SHAME AND SHAME ALIKE.—A certain king of Spain had promised to bestow relief upon the people of the country round Burgos, who had been ruined by war. They flocked in great numbers, but the treasurer would not let them in except on condition of having half of what they should get. Having consented to this, the countrymen entered the royal hall, where their leader knelt at the monarch's feet, and said, "I beseech your Majesty to command that every one of us here shall receive a hundred lashes!" "An odd petition truly," said the king; "why do you ask for such a thing?" "Sir, Sir," replied the peasant, "your Majesty's treasurer and the door-keepers insist on having half of whatever you give us."

A Californian paper tells of a hunter who killed nine thousand snipes at four shots, and the air was full of falling birds for several days, and to speak of the great number of cripples hobbling about the ground. Munchausen couldn't do more.

THE "GREAT SEA-SERPENT" FOUND AT LAST.

We publish on the following page an engraving of the "Great Sea-Serpent," from a sketch kindly sent us from Bermuda, on the coast of which island it seems that this famous creature has at length made his first appearance on dry land.

It appears that on 2d January last two gentlemen, walking on the beach of Harrington Sound, heard a strange splashing in the water, and almost directly afterward saw "a huge sea-monster" stranded on the shore, and rapidly dying from exhaustion. It was bright and silvery in color, without scales, and, as compared to those, about fifteen feet long.

Of course so strange a visitor attracted a great deal of attention, and among others, a fellow of the Linnæan Society of London, Mr. Matthew Jones, who happened to be on the island, hastened to examine the serpent. His report is as follows:

"Order, Acanthopterygii: Family, Cepotoni: Genus, Gymnetrus: Species, ——: Body oblong, compressed; naked, tuberculated; cuticle, a silvery covering of metallic lustre. Length, from head to caudal extremities, sixteen feet seven inches. Depth, at fourteen inches from facial commencement, nine inches, and decreasing gradually to near the vertical extremity of the stomach, when it attained its greatest depth of seven inches, and then decreased by degrees to the caudal commencement, which at the same distance and through the spinal column, two and a half by four inches.

"These dimensions are in the extreme.

"From the facial extremity of the snout expanding a slight depression at the occiput to the position at which the dorsal commences, a series of eight fins were taken, a gradual elevation of the dorsal ridge took place, and from the capital portion of this ridge arose, at equal distances from each other, a series of seven erect, quill-like, flexible filaments, from two to three feet in extent, gradually decreasing from base to apex, and possessing, in the case of the three longest, lanceolate points. These equidistant filaments were in connection of the three anterior ones, unconnected by membrane. From this series of lengthened elements, all along the back, from head to tail, extended a series of membranous fins, as closely situate to each other as to present the appearance of a single fin, the rays of each being united to the individual fin joined by the connecting membrane. The membrane of the right ventral, which is the position of the right ventral was sufficiently complete to enable me to state that it contained twelve spines. Anal and caudal fins absent.

"Head, truncated, compressed; facial outline of a dark color.

"Mouth, so damaged as not to be positively determinable at present, and separated from the fish from the portions of jaw still remaining, I should pronounce it intermaxillaries.

"Eyes, fourteen lines in diameter, slightly depressed, lobes, three and a half lines in width, of a bright silver, investing pupil of a somewhat dark color, and, in color, a light transparent blue.

"Stomach, a membranous chamber extending from beneath the gills to the anal extremity, five feet. Unfortunately this stomach had been opened and its contents partially injured before I saw the specimen; but a large proportion of mill, cuticle, etc., has been preserved including the major portion of the swimming bladder, which for so large a fish may be considered small. The color, so light, is evanescent. This swimming bladder contained a large amount of oily matter, and a piece thrown on the rutted surface of the water immediately subdued the agitation.

"Gill rays, eight in number, four to a side, crimson, flabellate; the anterior pairs furnished with double rows of tubelli, having the internals white, and armed on their inner side with minute dark-blue spinules.

"Gill covers, bony, radiate; not entirely covering the gills.

"Teeth. No appearance of any.

"In conclusion I have above described [from] it must be state that it was a male fish, and from the extremely fragile nature of its various parts I may venture to express an opinion that it had by no means attained maturity. I may also remark that my measurements were taken twenty-four hours after death, during which time it had lain exposed on the rocky shore."

Mr. Jones adds:

"The most notable fact, in connection with the capture of the present specimen, will doubtless be the interest and attention it will produce in the scientific world, for most assuredly we have in the specimen now before us many of the peculiarities, even to the minutest, the appearance of which hitherto apocryphal monster, the Great Sea-Serpent, so detailed by navigators, is invested. The long-known and somewhat crescentic eye, joined assiduously by the connecting membrane, and extending to the dorsal fins, which, viewed from a vessel's deck, present to the spectator the same so accurately described as a singular feature in the gigantic specimen seen by Captain M'Quhe, R.N., and officers, of H. M. S. Daedalus. Then again, the rapidity with which the last individual specimen moved through the water would coincide with the capabilities of a member of this genus; for the motive power produced by the fish on striking its tail, coupled with the extremely compressed form of body from the head throughout, must be immense.

"Here, then, we have a partial elucidation of the various statements which have at intervals appeared in the columns of the widest presses of England and America, emanating from the pens of travelers, and usually headed 'Occurrence of the Great Sea-Serpent.'"

Most people will be inclined to concur with Mr. Jones in identifying this Gymnetrus with the sea-serpent. A serpent which, in infancy, was sixteen feet long, may well be supposed to attain any size at maturity.

HON. JOHN SHERMAN.

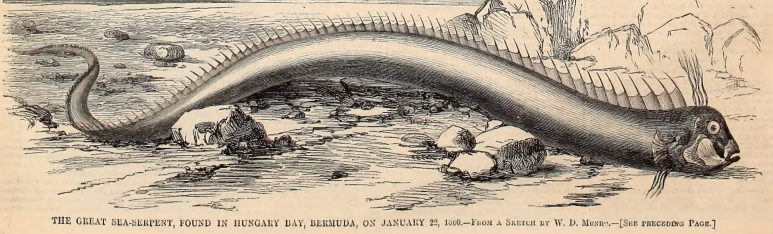
HON. JOHN SHERMAN, a Representative in Congress from the thirteenth district of the State of Ohio, is descended from the Sherman family of Connecticut, which settled there in 1635. His great-grandfather, Taylor Sherman (a connection of Roger Sherman), was a leading member of the Committee of Safety in the struggle for Independence. His father, Charles Robert Sherman, was one of the first emigrants from New England to Ohio, then called "The West," and he settled at Lancaster in the year 1810. After having for some years practiced law with success, he was elevated to the bench, and died in 1829, while presiding as a Judge of the Supreme Court. He was universally respected throughout the State as a pure and upright citizen, an able lawyer, and a sound and incorruptible jurist.

John Sherman, born on the 10th of May, 1823, at Lancaster, Ohio, was left at the death of his father one of a large family, with but slender means of support. After attending the public schools and academies in Lancaster and in Mount Vernon Counties until he was fifteen years of age, he joined a party of civil engineers, then engaged on that branch of the public works of the State of Ohio known as the "Muskingum Improvement." He was attached for two years to this party, which was under the command of Hon. S. R. Curtis, an ex-officer of the army, who has since distinguished himself in the Mexican War, and is now Mr. Sherman's colleague as a Representative from the State of Iowa.

In 1840 Mr. Sherman entered the office of Judge Parker, at Mansfield (his present residence), as a student of law; and so diligently did he apply himself, that he was admitted to the bar the day he was at legal age, in 1844. He soon after entered into partnership with his brother, C. T. Sherman, Esq., who enjoyed a high reputation as a commercial lawyer, and at once took a prominent position at the bar. While his brother counseled clients and attended to the office business, he appeared in court.

The region of country in which Mr. Sherman resides was principally settled by Pennsylvanians, strongly attached to Democratic principles. An enthusiastic Whig himself, he was thus virtually disqualified for the receipt of any elective office; nor was he a candidate until the caucus which resulted in his election to Congress. He was, however, chosen as the Whig delegate to the National Convention of '48, at Philadelphia, where he supported General Scott; but after the nomination of General Taylor zealously engaged in securing his election. In '52 he was appointed (with the Hon. S. F. Vinton) a Senatorial delegate to the Whig National Convention at Baltimore, where he had the satisfaction of seeing General Scott nominated. Neither was it his fault that the old hero was not elected, for he was an active participant in the campaign.

After the political agitation produced by the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, in 1854, two ex-Members of Congress—both Democrats, and supporters of the Kansas-Nebraska bill—presented themselves as candidates for Congress in the Mansfield District. A Convention of Whigs, Democrats, and others opposed to the Kansas-Nebraska bill, was called, and at its meeting Mr. Sherman was unanimously nominated. The contest was a warm one, but he was elected by about 3000 majority, and has since been twice re-elected.



HON. JOHN SHERMAN, OF OHIO.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

As a member of the Kansas Investigating Committee Mr. Sherman wrote an elaborate and able report, which was adopted as a standard authority by his political friends, and was denounced by their opponents. In this report, as in his speeches on the subsequent endeavors to give Kansas a State Government, he has taken a firm but temperate stand. "I trust," said he, in debate, "that the same sense of fraternal kindness that guided our fathers in their Revolutionary struggle will smoothed many difficulties in the formation of this government; and, more potent than all else, that the guiding hand of Divine Providence may save our beloved country from the shock of civil strife or civil revolution."—"Let us not war with each other; but, with the grasp of fellowship and friendship, regarding to the full each other's rights, and kind to each other's faults, let us go hand in hand in securing to every portion of our people their constitutional rights."

Mr. Sherman has acquitted himself with great credit as a member of the Committees on Foreign Affairs and on Naval Affairs, in which latter capacity he interposed an able and conclusive defense of the course of Commodore Paulding at San Juan. During the last session of Congress he was distinguished for his opposition to extravagant expenditures; and as a member of a special committee of investigation into naval affairs, he exposed glaring abuses with merciless zeal. At the same time he has ever been willing to vote liberal appropriations for carrying on the operations of Government; and he urged the giving to the soldiers of the war of 1812 and the Indian wars the same honor and the same reward which a grateful country has extended to the Revolutionary patriots.

On the first ballot for Speaker of the present Congress, December 5, 1859, Mr. Sherman had 66 votes, Mr. Bocock 86, Mr. Grow 43, Mr. Botelor 14—the remainder were scattering. At the next balloting Mr. Sherman received 107; and afterward, with the aid of Anti-Lecompton Democrats, attained to within three votes of a election. Week after week he retained this position. Nor were his friends willing that he should withdraw, until it was ascertained that a pledged band of his opponents would resist, by parliamentary stratagems, the adoption of the plurality rule. At last, on the 30th of January, 1860, they reluctantly consented, and at the fortieth ballot Mr. Sherman gracefully withdrew from the protracted contest, during which he had been placed in a most trying position, yet had so deported himself as to command general respect.

Mr. Sherman is evidently not ambitious to be ranked among the oratorical appendages of the House. Politics are with him a reality, not a pastime; and when he rises to address the House it is because he desires to give utterance to his deliberately formed opinions on some question of importance. These opinions, which cover the whole ground of debate, he so states as to make their full force apparent. His delivery is unaffected, graceful, and forcible. His gestures are pleasing, and his ability as a debater is manifest when he is questioned or interrupted by his opponents. He is of fair complexion, with auburn hair and beard, blue eyes, and a pleasing expression. Happily married to a daughter of the late Judge Stewart, of Ohio, he enjoys the attractions of home and the social pleasures of refined society. His many friends assert that he possesses warm feelings, unstinted generosity, grateful remembrance of kindness, and no disposition to revenge illiberal opposition, even when it has come from quarters where it was least to have been expected.

THE GREAT SEA-SERPENT, FOUND IN HUNGARY BAY, BERMUDA, ON JANUARY 22, 1860.—FROM A SKETCH BY W. D. MONRO.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

Mr. Sherman is now Chairman of the Ways and Means, in which all legislation involving expenditure of money is matured. The labor is necessarily great, especially as the Chairman of the Committee is expected to sustain its action before the House, and must therefore be "posted up" on all the various departments of Government. It is believed that Mr. Sherman will have the Appropriation Bills in readiness for legislative action at an earlier period of the session than has been customary, and that the evils of hurried sectional legislation just prior to final adjournment will be avoided. He will thus sustain his reputation, and add to his already strong claims for high honors at the hands of the people.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

[Printed from advance proof-sheets purchased from the author exclusively for "Harper's Weekly."]

MISS HALCOMBE'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

July 3.—Just as my head was on the door of my room I heard Sir Percival's voice calling to me from below.

"I must beg you to come down again," he said. "It is Fosco's fault, Miss Halcombe, not mine. He has started some nonsensical objection to his wife being one of the witnesses, and has obliged me to ask you to join us in the library."

I entered the room immediately with Sir Percival. Laura was waiting by the writing-table, twisting and turning her garden hat uneasily in her hands. Madame Fosco sat near her, in an arm-chair, imperturbably admiring her husband, who stood by himself at the other end of the library, picking off the dead leaves from the flowers in the window.

The moment I appeared the Count advanced to meet me, and to offer his explanations.

"A thousand pardons, Miss Halcombe," he said. "You know the character which is given to my countrymen by the English? We Italians are all wily and suspicious by nature, in the estimation of the good John Bull. Set me down, if you please, as being no better than the rest of my race. I am a wily Italian, and a suspicious Italian. You have thought so yourself, dear lady, have you not? Well! it is part of my wiliness and part of my suspicion to object to Madame Fosco being a witness to Lady Glyde's signature, when I am also a witness myself."

"There is not the shadow of a reason for his objection," interposed Sir Percival. "I have explained to him that the law of England allows Madame Fosco to witness a signature as well as her husband."

"I admit it," resumed the Count. "The law of England says Yes—but the conscience of Fosco says No." He spread out his fat fingers on the bosom of his blouse, and bowed solemnly, as if he wished to introduce his conscience to us all, in the character of an illustrious addition to the society. "What this document which Lady Glyde is about to sign may be," he continued, "I neither know nor desire to know. I only say this: circumstances may happen in the future which may oblige Percival, or his representatives, to appeal to the two witnesses; in which case it is certainly desirable that those witnesses should represent two opinions which are perfectly independent the one of the other. This can not be if my wife signs as well as myself, because we have but one opinion between us, and that opinion is mine. I will not have it cast in my teeth, at some future day, that Madame Fosco acted under my coercion, and was, in plain fact, no witness at all. I speak in Percival's interests when I propose that my name shall appear (as the nearest friend of the husband), and your name, Miss Halcombe (as the nearest friend of the wife). I am a Jesuit, if you please to think so—a splitter of straws—a man of trifles, and crotchets, and scruples—but you will humor me, I hope, in this one consideration for my suspicious Italian character, and my uneasy Italian conscience." He bowed again, stepped back a few paces, and withdrew his conscience from our society as politely as he had introduced it.

The Count's scruples might have been honorable and reasonable enough, but there was something in his manner of expressing them which increased my unwillingness to be concerned in the business of the signature. No consideration of any importance than my consideration for Laura would have induced me to consent to be a witness at all. One look, however, at her anxious face decided me to risk anything rather than desert her.

"I will readily remain in the room," I said. "And if I find no reason for objecting my small scruples on my side you may rely on me as a witness."

Sir Percival looked at me sharply, as if he was about to say something. But at the same moment Madame Fosco attracted his attention by rising from her chair. He looked at both her husband's eyes, and had evidently received her orders to leave the room.

"You needn't go," said Sir Percival.

Madame Fosco looked for her orders again, got them again, said she would prefer having me to our business, and resolutely walked out. The Count lit a cigarette, went back to the flowers in the window, and gently blew jets of smoke at the leaves, in a state of the deepest anxiety about killing the insects.

Meanwhile, Sir Percival unlocked a cupboard beneath one of the book-cases, and produced from it a piece of parchment, folded, longwise, many times over. He placed it on the table, opened the last fold only, and kept his hand on the rest. The last fold displayed a strip of blank parchment, with little dots stuck on it at certain places. Every line of the writing was hidden in the part which he still held closed under his hand. Laura and I looked at each other. Her face was pale—but it showed no indecision and no fear.

Sir Percival dipped a pen in ink, and handed it to his wife.

"Sign your name there," he said, pointing to the place. "You and Fosco are to sign afterward, Miss Halcombe, opposite those two x's. Come here, Fosco, and see that your signature is not to be done by mooning out of window and smoking into the flowers."

The Count threw away his cigarette, and joined us at the table, with his hands carelessly thrust into the scarlet belt of his blouse, and his eyes steadily fixed on Sir Percival's hand. Laura, who was on the other side of her husband, with the pen in her hand at the time, saw the Count glance between them, holding the folded parchment down firmly on the table, and glancing across at me, as I sat opposite to her, with such a sinister mixture of suspicion and embarrassment in his face, that he looked more like a prisoner at the bar than a gentleman in his own house.

"Sign there!" he repeated, turning sharply on Laura, and pointing once more to the place on the parchment.

"What is it I am to sign?" she asked, quietly.

"I have told you, to explain," he answered. "The dog-cart is at the door, and I must go directly. Besides, if I had time, you wouldn't understand it. It is a purely formal document—full of legal technicalities, and all that sort of thing. Come! come! sign your name, and let us have done as soon as possible."

"I ought surely to know what I am signing, Sir Percival, before I write my name?"

"Nonsense! — What have women to do with business? I tell you again, you can't understand it."

"As my rate, let me try to understand it. Whenever Mr. Gilmore had my business for me to do, he always explained it first; and I always understood him."

"I dare say he did. He was your servant, and was obliged to explain. I am your husband, and am not obliged. How much longer do you mean to keep me here? I tell you again, there is no time for reading any thing: the dog-cart is waiting at the door. Once for all, will you sign, or will you not?"

She still laid the pen in her hand, but she made no approach to signing her name with it.

"If my signature pledges me to any thing," she said, "surely I have some claim to know what that pledge is?"

He lifted up the parchment, and struck it angrily on the table.

"Speak out!" he said. "You were always famous for telling the truth. Never mind Miss Halcombe; never mind Fosco — say, in plain terms, you distrust me."

The Count took one of his hands out of his belt, and laid it on Sir Percival's shoulder. Sir Percival shook it off irritably. The Count put it on again with unruffled composure.

"Control your unfortunate temper, Percival," he said. "Remember, I have a right."

"Right!" cried Sir Percival. "A wife right in distrusting her husband?!"

"It is natural for her to accuse me of distrusting you," said Laura. "Ask Marian if I am not justified in wanting to know what this writing requires of me before I sign it?"

"I won't have any appeals made to Miss Halcombe," retorted Sir Percival. "Miss Halcombe has nothing to do with the matter."

I had not spoken hitherto, and I would much rather not have spoken now. But the expression of distress in Laura's face when she turned it toward me, and the insolent injustice of her husband's conduct left me no other alternative than to give my opinion, for her sake, as soon as I was asked for it.

"Excuse me, Sir Percival," I said—"but, as one of the witnesses to the signature, I venture to think that I have something to do with the matter. Laura's question seems to me to be a perfectly fair one; and, speaking for myself only, I can not assume the responsibility of witnessing her signature, unless she first understands what the writing is which you wish her to sign."

"A cool declaration, upon my soul!" cried Sir Percival. "The next time you invite your left to a man's house, Miss Halcombe, I recommend you not to repay his hospitality by taking his wife's side against him in a matter that doesn't concern you."

I started to my feet as suddenly as if he had struck me. If I had been a man I would have knocked him down on the hearthstone of his own door, and have left his house, never, on any earthly consideration, to enter it again. But I was only a woman—and I loved his wife so dearly!

Think God, that faithful love helped me, and I sat down again without saying a word. She knew what I had suffered and what I had suppressed, and she looked to me, with the tears streaming from her eyes. "Oh, Marian!" she whispered softly. "If my mother had been alive could she have been more for me!"

"Come back and sign!" cried Sir Percival, from the other side of the table.

"Shall I?" she asked of my ear; "I will, if you tell me."

"No," I answered. "The right and the truth are on our side—sign nothing, unless you have read it first."

"Come back and sign!" he reiterated, in his loudest and angriest tones.

The Count, who had watched Laura and me with a close and silent attention, interposed for the second time.

"Percival!" he said. "I remember that I am in the presence of ladies. Be good enough, if you please, to remember it too."

Sir Percival turned on him, speechless with passion. The Count's fat hand slowly tightened its grasp on his shoulder, and the Count's steady voice quietly repeated, "Be good enough, if you please, to remember it too."

They both looked at each other. Sir Percival slowly drew his shoulder from under the Count's hand; slowly raised his face away from the Count's eyes; doggedly looked down for a little while, and then sat down at the table; and then spoke, with the sullen submission of a tamed animal rather than the becoming resignation of a man conquered.

"I don't want to offend any body," he said. "But my wife's obstinacy is enough to try the patience of a saint. I have told her this is merely a formal document—and what more can she want? You may say what you please; but it is the part of a woman's duty to set her husband at defiance. Once more, Lady Glyde, and for the last time, will you sign or will you not?"

Laura returned to his side of the table, and took up the pen again.

"I will sign with pleasure," she said, "if you will only treat me as a responsible being. I have little what sacrifice is required of me, if it will affect no one else, and lead to no ill results—"

"Who talked of a sacrifice being required of you?" he broke in, with a half-suppressed return of his former violence.

"I only meant," she resumed, "that I would refuse no concession which I could honorably make. If I have a scruple about signing my name to an engagement of which I know nothing, why should you visit it on me so severely? It is rather hard, I think, to treat Count Fosco's scruple so much more indulgently than you have treated mine."

This reference, yet most natural, reference to the Count's extraordinary power over her husband, incurred as it was, set Sir Percival's smouldering temper on fire again in an instant.

"Scruples!" he repeated. "Your scruples! It is rather late in the day for you to be scrupulous. I should have thought you had got over all weakness of that sort when you made a virtue of necessity by marrying me."

The instant he spoke those words Laura threw down the pen—looked at him with an expression in her eyes which, throughout all my experience of her, I had never seen in them before—and turned her back on him in dead silence.

This strong expression of the most open and the most bitter contempt was so entirely unlike herself, so utterly out of her character, that it amazed us all. There was something hidden, beyond a doubt, under the mere surface-brutality of the words which her husband had just addressed to her. There was some lurking insult beneath them, of which I was wholly ignorant, but which had left the mark of its profanation so plainly on her face that even a stranger might have seen it.

The Count, who was no stranger, saw it as distinctly as I did. When I left my chair to join Laura I heard him whisper under his breath to Sir Percival: "You idiot!"

Laura walked before me to the door as I advanced, and at the same time her husband spoke to her once more.

"You positively refuse, then, to give me your signature?" he said, in the altered tone of a man who was conscious that he had let his own license of language seriously injure him.

"After what you have said to me," she replied, firmly, "I refuse my signature until I have read every line in that parchment from the first word to the last. Come away, Marian, we have remained here long enough."

"One moment!" interposed the Count, before Sir Percival could speak again—"one moment, Lady Glyde, I implore you!"

Laura would have left the room without noticing him, but I stopped her.

"Don't make an enemy of the Count!" I whispered. "Whatever you do, don't make an enemy of the Count!"

She yielded to me. I closed the door again; and we stood near it, waiting. Sir Percival sat down at the table, with his elbow on the folded parchment, and his head resting on his clenched fist. The Count stood between us—master of the dreadful position in which we were placed, as he was master of every thing else.

"Lady Glyde," he said, with a gentleness which seemed to address itself to our forlorn situation instead of to ourselves, "pray pardon me if I venture to offer one suggestion; and may believe that I speak out of the profound respect and my friendly regard for the mistress of this house." He turned sharply toward Sir Percival. "Is it absolutely necessary," he asked, "that this thing here, under your elbow, should be signed to-day?"

"It is necessary to my plans and wishes," replied the other, sullenly. "But that consideration, as you may have noticed, has no influence with Lady Glyde."

"Answer my plain question plainly. Can the business of the signature be put off till to-morrow—Yes, or No?"

"Yes—if you will have it so."

"Then what are you wasting your time for here? Let the signature wait till to-morrow—let it wait till you come back."

Sir Percival looked up with a frown and an oath.

"You are taking a tone with me that I don't like," he said. "A tone I won't bear from any man."

"I am advising you for your good," returned the Count, with a smile of quiet contempt. "Give yourself time; give Lady Glyde time. Have you forgotten that your dog-cart is waiting at the door? My tone surprises you, ha? I dare say it does; it is the tone of a man who can keep his temper. How many doses of good advice have I given you in my time? More than you can count. Have I ever been wrong? I defy you to quote me an instance of it. Go! take your drive. The matter of the signature can wait till to-morrow. Let it wait; and renew it when you come back."

Sir Percival hesitated and looked at his watch. His anxiety about the secret journey which he was to take that day, revived by the Count's words, was now evidently disarming possession of his mind with his anxiety to obtain Laura's signature. He considered for a little while, and then got up from his chair.

"SIGN THERE!"

"It is easy to argue me down," he said, "when I have no time to answer you. I will take your advice, Fosco—not because I want it, or believe in it, but because I can't stop here any longer." He paused, and looked round darkly at his wife. "If you don't give me your signature when I come back to-morrow—!" The rest was lost in the noise of his opening the book-case cupboard again and locking up the parchment once more. He took his hat and gloves off the table and made for the door. Laura had I drew back to let him pass. "Remember to-morrow!" he said to his wife, and went out.

We waited to give him time to cross the hall and drive away. The Count approached us while we were standing near the door.

"You have just seen Percival at his worst, Mrs Halcombe," he said. "As his old friend, I am sorry for him and ashamed of him. As his old friend, I promise you that he shall not break out to-morrow in the same disgraceful manner in which he has broken out to-day."

Laura had taken my arm while he was speaking, and she pressed it significantly when he had done. It would have been a hard trial to any woman to stand by and see the office of apologist for her husband's misconduct quietly assumed by his male friend in her own house; and it was a hard trial to Her. I thanked the Count coldly, and he left us. Yet I disliked him; for I felt already, with a sense of inexpressible helplessness and humiliation, that it was either his interest or his caprice to assume sure of my continuing to reside at Blackwater Park; and I knew, after Sir Percival's conduct to me that, under the support of the Count's influence, I could not hope to remain there. His influence, the influence of all others the dreaded most, was actually the one tie which now held me to Laura in the hour of her utmost need!

We heard the wheels of the dog-cart crashing on the gravel of the drive as we came out into the hall. Sir Percival had started on his journey.

"Where is he going to, Marian?" Laura whispered. "Is there any fresh thing he does secret to terrify me about the future. Have you any suspicions?"

After what she had undergone that morning, I was unwilling to tell her my suspicions.

"How should I know his secrets?" I said, evasively.

"I wonder if the housekeeper knows?" she persisted.

"Certainly not," I replied. "She must be quite as ignorant as we are."

Laura shook her head doubtfully.

"Did you not hear from the housekeeper that there was a report of Anne Catherick having been seen in this neighborhood? Do you think he may have gone away to look for her?"

"I would rather suppose myself, Laura, by not thinking about it at all; and after what has happened, you had better follow my example. Come into my room and rest and quiet yourself a little."

We sat down together close to the window, and let the fragrant summer air breathe over our faces.

"I am ashamed to look at you, Marian," she said, "after what you submitted to down stairs, for my sake. Oh, my own love, I am almost heart-broken when I think of it! But I will try to make it up to you—I will indeed!"

"Hush! hush!" I replied; "don't talk so. What is the mere mortification of my pride when compared to the dreadful sacrifice of your happiness?"

"You heard what he said to me?" she went on, quickly and vehemently. "You heard the words—but you don't know what they meant—you don't know why I threw down the pen and turned my back on him." She rose in sudden agitation, and walked about the room. "I have kept much suffering from your knowledge, Marian, for fear of distressing you, and making you unhappy at the very time when you were live. You don't know how he has used me. And yet, you ought to know, for you saw how he used me to-day. I have had him sneer at my presuming to be scrupulous; you heard him say I had made a virtue of necessity in marrying him." She broke again; her face flushed deeply, and her hands twisted and twined together in her lap. "I can't tell you about it now," she said. "I shall burst out crying if I tell you now—later, Marian, when I am more sure of myself. My poor head aches, darling—aches, aches, aches. Where is your smelling-bottle? Let me talk to you about yourself. I wish I had seen him in my stature, for your sake. Shall I give it to him to-morrow? I would rather compromise myself than compromise you. After your kindness to my part quarrel for him, by all the blame on you if I refuse again. What shall we do? Oh for a friend to help us and advise us—a friend we could really trust!"

She sighed bitterly. I saw in her face that she was thinking of Hartright—saw it the more plainly because her last words had set me thinking of him too. In six months only from her marriage we wanted the faithful service he had offered to us at our farewell words. How little once thought that we should ever want it at all!

"We must, we must!" she went on, passionately. I said. "Let us try to talk it over calmly, Laura—let us do all in our power to decide for the best."

That weighty clue she knew of her husband's embarrassments, and what I had heard of his conversation with the lawyer, together, we arrived necessarily at the conclusion that the parchment in the library had been drawn up for the purpose of borrowing money, and that Lawyer Kyrle's signature was absolutely necessary to fit it for the attainment of Sir Percival's object.

The second question, concerning the nature of the legal contract by which the money was to be obtained, and the degree of personal responsibility to which Laura might subject herself in signing it, I put in the dark, involved considerations which lay far beyond any knowledge and experience that either of us possessed. My own convictions led me to believe that the hidden contents of the parchment concealed a transaction of the meanest and the most fraudulent kind.

I had not formed this conclusion in consequence of Sir Percival's refusal to show the writing, or to explain it; for that refusal might well have proceeded from his obstinate disposition and his domineering temper alone. My sole motive for distrusting his honesty, sprang from the change which I had observed in his language and his manner when he entered the library. A change which convinced me that he had been acting a part throughout the whole period of his probation at Limmeridge House. His elaborate delicacy; his ceremonious politeness, which harmonized so agreeably with Mr. Gilmore's old-fashioned manners; his assumed regard for Laura, his candor with me, his moderation with Mr. Fairlie—all these were the artifices of a mean, cunning, and bad man, who had disguised his disguise when his practiced duplicity had gained its end, and had openly shown himself in the library as the master of the dark meaning of the grief which this discovery caused me on Laura's account, for it is not to be expressed by any words of mine. I will only say that at all hazards, it decided me to oppose her signing the parchment, whatever the consequences might be, unless she was first made acquainted with the contents.

Under these circumstances, the one chance for us, when to-morrow came, was to be provided with an objection to giving the signature, which might be taken on sufficiently commercial or legal grounds to shake Sir Percival's resolution, and to make him suspect that we were wrongly enlightened by the secret objections of business as well as himself.

After some pondering, I determined to write to the only friend within reach whom we could trust to help us discreetly in our forlorn situation. That man was Mr Gilmore's partner—Mr Kyrle. Without the business, now that our old friend had been obliged to withdraw from it, and to leave the management of his wealth. I explained to Laura that I had Mr. Gilmore's own authority for placing implicit confidence in that partner's integrity, honor, and long accurate knowledge of all her affairs; and, with her full approval, I sat down at once to write the letter.

I began by telling him my own secret clearly as it was; and then asked for his advice in return, expressed in plain, downright terms which we could understand, without any danger of misinterpretations and mistakes. My letter was as short as I could possibly make it, and was, I hope, unincumbered by unnecessary apologies or needless details.

Just as I was about to put the address on the envelope an obstacle was discovered by Laura, which, in the effort and preoccupation of writing, had escaped my notice entirely.

"How are we to get the answer in time?" she asked. "Your letter will not be delivered in London before to-morrow afternoon, and the post will not bring the reply here till the morning after."

The only way of overcoming this difficulty was to have the answer brought to us from the lawyer's office by a special messenger. I wrote a postscript to that effect, requesting the messenger might be dispatched with the reply by the eleven o'clock morning train, which would bring him to Limmeridge in sufficient time post one, and so enable him to reach Blackwater Park by two o'clock at the latest. He was to be directed to ask for me, and to repeat his questions addressed to him by any one else, and to deliver his letter into my hands and no others.

In case Sir Percival should come back to-morrow before two o'clock," I said to Laura, "the wisest course for us will be to be out in the grounds all the morning with your book or your work, and not to appear at the house till the messenger arrives, and time to consult with the letter. I will wait here for him all the morning to guard against my misadventures or mistakes. Is there anything more necessary? I hope and believe we shall avoid being taken by surprise. Let us go down to the drawing-room now. Or, perhaps, you would like to be out in the grounds all the morning with your book or your work, and not to appear at the house till the messenger arrives? I will take care to finish that Mr. Carter's resolutions were unfounded in fact. The House then went into Committee on the Civil Service and Revenue Departments and Pension Appropriation Votes, and the West India and Pension Appropriation Bills were laid aside to be reported to the House. The President's Annual Message to the House on Political and Mr. Spaulding (N.Y.) spoke against the President's veto of the St. Clair Flats Improvement bill. The House then adjourned till Monday.

INAUGURATION OF MILLS'S WASHINGTON.

The ceremony took place, as appointed, on 22d, notwithstanding very unfavorable weather. The Seventh Regiment left the city from New York to be present.

The column moved at about half-past three, and the other associations fell in. The sky had partially cleared up, and the column, extending over half a mile in length, preceded by Philharmonia avenue under pleasing auspices, swept the mud.

THE PLATFORM.

The column reached the President's house at about four o'clock under an unclouded sun. Altogether it was the finest military and civic display in Washington for many years. Pennsylvania Avenue was crowded with both combatants and spectators. The patriotic excitement was intense, owing to the anticipated interesting events. The view of the procession as it moved to the east of the great point of attraction was truly splendid.

The procession reached the circle the military wheeled to the right of the inclosure, while the promiscuous crowd entered it and took seats on the platform.

The Cabinet officers, with the exception of Secretary Floyd, Judge Campbell, the President, Vice-President, and Clark Mills, the artist, were in proximity to each other, and the centre of the day was, of course, conspicuous.

The platform was tastefully decorated with the flags of England, France, Russia, Prussia, Austria, Brazil, Chili, the Netherlands, Ecuador, Denmark, Portugal, Sardinia, Mexico, Venezuela, Naples, Hayti, Buenos Ayres, Paraguay, and Rome. Our own flag waved above all, and the dais was profusely decorated with the stripes and stars.

THE SPEECHES.

Senator Hammond introduced Mr. Mills, Mr. Nadal, who offered a prayer. Hon. Mr. Bocock, of Virginia, the orator of the day, then delivered an oration. Appropriate remarks were also made by Mr. Clark Mills, Mr. Whiting, Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Masons at Washington, and the President.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

Mr. Buchanan was greeted with general and prolonged applause. He spoke in a distinct and animated tone, as follows:—

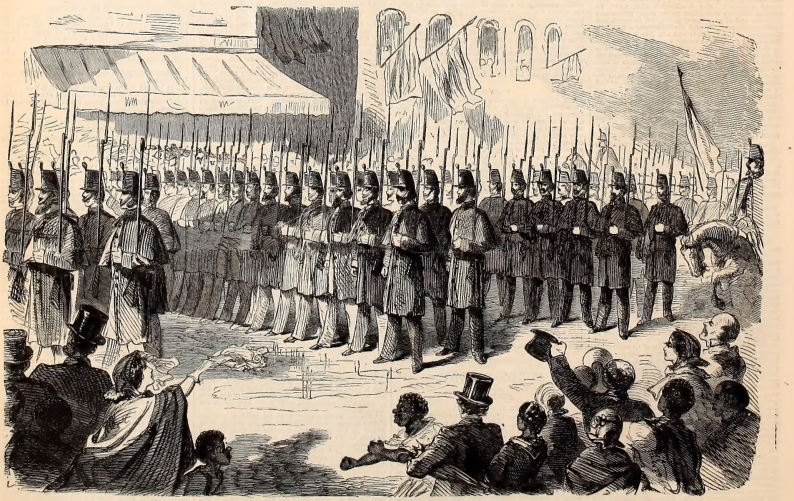
Fellow-Citizens,—I accept this most complimentary but now proceeded to us in this calm sunset almost without a cloud. The early part of the day was boisterous. Many accidents were reported to me by the police before the completion of these ceremonies. But these occurrences have terminated in thank God, always the case in the case in the history of our country. Arkansas and Tennessee are now sending the news of their safety. The sky still clear, bright, and animating. Such, I trust, will ever be the case on this green and sacred spot, and the reason appear to envelop us. (Applause.) The honorable and distinguished gentleman who has just left the chair, in laying the statue of Washington, which is a noble production, has presented to the people of this vicinity a most grateful task to be called to perform. Gentlemen here assembled, from all the commanding position, surrounded by the banners of the Representative States of the Confederacy, and by a vast assemblage of our fellow-citizens, civil and military, and to fall view of the river Potomac, which Washington loved so well, and of the shores of the United Commonwealths which, with one birth, I now solemnly dedicate this statue to the immortal memory of the father of his Country. (Applause.) I perform this act of pious devotion, not in the name of the people of the District or the States, but of the West—not in the name of those who dwell on the waters of the Atlantic or the Pacific—but in the name of the whole American people of the United States, one and indivisible, now and forever. (Loud applause and cries of "Hurrah for Old Buck!") May the God of our fathers forever bless and preserve the Union for ages yet to come. May they stand like the everlasting hills, against which the storms from every quarter of the compass shall beat in vain. In a word, may they endure as long as the moon endures, as shall be honored and blessed alone among the children of men. (Renewed and prolonged applause.) May Washington, "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," now and forever, and to fall view of the Capitol, and to fall view of the Federal City, and to fall view of the

THE INAUGURATION OF CLARK MILLS'S STATUE OF WASHINGTON, ON FEBRUARY 22, 1860.

THE SEVENTH REGIMENT NEW YORK STATE MILITIA IN THE CARS EN ROUTE FOR WASHINGTON.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN ARTIST.]

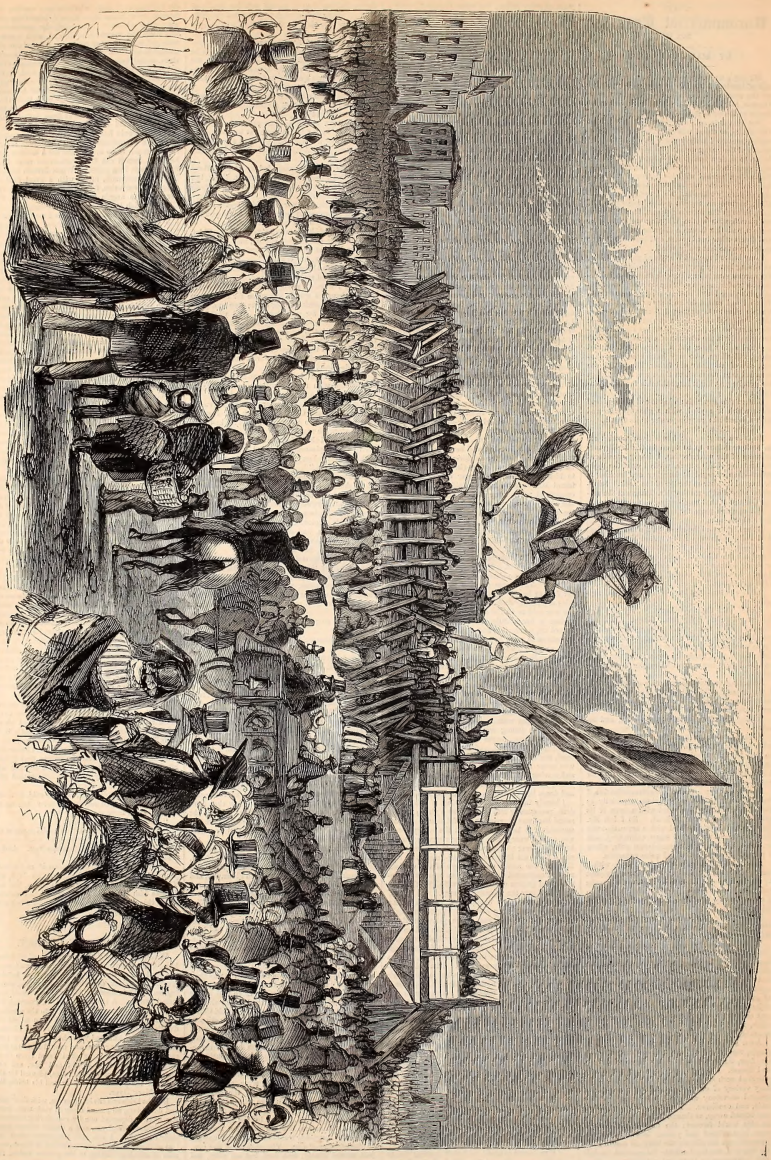
We published in last number an engraving of Clark Mills's statue of Washington, which was inaugurated on 22d at the Federal Capital. We now publish an illustration of the ceremony of inauguration, and two illustrations of the share taken in that event by the famed Seventh Regiment of New York State Militia.

The Seventh left New York on the evening of 21st, and arrived at Washington, after many vexatious delays, at 11·30 A.M. on 22d. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, the ceremonies were commenced without delay. The Seventh took its place in the line, and the procession proceeded up Pennsylvania Avenue to the President's House. An eye-witness observed:



"The principal feature in the whole procession was the presence of the Seventh Regiment. On the route of march they proceeded in column by companies. The carriage of the men was erect, their hand discoursed most excellent music, and they moved with the precision of a grand piece of machinery.

Another writer says:



"The New York Seventh Regiment was the greatest attraction of the procession, containing eight full companies, each extending nearly from curb to curb. The Baltimore battalion of City Guards, in point of discipline and numbers, elicited universal comments. The Law Greys were small in number compared with the foregoing, but were highly disciplined, and attracted much attention. The corps of Marines stationed at the Washington Navy Yard, one hundred and sixty in number, had the right of the column, and received the cheers of the spectators as they passed. The ordnance men, about fifty in number, made a fine display as a full company of light artillery. The Georgetown College Cadets made a creditable appearance in point of numbers and discipline. The Alexandria military participated, and made a fine martial appearance. The Fort Tobacco Cavalry—a new company, said to be the wealthiest corps in the country—added much to the interest of the procession.

"None of the diplomatic corps were present. They were assigned a place in the programme immediately after the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, but this they declined to occupy."

The account of the ceremony will be found in the news pages.

THE SEVENTH REGIMENT MARCHING UP PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE, WASHINGTON CITY.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN ARTIST.]

THE INAUGURATION OF CLARK MILLS'S STATUE OF WASHINGTON, BY PRESIDENT BUCHANAN, AT WASHINGTON, D. C., FEBRUARY 22, 1860.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN ARTIST.]

THE Uncommercial Cravler. NO. II.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

My day's no-business beckoning me to the east end of London, I had turned my face to that point of the metropolitan compass on leaving Covent Garden, had got past the India House, and at last began to file off to the right, toward Wapping.

Not that I intended to take boat at Wapping Old Stairs, or that I was going to look at the locality, because I believe (or I don't) in the constancy of the young woman who told her sea-going lover, to wash a beautiful old tune, that she had ever continued the same, since she gave him the bacco-box marked with his name; I am afraid he usually got the worst of those transactions, and was frightfully taken in. No, I was going to Wapping, because an eastern police magistrate had said, lately, in the morning papers, that there was no classification at the Wapping work-house for women, and that it was a disgrace, and a shame, and divers other hard names, and because I wished to see how the fact really stood.

Long before I reached Wapping I gave myself up as having lost my way, and, abandoning myself to the narrow streets in a Turkish frame of mind, relied on predestination to bring me somewhere or other to the place I wanted if I were ever to get there. When I had ceased for an hour or so to take any trouble about the matter, I found myself on a swing-bridge, looking down at some dark locks in a some dirty water. Over against me stood a creature remotely like the likeness of a young man, with a puffed sallow face, and a figure all dirty, and shiny, and dingy, who may have been originally great sons of his filthy old father, Thames, or the drowned man about whom there was a placard on the granite post like a large thimble that stood between us.

I asked this apparition what it called the place? There was built it appeared, with a gaunt grin, and with a sound like gurgling water in its throat,

"Minster Baker's trap."

As it is a matter of great sensitiveness with me on such occasions to be equal to the intellectual pressure of the conversation, I deeply considered the meaning of this speech, while I eyed it from position—then engaged in hugging and sucking a horizontal iron bar at the top of the sleek. Inspiration rewarded me, that Mr. Baker was the acting Coroner of that neighbourhood.

"A common place for suicide," said I, looking down at the locks.

"Soe!" returned the ghost, with a stare. "Yes! And Poll. Likewise Emly. And Nancy. And Jane"—he sucked the iron between each name—"and all the libeing. Ketches off their bonnets or shoes, keows, and headers down here, they does. Always a headerin' down here, they is. Like one o'clock."

And I said about hour of the morning, I suppose?"

"Ah!" said the apparition. "They an't partickler. Two after the hour. There. All times o' night. O'ny mind you!" Here the apparition rested its profile on the bar, and gurgled in a sarcastic manner. "There must be somebody comin'. They don't go a headerin' down here, wen there an't no Bobby nor gen'al Cove, far to hear the splash."

According to my interpretation of these words it was myself a General Cove, or member of the miscellaneous public. In which modest character I remarked:

"They are often taken out, are they, and restored?"

"I dunno about restored," said the apparition, who, for some inscrutable reason, very much objected to that word; "they're carried into the werkiss and put into a 'ot bath, and brought round. But I dunno about restored," said the apparition; "that is'nt—and vanished.

As it had shown a desire to become offensive, I was not sorry to be find myself alone, especially as the "werkiss" it had indicated with a twist of its twisted head, was close at hand. So I left Mr. Baker's terrible trap (baited with a scum that was like the soapy linings of cooky chimneys), and made bold to ring at the work-house gate, where I was wholly unexpected and quite unwanted.

A very bright and nimble little matron, with a bunch of keys in her hand, responded to my request to see the House. I began to doubt whether the police magistrate was quite right in his facts, when I noticed how quick active little figure and her intelligent eyes.

The Traveler (the matron intimated) should see the worst first. She was welcome to see every thing. Such as it was, there it all was.

So it was the only preparation for our entering the Fever wards." They were in an old building squeezed away in a corner of a paved yard, quite detached from the more modern and spacious main body of the work-house. They were in a building most monstrously behind the time—a mere series of grottos or lairs, with every inconvenience and objectionable circumstance in their construction, and only accessible by steep and narrow staircases, infamously ill adapted for the passing up stairs of the sick, or down stairs of the dead.

Shed in these miserable rooms, here on bedsteads, there on mattresses, as I understand it on the floor, were women in every stage of distress and disease. None but those who have attentively observed such scenes can conceive the extraordinary variety of expression still latent under the general monotony and uniformity of color, attitude, and condition. The form a little coiled up and turned away, as though it had turned its back on this world forever; the uninterested face at once lead-colored and yellow, looking passively upward from the pillow; the haggard mouth a little dropped, the hand outside the coverlet, going for and indifferent, so light and yet so heavy; these were on every pallet; but when I stopped beside a bed, and said ever so slight a word to the figure lying there, the ghost of the old character came into the face, and made the Fool ward as various as the fair world. No one appeared to care to live, but no one complained; all who could speak said that as much was done for them as could be done there, that the attendance was kind and patient, that their suffering was very heavy, but they had nothing to ask for. (It is the general cry when an clean and sweet as it is possible such rooms to be; they would require a pest-house in a single week if they were ill-kept.

I accompanied the brisk matron up another barrack staircase, into a better room, and was directed to the idiotic and imbecile. There was at least Light in it, whereas the windows in the former wards had been like slits in a prison-house passages. There was a strong grating over the fire here, and, holding a kind of state on either side of the hearth, were seated, in the full light of the grating, two very old ladies in a condition of feeble dignity, which was surely the very last and lowest reduction of self-consciousness that there is in this wonderful humanity of ours. They were evidently jealous of each other, and passed their whole time (as some people do, where fires are grateful) in mentally disparaging each other, and contemptuously watching their neighbors. Some of these specles on provincial gentlewomen was extremely talkative, and expressed a strong desire to attend the service on Sundays, from which the circumstances of London have derived the greatest interest and consolation when allowed that privilege. She gossiped so well, and looked about her so much like a lady herself, that I began to think this a case for the Eastern magistrate, until I found that on the last occasion of her attending chapel she had taken a pocket and stole, and had caused some confusion in the response by suddenly producing it and belabering the congregation.

So these two old ladies, separated by the breath of the grating—otherwise they would fly at one another's throats—sat all day long composing one another, and contemplating a world of fits. For every body else in the room had fits, except the watchwoman: an elderly, stale-bodied creature, with a large upper lip, and an air of repression, and saving of her strength. She sat quite still with her hands folded before her, and her eyes slowly rolling, biding her time for catching or holding somebody. This civil creature was quite above the interest to identify a reduced member of my honorable friend Mrs. Gamp's family) said, "They has 'em continual, Sir. They has more than one room entire than if they was coach-horses dropped from the moon, Sir. And when one drops, another drops, and sometimes both. There's as many as four to've on 'em at once, dear me, a rollin' and a tearin', bless you!—this young woman, now, has one dreadful bad."

She turned up this young woman's face with her hand as she said it. This young woman was seated in the light, pondering, in the profoundest of distraction. There was nothing repellant either in her face or mind. Very apparently were, variéties of epilepsy and hysteria were about her, but she was said to be the worst there. When I had spoken to her, and she had looked at me, had turned up, pondering, and a gleam of the mid-day sun shone in upon her.—Whether this young woman, in the days of her health, had been afraid, as they sit or lie pondering in their confused, dull way, ever get mental glimpses among the notes in the sunlight, of healthy people, and having things? Whether this young woman, brooding like this in the summer season, ever thinks that somewhere there are trees and flowers, even mountains and the great sea? Whether, not to go so far, this young woman ever has any dim revelation of that young woman who is dying woman who is not here, never will come here, who is created, and lives, and loves, and, and has a husband, and bears children, and lives in a home, and who never knows what it is to have this sullen and tearing pressure on her brain? I know what this young woman, God help her, gives herself up then, and drops like a coach-horse from the moon?

I hardly know whether to mention that infant children, penetrating into so hopeless a place, made a sound that was pleasant or painful to me. It was something to be reminded that the misery in it was not all weary, and was ever renewing itself; but this young woman was a child not long ago, and a child not long passed from under its skin. Howbeit, the active step and eye of the vigilant matron conducted me past the two provincial gentlewomen (whose dignity was roused by the children) and into the adjacent nursery.

There were two babies here, and more than one handsome young mother. There were ugly young mothers also, and sullen young mothers and callow young mothers. But the babies had not appropriated to themselves any bad expression yet, and might have been, for any thing that appeared to the contrary in their faces, Princes Imperial, and Princesses Royal. I had the pleasure of giving a practical commission to the baker's boy to take care of the baby, and found it fun to into the oven for one red-headed young pauper and myself, and felt much the better for it. Without that refreshment, I doubt if I could have been in a condition for "the Refractories," toward whom my guide then turned her way next, and marshaled me the way that I was going.

The Refractories were picking oakum in a small room gloomily warmed by a fire-place in a dark form, with their backs to a window; before them, a table and their work. The oldest Refractor was, you twenty; youngest Refractory, say sixteen. I have never yet ascertained, in the course of my uncommercial travels, why a Refractory habit should affect the tonsils and uvula; but I have always observed that Refractories of both sexes and every grade, between a Ragged School and the Old Bailey, have one voice, in which the tonsils and uvula gain a diseased ascendancy.

"Five years and I should be twenty, going for to pick five pound," said the Chief of the Refractories, keeping time to herself with her head and chin. "More than enough to pick what we picks now, in sitch a place as this, and 6a wot we gets here!"

[This was in acknowledgment of a delicate intimation that the amount of work was likely to be increased. "Not that I mind it myself, mum, for one Refractory had already done her day's task—it was barely two o'clock—and was sitting behind it, with her hands folded, "but some mow it.)

"A pretty Ouse this is, matron, ain't it?" said Refractory Two, "where a plesesman's called in if a gal says a word!"

"And wen you're sent to prison for nothink or less!" said the Chief, tugging at her oakum, as if it were the matron's hair. "But any place is better than this; that's one thing, and be thankful!"

A laugh of Refractories, led by Oakum Head with folded arms—who originated nothing, but who was in command of the skirmishers outside the conversation.

"If any place is better than this," said my brisk guide, in the calmest manner, "it is a pity you left a good place when you had one."

"Ho, no, I didn't, matron," returned the Chief, with another pull at her oakum, and a very expressive look at the enemy's forehead. "Don't say that, matron, 'cos it's lies!"

Oakum Head was brought up the skirmishers again, skirmished, and retired.

"I wasn't a going," exclaimed Refractory Two, "though I was in one place for as long as four years—J wasn't a going for to stop in a place of that sort, for all the Missis's fine talk and the fam'ly warn't 'speetable characters—there! And where I fort nately or bunfort'nately found that to be people worth calling so, or pretended to make themselves out to be—there! And where it wasn't their faults, by chalks, if I warn't made bad and hardened—like!"

During this speech Oakum Head had again made a diversion with the skirmishers, and had again retired.

The Uncommercial Traveler ventured to remark that he supposed Chief Refractory and Number One to be in the same room when he had been taken before the magistrate?

"Yes, Sir," said the Chief, "we har! and the wonder is, that a plesesman an't 'ad in now, and we took off sgen. You can't open your lips here without a plesesman's 'ead."

Number Two laughed (very urvularly), and the skirmishers followed suit.

"I'm sure I was thankful," protested the Chief, looking sideways at the Uncommercial, "if I could be got into a place, or got abroad. I'm sick and tired of this perpetooal life. I am, with reason."

So would he, and so was, Number Two. So would be, and so was, Oakum Head. So would we all and so were Refractories.

The Uncommercial took the liberty of hinting that he hardly thought it probable that any lady would undertake to be a likely young domestic of retiring manners, would be to opted into the engagement of either of the two sading Refractories, on her own presentation of herself as per sample.

"It ain't no good being nothink else," said the Chief.

The Uncommercial thought it worth the worth trying.

"Oh no, it ain't," said the Chief.

"Not a bit of good," said Number Two.

"And I'm sure," said Oakum Head, "to get into a place, or got abroad," said the Chief.

"And so should I," said Number Two. "Truly thankful I should be."

Oakum Head then rose, and announced as an entirely new idea, the mention of which profound sagacity had not yet suggested to her sister to be done" So I decoyed myself into another train of thought to ease my heart. But I don't know that I did it. It was so full of misery, that it was, after all, only a change to a single pauper, who had in possession of my remembrance instead of a thousand.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," he had said, in a confidential manner, as we were passing out, taking me aside, "but I have seen better days."

"I am very sorry to hear it."

"Sir, I have a complaint to make against the master."

"I have no power here, I assure you. And if I had—"

"But allow me, Sir, to mention it, as between yourself and a man who has seen better days, Sir. The master and myself are both Freemasons, Sir, and I make him the sign continually; but because I am in this unfortunate position, Sir, he won't give me the countersign!"

SUSA WHITE'S COSSET.

WHOEVER visits "y' antient towne" of Windham, Connecticut, will not fail to observe just on the outskirts of the village, on the road leading to Scotland and Canterbury, decaying wooden mansion, standing back a little from the highway in a weedy neglected garden. A stone-walled lane, guarded, not entirely by a giant sycamore, opens to the southern entrance of that old mansion, known to all the dwellers around as "The Parsonage House."

More than a hundred years has that house been standing, gathering moss and mould from the elements, and "Time's effacing finger" has scored those blackened walls were bright and new, and the hoary sycamore was a young tree, planted by the hands of the youthful minister and his bride, the lovely Mary Dyer.

But the bride and the bridegroom, with their sons and daughters, all passed away in their time, leaving, as they departed one by one, darker shadows in their familiar places, and a deeper silence upon their dwelling. I can just remember when the last of these, an aged woman clothed in black, was seen at evening walking in the garden before the house where great golden sun-flowers, and cup-roses, African marigolds and princes' feathers—flowers beloved and cherished by the old black serving-woman Cressa—were all that remained of the blossoms her mother had loved and planted. That same old woman in black was a bright-eyed, fair-haired, sunny-hearted little maiden once; the pet of the parson's household, the pride of his parish; named for her great-great-grandmother who came over in the May Flower. Not of the lonely old woman, the last of her family, am I going to write now, but of little Susa Wade White, whose grandmother used to tell me about sometimes when I asked her for a story.

Early in the spring of 1773, a farmer, living in the eastern section of the town of Windham, carried into his house one cold, stormy morning, a young lamb whose dam had perished in the storm. The poor little thing was chilled and almost dead. He laid it on his kitchen hearth, and his wife wrapped it carefully in a warm flannel blanket. When it gave signs of life, she put into its mouth some warmed milk, and rubbed it tenderly, until it licked her hands, and bleated in answer to her caresses.

"What can I do with it?" she asked her husband, when he came to dinner. "'Tis a nice lamb, as white as snow; but with the prospect just now before us, I shall have much time to nurse another, for when the 'Sons of Liberty' are called to the field the women will have to raise the bread."

"That's a sartin fact, Amy," replied her husband, "and the time is at hand! I couldn't bear to leave the little critter to die, though. I'll tell you what we will do with it, wife! There's the minister's little gal, who comes out here sometimes, and who seems to have a great liking for pets; we'll just keep it a few days till it gits strong and lively, and then carry it to her. She'll like it, I know."

Farmer Carey was not at all mistaken in his conjecture. The bright eyes of Susa White were brighter than ever the morning when the new pet was carried to the parsonage, for on each side, declared, was softer than silk and whiter than snow! She would take the very best care of it, and keep it until it was an old sheep. Her father, who was consulted about a name, advised her to give the lamb no heathen name, but to call it Nebuchadnezzar, because some day it would have to eat grass like the old King of Babylon. Susa thought it rather a hard name, but said that Nebby or Neb would do very well.

So that afternoon, when the parson was fast asleep in his study, she put a wreath of yellow dandelions around the cosset's neck, and sent Kate, the little servant-girl, to call some of the neighboring children. She then led it to the great mowing-trough which stood running over beside the well, and dipping her hand into the sugulate font, said, in tones grave as the Sunday tones of her father's:

"This lamb's name shall be Nebby," at the same time sprinkling his white, woolly head. The cosset not at all pleased with the ceremony; for he shook off the cold drops, and stamped his feet at his young mistress, to show his great amusement of the child, particularly of little Kate, who said, "White woolly didn't like being 'tized' any better than a darkey!"

Neb grew famously, and soon became as great a pet, almost, in the village as his mistress. Susa White's lamb was privileged to go any where he pleased, nibbling either grass or flowers as best suited his taste.

That was one of the pleasantest springs of Susa White's life, though a season of sore perplexity and darkness to the older and wiser in heart. From north to south there was a fluttering of wings for freedom. Act after act of oppression had roused the indignant people to a trial of its strength. The American army was not then organized, but association was the order of the day, and the watchword of all was "Liberty." Enough had been heard of the absolute power of Parliament; the colonies were no longer afraid to stand up boldly and declare, "The people have rights, and why not reason is supreme!" Such was every where the state of feeling when the infamous act for closing the port of Boston reached that patriot city. No time had declared his determination to starve his subjects into unreserved submission.

It was the tenth of May when the Port Act was received, and tidings of it were wafted speedily as possible from town to town, and from one to the colony. Sections traversed by stage-coaches were favored at that era, for the couches had always the latest news from the seat of disaffection, and every one was what the people of all ages and rank waited and expected with the greatest anxiety.

Long before the hour for the weekly stage a group of men might have been seen collecting around the old Stamford Tavern in Windham, discoursing on the one subject of common interest to all. From the court-house and from the counter, from the work-shop and from the plow, they came, eager to catch the first sound of the coach-horn, and to hear the rattling of the heavy wheels down the stony hill. Women with children in their arms stood at the doors to look out at the four-horse vehicle, and prisoners in the gloomy old jail grated through their grated windows to watch it as it passed.

"There she comes!" exclaimed half a dozen voices at once from the tavern steps. "There she is on the top of Zion's Hill! Smith tools loudly today. Ha's got news—no mistake about it!"

Blowing his horn most vigorously, the driver came dashing down the dusty road, his fine horses scarcely touching the ground over which they bounded. Beautifully they described their circle in front of the stage-house, bringing the coach-door and the ladies' entrance in a moment side by side. While the driver, with one hand, was guiding his team through their well-known figure, with the other he scattered a handful of papers amidst the by-standers: copies of the Boston Port-bill, edged with black in token of mourning; also an appeal from the citizens of Boston, asking counsel and aid of the sister colonies in their time of trial. Sad news this from "good old Boston"—for Boston, then as now, was the pride of New England.

Before the couch was started again on its way to Hartford the bills were posted all over the village; one on the great elm before the tavern door —the same tree on which the jolly little Bacchus sat for so manly long years astride his tun; a second was secured to another large elm a little farther to the north; a third to the whipping-post, which stood on the meeting-house corner; and the fourth to the court-house door. Before night they were read to the most remote sections of the town, and all true Windhamites had informed themselves not only to make common cause with the suffering colony, but to wage perpetual warfare against tyranny.

The next day was the Sabbath, and Parson White—who, like most of New England's clergy of his time, was a flaming patriot—carried the subject with him into the pulpit, and made a most earnest appeal for the rights of his brethren. He recounted all they had done and all they had suffered since that first odious Revenue Act had spread consternation and alarm throughout all the land; he spoke with enthusiasm of their resistance of the Stamp Act, and of the course they had pursued in regard to the tea question, for which they were now suffering the vengeance of the British Parliament, and being treated as the chief of rebels." In conclusion, he exhorted them, as men who loved their fellow-men, to concert some measures for proving what aid they were able to the beleaguered city.

There was no lack of attention on the part of the parson's auditory that day. The subject of his meditation hung on his words; it was a rousing call to action, such as the heart of man both loves and approves in times of danger and peril. Even the weakest intellect in the house could comprehend the subject and its requirements; and before the discourse was ended there was a universal cry what they could spare from their own immediate necessities. Poor little Susa! Never she turned her eyes for a moment from her father's high pulpit toward the door, and caught sight of Neb standing within the front feet on the door-sill, and evidently looking so sleek and handsome, felt for the first time the appeal directed to herself. Her bright eyes quickly filled with tears. "Dear Nebby!" she thought, sorrowfully, "I can not give him up. He would not make a mouthful for so many, if I did. He's all the pet I've got!" She recommend good Deacon Carey to keep him until he was a great sheep." This last reflection was a momentary comfort.

As soon as the blessing was pronounced she hastened to the door, feeling very sorry that Neb should have been thrust upon her by himself there that afternoon. "Every body will be saying now, 'There's one of the minister's little gals has got a grain nice fat cosset which she can sell as well as not!' I know they will—and well they may, too; but then, I can't help it. Poor Nebby! Poor Nebby!"

Nebby, wholly unconscious of what was passing in the mind of his youthful mistress, frisked around her as usual, licking her hand in token of welcome, and testifying his joy in the best way he could at her release.

"He's grown famously," said old Mr. Tinker. "He'd make a fine rooster!"

"I guess he won't," said Susa, in an under tone, standing over a fit to pet the cosset, for the reality to hide her tears. "Savage old man, isn't he, Neb?"

No one could speak to the lamb or pet him that night as usual but Susa Dorothea, and those thinking she ought to lay him on the altar of her country and humanity, when such a thought never entered the mind of a single one of her father's parishioners. On the contrary, they would, one and all, have protested against so great a sacrifice on the part of their little favorites. It was the voice of her own conscience speaking to little Susa White, and the voice of humanity also, asking the sacrifice of her pet lamb.

A town meeting was called immediately to deliberate on what should be done in this case. The Port Bill was to take effect the 1st of June, and then from many hundreds of the poorer citizens would arise a shout of woe. For the hands of industry were most effectually bound. There was a grand rally from every quarter of the town on the day appointed for the meeting. The old meeting-house was crowded to its utmost capacity, and there was no lack of zeal or enthusiasm. A number of young men came forward in their determination to offer their services to the blockaded city in the arts of agriculture, and in the person. Those would bear whatever contribution their fellow town's-people had to offer. The galleries were full of women, who were eager to bear a portion of all that was said or done, and some of the former of these had a widow's mite to add to the offering.

"Salt Lincoln hay is very good for working to fatten," whispered Susa White to her older sister. "I should hate to have our Dyer, shouldn't you?"

"No, indeed," was the reply; "nothing is to be shoved off on to us that if he wouldn't, if there was any need of him. I'll tench him to fire a gun by myself at nobody else out!"

"But he might be killed, you know," said Susa, thoughtfully, "like those young men father told us about last evening at Grey's ordinary."

"Well, that's a patriot's privilege, Susa. There's no use in building such a fuss about money when once the field is to be bought. I only wish I were a man myself to help drive every British officer out of Boston."

"Oh dear! every body is braver and more generous than I," thought Susa, bending down her head thoughtfully. "Now, there's Mary Wade Lincoln, whose oldest son has offered to go, has just given a sheep. Maybe she brought it up by hand, and likes it as much as I like Nebby. Then she is a poor woman with ever so many little children to take care of. I saw her wipe her eyes just now; but then I think it was because Nathan is going away, and not the sheep."

The gallants were beginning to be cleared, but Susa White lingered; for she had not yet learned the full amount of the contribution. It was not long, however, before Mr. Solomon Huntington, who was moderator, gave notice that two hundred and fifty-seven sheep and lambs were then on the paper ready for delivery. The young men who had volunteered to drive them would be ready to start the next day at noon. If there was any more business before the meeting they would adjourn.

Then Susa went down and stationed herself a little way from the front door to wait for her father. Nebby was not there; she had taken the precaution to shut him in the cow-stable before leaving home, lest his fat body should excite farther remark. Her father came out at last, talking with one of their neighbors. She went and put her hand in his softly, and looked up in his face to attract his attention.

"What's the matter, Susa? what do you want?" he asked, in a careless way.

"To give Nebby to the patriots," she said, bursting into tears.

Mr. White stood regarding his little daughter for a moment in silence, entering a word. His companion turned away to wipe a tear from his eye. Every body in town knew the child's fondness for her pet.

"So you wish to send Neb to the hungry children of Boston, do you?" her father inquired at last. "I am glad you are willing to make a sacrifice for the good of others, my daughter! 'The liberal soul shall be made fat.'"

"I want you to speak to Deacon Carey about it," she said, "for he may think strange." And again the child's tearful eyes were sent up for her.

"A cause that has not only the 'widow's mite,' but the infant's sacrifice, will be prospered of the Lord, Sir," said Colonel Dyer, approaching. "Let the women and children work with us, make the barley, and dry the sage; leaving alone the tea and the coffee, and the Lord will prosper us, and the Old Country will come to her senses by-and-by! Then, while the minister went back to add the last gift to the list, I'll take your hand caressingly as Susa's head, and said, 'You have a brave, generous heart, my child, and God bless it!'

Susa only shook her head in reply. She did not speak all the way home; and when they reached the house, perceiving some children there who had come to play with her and Nebby, she ran along to the orchard gate, slipped through, and was soon hard aloof and hidden from view.

Not a word was said in Susa's presence about her offering that night; but at the breakfast table next morning Mr. White told her that Mr. Tinker had been over to offer to send one of his sheep in place of hers. It was the same old man who had spoken to her in the grove with the cow by himself there that afternoon. "Every body will be saying now, 'There's one of the minister's little gals has got a grain nice cosset which she can sell as well as not!' I know they will—and well they may, too; but then, I can't help it. Poor Nebby! Poor Nebby!"

Nebby, wholly unconscious of what was passing in the mind of his youthful mistress, frisked around her as usual, licking her hand in token of welcome, and testifying his joy in the best way he could at her release.

"He's grown famously," said old Mr. Tinker. "He'd make a fine rooster!"

"I guess he won't," said Susa, in an under tone, standing over a fit to pet the cosset, for the reality to hide her tears. "Savage old man, isn't he, Neb?"

No one could speak to the lamb or pet him that night as usual but Susa Dorothea, those thinking she ought to lay him on the altar of her country and humanity, when such a thought never entered the mind of a single one of her father's parishioners. On the contrary, they would, one and all, have protested against so great a sacrifice on the part of their little favorites. It was the voice of her own conscience speaking to little Susa White, and the voice of humanity also, asking the sacrifice of her pet lamb.

A town meeting was called immediately to deliberate on what should be done in this case. The Port Bill was to take effect the 1st of June, and then from many hundreds of the poorer citizens would arise a shout of woe. For the hands of industry were most effectually bound. There was a grand rally from every quarter of the town on the day appointed for the meeting. The old meeting-house was crowded to its utmost capacity, and there was no lack of zeal or enthusiasm. A number of young men came forward in their determination to offer their services to the blockaded city in the arts of agriculture, and in the person. Those would bear whatever contribution their fellow town's-people had to offer. The galleries were full of women, who were eager to bear a portion of all that was said or done, and some of the former of these had a widow's mite to add to the offering.

"Salt Lincoln hay is very good for working to fatten," whispered Susa White to her older sister. "I should hate to have our Dyer, shouldn't you?"

"No, indeed," was the reply; "nothing is to be should be ashamed of him if he wouldn't, if there was any need of him. I'll tench him to fire a gun by myself at nobody else out!"

"But he might be killed, you know," said Susa, thoughtfully, "like those young men father told us about last evening at Grey's ordinary."

"Well, that's a patriot's privilege, Susa. There's no use in building such a fuss about money when once the field is to be bought. I only wish I were a man myself to help drive every British officer out of Boston."

"Oh dear! every body is braver and more generous than I," thought Susa, bending down her head thoughtfully. "Now, there's Mary Wade Lincoln, whose oldest son has offered to go, has just given a sheep. Maybe she brought it up by hand, and likes it as much as I like Nebby. Then she is a poor woman with ever so many little children to take care of. I saw her wipe her eyes just now; but then I think it was because Nathan is going away, and not the sheep."

The gallants were beginning to be cleared, but Susa White lingered; for she had not yet learned the full amount of the contribution. It was not long, however, before Mr. Solomon Huntington,

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

The New Parter IN "CLINGHAM & CO., BANKERS."

BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW,

AUTHOR OF "THE HASHEESH EATER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.—Continued.

THE inner door of the room opened, and Nora came dancing in with airy gentleness, thinking that her father still was asleep. She had been dressing for a walk; and her face was bright with a healthful confidence, such as she had a right to feel, having done every woman's duty that lay before her for the father who made her his household, and being now close to go out, and run, rumble, muse, and play the unconscious poet as her list, in God's dear life-giving meadows, under his glad, vouchful blue sky. A gipsy hat of dauntiest Leghorn—kept bright by loving use, though it had seen several generations of that paternal head-coverings—and perched like a pleasant, great bird on her shining, low-brought hair, a little jauntily inclined to one side, as if, while it sheltered her with its wings, it would also kiss her pearly cheek stooping down in the summer winds afield. And under this affectionate shade those clear, truthful blue eyes of hers looked out lovingly, like twin wells in the spring forest, which never were withered any bad face, any harmful thing; aught that lives save the happy sky, the birds, and the treetops. Oh, dear Nora, unconsciously! she leaned down once more to kiss her father, and saw that he was not asleep, but that his hands were clasped over his eyes, and the tears were stealing through his fingers. "Oh father, dear father! what is the matter?" she exclaimed, half-terrified, and gently trying to remove the hands that she might see his face. Then she knelt down over him, sitting down by his side, and kissed him again and again.

"Oh, Nora! Nora!" sobbed the old man, "I have been—I have been—but have done something very wrong—very passionate!"

"What is it, darling? Please tell me, won't you?"

"Oh, I have grieved our kind friend, Mr. Green; I ordered him out of the door, and he will always go with me from this time on, for the friend he has been any more! And after what he has done for us, after what he has done this very day for us! Look there, Nora!"

And John Manton held out his foot to show Nora Luke Green's present, and then relapsed into child-sorrow.

The blood came, mantling Nora's cheek close on the border of her brown hair, and her eyes drooped for an instant with a look that was displeasure and shame, but both well under rein. And then she said, "Father, I know Mr. Green any more presents from Mr. Green, if you had just as lief, father dear. When I was a little girl, it began with you buying me almost such small things; even then I was ashamed to take them; it was always pain to me not to answer. No, I thank you; and many a time I have felt as if I wanted to put them out of sight, because it grieved me to look at these witnesses of—well, I will say unkind weakness, for he has been kind to my dear father, but obligation, at any rate."

"Doesn't he always seem as much obliged as we, dear?"

"Yes, daring father, he seems so, but you know he isn't. Look all about this room, for instance. There is a picture; here is an engraving; there's a book; there's a vase; there's—and we never can be able to repay him! And now that I am a young lady, now that I am your little right-hand, grown older, as you, you know"—and she kissed the old man's forehead with affectionate playfulness—"don't you have a sort of feeling that it isn't right for me, like-wise, not womanly for me to have such benefits bestowed on this dear little family of mine, when I can never pay them back as I ought?"

"Perhaps Luke Green doesn't think so."

"Think what, dear?"

"That there is no way in which you can pay them back."

"What do you mean, my dear father?"

"You know that I have not very long to live, at the utmost that can be hoped but a very few years, and then when I leave you all alone, who—"

"Father!" The young girl started, and threw back her hair upon her shoulders, as if the string had choked her. And with her face all aglow, her eyes brimming, and her voice trembling, she continued, "You cannot think such a fact she should quite break down.

"And is all this my price? My father! oh, my father! I am not worth so little to you, then, that you are willing these things, these miserable things, should buy me? Oh! oh! that they had never entered that door; that they never had come, bringing this wrong, this curse with them! Is my separation between you and me—a separation by my purchase! Dear father! let me stay and be your handmaid, your servant!"

And with an unconscious pathos Nora knelt, holding her father's hand upon her heart. And the poor old man wept again.

"Forgive me," she went on to say, "if I grieve you speaking so strongly; but these thoughts break my heart; yes, and these presents too. What has been done this afternoon to turn your thoughts to what has been said that made you angry? Tell me, darling: I know it wasn't your fault; how did he offend you?"

John Manton, roused by the magnetic sympathy of his daughter, rallied from his exhaustion and granted her request. In detail he related the occurrences of the afternoon. With the faithfulness of an echo he told Nora all that Luke Green had said of her—of Ernest Beckford. And when at last, stung by the memory of the insult, and shaking his fist as he repeated it, with somewhat of the original courage which had met the exigency, he said, "And now, do you wonder at my turning him out of the door?" He was surprised to hear no response from Nora, and, looking up into her face, beheld it marble-white, the eyes fixed, the lips bloodless and half apart, while a strange shuddering ran through her shoulders, and she seemed like one who has been too frightened by a dreadful spectacle, and feels the scream which would tell her terror frozen at her heart.

"Nora! Nora! daughter! what is the matter with you?" exclaimed the old man, now alarmed, with good reason, in his turn.

"I do not think I will go out to walk today," she said, in a slow, dreamy utterance: "I am not very well—I shall do better to go and lie down a little while. But it will pass over. Oh yes, it will pass over."

"Can't I help you? Let me support you; you sin't able to get up stairs alone."

"Oh yes! I'm quite strong—see, I can walk as briskly as ever! I will be down again in time for tea: do you go to sleep again, dear, and don't be alarmed. You need no alert."

Again she pressed a kiss on her father's mournful brow, and casting on him one quick, loving look, which was all her heart had time to give, between the throes of its dire pain-wrestle, she almost bounded out of the room, up the stairs, and into her own little bedchamber. Once in, and she locked the door noiselessly, then fell upon her knees at her bedside, saying only, "O God! O God!"

With her face buried in her hands, and perfectly motionless, she knelt quite passive to her thoughts, crushed down by their massive freshet, and hardly sure whether it was of herself she was thinking, or of some poor girl elsewhere, who had suffered a great calamity. There was heart-sickness; there was fearful astonishment; there was uprooting of heavenly hopes that had grown gloriously since their deep first planting; there was a despair of all things in this world; there was an awful insidious question that would not go into exile, "Does God know? Does God care? But were all these in her soul or another? Were they grief, or were they pity?"

As if to steady herself on something strong and free, Nora arose, dreamily went to the window, and looked out into the high, wide summer sky—type of all glad, great hearts; with clouds floating through it that change, but itself changing never! And there was one soul, or her ideal of one soul, whom this sky had always called to her mind. Like him, it was pure and e'er gladsome; stainless, chainless, trustworth, ; full of all high hopes, suggestions, promises. Ah! to her soul his had been the all-surrounding heaven! Sunny by day, by night starry: tinging all thought, next to God!

"Ernest Beckford! Ernest!"—she repeated, looking far off across the fields to one well-remembered spot by the brook-side—"Ernest!"—and she paused, not willing immediately, even in question, to link that name to the next thoughts. "Burglar—thief—forger—seducer! O God! be pitiful to a poor girl that hath nowhere to go but to thee; no one to ask, no one to counsel her. Tell me—oh tell me! Show me, if need be, some sign in heaven—something that will not lie—that I may be sure; for my heart is breaking!"

No—no sign in the sky came to Nora Manton. But, just for that moment, the sky itself seemed to swoon and blacken in sympathy with her soul. For suddenly, as by the fiend's own trumpet of resurrection, there arose and stood before her an appalling memory—a memory sweet in its birth, but terrible, terrible in its new life, its return under a new guise of interpretation. The night she first saw Ernest Beckford, where was he? How did he meet her? In the counting-room, after bank hours—long after—for it was eleven o'clock at night. And how had he come in thither? Plainly by the same key with which he locked the outer-door when he left her. Yes, he had carried a key which could admit him at any time. And what right had a second bookkeeper—one of the most slightly attached of all the officers to the permanent interests of the Bank—what right had he to such a key? Who ever heard of such a one having it? And again sounded through her brain those dreadful names, "Burglar, thief, defaulter!" "O God! O God! have mercy on me!" again cried the poor girl, thrown once more upon her knees by the window, in her wrestle with this maddening suspicion.

Had he died—had he, in all his untarnished nobleness, come drifting to her feet on some river tide, and, leaning down, she had drawn him out cold, pale, drowned; had aught befallen him that was medicable by patience, by effort, by prayer: Were it captivity, she could have travelled land and sea to sit down at the dungeon-door and work for his ransom; were it long wasting sickness, night and day she could have nursed and watched him until she received him at God's hand, or herself lain down to rest beside him on the Infinite arms! Were it aught that men call bad in fortune—oh! the ineffable desirableness of any thing, or all of these, compared with her hearing him called—she could not say—think, those words again!

And as the pang of these thoughts grew sharper her perception became more intense, and every littlest spot upon the floor, every mote sky of her heart—Nora arose and felt at peace. No other proof than this little stranded boat, her own, with all its freight of beautiful hope, by right of salvage, had she that Ernest loved her. She knew that in his eyes she had always seen the same electrical sparkle of glad surprise that her heart felt when they met. She knew that he never spoke aught to her the few times that she had been in society together, in flattery, in badinage, in surface-talk, that he came to her with such an earnestness as characterized his manner to none else, that he spoke to her of deeps within his heart such as men seldom descend into in a woman's presence, but never had his lips told her any thing like the burden which that little boat carried. Yet in her heart she knew that she loved Ernest Beckford, giving him the passionate first-fruits of a soul that has just crossed the threshold and come to the altar of the holily beautiful temple of Womanhood. This she knew, and the Spirit that takes care of such as she, told her through her fresh, unblunted woman-instinct, that the man who launched that little paper pinnace was worthy—was able to give her back love for love.

"God and Ernest forgive me!" were the first words she spoke. And for the first time now she wept—wept tenderly and quietly. Not such tears as might have come to her fevered eyes a moment before—like hot and bitter springs of brine boiling up among the dryness of desert sand, but tears that seemed rather to fall from above on her blue eyes as the dew from heaven upon thirsty violets—a life-bringing overflow from the upper exhaustless fountains. Through these refreshed eyes of hers she looked out and saw all things new; the very cloud-veil of her tears had a sweet faith-rainbow in it, and all distrust was washed out of her heart like dust that floated in the sunshine past her window, every thing was noticed, and left a distinct, painful impression on a mind melted like wax in the fire of trouble. And each object brought its suggestion, its reminiscence. Sitting by this window, how often had she thought of him within the last few weeks, with her eyes fixed on one luxuriant Persian lilac which blossomed just by the garden wall. It had become dear to her because her eyes rested on its sweet, weakly pillow of purple when her heart was reposing on such delicious reveries. And now it seemed as if each delicate trumpet of all those overladen spikes of blossom were plainly visible by itself, and had its own faint, funereal strain—audible to the heart, if not to the ear. Looking beyond the little grassy slope and terraced pottery below it, which formed the garden of the Bank, her eyes caught a glimpse of the brook, revealed between thick alder clumps. In the sun it shone like a pool of gold. The serpentine line which it described, backward up into the meadows, was invisible by reason of the high grass and shrubbery that fringed its banks. Yet Nora from childhood knew all its windings, and by her mind's eye followed up the stream toward its head, but stopped at a certain rock, above whose jutting foot a little eddy spun lazily forever, dimple chasing dimple all the summer's day. Once more she stooped down and drew a small paper-boat ashore from the great waters against which it lay waterlogged, and seeing handwriting therein, spread it open, with a quickened beating of the heart, to read—

"PRINCES SEVEN, ENCHAINING HANDS, BEAR THE LIVE HEAD HOMEWARD."—(BY MILLAIS.)

"All the life of the young man is but a pilgrimage from one sweet woman's breast to one other. From the bosom out of whose life he came he goes voyaging wearily, painfully, and rest he hath none, until he comes to the bosom with whose life he is to be one for evermore. Ernest—Nora."

As if a great shadow had been lifted from her eyes—as if that sign for which she had asked Heaven had suddenly dawned forth in the inner from parched and rained-on leaves.

"He is not false to God," she said in her heart, calmly; "he is not false to himself—to the thought of him that I have cherished day and night so long—the thought that has grown beautiful and great until it has overshadowed all other things in my soul, and made them silts to water its roots. The whole world may forsake him, yet will not I! He may be taken to prison or to death—all tongues may speak him ill—all faces that can look into his noble eyes and then laugh at him, may laugh! I can wipe off with one tear of mine all scorn of their thin his proud fair forehead can not shed, and, O God! if thou wilt give—if thou hast given—his love to me, I will kiss his heart into patience, into hope, through his dear lips! He is pure! He is true! Ernest! as God liveth, I will never—never—never leave thee nor forsake thee!"

She knelt once more, no longer in the silence of an unutterable anguish, but the silence of a God-steadied soul, prepared to meet the worst in the jointless panoply of Faith. Luke Green—a weak, sick, childish, old father—all the talk, the thought, the action of that vague Protean monster which we call the World—the direst, ugly-looking suspicions—were on one side, Nora Manton would put her hand in Ernest Beckford's and stand on the other, under the shadowing wings of God's young daughter, Faith, which is standing with God."

And I have noticed that it is not an unhappy thing, this standing in a minority of two or three when God is one of them.

She knelt in prayer. And having received strength anew, bathed her temples and her eyes, and returned to her father. Returned, too, with so much additional helpful courage and strength beaming from her, that its prodigal largess of overflow being quaffed by the poor old man, exhilarated him into an utter forgetfulness that he had shown Luke Green the door. And all that evening, instead of having the paper read to him and going to sleep, he sat on the back couch and told stories of his boyhood, while, with a brow of chastened cheerfulness and love, Nora sat at his feet, the moon filling on her brown hair.

Such a godlike quality there is in having met the fiend, come he in what shape he may—temptation, doubt, pain, or death—and conquered him by faith, that the good of victory is not a mere selfish benefit, a reward to the soul that has fought, but also makes that soul a centre of new force for other and weaker spirits. With more than enough strength for personal, present living we come out of our gymnasium—with our superfluity we lift every poor soul one that touches us up to a higher level of soul-life. It is, therefore, better to conquer pain than never to have it and float pleasantly down the tide. And so felt Nora Manton, sitting at her father's feet that night listening to stories that pleased him, while she did not know at that moment where, under God's wide silvery sky of night, Ernest Beckford was standing—knew only that God has never been known to desert true souls.

THE LEGEND OF THE HEAD OF BRAN.

[BRAN was a king of England in the old fabulous British history; and the legend says that Bran's head was cut off by his order, carried by seven Princes to the White Mount, the site of the present Tower of London, and there buried, looking toward France. So long as the head lay there, said the legend, no invasion could come from over sea.]

I.

WHEN the Head of Bran
Was firm on British shoulders,
God made a man!
Cried all beholders.

Steel could not resist
The weight his arm would rattle;
He, with naked fist,
Has brain'd a knight in battle.

He march'd on the foe,
And never counted numbers;
Foreign widows know
The hosts he sent to slumbers.

As a street you scan,
That's tower'd by the steeple,
So the Head of Bran
Rose o'er his people.

II.

"Death's my neighbor,"
Quoth Bran the Blest;
"Christian labor
Brings Christian rest.

"AND SEEING HANDWRITING THEREIN, SPREAD IT OPEN," ETC.

From the trunk sever
The Head of Bran,
That which never
Has leat to man!

"That which never
To men has bow'd,
Shall live ever
To shame the shroud:
Shall live ever
To face the foe;
Sever it, sever,
And with one blow.

"Be it written,
That all I wrought
Was for Britain,
In deed and thought:
Be it written,
That, while I die,
Glory to Britain!
Is my last cry."

III.

Crimson-footed, like the stork,
From great ruts of slaughter,
Warriors of the Golden Torque,
Cross the lifting water.
Princes seven, enchaining hands,
Bear the live head homeward.
Lo! it speaks, and still commands;
Gazing far out foamward.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE MISTRESS OF The Parsonage.

BY ELLA RODMAN.

PART III.

In our drives about the country a favorite point of interest was a mansion of gray stone, that stood isolated and tenantless amidst thick trees that formed a perfect grove around it, and gave the place a dark air of mystery that possessed for me a strange fascination.

Mr. Winnesile always stopped the horse there that I might gaze upon the house as long as I liked; and he had told me laughingly that it was haunted. The almost perpetual twilight made by those trees rendered it a fitting place for the perpetration of a dark deed, and I shuddered as I looked upon it. Well might I shudder, for the trail of the serpent was upon it.

One mild day in March we drove toward the stone house; but as we approached it we saw several workmen busily engaged upon it. Some were altering windows, others were clearing away the rubbish of dead leaves and brushwood that had accumulated around the house, and others were here and there lopping down a tree that obscured the view. These were unmistakable signs of coming occupants; and I felt a pang of regret that the neglected old place which I had looked upon almost as mine should be thus disturbed.

Mr. Winnesile spoke to one of the men, who advanced respectfully to the carriage, and in answer to his inquiries told us that the place was being repaired for the owner, Mrs. Otcheson, who might be expected there some time in May.

"A widow, then?" was the natural query.

"Oh no, Sir!" replied the man, with a peculiar smile, "The lady has a husband."

THE BUDS.

We did not wish to question the man any further, and drove homeward—talking, as we went, of the place and the new-comers. I felt quite excited upon the subject, but my husband took it more calmly.

Every time that we passed now the house presented some new phase of improvement. One day a tasteful portico had been added—then a bay-window—then a trellis-work for climbing plants. The guiding hand in all these alterations was evidently one of exquisite taste, and I felt considerable curiosity to behold the person, whom I at once decided to be Mrs. Otcheson.

Rich plate-glass glittered in all the windows, in place of the little dusty panes, obscured by cobwebs; a beautifully graveled walk wound up from the entrance-gate; and the lawn, entirely cleared of all unsightly obstructions, wore the rich velvet hue of early spring-time.

And one raw afternoon in May, as Mr. Winnesile and I passed the house on foot, returning from a visit to some poor parishioners, we saw that the long windows were draped with rich curtains; and little hands pushed aside the obscuring folds, and bright, dimpled faces looked eagerly out. The wind shook the trees, and scattered cherry-blossoms over the lawn, and delighted voices called out:

"Look, mamma! it snows! It really snows!" We had just concluded that it would not do to be gazing in at other people's windows, when a splendid looking woman looked forth upon the lawn, and laughed merrily at the children's mistake.

I had never seen such a woman before! A beauty perfected by all the refinements of luxury, the advantages of education, and the adornments of wealth. I do not know how long I might have stood there gazing, had not my husband drawn me away; and I thought of her continually until I saw her again.

The next day we passed Mrs. Otcheson in the road, accompanied by a gentleman whom we at once concluded to be her husband. They were a splendid looking couple; she, with her bright, glowing beauty, and he, with his classically-handsome face, pale, as if from suffering, and a melancholy, wearied look, clouding the dark splendor of his eyes.

I glanced at him again—he was lame; and I felt the tears coming into my eyes as I raised them to his face. Those dark eyes were bent upon me so earnestly that I withdrew mine in confusion, and the warm color rushed into my face.

The strangers were evidently settled in their new quarters, and it was time for the neighbors to show them some attention. Mr. Winnesile and I were among the first who called, and that visit opened to me an entirely new phase of existence.

The hall door stood wide open; and as we approached a gay figure flitted from the window, and Mrs. Otcheson came forward to receive us.

"The very persons whom I most wish to see!" she exclaimed with an easy grace, seizing me by both hands; "Pardon my freedom, Mr. Winnesile," she continued, "but I always say exactly what I feel."

Her manner was caressing in the extreme; and I felt flattered that this beautiful, distinguished-looking woman should treat me with such affectionate consideration.

She ushered us into a room that fairly dazzled my eyes with a perpetual view of crushed flowers. Our feet sank into them on pressing the soft and yielding carpet. Sofas, chairs, and sofas seemed strewn with them, and the room well deserved the name bestowed upon it of "summer parlor."

I was half-bewildered, and almost afraid to sit down any where, our plain Parsonage was so different; but Mrs. Otcheson specially deputed me upon a sofa, and placed herself beside me. She talked so fast that I could scarcely notice her minutely; but I saw her many, too many times afterward, and her portrait is distinctly impressed upon my memory.

She was perhaps thirty years of age; not very tall, but decidedly inclined to fullness, and her complexion reminded me of milk and water. I can think of no comparison so appropriate; it had, here and there, the beautiful blue tinge produced by the mixture of those liquids, and her neck and shoulders, which she wore very much exposed, were a perfect study. Her face was very like the portraits of Martha Washington taken in her youth, except that the hair and eyes were lighter.

She was dressed in an apricot-colored silk, with a scarf of some cloud-like texture floating away from her shoulders; and her diminutively beautiful hands were covered with gems that seemed, to my inexperienced eye, enough to buy the whole of Meadowbrook.

There was an air of luxury every where, from Mrs. Otcheson herself to the minutest adornment of the lordly mansion; and I sat in a half-dreamy state, only roused by the discovery that I was being minutely scanned by the smiling eyes of my new acquaintance.

We inquired after Mr. Otcheson. "He did not appear to be in very good health," my husband added.

Mrs. Otcheson looked puzzled for a moment.

"Oh," said she, with a merry laugh (merry laughs were frequent with her), "that was Oscar—my brother, I mean—whom you saw with me the other day. I will show you the conservatory, if it will not fatigue you too much, and probably we shall come across him in our rambles. He is rather sensitive, poor fellow!"

MRS. OTCHESON AT THE PIANO.

We walked through two or three more elegant rooms before we entered the conservatory. It was very spacious, and beautifully fitted up, with a queer little room opening out of it, from which came the sounds of children's voices.

A gentleman sat there, surrounded by the bright faces we had seen in the window; and as he turned at our approach, I encountered again those singular eyes that seemed to exercise a magical power over me. I wished to retreat, and managed to get behind my husband, to whom the gentleman was at once introduced as "my brother, Mr. Pendleigh;" and then I was drawn forth from my hiding-place, and my name was pronounced by Mrs. Otcheson in a very indifferent manner.

I turned to the children, in order to conceal my embarrassment; but the pretty little creatures whom I had admired ran directly in my face, and attracted the attention of the whole party to me by exclaiming:

"Why, mamma, Oscar can look exactly like the picture of an angel in my story-book!"

Mrs. Otcheson laughed and looked at her brother.

"Harry is practicing pretty speeches early," said she.

"Harry speaks, as all children speak, directly from the heart," replied Mr. Pendleigh, quickly.

He spoke in a low tone, and I am quite sure Mr. Winnesile did not hear him.

Mr. Pendleigh's manner puzzled me extremely. I felt very sorry for him, and very much interested in him; but at the same time I was rather afraid of him. He broke off the chinese buds in the conservatory, which he carried about with him until the moment of our departure, and then gave them handed to me with a low bow. I took them mechanically; and then my children dabbled in the embrace of Mrs. Otcheson, who said, as she kissed me,

"Now remember that, since you have found the way, you are to run over here very often without ceremony. I am an old married woman, you know, while you have no cares."

This speech, uttered in quite a loud tone, struck me as a little singular. Had she forgotten that I, too, was married? Or did she only refer to her children? Mr. Pendleigh's manner to Mr. Winnesile was respectful in the extreme—reverential, I thought—and my husband appeared very much pleased with him.

Our visit was returned with flattering expedition by Mrs. Otcheson and her brother. "Mr. Otcheson," she said, "was so much immersed in business that he had scarcely time to visit his own family."

Mr. Winnesile had gone out, and I was left to the formidable ordeal of receiving the visitors alone. Mrs. Otcheson evidently saw my embarrassment, and kindly endeavored to relieve it. She praised the Parsonage, admired its situation, and the roses that clustered around the windows; and, finally, she talked herself out into the porch, leaving me to what I particularly dreaded, the strange scrutiny of Mr. Pendleigh's eyes.

He must have perceived that they troubled me, for he suddenly withdrew them, and, much to my surprise, gave vent to the following remark:

"I should think, Miss Winnesile, that you would sometimes feel rather lonely here, even with your father's company?"

"My father's company?" I repeated, somewhat bewildered.

"Perhaps," he continued, "he is too much of a student to leave his books very often? I should judge so from his appearance."

"Is it possible," I asked, with a faint glimmering of the truth, "that you supposed Mr. Winnesile to be my father?"

"I did," said he with a smile. "He is your uncle, then?"

"No," I replied, as calmly as possible; "he is my husband."

Mr. Pendleigh started to his feet. The expression of his face frightened me. He stood there looking at me for a moment, and then rushed to the door to meet his sister, who was just entering.

Mrs. Otcheson's face was troubled in a moment; but, passing her arm through her brother's, she desired me to excuse them for a short time, as he had been seized with a sudden illness, from which he would soon recover.

They went out together, and conversed earnestly for a few moments. Then Mrs. Otcheson returned alone. Her brother, she said, had desired her to excuse his abrupt conduct to me; but he was subject to these attacks, which often seized him at most unaccountable seasons. He hoped soon to have the pleasure of making his apology in person.

"What were you saying to Oscar just as I came in?" inquired my visitor. "It seemed to be a very animated conversation."

"We were talking of Mr. Winnesile, my husband," I replied. "Mr. Pendleigh, it appears, suspected him to be my father!"

"Your husband!" exclaimed Mrs. Otcheson, with a little start. "Is he really your husband?"

"Did you not know this?" I asked, abruptly, for something in Mrs. Otcheson's manner engendered the suspicion that this was all acting.

She smiled at what she called my naiveness, "and replied, gaudedly, that one would not be led to form such a supposition from my appearance.

"But how could this have happened?" continued the lady. "Forgive my freedom, but you are such a mere child—were you left to Mr. Winnesile's guardianship when an infant, or were you rescued by him from some dreadful death—or what could possibly have brought you two together?"

"Neither," I replied, proudly, my lip quivering at the recollection of all my husband's tenderness. "I was a poor, oppressed orphan, struggling as an ill-paid teacher for my daily bread, and to Mr. Winnesile I owe all that I have, and all the love and duty I could give would but ill repay him."

I had burst into tears, and Mrs. Otcheson wound her arm caressingly about me with soothing epithets. There was something about this woman which I could not fathom. But the moment before I had almost hated her, and now I was sobbing upon her bosom, drawn there by an irresistible power of attraction which some mortals possess.

"This is noble in you!" said Mrs. Otcheson, dropping a tear or two in sympathy with mine. "My husband, too, is a great deal my senior; but I just am bound with golden fetters, not those of love. My story, if told, would be found very similar to that of 'Auld Robin Gray.'"

It did not strike me at the time as strange that a woman could communicate to a perfect stranger a fact like this; so much is there in "manner" that I considered Mrs. Otcheson as very much to be pitied for her misfortunes. When I knew her better, I transferred my pity to Mr. Otcheson.

We had quite a long interview, and I became calm again, and promised frequent visits; and at last, with many kind messages for Mr. Winnesile, my visitor took her departure.

When alone, I sat and thought these things all over, and I could not make them quite straight; but, while deep in my reverie, my husband's hands were suddenly placed over my eyes, as he saluted me as "Mrs. Grave-face."

I laughed, and told him of my visitors; and he said, with a brightening smile, that Mrs. Otcheson was very kind, and he was glad I had found such agreeable acquaintances. Mr.

Pendleigh, he said, was a noble-looking fellow: we must do all in our power to make him forget his misfortune.

Poor Arthur!

The first Sunday after their arrival there appeared at church Mrs. Otcheson and the children, and an elderly gentleman with stiff, white hair brushed up very high. Mr. Otcheson stood up very erect, and took very loud responses, and seemed determined to render himself as imposing as possible; but what a contrast to her!

The family attracted much attention; and poor Mr. Durrell, the young candidate for priest's orders then now and then officiated in Mr. Winnelsie's place, dealt forth his amiable platitudes with even less success than usually for all eyes were constantly traveling in the direction of that one pew. Mrs. Otcheson's beautiful face seemed to look forth from a rose-colored cloud, the effect of the plumes in her bonnet; while the children, with their costly legbarness and rich white flounces, their dresses in the latest Paris style, and faces and air minatures of the mother, were specimens of childhood not often seen in Meadowbrook.

So the good people looked, as country people will; and Miss Sally Simes maliciously remarked that "she supposed we should all be turned upside down now." Notwithstanding which prediction the people of Meadowbrook confessed, without an exception, to look on their feet as they had hitherto done.

Mr. Otcheson was seldom visible save on Sunday, being generally immersed in his ledger and daybook in the city to enjoy his country-home. He looked like a long skeleton-up line of figures; and Mrs. Otcheson might perhaps be excused for any thing but marrying him.

I stopped at the house one morning, at rather an unseasonable hour, on an errand for Mr. Winnelsie; and Mrs. Otcheson declines that nothing could be pleasanter, and I should go directly up to her "sanctum," as she called it, and be perfectly at home.

Her energetic volubility conquered me; and finding all my objections overruled, I suffered myself to be persuaded, and followed her up the broad flight of richly-carpeted stairs to a large room in the second story.

The same taste was displayed in every part of the house; and in answer to my admiring remarks, Mrs. Otcheson said that one would scarcely suppose a gentleman to be the prime mover of all.

"Mr. Otcheson?" and I, inquiringly.

"Mercy, no!" she replied, quite pettishly; "Mr. Otcheson couldn't tell pink from blue, or green from red. The slightest inconsistency offends Oscar's quick eye; and I often think that, with his ultra-refinement, he is scarcely a fit companion for a man of the world of this commonplace sphere."

Mrs. Otcheson seemed devoted to her brother; and in a deep, saintly affection appeared to me very beautiful. Oh! what short-sighted creatures we are! But it must be remembered that I might as well have spent my life in a convent, for all the knowledge I had of the world and the world's iniquities; and Mr. Winnelsie, with his thoughts like mountains half lost in heaven, was not much wiser.

The room was furnished with green—a light, spring-like tint; and rich lace draped the toilet-table and windows. What intricacies of the toilet were here displayed in dazzling splendor! Cut-glass bottles filled with perfumes, wonderful pomades, and mother-of-pearl dressing-combs—in short, every thing that wealth and taste could devise. I had scarcely imagined such luxury; and I thought of the severely plain Arcadian morning that these surroundings with the ease of a cow in a flower-bed.

Mrs. Otcheson noticed me in a fastened that quite frightened me, so low did I sink into its cushioned depths; and I should scarcely have been surprised had I been gently let down through some trap-door.

"Now," said my smiling friend, "this is just as it should be. I am quite lonely to-day, for Oscar has gone on some erratic expedition to the city, and your arrival was quite apropos. This is my own particular domain, into which no one ventures to intrude; even the children knock at the door for permission to enter; and here I can imagine myself free"—she said it as if she stretched the wedding-ring on her finger—" free, I mean, from all cares."

I understood her, perhaps, as she did not wish to be understood; and I pitied her, sitting there in her luxury and misery.

We sat thus for some minutes; but suddenly Mrs. Otcheson caught my eye, and dashing off this melancholy mood, she moved quickly toward an elegant piano.

"Do you play?" said she, abruptly.

I unwisely replied in the negative; and running her fingers carelessly over the keys, she struck a few random notes, and then perceiving my absent mien, struck boldly forth into a strain of melody that pervaded my whole soul with a grand and mingled delight.

I absolutely fed upon that music; and when the notes ceased, and Mrs. Otcheson turned to ascertain the cause of my silence, I drew a long sigh, like one unwillingly awakened from a pleasant dream.

"Why, you are a perfect enthusiast!" she exclaimed; "and yet you have no knowledge of music? That is so singular!"

"Not so very," I replied: "a musical education is expensive, and I was educated upon very economical principles."

"Very frankly spoken," said Mrs. Otcheson; "I like that. But I have a proposal to make," she continued, "which is, that you commence taking lessons forthwith, with me for your teacher. I see that you would be an apt scholar, and it will be a real charity to provide me with some employment. Let us begin at once."

The proposition was a tempting one, but I hesitated to accept it until I had consulted Mr. Winnelsie. I did not know that he would wish me to accept this favor from a stranger.

Mrs. Otcheson laughed when I spoke of my husband.

"Well," said he, "you are an obedient little wife—you are but a child yet."

I turned the conversation with the rather abrupt remark, "Your brother was not at church on Sunday?"

"No," she replied; "it the truth is, Oscar very rarely goes to church—he does not approve of it."

"Does not approve of it?" I repeated.

"No," continued Mrs. Otcheson, apologetically; "Oscar has some very peculiar views, and one of these is that going to church is a species of vanity. He can worship God, he says, better in the open air—in every thing."

"It strikes me," thought I, "he doesn't worship Him at all." I was silent, and could scarcely have been more shocked had Mr. Pendleigh appeared visibly before me and displayed a cloven foot.

"We have always thought it best," said Mrs. Otcheson, "to humor Oscar—during that time, and perhaps some gentle influence, might wean him from these strange notions. He is a great admirer of Mr. Durrell, perhaps, Mrs. Winnelsie, if you were to take him in hand, you might be able to convert him from his heathenism."

"I should be very glad to do him any service in my own goodness to undertake the reformation of another, and here the conversation dropped.

I was quite frightened at discovering how the hours had slipped away, and I departed home for fear that my husband might become uneasy.

Mr. Winnelsie was delighted with the music-plan, and thought it a very kind thing for me. I should go there, he said, as often as I liked; and he appeared to think that Mrs. Otcheson would be a very fit object of conferring a favor. I told him about Mr. Pendleigh, and he was quite troubled.

"Poor Arthur!" he said; "poor, deluded fellow! There is a great deal more of this in the world than you imagine, Fairy; and we are not to sit still and fold our hands, even if we do distrust our own goodness. We must endeavor to cultivate the acquaintance of this Mr. Pendleigh, and show him that we really feel an interest in him, and perhaps, with God's help, we may be able to win him back to the truth."

And my husband, who was not one to content himself with talking, took an early opportunity to invite Mr. Pendleigh to dine, apparently as much at home at the Parsonage as he felt inclined.

"It is always cool and shaded," said he, with frank simplicity, "if it can offer no other attraction; and to an invalid like yourself a change may be very grateful."

Mr. Pendleigh seemed very much affected. He grasped Mr. Winnelsie's hand with warmth, and regarded him with the half-yearning reverence with which we look upon those whom we believe to be very much better than ourselves. "He would certainly come," he said, "as the only way in which he could show his deep appreciation of this kindness was by accepting it."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Hoarseness and Sore Throat.

This unpleasant and painful result of "Catching Cold" or unusual exertion of the throat will always at once yield to the unbleasant and sore throat. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" or Cough Lozenges, to directly relieve in the mouth. Hence, Singers and Public Speakers will find them of peculiar advantage.

We have found them of great service in allaying Bronchial Irritation, and in Coughs consequent upon a cold."—Rev. DANIEL WISE, late Editor of Sunday Recreation.

MOORE'S ENCYCLOPEDIA OF MUSIC, containing the Biographies of more than 4000 Musicians, a History of Music in all Nations, and many Essays; a full description of Musical Instruments; Treatises on Harmony, Thorough Bass, &c., is indispensable to every Musician and Library. 64 00.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington St., Boston.

HARD TIMES NO MORE—Any Lady or Gentleman in the United States possessing from $5 to $10 can secure a profitable and permanent employment which from $5.00 to $10 per day can be realized. For terms, address (with stamp)

W. R. ACTON & CO.,
41 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia.

Stop Bleeding—Stop Spitting Blood.

REMEDY READY.—A certain cure for Hemorrhage. Highest testimonials. Send for circular. In boxes containing 15 powders at $5, or sent by mail in envelopes: 6 powders for $3. Sold by

DR. HUNSON, agent,
Wholesale and retail, No. 145 Fulton Street, N.Y.

CANVASSING AGENTS WANTED

In every county of the United States to sell one of the most popular books ever published. Apply at once to

BILL & BROTHERS,
Louisville, Ky.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

Publish this Day:

I.

ÆSCHYLUS. En Novissima recensione Frederici A. Paley. Accessit Verborum quæ præcipue notanda sunt et Nominum Index. 18mo, Muslin, Flexible Binding, 40 cents.

II.

HORATIUS. Quinti Horatii Flacci Opera Omnia. Ex Recensione A. J. Macleane. 18mo, Muslin, Flexible Binding, 40 cents.

THE ART JOURNAL—1860—
LONDON.

The February number of this popular work is now ready, and contains the second part of a NEW series of Papers, descriptive of the Courts of the Hudson, from its source to the Sea, by James J. Jarves, profusely illustrated with original engravings on wood from actual sketches taken in the localities of the past year. THE COMPANION GUIDE BY RAILWAY IN SOUTH WALES. By Francis Wey. Illustrated by Harding, J. D. Harding, Birket Foster, &c., &c.

THE TURNER GALLERY.—For long, the subscribers to the ART JOURNAL will obtain engravings from pictures by Turner, and the Art Journal is a work especially suited for connoisseurs, Artists, and all lovers of the Fine Arts. Each number contains three large Steel Engravings and numerous illustrations on wood. Subscription, $3 00 per annum, or 75 cents per number.

VIRTUE & CO., No. 26 John Street, New York.

Winant's Excelsior Billiard Tables.

Manufactury 71 Gold Street, N. Y.

Michelet's New Book. (LA FEMME.) La Femme. WOMAN. (LA FEMME.)

HIS SEQUEL TO L'AMOUR.

Just Published in Paris, and translated from early sheets, by Dr. J. W. Palmer, Translator of "L'Amour." One vol. 12mo, muslin. Price $1.

The following interesting subjects are eloquently treated in the work:

The Working Woman.	How she gives her heart away.
The Woman of Letters.	The Young Wife.
The Governess.	Arts and Books.
The Actress.	How Woman excels Man.
The "Dame aux Camel Lias."	The Mysteries of Love.
"One more Unfortunate."	The Communion of Love.
The Book of Love.	The Woman, an Object of Peace and Consolation.
The combination of the book of Love.	The last Love.
Woman a Religion.	Woman the Protectress of Freedom.
Revelations of Heroism.	Woman.
The Woman who loves most.	Children, Toys, Dolls, etc.
The Man who loves best.	Also,
	Twenty-sixth Edition of
(L'AMOUR.)	(L'AMOUR.)

One vol. 12mo, muslin. Price $1.

The unexpected sale of this remarkable volume is evidence how highly it is appreciated, and has been pronounced as the great fact of the publishing year.

Either of the above works sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price.

RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers,
No. 130 Grand Street, New York.

IRON-AMALGAM BELLS.

We take leave to call the attention of those interested to the assured price list of our cheap Church Bells—and which, for the future, it will be observed, are offered at about one-third as much as is usually charged for them in proportion to size and weight by the manufacturers of brass-composition bells. Farm, School, Steamboat, Factory, Plantation, Clock, Yacht, Standard, and Crank complete.

No. 1, 16 in. Bell including hangings weight 65 lbs.		$6 00
2	18	"	" 95	9 00
3	20	"	" 123	12 00
4	23	"	" 179	18 00

Church, Academy, Farm Alarm, and Steamboat Bells rigged with Yoke, Standards, Tolling-Hammer, and Rope.

No. 5, 28 in. Bell including hangings weight	300 lbs.	$50 00
6	36	"	" 500	80 00
7	42	"	" 800	100 00

Bells warranted twelve months, and shipped free of charge for drayage, on receipt of price.

E. HAUGHEY, Agent, Cincinnati, O.

N. B.—Highest price paid for broken Brass Composition Bells.

FRUITS AND FLOWERS!—If you wish to know all about cultivating Fruits, Flowers, and Vegetables, subscribe for MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER. Published at ROCHESTER, N. Y., at $2 a year. WEEKLY. It contains more and better information relating to Rural Affairs than any other paper now published in America, and should be in the hands of every Farmer and Gardener in the land. Specimens sent free. Try it, and you will see. Only $2 a year. Three months on trial, 25 cents.

Address D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N.Y.

IRON IN THE BLOOD.

DYSPEPSIA, SCROFULA, GENERAL DEBILITY,
and Impure Skin.
Headache.

Why is Iron beneficial to the system?

Why is it efficacious in so many diseases apparently unconnected with the blood?

Why is "PERUVIAN SYRUP," or Protected Solution of Protoxide of Iron, a specific, better than any other medicinal preparation of iron?

Since the remarkable cures effected through the Agency of "PERUVIAN SYRUP" have been made public, the above questions are frequently asked respecting it. They are facts which indicate the great importance of Iron in the Blood," which can be had on application. The following are a few out of numerous certificates of remarkable cures from the following well-known physicians, ministers and others:

Rev. John Pierpont,
Rev. Henry Ward Beecher,
Rev. Arthur B. Fuller,
Rev. A. D. Gillette,
Rev. Gordon Robins,
Rev. Sylvanus Cobb, Jr.,
Rev. Thos. Whittemore,
Rev. Richard HUNSON, agent,
Rev. M. J. Webber,
Rev. Henry Cook,
Rev. J. Pearson, Jr.,
Rev. Henry Blanchard,
Rev. S. H. Riddel,
Rev. F. D. Huntington,

Rev. John W. Olmsted,
Rev. Lewis Johnson, M.D.,
Russell Rinney, M.D.
E. H. Sewall, M.D.,
W. F. Nichols, M.D.,
Charles Rand, M.D.,
Jeremiah Chase, M.D.,
Rev. Antonio Bachelder, M.D.
Marcellus Amsden, M.D.,
Abraham Wendell, M.D.,
H. E. Risney, M.D.,
Henry Ingalls, M.D.,
Thomas A. Dexter,
Mrs. Sarah Sampson.

Pamphlets laid on application to the agents, or to N. L. CLARK & CO., Proprietors, Boston.

Sold by Druggists generally in the United States. Sold wholesale by all Jobbers.

HARRIS & CO., 429 Broadway.

ONE DOLLAR.—It should be known to every family in the United States that for ONE DOLLAR sent to our address, a fortnightly, elegantly-illustrated, and entirely original MAGAZINE may be had for a whole year. Beautifully printed on clear white paper, with new type, and each number containing over one hundred pages of reading and illustrations making twelve hundred pages a year, or two volumes for one dollar! BALLOU'S DOLLAR MAGAZINE now circulates 119,000 copies, and is the cheapest publication in the world. Inclose one dollar, as below, and receive the Magazine by return of mail for a whole year.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher, Boston, Mass.

FROM THE DAILY ATLAS AND BEE, BOSTON:—" Our readers in the public are not unfamiliar with the name of Dr. Halsted, the proprietor of the Round Hill Water Cure, in Northampton, Mass. The Doctor's treatment of disease, known as the 'Metropathic System,' has produced wonderful results, verifying success where all others signally failed. He is especially efficient where the body is debilitated and 'run down.' It is also of marked merit in the cure of diseases incident to females, as many in this city can testify. We are knowing to many surprising cures effected by the Round Hill Water Cure, and cheerfully recommend to sufferers to consult it. Its success is unequalled."

COUNTRY NEWS will save TIME and EXPENSE By sending

Their ORDERS to HAMILTON, JOHNSON & PARRELLY, Wholesale News Agents, No. 121 Nassau St., N. Y.

Perry's Japanese Boot and Shoe Polish.

Splendid gloss. No rubbing. Soils nothing. Sold everywhere.

JAPANESE POLISH CO.,
No. 447 Broome Street, one door west of Broadway.

"GET THE BEST."—Both People and Press say Moore's Rural is the best Family and Farmers' paper. See it, and decide. It's only $2 a year. Specimens sent free.
Address D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N.Y.

Hazard & Caswell's Cod Liver Oil.—The Cod Liver Oil manufactured by the parties whose names it bears, consequently can be warranted the purest and sweetest in the world. For sale by druggists all over the United States.
CASWELL, MACK & Co., 5th Av. and 34th St., Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York.

TO THE LADIES OF AMERICA.

No lady objects to a beautiful complexion, yet many neglect the use of means to obtain it. We are positive the single bottle of the elegant French Floral Extract, "TRIFERA," will produce the most beautiful effect. It is a most excellent qualities as a restoring and beautifying medium. Try it. Sold by druggists generally.

MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER, a first-class, high-toned, and progressive Rural and Family Weekly. $2 a year; or this quarter's numbers (13) sent, on trial, for 25 cents.
Address to D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N.Y.

Invaluable to Every Practitioner.

An Epitome of BRAITHWAITE'S Retrospect of Practical Medicine and Surgery,

BY
WALTER S. WELLS, M.D.

To be completed in Five Parts, at $1 00 each.

(PARTS ONE AND TWO NOW READY.)

Bound in Two Volumes, in Sheep $6 50.

From the Preface.

"The design of the author in presenting to the Profession an Epitome of Braithwaite's Retrospect of Practical Medicine and Surgery,' is to enable the Practitioner to refer at once to the treatment of all varieties of disease—to refresh his memory in cases of emergency, and to bring the accurate knowledge of the scientific publications as would otherwise involve considerable research to acquire from the original volumes.

"Reference to the part and page of the original volume of which the article forms a part is appended for the convenience of those who may wish to refer in detail."

Extract from Preface.

From Prof. Willard Parker, College of Physicians and Surgeons, N. Y.

"W. S. Wells, M. D., has submitted to my inspection his Epitome of Braithwaite's Retrospect. I am very well pleased with the result of his labors. He has conferred a great favor upon the Profession. Braithwaite's Retrospect fills seven large volumes, and of itself makes quite a library. Dr. Wells' Book not only furnishes us with an abstract of the valuable matter to be refer, without loss of time, to any special subject in the forty volumes."

From John W. Francis, M.D., LL.D., New York.

"Few physicians are devoted to Medical science to keep so eminently distinguished, for a series of years, as Braithwaite's Retrospect of Practical Medicine and Surgery. It may well be deemed quite a library of the great modern improvements in the noble art of healing. It is not beatiate to say that your undertaking will be an acceptable one to the Profession, and will of itself make a most wholesome knowledge for the benefit of Practitioners, and will tend to the cultivation of medical learning wisdom. Your labor deserves the patronage of the Profession."

From Prof. Valentine Mott, University Medical College, New York.

"You have rendered an essential service to the Profession in the abridgment of Braithwaite's Retrospect of Practical Medicine. The alphabetical arrangement of the subjects will be most acceptable to Practitioners of this City and Country who have but little leisure for reading. Your science it is a valuable present to the Physician and Surgeon."

From Prof. R. Ogden Doremus, New York Medical College.

"It affords me great pleasure to offer my cordial commendation of your laborious undertaking to present to the Profession an Epitome of Braithwaite's Retrospect.

"You state that the Analytical Table of Contents and Tabulation of this voluminous work will be appreciated."

From James R. Mann, Medical Library, and Librarian of the Mussi Laboratory.

"I have read Dr. Wells' abridgment of the volume of your Epitome of Braithwaite's Retrospect.

"The value of the Retrospect to the Profession has long been settled, and you have, by condensing it into a portable form, rendered it more valuable, and enabled us so to facilitate finding all the information it contains on any point, as I have suggested in my work."

Published for the author, by subscription.
By CHARLES T. EVANS, 114 Fulton Street, New York.

For sale also by H. G. LAWRENCE, Bookseller, &c., 1 Vesey Street; and MILLER, MATHEWS and MASE-BROOK, 775 Broadway.

Physicians and others desirous of subscribing to this Work, can receive the First Part at once (which will be sent prepaid,) on their remitting $1 00, addressed to "CHARLES T. EVANS, Box 4583, New York P. O.," and the remaining four numbers monthly thereafter on the same conditions.

The Second and concluding Parts will be issued Monthly, and every Subscriber will be notified when each Part is ready.

PARTS ONE AND TWO NOW READY.

ANOTHER SPLENDID STORY! WRITTEN EXPRESSLY FOR THE New York Weekly!

WILL BE COMMENCED IN THE NEW YORK WEEKLY ON THURSDAY, MARCH 1st, 1860, by the publication of a NEW AND BEAUTIFUL STORY, ENTITLED

AMY RAYNER;

OR,

THE TANGLED PATH.

From the pen of

OUR GIFTED LADY CONTRIBUTOR.

Miss Lucy A. Randall,

Daughter of the widely-known and greatly-esteemed City Superintendent of Public Schools,

S. S. RANDALL, ESQ.

Miss Randall has already earned for herself an enviable reputation as a sketch-writer, under various nom de plumes, but she is better known, perhaps, as "HELEN COURTNEY GRAEME," in the NEW YORK WEEKLY, and Mrs. GEORGE P. BURLINGHAM WILDE, in a contemporary journal.

Those of Miss Randall's admirers who have attended the beautifully-written sketches of this talented young lady, and every one of these will hail with delight the announcement that she has undertaken a serial narrative. It has often been remarked by many that we exquisite a writer as MISS RANDALL would accomplish wonders in a novel; and we beg to assure all who have formed this opinion that they are not mistaken.

THE TANGLED PATH

WILL BE READY IN THE NEW YORK WEEKLY ON THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 1860.

For sale every where.

OUR TERMS.

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY is sold by all respectable News Agents in the United States. The price is FOUR CENTS, but in some cases, where Agents have to pay extra freight or postage, a higher price is necessarily charged. When there is a News Agent in the town, we desire to refer you to HIM. WE DEAL DIRECT ONLY WHEN We do not wish to mail the paper except to places where there is no other means of getting it. When sent by mail, the price will invariably be $3 a year, in advance: Subscriptions taken for three months, or six months, will be sent for a year for $2; four copies for $6; eight copies for $15. Clubs of ten and others who get up clubs of ten, and send us $15 at one time, will be entitled to an extra copy for their trouble. The bills of all solvent banks taken at par for subscriptions. Canada subscribers must send twenty cents extra with every subscription, to prepay the American postage.

Specimen Numbers sent free.

STREET & SMITH,
PROPRIETORS of "THE NEW YORK WEEKLY."
No. 22 Beekman Street, N. Y.

Bound Volumes of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

BINETEEN SEMI-ANNUAL VOLUMES of the Magazine have been published. We will send by Mail, postage paid, to any place in the United States within 2000 miles of New York, any of these volumes, neatly and uniformly bound in Muslin, upon the receipt of Three Dollars per Volume. When complete sets are purchased, we will make a discount of Twenty-five per cent., forwarding the volumes by express, the freight being at the expense of the purchaser.

These Nineteen Volumes of the Magazine contain matter equivalent to more than One Hundred ordinary Octavo Volumes, and are illustrated by more than SIX THOUSAND Engravings, executed in the highest style of the art.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.

O'Connor & Collender, 65 to 69 Crosby Street.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $70.
HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

THE ORANGE BLOSSOM WEDDING ENVELOPE, just issued, very beautiful (copyright secured), at STEWART'S Wedding Card Depot, No. 302 Broadway, cor. Duane Street. Also, French PAPER.

OLD DR. HEATH'S BOOK OF Travels and general discoveries of the Japanese and East India Medicines, with full directions, forms for the treatment of Consumption, Bronchitis, Coughs, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Fevers, Heart Diseases, Scrofula, Chronic Rheumatism, Diseases of the Kidneys, Gravel and Urinary Deposits, Female Complaints, &c. Illustrated with hundreds of certificates of cures and engravings. For the purpose of carrying as many suffering fellow beings as possible from the jaws of death, it will be sent to any part of the country by sending 25 cents to

DR. HEATH, 61 Broadway, New York City.

To Wholesale Dealers in Jewelry.

The undersigned begs to say that, owing to his unsurpassed facilities, he is able to offer to the Trade Jewelry of any description on better terms than any other house in New York.

All orders will receive the most careful and prompt attention.

W. A. HAYWARD,
293 Broadway.

TO THE CHRISTIAN WORLD.

THE CHEAPEST AND LARGE ENGRAVING OF CHRIST AND HIS APOSTLES,

(From Thorwaldsen's immortal group. Size 24 by 36.)

AND

A BEAUTIFUL BIBLE IN GILT,

For only $2.

It is pre-eminently appropriate for the CHRISTIAN HOUSEHOLD.

It is a TOUCHING REMEMBRANCER

of our Divine Saviour!

It is a Magnificent Wreath of Art, on the angelic shine of our Faith!

(From Rev. Dr. Prime, Editor of New York Observer.)

THORWALDSEN'S STATUARY.

Dayton & Co.'s advertisement of their fine engraving of Thorwaldsen's celebrated group of "Christ and the Apostles," will attract attention. One of the pictures hangs in my study, and has enjoyed the work as elsewhere, by suitable for the wider of every Christian household. The work is finished like a line steel engraving, which it is bound in velvet and gilt, and the price at which he offers them is so low, that thousands may avail themselves of the opportunity. We hope they will.

(From Rev. Dr. Tyng.)

SECOND NOTICE.

DAYTON'S ENGRAVINGS. We would again call attention to Mr. Dayton's advertisements. We have every reason to believe that there will be the proper response from the public. Subjoined are two letters concerning money for its splendid works of Art.

The Bible which we present with this impressive engraving is Divine, bound in beautiful gilt clasp and clasps, worth at retail from $3 to $4.

To those who will thus distribute this religious picture without the Bible, the price is $1, with 12 cents to pay postage.

☞ Send to DAYTON & CO., 47 Park Row, N. Y., $7 and $2 cents in stamps for return postage on Engraving and Bible.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.

B. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

THREE GOOD JOURNALS FOR 1860. Well adapted to all readers in every family:

LIFE ILLUSTRATED: A FIRST-CLASS FAMILY PAPER, devoted to News, Literature, Science, the Arts; to ENTERTAINMENT, IMPROVEMENT and PROGRESS. Published weekly at $2 a year.

THE WATER-CURE JOURNAL; Hydropathy, its Philosophy and Practice; Physiology, Anatomy, and the Laws of Life and Health. $1 a year.

THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, Devoted to all those Progressive Measures for the Elevation and Improvement of Mankind. Illustrated. $1 a year.

For THREE DOLLARS, all three Papers will be sent a year.

FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

☞ Sample gratis. Agents wanted. Begin now!

Agents Wanted

[To obtain Subscribers for]

LOSSING'S

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION,

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 Pages and 1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be SUBSCRIBED FOR BY AGENTS, to each of whom a special District will be given. Here is an opportunity for Applicants should name the Counties they would prefer. For full particulars address GUY W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Quero's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly

The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, in half the usual time.

Also,

Quero's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil.—The greasy sensation of the oil is obviated, and it does not cause any nausea after taking. The best purgative for children. To be had at the Inventor's Depot, 277 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. PERKINS, FOLD, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 19 Beekman Street.

Barney's Opera Perfume.

DESCRIBED IN MILLE. ANGELO'S LETTER.

A new and elegant PERFUME, exhaling the most delightful and exquisite odour; as truly fascinating as the beautiful, unexplainable likeness it bears each bottle. More than 5000 bottles were sold in a few days while this Perfume was first in Boston.

Sold wholesale by J. W. SONCRANT & Co., No. 91 Fulton Street.

Retailed by all Druggists and Fancy Good Dealers.

Private Hair Dyeing Rooms, for ladies, at Batchelor's Wig Factory. Hair Dyeing and Wig Establishment, 16 Bond Street, Private Entrance. Copy the address, 16 Bond Street.

!! SOMETHING NEW !!

A HEMMER, TUCKER, FELLER, BINDER, AND GUAGE combined, just patented, simple, hemming any kind of cloth, from the finest cambric muslin, applied to any Sewing Machine by any one in a few minutes. Retail price $5. LIBERAL DISCOUNT TO THE TRADE. Orders by mail supplied (with complete instructions), postage paid. Send for a circular.

UNIVERSAL HEMMER CO.,
429 BROADWAY, N. Y.

☞ The DENTIST'S best outlay is to purchase SHAW'S ARTISAN. For sale at Dentist Depots. CIRCULARS of explanation, address SHAW & BAILEY, 943 Race Street, PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

☞ Orders will meet with prompt attention.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

NEW LIST OF GIFTS FOR 1860.

G. G. EVANS & CO.,

PROPRIETORS OF THE ONLY ORIGINAL AND MOST EXTENSIVE GIFT BOOK STORE IN NEW ENGLAND,

No. 43 and 45 Cornhill,

Boston, Mass.,

Commence the year with an

GREATLY INCREASED STOCK OF BOOKS,

And an extensive assortment of

USEFUL and ELEGANT GIFTS.

During the past six months we have been enabled, through the favors of our patrons, to add materially to the facilities with which we are possessed, and are now better prepared to fill all orders with a liberality and promptitude not exceeded by any other house in the world.

Our Catalogue of Books embraces the productions of the best authors, issued by the publications of the

MOST EMINENT HOUSES IN THE TRADE,

And comprises WORKS in almost

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE.

In addition to these, we have on hand, immediately after publication, all

NEW WORKS AS FAST AS ISSUED.

Our Books are all new, and are substantially bound.

The aim of Publishers and Booksellers should be to make a valuable present with each Book at the time of sale.

Such a present we offer.

Consist of an almost endless variety of useful and elegant articles, embracing in part

FIFTY CENTS TO ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS

In Value,

Among which will be found

GOLD AND SILVER WATCHES,
GUARD AND CHATELAINE CHAINS,
LAVA, CAMEO, AND MOSAIC JEWELRY, GOLD STONE, MOSAIC AND FLORENTINE SETS OF PINS, EAR RINGS, AND EAR DROPS, GOLD PENCILS, AND PENCIL HOLDERS,
LOCKETS,
STUDS,
SLEEVE BUTTONS,
BRACELETS,
PORTE MONNAIES,
PORTE MONNAIE RINGS,
PEARL HANDLED POCKET KNIVES, &c.

And as we are constantly receiving

NEW STYLES OF JEWELRY,

And adding to the list many useful articles not heretofore embraced in it, we are confident that, for

COMPLETENESS AND VARIETY, OUR SELECTION CAN NOT BE EXCELLED.

We allow the

MOST LIBERAL COMMISSION TO AGENTS,

And invite all who are desirous of earning a little money, or who wish to obtain a

LIBERAL AND GOOD CHOICE BOOKS At a

COMPARATIVELY SMALL OUTLAY OF TIME, And

WITHOUT EXPENSE,

To act as our Agents.

We can also refer to hundreds who already possess valuable collections of Books, which they have received as Commission on Purchases, and in addition to the presents sent with each book.

We take no risk of loss through wait, if our directions are complied with.

A full and complete classified Catalogue sent free to any address on application.

Agents supplied with Show Bills and Circulars, and every information given.

Address G. G. EVANS & Co.,
Nos. 43 and 45 Cornhill, Boston, Mass., or
G. G. EVANS & Co., 439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

A CERTAIN SEASONS OF THE YEAR

And during sudden changes of temperature, every person requires some simple and effective medicine to preserve the system in its full tone and vigor.—RADWAY'S READY RELIEF is such a remedy. Prompt, and cheapest remedy for the purpose. Numerous well-authenticated testimonials of daily occurrences place its efficacy beyond question.

Scrofula, or King's Evil.

One quarter of all our people are scrofulous; their persons are invaded by this lurking infection, and their health is undermined by it. To cleanse it from the system we must purify the blood by an alterative medicine, and invigorate it by healthy food and exercise. Such a medicine we supply in the most effectual remedy which the medical skill of our times can devise for this every where prevailing and fatal malady. A thousand cures, within a single year, indicate that have been discovered for the expurgation of this foul disorder from the blood, and the rescue of the system from its destructive consequences. Hence it should be employed for the cure of not only scrofula, but also those other affections which arise from it, such as ERUPTIVE and SKIN DISEASES, ERYSIPELAS, SCURVY, ITCH, ROSE, or ERYSIPELAS, PIMPLES, PUSTULES, BLOTCHES, BLAINS and BOILS, TUMORS, TETTER and SALT RHEUM, HEAD HEAD, FEMALE WEAKNESSES, DROPSIES, STERILITY and MERCURIAL DISEASES, DROPSY, DYSPEPSIA, DEBILITY, and, indeed, ALL COMPLAINTS ARISING FROM VITIATED or IMPURE BLOOD. Full trial will relief in "Impurity of the blood" is founded in truth, for scrofula is a degeneration of the blood. The particular purpose and virtue of this Sarsaparilla is to purify and regenerate that vital fluid, without which sound health is impossible in contaminated constitutions.

AYER'S

Compound Extract of Sarsaparilla,

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & CO.,

LOWELL, MASS.

Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES won't grow upon your face, use my onguent (established 1853), which will force them to grow as rapidly from the first application, and without stain or injury to the skin. Sent by mail, post-paid, to any address. R. G. GRAHAM, 169 Nassau Street, New York.

Sent per-paid by FIRST POST, for 15 cents.

NEW ALMANACS, Rich, Racy, Instructive, for 1860. Jayne's, Lindsley's, and Wonderful Cure. Sent for 15 cents, by FOWLER & WELLS, New York.

ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, 66 West Thirteenth Street.—Acute, chronic and nervous diseases, of every description, successfully treated without medicines. Private parlors and female attendants for ladies. Good board and attentive nurses. Medicated electrical baths, 50 cents.

BEAUTIFUL WHISKERS OR HAIR produced in six weeks, easily and cheaply made, price of full receipt, $1 00. Sent by return mail.

Address DR. DICKINSON, Hudson, Michigan.

To the Book Trade.

HARPER & BROTHERS' SPECIAL TRADE CIRCULAR for the SPRING of 1850, was issued February 20th, and may be obtained by Booksellers on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

W. J. SHARP'S BILLIARD TABLE

Manufactory, 149 Fulton Street, New York.

Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 96 to 80 pages—and from one third to one half—more reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE have the pleasure to announce that they have made arrangements with the Author, by which they will receive the Monthly Parts of TRACKERAY'S New Novel, "THE VIRGINIANS," in advance of publication in England. The publication in England of Part 1 appears in the present Number of the MAGAZINE, and the Publishers will complete about Eight Parts, one of which, with the original Illustrations, will be published in each succeeding Number.

The Publishers renew the assurances which they have so often made, that HARPER'S MAGAZINE will continue to maintain the sound conservative position which it has assumed. They do not undervalue the importance of the questions at issue between the different sections and parties of the country, but they believe that a magazine especially devoted to its advocacy and maintenance. The Publishers are of HARPER'S MAGAZINE deem it of paramount importance that there should be a periodical which, leaving the discussion of these topics to the weekly and daily journals and special advocates and opponents, shall inculcate them general principles which those opinions must affect, and patriotic citizens of every section can heartily concur. The Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, the organ of no party in politics or sect in religion; but a National work, drawing its influence and monthly contributions from every quarter. The Contributors whose papers appear in its pages, feeling its responsibility to the character of its views, and of the general opinions upon the exciting questions of the day. What these private views are, or how they are expressed, beyond the pages of the Magazine, the Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE have no inquire; but they will exercise the most watchful care that nothing shall find place in any department of the Magazine which shall render it an unwelcome visitor in any household.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
All the EXTRA Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten.
SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

The postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents per year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST FAMILY AND CHILDREN'S

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

The First Number of the Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY appeared on the 4th January, 1860. Each year over 8,500,000 Numbers of HARPER'S WEEKLY were sold, and nearly half a million persons read its contents. In commencing the new volume, the proprietors desire to state that the best evidence that the paper is HARPER'S WEEKLY, is that every number before any thing else, a REMARKABLE NEWSPAPER—published in the fullest sense of the word to the daily events of the time, and in full compliance to the daily press as containing information with each. How far they have attained this aim, the three volumes now published will show. The illustrations of the Third Volume will not suffer in regular and faithful with which every important event of the past year has been related and illustrated in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. They would refer especially, in this connection, to the Indian Ocean, the Great Eastern Steamer, the Prince of Wales's Journey, the Japanese Embassy, the Paris Exposition, Italian affairs, etc., etc. The Publishers of this paper can be best realized by supposing that it did not appear one week, and to consider how little important information of passing events if they had to rely on written descriptions alone. In this respect, the arrangements for the coming year are more complete than they have been heretofore. HARPER'S WEEKLY has a regular staff of correspondents in almost every quarter of the globe, and commands the pencil of the first artists of the day. It will moreover, in order to present its readers with a complete and connected history of the age, continue to transfer to its pages the best and most generally interesting pictures from foreign illustrated journals. In a word, the subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely on finding in its pages each year an entire, well-drawn, well-engraved, and well-printed picture of every memorable event which occurs, and a record of every social fact and every material attention of the people of this country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best tales that are written by native and foreign authors. It has already published a Tale of Two Cities, by CHARLES DICKENS (with original illustrations by the author), which, as a story, confessed to be by all by SIR E. LYTTON BULWER; The Dead Secret, by WILKIE COLLINS; Lost in the Wilds, by CAPTAIN GARRARD; A Good Fight, by CHARLES READE; and Tremaine, by CHR. CLELAND STORER. In the present year will be published Second Thoughts, a Series of Journeys, by CHARLES DICKENS; The Virginians, by WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY; The New Fortune to Cleopatra at Co., Bankers, by ITTY BRADY (Country Ed.), both of which will be illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN, ESQ., and The Mistress of the Parsonage, by ELIZA LOUISA, illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN, ESQ. On, or before the conclusion of these tales, others of equal merit will be commenced. It being the intention of the publishers to secure every work of undoubted excellence which can be had for a money. This liberality necessary to add, that the foreign serials which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased only from the authors by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, who, in many instances have to pay a large sum for early or final advance to a handsome copyright to the author.

In addition to a series of such novels of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain a short complete tale by a native or foreign author. With respect to these tales, as well as serials, the publishers will publish the best that they can procure, without regard to their origin.

The other departments of HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue to receive careful attention at the hands of the publishers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $4 00.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

FIRST ELEGANT CREATURE. "A—Don't you Dance, Charles?"
SECOND DITTO, DITTO. "A—No—Not at Fwesent! I always let the Girls look, and long for me first!"

LATE FROM THE NURSERY.

MAMMA. "Now, Frank, you must put your Drum down, if you are going to say your Prayers."
FRANK. "Oh, do let me wear it, please; I'll promise not to think about it."

Davis Collamore & Co.,

Have removed their Stock of

China, Glass, &c.,

To No. 479 Broadway, New York,

(between Grand and Broome Sts.).

We invite the Public to examine the quality and styles of our goods, comparing the prices, which are

Low for Cash.

One Price—No Deviation.

The Greatest Triumph of the Age!!!

CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY BIBLE.

Part I. now ready. Mailed free on receipt of fifteen cts. Liberal discounts to Canvassers and Agents.

H. DEXTER & CO., 117 Nassau street, N. Y.

AGENTS for AMERICA.

Spasmodic Asthma.—The most severe cases of this dreadful complaint have been cured by a few doses of Jesse Whitcomb's Remedy for Asthma, and in no instance has it failed to give immediate relief. Prepared only by Joseph Burnett & Co., Boston. For sale by all Druggists at $1 00 per bottle.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S

Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,

For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the normal habits of female life superinduce a variety of diseases which this Catholicon will counteract and cure. It can be relied upon in any case of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, Ulceration of the Womb, Faintness, Lassitude, &c. When every thing else has failed, this article is never taken without benefit. No suffering female should leave it untried. A pamphlet, with full symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent (gratis) by mail, or delivered by any Agent. It is sold in every town, or sent by express. Be cautious of an imitation, somewhat similar in name, with my certificates altered. Address BARNES & PARR, No. 13 Park Row, N. Y.; FOWLE, FARR, Cincinnati or Chicago; WEEKS & POTTER, Boston; or CALLENDER & CO., Fulton, J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Utica, N. Y.

4 Powerful Microscopes of different powers sent by mail for $1 00. Same to California $1 50.

"It magnifies more than 500 times. A marvelous, little and effective microscope."—Dallas's Pictorial.

"A wonderful magnifier for 25 cts."—Boston Ledger.

UNDERWOOD, 114 Hanover Street, Boston.

Putrid Sore Throat

AND SCARLET FEVER, cured by Dr. S. B. Smith's Magnetic Salve, No. 239 Canal Street, N. Y. A plaster of it around the neck; anoint inwardly, and gargle with red rose or sage tea, strong. A box sent by mail, pre-paid, for 25 cents.

Established in 1834.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,

Manufacturer of the Over-strung

GRAND & SQUARE PIANO-FORTES,

Manufactory and Warerooms

72 to 85

East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these Instruments. They are warranted for Five Years, and Prices are moderate.

Coleman's Eutaw House,

Baltimore.

This popular House has been thoroughly renovated, and opened by ROBERT B. COLEMAN, late of the Astor House and St. Nicholas Hotels, and offers superior accommodations to families and travellers.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.

PENFOLD, FARRER & MOWER,

Wholesale Druggists,

15 Beckman Street, New York.

COUGHS.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

The great and sudden changes of our climate are fruitful sources of Pulmonary and Bronchial affections. Experience having proved that simple remedies often act speedily and certainly when taken in the early stage of disease, recourse should at once be had to "Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Lozenges, let the Cold, Cough or Irritation of the Throat be ever so slight, as by this precaution a more serious attack may be effectually warded off.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.

(for which the "Troches" is a specifics), having made me often as a mere nuisance."

N. P. WILLIS.

"I recommend their use to PUBLIC SPEAKERS."

REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

"Have proved extremely serviceable for HOARSENESS."

REV. H. W. BEECHER.

"Almost instant relief in the distressing labor of breathing peculiar to ASTHMA."

REV. A. C. EGGLESTON.

"Contain no Opium or any thing injurious."

DR. A. A. HAYES, Chemist, Boston.

"A simple and pleasant combination for COUGHS, &c."

DR. G. F. BIGELOW, Boston.

"Beneficial in BRONCHITIS."

DR. J. F. W. LANE, Boston.

"I have proved them excellent for WHOOPING COUGH."

REV. H. W. WARREN, Boston.

"Beneficial when compelled to speak suffering from COLD."

REV. S. J. P. ANDERSON, St. Louis.

"I heartily unite in the above commendation."

REV. M. SCHUYLER.

"EFFICACIOUS in removing HOARSENESS and IRRITATION of the THROAT, so common with SPEAKERS and SINGERS."

PROF. M. STACY JOHNSON La Grange, Ga.

Teacher of Music, Southern Female College.

"I have been much afflicted with BRONCHIAL AFFECTION producing HOARSENESS and COUGH. The 'Troches' are the only effectual remedy, giving power and clearness to the voice."

REV. GEO. SLACK,

Min. Ch. of England, Milton, Parsonage, Canada.

TROCHES.

Brown's Bronchial Troches.

☞ Cures Cough, Cold, Hoarseness and Influenza. Clears any Irritation in the Throat. Relieves the Hacking Cough in Consumption. Relieves Bronchitis, Asthma and Catarrh. Clears and gives strength to the voice of SINGERS. Indispensable to PUBLIC SPEAKERS. Soothing and simple, CHILDREN can use them. As they assist Expectoration and relieve Hoarseness.

☞ Sold by all Druggists in the United States, at TWENTY-FIVE CENTS A BOX.

Richard Campbell,

Manufacturer of all kinds of Saddlery Harness, Trunks, Valises, Carpet-Bags, &c.,

No. 50 Fourth Avenue, N.Y.

Particular attention paid to Orders by mail.

References—Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square.

GREAT CURIOSITY.—Particulars sent free. Agents wanted. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

LEAP YEAR GIFTS.

1860.

With Books of every standard Author, in all the departments of Literature, at Publishers' lowest prices, you will obtain

Elegant Presents

from the

Quaker City Publishing House,

PHILADELPHIA,

The Oldest Publishing House in America Conducting the Gift Book Business.

A New and Enlarged List

of

SPLENDID GIFTS

for

1860,

Embracing

Valuable and Appropriate GIFTS for MOTHERS.
Valuable and Appropriate GIFTS for FATHERS.
Valuable and Appropriate GIFTS for SISTERS.
Valuable and Appropriate GIFTS for BROTHERS.
Valuable and Appropriate GIFTS for SWEETHEARTS.
Valuable and Appropriate GIFTS for LOVERS.
Valuable and Appropriate GIFTS for WIVES.
Valuable and Appropriate GIFTS for HUSBANDS.

This list will be sent free to all.

Send for it.

A new Edition of the Quaker City Publishing House Catalogue has just been issued, comprising

The New Books,

The Standard Books,

The Miscellaneous Books,

In all the departments

of

Literature and Science.

Not an exceptionable volume can be found in the entire Catalogue. It is richly worthy the attention of the Scholar and general reader, and is Sent free to any address.

Write for it.

It contains Books of

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, TRAVEL, POETRY,
HUMOR, ADVENTURE,
FACT, FICTION,
DEVOTION, AMUSEMENT.

It contains Books for Old and Young,

Boys and Girls,
Farmers and Mechanics,
Merchants and Physicians,
Lawyers and Statesmen,
Soldiers and Sailors.

Remember that all books are sold as low as at any other establishment, and a handsome present accompanies each book sold.

ALBUMS,

Of all sizes and styles, with splendid Engravings.

PRESENTATION BOOKS,

In every beautiful style of Binding.

PRAYER BOOKS,

Protestant and Catholic.

HYMN BOOKS,

Of all denominations.

POEMS,

Of all the Authors.

JUVENILE BOOKS,

In almost endless variety.

BIBLES,

Of all sizes and qualities.

All sold at the lowest prices, and a beautiful gift presented with each book.

The Quaker City Publishing House

GUARANTEES

the most perfect satisfaction to all of its patrons.

BEAR IN MIND THAT

You can order any books which are in print, and they will be furnished at the Publishers' Prices, and promptly sent to any destination.

Money may be sent at our Risk,

Provided it is enclosed in presence of a reliable person and properly registered. But the best and safest mode is to remit by Draft on Philadelphia or New York, and made payable to my order.

To those who will act as AGENTS.

Send for a Catalogue and private Circular, which contain inducements not to be excelled, if equaled, by any other establishment, with full directions and particulars.

Address all orders to

DUANE RULISON,

Proprietor of the Quaker City

Publishing House,

No. 33 South 3d Street,

Philadelphia,

Pa.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. IV.—No. 167.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

CHARLES DICKENS'S NEW SERIAL.

We publish in this number the Third Journey of "THE UNCOMMERCIAL TRAVELER"—being a Report, by CHARLES DICKENS, on Sunday Preaching in Theatres. We need hardly add that it fully sustains Mr. Dickens's world-wide popularity.

We continue in this number our serials, to wit:

1. THE WOMAN IN WHITE, by WILKIE COLLINS, with MCLENAN'S illustrations—commenced in No. 152.

2. THE NEW PARTNER IN CLINGHAM & CO., an exquisite Story of American Life, by FITZ HUGH LUDLOW, illustrated by MCLENAN—commenced in No. 159.

3. THE MISTRESS OF THE PARSONAGE, by ELLA RODMAN — another charming Tale of Country Life in the United States —with HOMER'S illustrations—commenced in No. 164.

On or before the conclusion of these tales, others of equal merit will be commenced, it being the intention of the publishers to secure every work of undoubted excellence that is written here or abroad. The foreign serials which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased from their authors by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, who, in many instances, give for a mere right of priority what amounts to a handsome copyright to the author.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has regular artist correspondents in almost every quarter of the globe, and commands the pencil of the first artists at home. In order to present its readers with A COMPLETE ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF OUR AGE, it likewise transfers to its pages the best and most generally interesting pictures from foreign illustrated journals. The subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely on finding in its pages an accurate, well drawn, well engraved, and well printed picture of every memorable event which occurs, and a portrait of every man who attracts the general attention of the people of this country.

We can supply back numbers on receipt of the money.

SENATOR HUNTER OF VIRGINIA.

ROBERT M. T. HUNTER, a United States Senator from Virginia, was born in Essex County, in the eastern part of that State, on the 21st of April, 1809. His ancestors were among the first settlers in that fertile region, which lies on the southern bank of the River Rappahannock, formerly frequented by European vessels, which brought supplies of goods in exchange for tobacco. Here the Hunter family, generation after generation, successfully cultivated their estate; nor do we learn that any of them occupied public positions until James Hunter (the father of the subject of this sketch) was elected a Member of the State Legislature. He gave his son Robert a liberal education; and the young man, after having graduated at the University of Virginia, studied law with Judge Henry St. George Tucker, of Winchester, the author of several legal works, and a prominent politician in his time.

In 1830 Mr. Hunter was admitted to the bar, and commenced practice in his native county, where, in 1832, he cast his first Presidential vote for Andrew Jackson. He, however, espoused the cause of State Rights, in the attempt made by the Administration to coerce South Carolina, and was elected to the Virginia House of Delegates by the opposition in 1834. He served three years, and took a high stand as an independent, original legislator, opposing the Administration in its hostility to "nullification" and its exertions to "expunge" a resolution on the records of the Senate; yet sustaining the veto of the United States Bank and the efforts to abolish the "American system" of protective tariffs.

In 1837 Mr. Hunter was elected to the Twenty-fifth Congress as a Representative from his native District; and although he acted with those State-Rights Whigs who had supported Judge White for the Presidency, he zealously opposed a United States Bank. In an able speech, which displayed his intimate acquaintance with financial matters, he expressed his earnest desire to relieve the country from the pecuniary distress then paralyzing industry and arresting progress. "I might," said he, "perhaps escape responsibility by declaring that, as I had nothing to do in producing the present distress, so I was bound to do nothing toward restoring things to a sounder condition. Sir, I scorn the excuse. I think I see something which may be done for the good of the country, and I am willing to share the responsibility with those who will attempt it. In taking my course I form no new connections, I make no alliances; I act as I was sent here to act. I legislate not for party, but for the good of our common country. I tread all personal and party considerations in the dust when they present themselves in competition with the most important interests of the people." The course thus marked out early in life Mr. Hunter has consistently pursued; neither has he been found alternately advocating and opposing the great financial or commercial measures which have divided the country—bearing one party to step into another at a critical moment, and grasp the honors of victories already won by those who had been his opponents. His constituents appreciated his ability and his integrity, which they indorsed by a re-election.

When the Twenty-sixth Congress met the organization of the House was delayed by the first of the four memorable contests for the Speakership which have occurred during the past twenty years, and there is a curious connecting link between the first and the last. When the House met, on the 2d of December, 1839, five gentlemen presented themselves as representatives from New Jersey, which then elected by "general ticket," and exhibited their certificates, bearing the "broad seal" of the State and the signature of its Governor, William Pennington.—The seal and the signature were alike repudiated after a stormy debate; and on the 16th of December Mr. Hunter was elected Speaker by three majority.

Mr. Hunter was thus called on to preside over the House of Representatives during the troubled close of the Van Buren administration, and so discharged his arduous duties as to receive a unanimous vote of thanks at the expiration of the term.

Re-elected to the Twenty-seventh Congress, Mr. Hunter found himself one of the minority combating the measures introduced by the Whigs after their triumphant election of President Harrison. Bank, bankrupt, tariff, and loan bills were opposed by Mr. Hunter with equal zeal; and during the last session he aided in repealing one of these measures—the bill for the relief of bankrupts, passed at the first session.—His opposition to a National Bank was, however, used against him with effect during the next canvass, and he had the disadvantages arising from a change in the boundaries of his district—his competitor defeating him by a small majority.

In the Presidential campaign of 1844 Mr. Hunter warmly advocated the election of James K. Polk, and was himself successful as a candidate for the House of Representatives. He cordially supported President Polk in the difficulties with England on the Northwestern boundary and in the prosecution of the war with Mexico. On the introduction of the "Wilmot Proviso" he opposed it, and has since been the uncompromising opponent of the party then formed, now known as the Republican.

Elected in 1846 a Senator of the United States from Virginia, he took his seat in December, 1847, and was placed on the Committee of Finance,

HON. ROBERT M. T. HUNTER, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM VIRGINIA.

[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

of which Daniel S. Dickinson, of New York, was Chairman. There has not, from that day to the present time, been a prominent question before the Senate which he has not—clearly, briefly, and emphatically—given his views upon. He has made it comparatively few long speeches, but has left the impress of his intellect upon nearly every subject debated. Ever ready to maintain the rights of Virginia, and to sustain the honor of the South, it has nevertheless been truly said of him that he has distinguished himself for that manliness of character which comprehensively grasps the future and the present; and which, divesting itself of local and sectional prejudices, seeks so to legislate as to increase the prosperity of the Union.

In 1849 Senator Hunter succeeded Senator Dickinson as Chairman of the Committee of Finance—a responsible position, which he has since held. One of his earliest acts was to advocate the establishment of a branch mint in the city of New York, in acknowledgment of which important service a large body of citizens tendered him a public dinner. In declining it, on account of pressing engagements at home, he set forth the position taken by Great Britain in extending for the empire of trade and the supremacy of the seas, and declared that if Brother Jonathan is to enter the contest New York must take the lead. "Sea is," said he, "already giving evidence that she accepts her destiny, and is preparing for the conflict. Her lines of magnificent steamers, if they do not girdle the earth, will expangle the oceans in more directions than one; her commercial enterprise and ambition are worldwide in their extent. In such an undertaking as this may all good omens attend and all success reward her. In such a struggle she has the right to expect the fostering care of American legislation. She may justly demand all proper facilities for commerce, the whole machinery of the mint and assay office, and whatever shipbuilding system adjusted to her wants, and whatever legislation may be necessary to enable her to maintain a free commercial competition with the rest of the world. The very creation of such an emporium as New York would then become, and be eminently conservative of peace abroad and harmony at home; for all its vast interests would be staked to some extent on the peace of the world, and wholly upon contented home."

As Chairman of the Committee on Finance Senator Hunter has been obliged to take a leading part in the discussion of all tariff questions, and he has adhered strictly to his original position—that no more money is to be raised off duties on foreign imports than would be just sufficient for the support of the Government, honestly administered. This has prompted him to keep down, so far as he has been in his power, the expenditures of the Government. "I think," he said, last year, "we are in more danger from an increased taxation, and from a contest in regard to a high tariff and revenue, and all those questions, than we are from any thing else just now; and, under that belief, I have felt it to my duty to vote even against some good appropriations if I believed they could be postponed without any serious detriment to the country."

Senator Hunter is not, however, disposed to cripple American industry by adhering to a tariff policy calculated to depress it. In a speech made last year, in reply to Senator Simmons, of Rhode Island, Mr. Hunter, the Senator from Rhode Island made an appeal to us in the name of the American laborer; and whenever he speaks on that subject he moves my sympathies, because he is eloquent and sincere; he touches my heart, if he fails to convince my head; but when I come to look coolly upon it, I find that my theory of doing it is very different from his. I, too, would aid the American laborer. The paths we would pursue to reach the same end diverge most widely. I would cheapen the axe with which he hews his way into the forest; the saw and the plow with which he wrings from the reluctant grasp of mother earth a hard-earned subsistence for his wife and his children; the blacksmith who covers him by night, and the coat which shields him by day against the storms and the rigors of winter. I would diminish the price of the bolt with which the sailor fastens the side of his ship together, and cheapen the cordage which holds the spars in their places: and if in justifiable means in my power I would open to him every port upon all the seas. I would cheapen to the mechanic all the tools which he used and the clothes which he wore; I would cheapen to him the sugar that sweetens the cup that cheers but not inebriates: I would relieve him from the load of dependence for his subsistence upon luxuries to be extracted from the hard earnings of his fellow-laborer. I would extend, because I would cheapen the cost of making, that iron path upon which our citizens of every degree are passing day and by night in pursuit of their objects of pleasure or of profit. In short, Sir, I would open wide the door to the self-development of American industry, and leave it free to pursue the best of its own genius; and if it did not then achieve whatever is grand and useful, or curious and beautiful in art, the fault would not rest upon the want of proper opportunity, but upon its own incapacity. Myself, I am willing to abide by the result. I do not distrust the capacity of my countrymen to do as much as has been effected by any other nation in founding empires or building up industrial systems."

While Senator Hunter has been diligently engaged at Washington others have attempted to supplant him in the affections of the Democrats of Virginia, but without success. When the Member of Statesmen and of Presidents" inaugurated the proud monument erected at her Capitol in honor of George Washington, Senator Hunter was the orator selected, and truly grand was his finished and philosophical production. He has been again re-elected to the Senate of the United States, and is undoubtedly the chosen candidate of the Virginian Democracy for President.

In person Senator Hunter is not a brilliant man. Grave and sincere, the expression of his countenance is peculiarly quiet and subdued—often languid and indifferent. His hair is jet black, and his complexion is swarthy. His form is compact, and there is an intimation of slowness and sophlegm in his movements; if he has passions they have little effect upon his exterior—the iron stove scarcely glows with the intensity of internal fire. His attire is careless; his manners are frank and cordial. No suspicion or taint has ever clouded his political career; no flock of lobby harpies flock around him; and he is evidently disposed to be governed by the dictates of his own conscience rather than by the edicts of a caucus. In short, he is the impersonification of that great truth proclaimed by Mr. Jefferson, in the letter which he drew up for presentation by Virginia to George the Third: "The true art of governing is the art of being honest; and to acquire that does not need the advice of many counselors."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1860.

SUBVENTIONS TO OCEAN STEAMERS.

UNANSWERABLE statistics show that the vast empire of the seas, which ten years ago was nearly ours, is again passing into the grasp of England. The steam navy of England is driving not only our sailing-vessels, but our steamers also from the American Ocean. Our operation is gradual, but steady. In the year 1857, out of forty-two steamers plying between this country and the European ports were American, and thirty-one English, French, or German; in the year 1859, out of forty-six steamers plying regularly across the Atlantic, only five were American and forty-one were foreign. In other words, in two years the steam service across the Atlantic increased ten and a half per cent.; but in the same period the foreign steamships on the route increased thirteen per cent., while the American steamships declined over fifty per cent.

In seeking for the causes of this palpable defeat of our steamship-owners by foreigners, we discover that British ship-owners enjoy a marked advantage in a subvention granted by the British Government. That Government sagaciously devotes a large sum annually to the maintenance of the Cunard line of steamers, which the members can afford to carry passengers and freight at cost; the money they receive from the English Government, in the guise of mailpay, affords a handsome profit upon the capital invested by their owners. This places them in a position far superior to that of any American line. The same policy is employed by the Canadian line, which receives a similar annual aid from the Government of Canada. Other lines—the screw line from New York to Liverpool, the Collins line, and the Havre line—likewise receive aid, in one shape or another, from the British Government. The statesmen of England have long since arrived at the conclusion that a few hundred thousand pounds would be well invested in driving American steamships off the Atlantic. How well they have succeeded in the figures given above sufficiently show.

Our steamships received nothing but a bare remuneration for transporting the mails from port to port. They were not, like the Cunard line, paid a large subsidy to the Collins steamers. Unhappily Mr. Collins and his associates had neither the sagacity nor the discretion which were requisite to retain the boon. Instead of relying on the patriotism and sagacity of Congress, it is loudly asserted that they undertook to buy up members and Senators, and, as was sure to be expected, the result was the loss of their annual grant. An odor of corruption and roguery hung round the line, and it died of its death. It was badly managed, badly officered, and badly engineered in every way. If Mr. Collins had been content with the same allowance as the Cunard vessels receive from the British Government, and if he had forborne to seek that by scheming and intriguing, he would have enjoyed it still, and the line would still have been in existence.

However, we may let by-gones be by-gones. The question is now, shall any thing be done for the salvation of our steam navy? We, in this journal, have always taken the democratic ground that Government subventions to lines of steamers were wrong in principle, and tendency of the fatal protective system. We hold that if the steamship business be good and profitable, our people can safely be trusted to engage in it; if it be not good and profitable, it is waste of time and money to tax the people at large to make it so. But in this case a distinction must be drawn on national grounds. High national reasons forbid us to suffer the domination of the Atlantic Ocean to pass into the hands of Europeans. In the event of war, the vast preponderance of Great Britain's steam navy would place this country at great disadvantage. The question, therefore, for our representatives at Washington is, whether these national considerations are of sufficient weight to induce us to follow England in her plan of subsidizing lines of Atlantic steamers, so long as she persevers in that policy?

We can not but think that Mr. Dallas—whose presence at the Court of St. James has been thus far purely ornamental—might render a good service to his country by bringing this subject under the notice of the British Government. If that Government would agree to abandon its present subsidy to the Cunard steamers we ought to let our steamers shift for themselves. But if the British Government perseveres in protecting the great British line, then, if it be of national consequence to us to have an American line, there would seem to be no alternative for this country but to follow the example, unsound as it is in principle.

EXPLOSIONS OF STEAM-BOILERS.

ESSENTIAL as steam is to the development of the industrial, manufacturing, and commercial prosperity of this country, recent catastrophes are lending many to regard its drawbacks as almost counterbalancing its advantages. So much property and so many lives are being daily destroyed by explosions of steam-boilers that, if it were impossible to devise proper remedies for such accidents, it would almost become a question whether we had not better dispense altogether with so terrible an agent of mischief. Happily for the cause of mechanical and scientific progress, very few accidents have occurred thus far which can not be legitimately traced to carelessness in some shape or other.

Unscientific boilers are apt, whenever an explosion occurs, to lay the blame on the boiler maker. Undoubtedly some boilers are made of unsound iron, and hanging would be a mild punishment for the manufacturers who, for a trifling gain, expose their fellow-creatures to such risks as explosions involve in large cities. But the vendors who talk of iron being "bright and shiny on the edge," and therefore "apparently rotten," are not always reliable. Boiler makers and manufacturers have the best reasons in the world for using none but the best iron. It is not reasonable to believe that either the one or the other will wantonly sacrifice their commercial standing, the work of years, and jeopardize the lives of every one within half a mile of the material which they furnish for so important a purpose, simply because by so doing they can add a trifle to their bank account. Nor is it at all plausible to say that a boiler maker of known reputation is going to slight his work in some particular or fraction of others, when doubtless his productions—the produce of his skill and capital—dot the country far and wide in the United States and scores of roads and seas.

We do not mean to say that bad iron is never used in the manufacture of boilers; but in most cases of accident we believe the real cause will be found to lie in the carelessness of the operatives intrusted with the management of the boilers. For instance, according to the evidence given at the recent coroner's inquest in Brooklyn, it appears that fires were started overnight, and left "banked" all night with some but a small supply of water; and it also appears (though no mention is made of it) no means were provided for supplying the water needed. Now boilers need water if fire is kept in them, whether working or not; there are leakages and condensation going on continually, which are exhaustive, and which no engineer can foresee. To conduct a boiler with out means of running in water. Need any further cause be sought for the terrible loss of life in this case?

Similar instances abound. A case has come to our knowledge in which a blind man, in the State of Massachusetts, ran a locomotive, accompanied by his wife, with the consent of the superintendent and directors. We can point to places in this city where the proprietors of steam-vessels intrust their boilers are in an unsafe condition, and yet go on every day with a serene calmness, trusting to luck and a boy's supervision; not realizing that they have in their vaults a boiler which rends bands of iron and brass as a man as straw. Then, when "misfortune" overtakes them, we have the melancholy fact over again—"had iron," "no safety-valve," etc., etc.

If our Legislature could spare a few days for the railroad and steamboat railroad plunder bills which now engross the attention of members, they might do some good by enacting laws imposing heavy penalties on parties owning steam-engines and boilers recklessly managed, and employing men who are not engineers, but, technically speaking, "stoppers and starters;" overloading safety-valves, and committing other similar imprudences. Under such restrictions steam would be rendered safer in its use, better in its action, and more profitable to its proprietors.

Steam cylinders should be increased. Steam at sixty-five pounds pressure per square inch is more effective, and works with more economy to each and every part of the engine, the boiler included, than smaller cylinders with higher pressure. It is a common practice in factories to get a little engine, and "work her up," as they call it. We have asked one engineer in the city here what power he called his engine (seeing that it was labouring very hard, and fairly staggering under its load—it was one of 11½ bore and 22 in stroke). "Oh!" said he, "it's about 30-horse." He carried seventy-five pounds steam to the square inch, and thought he was getting 30-horse power out of it! This is but a sample of one from many. Engineers crack on steam as much as they can fairly get; hang on pokers, weights, shaft-couplings, and whatever comes to hand; then, when they finally "work her up," we have the old tragedy over again.

The main evil is, that sufficient attention is not paid to hiring capable men to work engines. If a manufacturer wants a book-keeper, he takes pains to ascertain if he be reliable and honest; but if he wants an engineer he takes the first that comes with his certificate, and that is often offhand, often at so low a rate of wages that no careful, sober, intelligent man would accept the place. There are a few places in this city where good prices are paid to engineers. Now these incompetent and underpaid men are not so much to blame for the disasters arising from their want of capacity or inattention as the men who hire them. The former must get a living at some rate or other, and so long as there is a demand for their services there will be plenty of them. There is no lack of engineers in the land; no lack of men who solely and religiously strive to do their duty at any and every personal hazard. But too many owners of steam-power, in this city especially, seek to save a few dollars a month by employing incompetent hands, and the result is—the old story—buildings blown up; unfortunate human beings killed by the score; and, of course, the usual verdict—"Nobody to blame!"

If the Legislature would render it incumbent on the owners of steam-engines in large cities to employ competent engineers, and would render them personally responsible for accidents where they had failed to do so, we might have to record a reform in this important matter.

AN OUTRAGE.

ON Friday last Superintendent Pilsbury, whose portrait we give on another page, tendered his resignation of the office of Superintendent of the Metropolitan Police. His ground for the step was the persistence of Messrs. Bowen, Stranahan, and Mayor Wood—Commissioners of Police—in assuming entire control of the force, and disregarding the superintendent to the mere rank of their recording clerk.

This is the first overt act of the new league between Fernando Wood and the Republicans of New York city. The object of which is to use the police in the Presidential election in November next, each (Wood and the Republicans) privately intending to cheat the other when the time comes. The object of the three members of the Police Commission who voted against this outrage is to preserve the police free from politics, and to render them a safe, moral and useful body. It now rests with Commissioner Shillman—whose casting vote remains to be thrown—to decide which side shall win.

At the time the Metropolitan Police Act was passed this journal took the ground that the measure was unsound in principle, and that, in practice, it would merely render the police a Republican instead of a Democratic machine. Thus far, we are bound to say that much has been done by the Commissioners to disprove the latter statement; the police in their hands has undoubtedly proved more efficient than it was before. But now, it seems, the mask is being thrown off; the Republican party want their reward. It rests with Mr. Shillman to decide whether they shall get it, at the cost of police efficiency in this city.

THE LOUNGER.

"WOMAN."

MICHELET has published the sequel to his "Love," which, like Palmer Cox's "Brownies," and which will not disappoint any admirer of the first book. It is very difficult to speak of the work as a whole, for, like the latter, it is alternately impassioned and scientific. And yet he says a great many noble and true things with generous eloquence. In the pendulous confidence of dependent young girls seeking their fortune in great cities, and the terrible dilemma of death or dishonor, which Mrs. Dall so calmly puts in her admirable little treatise, are presented by Michelet with a fullness and force which are startling. It affectingly rouses the maudlin sensitiveness that "women are about as well off as they can ever hope to be." Are men so? And is the position of woman in a world where men rule so palpably preferable?

The book has one fatal defect. It is only a criticism, not an experience. Michelet says truly enough that the sexes are entirely different. "Woman is not lesser man," as Tennyson sings; and this, which is designed as an analysis and exposition of what is most essentially feminine in woman, is written by a man. It is, therefore, only the writer's observation, and not an observation which can be scientifically verified; for it is an estimate of character and nature which is necessarily colored by the individuality of the observer. It is often incoherent and vaguely sentimental, but interests by its frequent shrewd insight and delicate appreciation.

Yet its key-note is the same. "Woman is born to suffer. Every great step of life is to her a wound," says our author. So in the midst of the most glowing passages the thought suddenly obtrudes, "This is not a loyal appreciation of a more exquisite human nature; it is morbid sympathy, it is the pity of superiority, for an invalid."

In fact, Michelet's entire theory of the sexes is not of equality in diversity, but of vigor and dependence. Man is the sun, woman is the flower, living only in his light, forever leaning and yearning toward him. The husband is protector, guardian, father (Michelet says so!) of the wife. Has it never entered into the mind of a Frenchman to conceive a woman robust and healthy in body, steady in nerves, profoundly cultivated in mind, calm and serene in soul, simple in manner, and of heart so loving and loyal that sentimental sophisty is impossible? Here are three hundred pages about woman, her life and love and education, and not the slightest recognition of the fact that the utter reconstruction of the very thing which Michelet describes to be the especial object of her creation may be her radiant crown of glory. The depth and sweetness and power of human character have been quite as nobly illustrated by the women who have never married as by those who have.

Yet it would be very unfair not to acknowledge the evident honest intention of Michelet to heighten the respect and consideration for women, which seems almost to have died out of Frenchmen, if their literature and their life are truthful witnesses. Of true life, Michelet, himself a Frenchman, and for many years in constant communication with the young men of France, must be taken as competent witness—more competent than any foreign observer. The literature, however, speaks for itself. Even in George Sand's stories—and Michelet calls her "our great novelist, a woman of wonderful power"—what melancholy portraits we have! Even Consuelo tells lies. Even the best of the women are intellectually or morally deformed. George Sand's novels are a chorus of fiery, indignant protest against the social system which is based upon debauchage and polite of nations. How a Frenchman lifts his hat when a woman passes, and what does it say? What is Balzac with the cruelly calm analyst of the woman of an essentially artificial society? Shall I speak of Dumas —of Sue—of De Kock, whose name is not a polite decent to mention, but whose scarcily-draped stories were the reading of the great middle class of French men and women? Of late he has been somewhat superseded by Ernest Feydeau, whose last and worst novel by Ernest Feydeau, whose last and worst novel by Ernest Feydeau, whose last and worst novel

GENERAL AMOS PILSBURY.

We present in connection with this sketch an excellent likeness of the General Superintendent of Police, Amos Pilsbury. He was born in the town of Londonderry, New Hampshire, on the 8th of February, 1805. He came from a sturdy stock. His grandfather took part in the baptism of blood on the plains of Lexington and slope of Dunker's Hill. His father, Moses C. Pilsbury, was in the war of 1812. He left his small farm and needy family at the call of his country, and remained in the army till the war closed. He was a noble specimen of the Puritan stock—religious, devout, decided in his convictions, bold, and of unflinching integrity. He left home to begin life at ten years of age, with his whole capital in his pocket, consisting of one cent. He started from his home, what was better than gold, a good name, good principles, a deep religious faith, an indomitable energy, and a confidence that his own right arm would achieve for him a position.

While working on his farm at Londonderry, Moses C. received a letter from the Governor of the State inviting him to Concord. He was tendered the post of Warden in the State Prison. It was a post of honor and emolument. Applicants were numerous. Men of political influence pressed their favorites upon the attention of the Governor. Mr. Pilsbury was not a candidate. He did not desire the new and untried responsibility. He did not feel competent to assume its duties. But the Governor and Council were persistent. All others were passed by, and the modest, distrustful, reluctant farmer was made Warden of the prison. He served in that capacity eight years. He laid the foundation of that fame which can never be lost.

In the prison of Concord Ames entered upon his distinguished career in the month of April, 1834, at the early age of nineteen years. He began on the lowest round of the ladder, and was appointed one of the guards of the prison. But he took his stand at once as a ruler among turbulent men. At that time prisons were as bad as prisons could be. They were schools of dissipation and seminaries of crime. Convicts entered baleful in transgression, and came out full-grown men. The cells were noisy with profanity, and reeked with crime and obscenity. All classes, ages, and conditions herded together. The young criminal and the hoary-headed villain, the youth arrested for petty larceny and the bold robber and murderer, dwelt in a common receptacle. Their time was spent in idleness, profaneness, gambling, drunkenness, and all lewdness. What little government there was was the fruit of force. Moral instruction was not attempted. The Bible, prayer, the Sabbath, worship, labor, and solitary cells as a means of discipline and regulation were not thought of.

Faith, patience, and toil produced a change even in the Concord Prison. There was no chapel, but the dining-room was used. The State provided no Chaplain, and the Warden officiated. Each day the men filed in to their meals. The Warden appeared at the head of the table, read a portion of the Word of God, and offered prayer, before any one was allowed to taste his food. This was a part of the discipline of the prison. His deep religious faith was his hiding-place of power which gave him such command over men. At the expiration of eight years the Warden left the Concord Prison one of the best regulated in the land.

In the year 1837 Amos Pilsbury was appointed Deputy Warden of the new State Prison at Weathersfield, Connecticut. His father was Warden, having been appointed in the month of July, in the same year. At that time Connecticut could boast of one of the worst prisons in the land. The State prisoners were confined in the copper mines at Symsbury. Their cells were seventy feet below the surface of the earth—deep, dark, damp, gloomy pits. Into this receptacle the convicts were lowered to sleep, and from it they were brought up every day for work. They were made secure by the strongest chains on their ankles. The chain was not removed by day or night until the convict was borne to his burial or was discharged. And the number and weight of his chains depended upon the conduct of the prisoner. From this prison one hundred and fifty-two desperate, and defiant men as were ever seen together were to be conducted to their new home at Weathersfield. They had been hardened by years of hardened by imprisonment. They knew what it was to be infamous—to drag a heavy chain day and night—to feel it gall their limbs in their downsitting and their uprising, at work and at play—they knew brutality, abuse, curses, blows, violence, sharp cold, and keen hunger. They knew nothing of humane discipline, kindness tempering severity. The young Deputy Warden was charged with the removal of the men from Newgate. He marched them down in admirable order. The rare power of controlling men, which has made his name famous for thirty years, was exhibited in his control over these hardened men. Inside the prison walls at Weathersfield the convicts were formed into line. Without weapon of defense or protection the young Warden struck the chains and fetters from the limbs of the convicts. These degrading and galling tokens of servitude had been worn by some of them for ten years. The astonished convicts were told that chains and fetters would form no part of the new discipline. Long habits of herding together without discipline or subordination—with all the bad traits of character sharpened, and licentious habits cultivated—the new system was regarded by many as hazardous, if not foolhardy. But the young Deputy was conscious of his power over the desperadoes in the prison-yard, who were unchained for the first time for years. But the men were as orderly as if they were visitors and not convicts. Each man was told his duty. The discipline of the prison was explained. He was shown his neat and clean cell. He was informed that his comfort would depend upon his own conduct.

The prisoners had not seen the Warden. They were drawn up into a line to receive him. He was a man not far from fifty years of age—a plain, farmer-like looking man. He was unarmed, and carried the Bible under his arm. He came into the presence of the prisoners, and thus addressed them:

GEN. AMOS PILSBURY, CHIEF OF THE N. Y. METROPOLITAN POLICE.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

"Prisoners,—I come to you with the sword of Justice and the olive-branch. Which will you have? For the government of my own family I read daily from the Bible, and ask the blessing of God on them. I shall do the same with you."

Amidst profound silence, while the tears started from eyes not accustomed to weep, he read that portion of the Word of God which asks this significant question, "Who maketh us to differ?" He followed the reading by a brief, touching, and affecting prayer. And so the new discipline was inaugurated. The scene was worthy of the pencil of the great artist. The new prison—one hundred ungovernable and desperate men—chains and fetters struck from their limbs lying on the pavements by their side—a mere youth by their side controlling them—an aged man with no weapon of defense but the Word of God, amidst profound silence commending those neglected men to that Redeemer who, in the days of his flesh, had commanded his disciples to visit the prison. The question of discipline was settled from that moment. No insubordination was seen. The government was as perfect the first week as it was after the lapse of years.

In April, 1830, General Pilsbury was elected Warden of that prison on the resignation of his father. He was a young man—too young, many thought, for so important a post. But it was soon apparent that the mantle of the sire had worthily descended upon the son. For order, discipline, and economy the Weathersfield prison became the model prison of the land. Its fame extended to Europe. Men made pilgrimages to it to learn the secret of its prosperity. To support the old Newgate prison, from 1810 to 1827, the sum of $120,000 had been drawn from the State treasury. The new prison, under General Pilsbury, at the expiration of two years, after defraying all its expenses, returned into the treasury the sum of $8000 as the earnings of the institution.

At the expiration of two years a new warden was appointed, who, with the aid of the directory, undertook to conduct the affairs of the prison. An immediate and desolating change followed the removal of General Pilsbury. The prisoners would obey no one. They were bold, noisy, and riotous. They broke out into open and defiant rebellion. Every form of disorder prevailed. Prisoners communicated with each other in defiance of the rules. Under-keepers traded with the convicts. Newspapers reflecting on the affairs of the prison were circulated. An under-keeper was murdered. The prison was reduced to a state of anarchy. Nine months had destroyed the discipline of years. The Legislature recalled General Pilsbury. The moment he appeared within the prison walls the rebellion ceased. Discipline revived; the men went cheerfully to their work; and during the entire twelve years that General Pilsbury conducted the affairs of that institution no similar outbreak occurred. He left it the most perfect institution of the kind in the world.

To the people of the city of Albany General Pilsbury gave ten years of the best part of his life. In 1845 he became warden of the Penitentiary in Albany, and reared the buildings connected with that institution. The people of Albany, in common with those of the State, became alarmed at the vast increase of crime. Common jails were perfect nuisances. Frauds and flagrant abuses were in the management. Prisoners were crowded together in one common room, where rum, gambling, rioting, oaths, and idleness marked the pastimes. Discipline was defied. Men tried for petty offenses, both half-fledged petty larceny, hardened villains, set side by side in one common jail, all mixed and all vicious. The citizens of Albany resolved to remedy the mischief in a degree. They committed to General Pilsbury the erection of the institution and its government. Under his eye it grew in perfection and public favor. The annual reports of the Inspectors, which cover a period of ten years, are full of enthusiastic praise. They speak of him as a disciplinarian unequaled—of his humane firmness—of the economy of his rule—of the reformation that followed his regulations—how the idle and vicious were compelled to earn their own bread—the taste, the order, the cleanliness, the health of all, and all departments of the prison—his unwearied perseverance, and his singular tact and ability in the management of men. For beauty of location, economy, and discipline, it is now unequaled. The most desperate and turbulent men, that were brought to the prison in chains, when they passed the gate and had their fetters knocked off, would cast their gibes and oaths, throw away their cigars, and exclaim, "All right, Captain. Now we have done. We know where we are. We shall keep the rules." And during the whole imprisonment would be found the most obedient to the rules of the prison.

In 1853 General Pilsbury took charge of the State property at Ward's Island. It was one of the dark places of the city. The Commissioners of Emigration clothed the Superintendent with full power to conduct the affairs of the institution according to his own judgment. Nearly 2000 persons were supported on the island; 200 persons were employed and paid to do the work. The annual expenses in the island were $260,000. The new warden produced an immediate change. The expenses were reduced. All who were able were compelled to work. The well took charge of the sick. The indolent and worthless concluded they had better work where they could get pay, and left the island in disgust. The number to be supported ran down from 2000 to 600, paid employés to 60, and the annual cost from $260,000 to $75,000. Order arose out of confusion, economy out of mismanagement, and industry took the place of idleness.

Last year General Pilsbury was appointed to the head of the Metropolitan Police—an office which, by the time this paper reaches our readers, he may have resigned. When he accepted the post of Chief it was with the express understanding that he should have power enough to fulfill the duties. He made no claim to police patronage, or to legislative or judicial authority over the department; but he insisted on being the "executive head." After some debate the Commissioners agreed to his terms and appointed him, assuming him that he would be "leaded down with power." Those Commissioners now undertake to deprive the General of the power of detailing the men; they seek, in fact, to make one of their number as a Committee the real executive head of the police, reducing General Pilsbury to the position of a clerk to the Commissioners. It is under these circumstances that he has tendered his resignation. The result of the affair will be probably known by the time this paper is printed. If the Commissioners really deprive General Pilsbury of the power for which he stipulated when he took his office, and without which he could not discharge its duties in an efficient manner, they will assume an enormous responsibility. No man of any character would take the post vacated under such circumstances, and the disasters would probably be called upon to interfere.

General Pilsbury is now fifty-four years old. He has two children living, one of whom, a son, succeeds him at Ward's Island. He is a man of fine presence, with a full, pleasant face.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

[Printed from advance proof-sheets purchased from the author exclusively for "Harper's Weekly."]

MISS HALCOMBE'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

July 3d.—When the dinner hour brought us together again, Count Fosco was in his usual excellent spirits. He exerted himself to interest and amuse us as if he was determined to efface from our memories all recollection of what had passed in the library that afternoon.

"HUSH!" SHE WHISPERED; "I HEAR SOMETHING BEHIND US."

Lively descriptions of his adventures in traveling; amusing anecdotes of remarkable people whom he had met with abroad; quaint comparisons between the social customs of various nations, illustrated by examples drawn from men and women indiscriminately all over Europe; humorous confessions of the innocent follies of his own early life, when he raised the fashions of a second-rate Italian town, and wrote preposterous romances, on the French model, for a second-rate Italian newspaper—all flowed in succession so easily and so gayly from his lips, and all addressed our various curiosities and various interests so directly and so delicately, that Laura and I listened to him with as much attention, and, inconsistent as it may seem, with as much admiration also as Madame Fosco herself. Women can resist a man's love, a man's fame, a man's personal appearance, and a man's money; but they can not resist a man's tongue, when he knows how to talk to them.

After dinner, while the favorable impression which he had produced on us was still vivid in our minds, the Count modestly withdrew to read in the library. Laura proposed a stroll in the grounds to enjoy the close of the long evening. It was necessary, in common politeness, to ask Madame Fosco to join us; but this time she had apparently received her orders beforehand, and she begged we would kindly excuse her. "The Count will probably want a fresh supply of cigarettes," she remarked, by way of apology; "and nobody can make them to his satisfaction but myself." Her cold blue eyes almost warmed as she spoke the words—she looked actually proud of being the officiating medium through which her lord and master composed himself with tobacco-smoke!

Laura and I went out together alone.

It was a misty, heavy evening. There was a sense of blight in the air; the flowers were drooping in the garden, and the ground was parched and dreary. The western heaven, as we saw it over the quiet trees, was of a pale yellow hue, and the sun was setting faintly in a haze. Coming rain seemed near: it would fall probably with the fall of night.

"Which way shall we go?" I asked.

"Toward the lake, Marian, if you like," she answered.

"You seem unaccountably fond, Laura, of that dismal lake."

"No; not of the lake, but of the scenery about it. The sand and heath, and the firtrees, are the only objects I can discover, in all this large place, to remind me of Limmeridge. But we will walk in some other direction if you prefer it."

"I have no favorite walks at Blackwater Park, my love. One is the same as another to me. Let us go to the lake—we may find it cooler in the open space than we find it here."

We walked through the shadowy plantation in silence. The heaviness in the evening air oppressed us both; and when we reached the boat-house, we were glad to sit down and rest inside.

A white fog hung low over the lake. The dense brown line of the trees on the opposite bank appeared above it like a dwarf forest floating in the sky. The sandy ground, shelving downward from where we sat, was lost mysteriously in the outward layers of the fog. The silence was horrible. No rustling of the reeds—no bird's note in the wood—no cry of waterfowl from the pools of the hidden lake. Even the croaking of the frogs had ceased to-night.

"It is very desolate and gloomy," said Laura. "But we can be more alone here than any where else."

She spoke quietly, and looked at the wilderness of sand and mist with steady, thoughtful eyes. I could see that her mind was too much occupied with its own thoughts to feel the dreary impressions from without, which had fastened themselves already on mine.

"I promised, Marian, to tell you the truth about my married life, instead of leaving you any longer to guess it for yourself," she began. "That secret is the first I have ever had from you, love, and I am determined it shall be the last. I was silent, as you know, for your sake—and perhaps a little for my own sake as well. It is very hard for a woman to confess that the man to whom she has given her whole life is the man of all others who cares least for the gift.

"If you were married yourself, Marian—and especially if you were happily married—you would feel for me as no single woman can feel, however kind and true she may be."

What answer could I make? I could only take her hand, and look at her with my whole heart, as well as my eyes would letme.

"How often," she went on, "have I heard you laughing over what you used to call 'your poverty' how often you have made me mock speeches of congratulation on my wealth! Oh, Marian, never laugh again, if you love me, over poverty—it has made you your own mistress, and has saved you from the lot that has fallen on me!"

A sad beginning on the first day of my wife!—and in its quiet, plain-spoken truth. The few days we had all passed together at Blackwater Park had been many enough to show me—to show my one—what her husband had married her for.

"You shall not be distressed," she said, "by hearing how soon my disappointments and my trials began—or even by knowing what they were. It is bad enough to have them on my memory. If I tell you how he received the first, and last, attempt at remonstrance that I ever made, you will know how he has always treated me, as well as if I had described it in so many words. It was one day at Paris, when we had ridden out together to the tomb of Cecilia Metella. The sky was calm and lovely—and the ground old ruin looked beautiful in the remembrance that a husband's love had raised it in the old time to a wife's memory. I was in my best tenderly and graciously toward my husband than I had ever felt yet. 'Would you build such a tomb for me, Percival?' I asked him. 'You said you loved me dearly, before we were married; and yet, since that time—' I could get no farther. Marian! he was actually looking at me! I pulled down my veil, thinking it best not to let him see that the tears were in my eyes. I fancied he had been paid any attention to me; but he had. He said, 'Come away,' and laughed to himself, as he helped me on to my horse. He mounted his own horse, and laughed again as we rode away. 'If I do build you a tomb,' he said, 'it will be done after your own money. It would be whether Cecilia Metella had a fortune and paid for her.' I made no reply—how could I? I was ashamed of my own folly. 'Ah, you light-complexioned women are all sulky,' he said. 'What do you want? compliments and flattery? Well, well, I'm in a good humor this morning. Consider the compliments paid, and the speeches said.' Such little kisses, they were hard things to us, how well we remember them, and how much harm they do us. It would have been better for me if I had gone on crying; but his contempt dried up my tears and hardened my heart. From that time, Marian, I never checked myself again in thinking of Walter Hartright. I let the memory of those happy days, when we were so fond of each other in secret, come back for comfort me. What else had I to look to for consolation? If we had been together, you would have helped me to better things. I know it was wrong, darling—but tell me if I was wrong, without any excuse."

I was obliged to turn my face from her.

"Don't ask me!" I said. "Have I suffered as you have suffered? What right have I to decide?"

"I used to think of him," she pursued, dropping her voice, and moving closer to me—"I used to think of him when Percival left me alone at night to go among the Opera people. I used to fancy what I would have been, if it had pleased God to bless me with poverty, and if I had been his wife. I used to see myself in my neat cheap dress, sitting at home and waiting for him, while he was earning our bread—sitting at home and working for him, and loving him all the better because I had to work for him—seeing him come in tired, and taking off his hat and coat for him—and, Marian, pleasing him with little dishes at dinner that I had learned to make for his sake. Oh! I hope he is never lonely enough and sad enough to think of me, and see me, as I have thought of him and seen him!"

As she said those melancholy words all the lost tenderness returned to her voice, and all the lost beauty trembled back into her face. Her eyes rested so lovingly on the blighted, solitary, ill-omened view before us as if they saw the friendly hills of Cumberland in the dim and threatening sky.

"Don't speak of Walter any more," I said, as soon as I could control myself. "Oh, Laura, spare us both the wretchedness of talking of him now!"

She roused herself, and looked at me tenderly.

"I would rather be silent about him for ever," she answered, "than cause you a moment's pain."

"It is in your interests," I pleaded; "it is for your sake that I speak. If your husband heard you—"

"It would not surprise him if he did hear me."

She made that strange reply with a weary calmness and coldness. The change in her manner, when she gave the answer, startled me almost as much as the answer itself.

"Not surprise him?" I repeated. "Laura! remember what you are saying—you frighten me!"

"It is true," she said; "it is what I wanted to tell you to-day when we were talking in your room. My only secret, when I opened my heart to him at Limmeridge, was a harmless secret, Marian—you said so yourself. The name was all I kept from him, and he has discovered it."

I heard her; but I could say nothing. Her last words had killed the little hope that still lived in me.

"It happened at Rome," she went on, as wearily calm and cold as ever. "We were at a ball, given to the English by some friends of Sir Percival's—Mr. and Mrs. Mayland. Mrs. Markland had the reputation of watching very closely; and some of the guests prevailed on her to show us her drawings. We all admired them—but something I said attracted her attention particularly to me. 'Surely you draw yourself?' she asked. 'I used to draw a little once,' I answered; 'but I have given it up.' 'You have once drawn,' she said, 'you may take to it again one of these days; and if you do, I wish you would let me recommend my master.' I said nothing—you know why, Marian—and tried to change the conversation. Mrs. Markland persisted—'I know he had all sorts of teachers,' she went on, 'but the best of all, the most intelligent, and the most attentive, was a Mr. Hartright. If you ever take up your drawing again, do try him as a master. He is a young man—almost a boy—and extremely poor—I am sure you will like him.' Think of those words being spoken to me publicly, in the presence of strangers—a gentleman who had been invited to meet his bride and bridegroom! I did all I could to control myself—I said nothing, and looked down at my dress. When I ventured to raise it again, my head again my eyes and my husband's eyes met, and I knew by his look that my face had betrayed me. 'We will see about Mr. Hartright,' he said, looking at me all the time, 'when we return to England. I agree with you, Mrs. Markland—I think Lady Glyde is sure to like him.' He laid an emphasis on the last words which set my cheeks burn, and set my heart beating as if it would stifle me. Nothing more was said—we came away early. He was silent in the carriage, driving back to the hotel. He helped me out, and followed me up stairs as usual. But the moment we were in our drawing-room he closed the door, pushed me down into a chair, and stood over me with his hands on my shoulders. 'Ever since that morning when you received your audacious confession to me at Limmeridge,' he said, 'I have been on the watch for the man; and I found him in your face to-night. Your drawing-master was the man; and his name is Hartright. You shall repent it, and you shall repent it, to the last hour of your lives. Now go to bed, and dream of him, if you like—with the marks of my horsewhip on his shoulders.' However he may be angry with me now, he refers to what I acknowledged to him in my confidence with a sneer or a threat. I have no power to prevent him from putting this own horrible construction on the confidence I placed in him. I have no influence to make him believe me or to keep him silent. You looked surprised to-day when you heard him tell me that I had made a virtue of necessity in marrying him. You will not be surprised again when you hear him repeat it the next time he is out of temper—oh, Marian! don't! you hurt me!"

I had caught her in my arms, and the sting and torment of my own remorse had closed them round her like a vice. Yes! my remorse. The white despair of Walter's face, when my cruel words struck him to the heart in the summer-house at Limmeridge, rose before me in mute, unendurable reproach. My hand had pointed the way which led the man my sister loved, step by step, far from his country and his friends. Between those two my hand I had stood to sunder them forever, the one from the other—and his life and her life lay wasted before me, alike, in witness of the deed. I had done this, and done it for Sir Percival Glyde.

For Sir Percival Glyde.

I heard her speaking, and I knew by the tone of her voice that she was comforting me—for, while overcome by nothing but the reproach of her silence! How long it was before I mastered the smothering misery of my own thoughts I can not tell. I was first conscious that she was kissing me; and then my eyes seemed to wake on a sudden to their sense of outward things, and I knew that I was looking mechanically straight before me at the prospect of the lake.

"It is late," I heard her whisper. "It will be dark in the plantation." She shook my arm, and repeated, "Marian! it will be dark in the plantation."

"Give me a minute longer," I said—"a minute to get better in."

I was afraid to trust myself to look at her yet, and I kept my eyes fixed on the view.

It was late. The dense brown line of trees in the sky had faded in the gathering darkness, to the faint resemblance of a long wreath of smoke. The mist over the lake below had stealthily enlarged, and advanced on us. The silence was as breathless as ever—but the horror of it had gone, and the solemn mystery of its stillness was all that remained.

"We are far from the house," she whispered. "Let us go back."

She stopped suddenly, and turned her face from me toward the entrance of the boat-house.

"Marian!" she said, trembling violently. "Do you see nothing? Look!"

"Where?"

"Down there, below us."

She pointed. My eyes followed her hand, and I saw it too.

A living figure was moving over the waste of heath in the distance. It crossed our range of view from the boat-house, and passed darkly along the outer edge of the mist. It stopped, far off, in front of us—waited—and passed on; moving slowly, with the white cloud of mist behind it and above it—slowly, slowly, till it glided by the edge of the boat-house, and we saw it no more.

We were both unnerved by what had passed between us that evening. Some minutes elapsed before Laura would venture into the plantation, and before I could make up my mind to lead her back to the house.

"Was it a man or a woman?" she asked, in a whisper, as we moved at last into the dark enclosure of the outer trees.

"I am not certain."

"Which do you think?"

"It looked like a woman."

"I was afraid it was a man in a long cloak."

"It may be a man. In this dim light it is not possible to be certain."

"Wait, Marian! I'm frightened—I don't see the path. Suppose the figure should follow us?"

"Not at all likely, Laura. There is really nothing to be alarmed about. The shores of the lake are not far from the village, and they are free to any one to walk on by day or night. It is only wonderful we have seen no living creature there before."

We were now in the plantation. It was very dark—so dark that we found some difficulty in keeping the path. I gave Laura my arm, and we walked as fast as we could on our way back.

Before we had gone half-way through, she stopped, and forced me to stop with her. She was listening.

"Hush!" she whispered; "I hear something behind us."

"THERE SAT THE COUNT," ETC.

"Dead leaves," I said, to cheer her, "or a twig blown off the trees."

"It is summer time, Marian; and there is not a breath of wind. Listen!"

I heard the sound, too,—a sound like a light footstep following us.

"No matter who it is, or what it is," I said; "let us walk on. In another minute, if there is any thing to alarm us, we shall be near enough to the house to be heard."

We went on quickly—so quickly that Laura was breathless by the time we were nearly through the plantation, and within sight of the lighted windows.

I waited a moment to give her breathing-time. Just as we were about to proceed she stopped me again and signed to me with her hand to listen once more. We both heard distinctly a long, heavy sigh behind us in the black depths of the trees.

"Who's there?" I called out.

There was no answer.

"Who's there?" I repeated.

An instant of silence followed; and then we heard the light fall of the footsteps again, fainter and fainter—sinking away into the darkness—sinking, sinking, sinking—till they were lost in the silence.

We hurried out from the trees to the open lawn beyond; ceased it rapidly; and without another word passed between us reached the house.

In the light of the hall-lamp Laura looked at me, with white cheeks and startled eyes.

"I am half dead with fear," she said. "Who could it have been?"

"We will try to guess to-morrow," I replied.

"In the mean time say nothing to any one of what we have heard and seen."

"Why not?"

"Because silence is safe—and we have need of safety in this house."

I sent Laura up stairs immediately, waited a minute to get off my hat and put my hair smooth, and then went at once to make my first investigations in the library on pretense of searching for a book.

There sat the Count, filling out the largest easy-chair in the house; smoking and reading calmly, with his feet on an ottoman, his cravat across his knees, and his shirt collar wide open. And there sat Madame Fosco, like a quiet child, on a stool by his side, making cigarettes. Neither husband nor wife could by any possibility have been out into that evening, and have just got back to the house in a hurry. I felt that my object in visiting the library was answered the moment I set eyes on them.

Count Fosco looked in polite confusion, and tied his cravat on, when I entered the room.

"I am afraid you are disturb you," I said. "I have only come here to get a book."

All unfortunate men of my size suffer from the habit of fat. The Count, relieving himself gravely with a large green fan. "I wish I could change places with my excellent wife. She is as cool at this moment as a fish in the pond outside."

The Countess allowed herself to thaw under the influence of her husband's quaint compassion. "I am near warm, Miss Halcombe," she remarked, with the modest air of a woman who was confessing to one of her own merits.

"Have you and Lady Glyde been out this evening?" asked the Count while I was taking a book from the shelves to preserve appearances.

"Yes; we went out to get a little air."

"May I ask in what direction?"

"In the direction of the lake—as far as the boat-house."

"Aha? As far as the boat-house?"

Under other circumstances I might have resented his curiosity. But to-night I looked for as another proof that neither he nor his wife were connected with the mysterious appearance at the lake.

"No more adventures, I suppose, this evening?" he went on. "No more discoveries, like your discovery of the wounded dog?"

He fixed his unfathomable gray eyes on me, with the same clear, irresistible glitter in them which always forces me to look at him, and always makes me unaware while I do look. An unsatisfactory sensation that his mind is prying into mine overcomes me at these times; and it overcame me now.

"No," I said, shortly; "no adventures—no discoveries."

I tried to look away from him and leave the room. Strange as it seems, I hardly think I should have succeeded in the attempt if Madame Fosco had not helped me by causing him to move and look away first.

"Count, you are keeping Miss Halcombe standing," she said.

The moment he turned round to get me a chair I seized my opportunity—thanked him—made my excuses—and slipped out.

An hour later, when Laura's maid happened to be in her mistress's room, I took occasion to refer to the discoveries of the night, with a view to ascertaining next how the servants had been passing their time.

"Have you been suffering much from the heat down stairs?" I asked.

"No, miss," said the girl, "we have not felt it to speak of."

"You have been out in the woods, then, I suppose?"

"Some of us thought of going, miss. But cook said she should take her chair into the cool court-yard outside the kitchen door; and, on second thoughts, all the rest of us took our chairs out there too."

The housekeeper was now the only person who remained to be accounted for.

"Is Mrs. Michelson gone to bed yet?" I inquired.

"I should think not, miss," said the girl, smiling. "Mrs. Michelson is more likely to be getting up just now than going to bed."

"Why? What do you mean? Has Mrs. Michelson been taking to her bed in the daytime?"

"No, miss, not exactly, but the next thing to it. She's been asleep all the evening on the sofa in her own room."

Putting together what I observed for myself in the library and what I have just heard from Laura's maid, one conclusion seems inevitable. The figure we met at the lake was not the figure of Madame Fosco, of her husband, or of any of the servants. The footsteps we heard behind us were not the footsteps of any one belonging to the house.

Who could it have been?

It seems useless to inquire. I can not even decide whether the figure was a man's or a woman's. I can only say that I think it was a woman's.

DERNIER RESORT.

Sere told me that she loved me once,

"But now," she feared, "her love was dead."
The fault was mine—I was a dunce
To show a bigger heart than head.

With love I pestered her so much
She thought it cheap—not worth a groat!
Well, 'love is blind;' but this I vouch,
Her words took from my eye the mote!

"Sweet love," I said, "your love is dead,
And mine, though living, 's little worth;
We now should part; we may not wed—
I go a whaling voyage north!"

I spoke with pride and high-born zest;
She saw the passion in my eyes.
She leaned her head upon my breast,
And said, "If you go, may not I?"

ONLY A WOMAN'S STORY.

LONG ago, my friend, as you watched with me in my sickness, I promised to tell you the story of my life. It all seemed to come back to me in those long wakeful nights; and if you have not forgotten the lonely woman cheered by your kindness, I will keep my promise now.

You know that all home I lived in was my first home. I hoped to be taken from it to my last one. It was the pleasantest place in the world to remember—the old house, resting under the elm-trees, and the smooth natural lawn sloping down, with its green grassy banks, to the river. It seemed as if God had made that beautiful spot for a resting-place. Far behind the old house rose the great solemn mountains that lay close against the sky. I think now, perhaps, it was nearer heaven.

Next to our house was the tram farm-house, always my other home, and only separated from it by a hedge, that as a child I thought high, as a maiden could be with— Ah! it is hard to stop remembering; and it is wrong to live only in retrospection.

I don't know when John Maynard and I first liked each other. It seemed as natural as breathing. We were always together. As children, we took the love-passages usually played in the fields; hand in hand we wandered over the hills for the wild-flowers in summer, and the scarlet berries in autumn. As we grew older, there came a time when I looked for the blossom of the larch grew long. John was to go out into the great, wonderful world, and grow rich and famous; and I was to stay at home and wait—wait. I think that is what we are all doing in some way or other.

So the years went by till John was twenty and I seventeen. Then the old child-plans became more real. At last it was true that he would go to a city far away. Somehow the walks grew plainer as the time grew freer; and I almost wished he would not be so kind, it was making it so much harder to say good-by.

Then the harvest moon went down and down, until the last day before he was to go. It was early autumn, and we walked through the woods, which were flaming with the changing foliage; then by the river, with the scarlet glory of the Cardinal flower; over the hill where we used to watch the sunsets, and think how soon the sun went down. Every thing was much the same, but John looked away off to the distant hills which were to lie between us; and if my eyes were bent on the flowers at my feet I did not see them for the tears I was trying to hide.

But when we came to the fallen tree, our old seat, it seemed to come over me all at once that John was going away—that I might never see him again!—till I seemed to be saying to myself, "Never again! never again!" I just looked in his face, and—I am not crying! I was only my heart that was crying before.

Then he took my hands and told me the story —old since people have lived and suffered; new while they live and love. He told me how the friendship of a lifetime had grown into love for me—he never knew how much until he came to leave me; how my love for him would be his incentive to honor and success; and, again and again, those wonderful, wonderful words—he loved me!

What could I answer? Only that I did not remember the time when I had not loved him; that I would wait with patient trust until the time came to fulfill our hopes and promises.

As we walked through the deepening twilight, we said we would go through life as through the wood together. I think the very birds sang sweeter for our happiness! We were so young that all life seemed natural—bathed in sunshine, like the distant hills that stretched away before us. That night, as I smoothed my brown hair, I looked through happy tears at the face which he said was fair to him—and so seemed prettier to me for that.

So he went away; and there came a long, long time when I had little to make it shorter. Then the winter came, and the soft snow hid the old walks and wood-paths, and obliterated them all, like Time. Then came the tardy spring, with its sweet promise; and the summer, with its fulfilling blossoms; and at last the golden autumn. Just one year! And he was to come back for a short while, returning again to the city. Oh! it was such an eager pleasure to expect him—only the days were so much longer when I were wishing them away! So I sat, with womanly wonder, thinking how he would look—wondering if the year and the new life had changed him; never once asking myself if he had changed my love. How could he? Why I not the same, with a love enriched by memory as well as hope?

So the last time went by—and if John's letters grew less frequent I thought it was because he was coming to me so soon. At last he came. Oh, how dreary it had tried to expect some outward change from the effect of city life, and the natural development of his young manhood. I knew he must grow and outgrow a great deal. Then I tried to find in his conscious difference of ways and manners, and I was afraid of comparing his new and his old life. Then the first fears came—and stayed.

When people cease loving you, Fanny dear, they are sometimes a great deal kinder, as if to make up for it. John was so kind that he betrayed the truth day by day, hour by hour. I held him by his honor, and no longer by his love; how he wearied of the ties he was too honorable to break! I was full of resources but he became only duties to him. You know the difference and I could not bear that. I saw it all, day by day, and I think strength was my own was given me to bear it. I think earth gave less than that heaven might grow more so. Life would be hard and difficult if it were not for the thought of this eternal compensation.

One evening we took the old walk through the woods. As I remembered our last walk there, I tried to compose myself for what I had to do, but I never faltered. I told him how I had seen, day by day, the change that had come over him; how my own love had never altered but was unchanged; how I could never accept my happiness at the expense of his. I told him how I had seen him fulfilling the duties of a position unsuited to his old, Fanny, duty is not always happiness; and we only gather the pale Platonic flowers of peace when we lose the passion-flowers of love!

I don't know when I was free—free from his sacred promise to me—free to win and wed! It was hardest of all to say I should rejoice in the happiness I had given him—his wife. There came a strange feeling at my heart as I said it; but I looked up at the sky, and that made me stronger —that calm, quiet, beautiful, with its upper deeps.

John was touched at what I said; but he never gainsayed it, nor wronged me by deceiving me. He only said he was not worthy of me. Of that we have always differed, and always shall differ. He saw I was firm and sincere; and then he even tried my strength by telling me of a woman he had met in the city whom he knew I was wo manly pride came to my aid, and he never knew how every word entered the heart he had broken.

As we walked home through the wood its shadows seemed to fall all around my heart. The glory in the west had faded away, and only the solemn, shifting gloom looked down upon us.

That night we parted calmly, never to meet again. He went back to his new love and new life, and I back to loneliness and a hopeless future.

The dreary days lengthened into months, and another year brought the news of his marriage. I tried to pray for his peace. My own heart was numbed with pain. I can't say much about long watching and waiting; the uneventful life of lonely womanhood. Then the sense of "duty" —the old selfish enigma of duty for happiness' memory for hope, "the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness."

After many years came news of his death. Then there was a great blank in my life; when it must have been my duty to live it was over. Death silently takes away, but never in soul. It is to the happy who are eager for life.

My good old parents were taken from me. Heaven was kind, and they died in one day—never missing each other, and lying down together to their welcome sleep.

For ten long years I have been alone; but I shall find companions soon, for I know that three are waiting for me above. Three; for Heaven redeems earth's losses: and I shall find my own again will redeem life's woes and blindness, and be my eternal compensation.

That is all, Fanny; only a woman's story, short and simple, soon told and forgotten. But when woman's part of grief comes to you, remember we shall be kindred by the sacred tie of sorrow. We have not all our dead; and there are griefs above the earth deeper than those beneath it, for we dare not mark all our graves.

I have tried to be brave and patient. When happiness failed, I have asked for peace—only peace. I have waited so long for that. It seems near and eternal now.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, February 27, in the Senate, Senator Davis (Mass.) presented a memorial from the Legislature of New Mexico asking for the organization of the Territory of Arizona. Senator Seward (N. Y.) presented petitions against the Senator's proposed revision of the tariff of 1857. Senator Collamer (Vt.) moved an inquiry into the expediency of making an appropriation to pay Captain Ellis for the property which he returned to their writers. Adopted. Senator Wilson (Mass.) gave notice of a bill to provide that no one shall be paid for public printing 25 per cent. Senator Brown's resolution relative to Pyramidions was then taken up, and Senator Toombs (Ga.) addressed the Senate. The subject, after some discussion, on the Senate's own executive session, adjourned.—In the House, the bills for the payment of Thomas Smith and Joseph Hamilton, for the services of Military Academy, were passed. Mr. Cockburn (Pa.) moved a bill to failure to elect a speaker to introduce a resolution to test quiry whether any further legislation was necessary to secure the fidelity of public officers in the District of Columbia, and also the rights of free persons in said District. The printing of extra copies of the President's Annual Message, and Reports of the Heads of Departments, was ordered, as necessary for the public service, the saving of some $16,000 being secured. Mr. Adonin (N. J.) inquired in any misleading in reply to Mr. Cutler's petition relative to the treatment of the New York Seventh Regiment. But objections were made, and the House proceeded to vote for Printer. Mr. Corbin (Ind.) withdrawing the name of Mr. Defrees. Three votes were had, but there having been no choice, several ineffectual efforts were made to postpone and adjourn, when another vote was had, as follows: Necessary to a choice, 93; for Mr. Printer, 74; for Mr. Ford, of Ohio, 53; for Mr. Defrees, 71; Mr. Sexton, 13; Mr. Bull, 2; Mr. Winston, 1. Mr. Ford declined and declared.

On Tuesday, February 28, in the Senate, Senator Mason (Va.) moved a resolution calling upon the President to furnish a copy of any report establishing the boundary between the United States and Great Britain. Senator Foot (Vt.) submitted a report and bill explanatory of the existing law in effect of the 3d section of the act of 1819 with Spain. The bill authorizing the sale of Fort Snelling, etc., and regulating the appointment of Superintendents of Public Armories, was taken up and debated. Mr. Toombs then went into executive session. Adjourned.—In the House, Mr. Sherman (Ohio) reported, from the Committee on Ways and Means, a bill providing that the President's Message and Executive documents could be printed in time for distribution at the commencement of each session of Congress. Mr. S. said the object was to have the Message and documents shall be allowed twenty cents per mile instead of forty. Mr. Sherman moved to be cemented by a straight and graphical line, and repealing all existing acts upon the subject. Mr. Sherman explained the object of the present system. Some debate was had, when the bill, which had been reported as a substitute for one referred to Mr. Pendleton, was adopted. Mr. Sherman then moved the consideration of the bill to provide for the sale of the further proceedings were interrupted by Mr. Ruffin (N. C.) rising to a question of privilege, declaring that his name was not recorded as voting on the election of Printer yesterday. Mr. Sherman insisted upon the question being put first, and Mr. Ruffin said he would move to certain that he was not recorded. The House was adjourned without taking the question on Mr. Sherman's motion.

On Wednesday, February 29, in the Senate, the Invalid Pension Bill was passed. Senator Gwin (Cal.) reported the Military Academy Bill without amendment. On motion of Senator Seward (N. Y.) the bill for the admission of Kansas was put on its passage. Senator Mason of Senator Mason (Va.) the President was called upon to furnish whatever communication he had received from the Governor of Texas relative to the disturbances on the Rio Grande. Senator Seward presented the memorial of the Legislature of Kansas, praying for admission into the Union, and moved that it be referred to the Senate at length. After his speech, there was a long debate, lasting till 6 o'clock, in which Senators Douglas, Green, Bigler, Seward, Doolittle, and Wigfall took part, when the subject was postponed till Monday next. The Senate adjourned.—In the House, Mr. Parrott (Kansas) presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas asking admission as a State under the Wyandot Constitution. Mr. Curtis (Ohio) moved to suspend the rules in order to take up a resolution calling on the President for copies of any official correspondence between the Department and Governor Houston of Texas, regarding the difficulties on the southwestern frontier. Mr. Stanton (Ky.) moved to lay the table, which was carried by a vote of 91 to 74. Mr. Curtis then moved authorizing our troops to enter any of the States of Mexico. Mr. Bocock (Va.) moved to lay the motion to amend the journal by recording his vote for Mr. Glossbrenner. Mr. R. T. Hamilton (Texas) moved that he had voted was confirmed by other members who heard him, and the motion was agreed to. Mr. Curtis's motion was then to be corrected. The Speaker then declared the election of Mr. Glossbrenner. Mr. Curtis (Ohio) said he had, while Mr. Ruffin's motion was pending, endeavored to obtain the floor in attempting the introduction of a resolution. Mr. Ford he declared elected Printer, made another motion, which was agreed to. The Speaker then announced that the House would proceed to the election of Printer. Mr. Ruffin moved to lay the motion, but they was disagreed to, and the House voted as follows:

Necessary to a choice, 180; Mr. Seaton, ... 9
Necessary to a choice, ... 91; Mr. Winton, ... 2
Necessary to a choice, ... 91; Mr. Ford, ... 53
Mr. Glossbrenner, ... 76; Mr. Ritchie 1

On motion of Mr. Sherman (Ohio) the latter motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned till to-morrow. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the Senate bill granting a speech in behalf of Slavery. He was replied to by Mr. Sherman (Ohio). Mr. Grow (Pa.) addressed the House on the subject of the public lands. Mr. Grow (Pa.) addressed the House in favor of appropriations to American industry, when the House adjourned.

On Thursday, March 1, in the Senate, Senator Davis (Miss.) submitted a modified series of resolutions (Miss.) submitted a modified series of resolutions (Democratic Platform), and they were ordered printed. Senator Bigler submitted the act regulating the appointment of duties on imports, etc., was taken up and passed. The Military Academy Appropriation bill was taken up, and Senator Wigfall (Texas) moved an amendment appropriating $100,000 for the support of a regiment of mounted volunteers to defend the frontiers of Texas, in consequence of the acts of Mexico. Mr. Seward (N. Y.) which Senators Douglas (Ill.), Doolittle (Wis), Mason (Va.), Iverson (N. C.), Wigfall (Texas), Benjamin (La.), Crittenden (Ky.), Trumbull (Ill.), Davis (Miss.), Gwin (Cal.), and Salisbury (Del.) participated, when the matter was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.—In the House, Mr. Adonin (N. J.) rose to reply to the censures cast on the Washington States Committee of Arrangements by Mr. Carter's (N. Y.) resolution, but several members objected. On motion of Mr. Washburn (Me.), an inquiry was ordered into the expediency of abolishing a portion of the land offices, or reducing their salaries. Mr. W. also reported a bill amendatory of the act providing for the safety of passengers on steamboats. After debate, the consideration of the bill was postponed for three weeks. The resolutions which Mr. Curtis (Iowa) attempted to offer on Saturday, calling upon the President for copies of whatever communications had been received from Governor Houston of Texas, relative to the troubles on the frontier, was adopted. Mr. J. Glancy Jones (N. Y.) reported a bill for the better protection of female immigrants on the high seas. The President's Annual Message was then taken up, when Mr. Ashmore (S. C.) addressed the House in defence of the South in the position in favor of slavery. The House then adjourned.

On Friday, March 9, in the Senate, Senator Wilson (Mass.) introduced a bill mandatory of the act providing for the cession of the public printing. The private calendar was taken up, and the usual routine of bills went over. The bill granting a pension to the widow of Gen. Porter P. Smith—nothing else. It was amended, on motion of Senator Reward (N. Y.), by including the widow of Gen. Riley, when the whole was postponed. The Senate then went into Executive Session, after which it adjourned till Monday. In the House, Mr. Adrain (N. J.) had made a statement in reply to the resolutions of Mr. Carter (N. Y.) relative to the transactions of the New York Sub-Treasurement at Washington. The statement shows that there was no cause of complaint whatever at the moneys forwarded to the New York Military. The bill carrying into effect treaty stipulations with the Indians of Oregon and Washington Territories, was passed. The House then proceeded to vote for Printer, with this result:

Whole number of votes..187 For Mr. Glossbrenner.... 72
Necessary to a choice.... 94 For Mr. Sexton..... 9
For Mr. Ford..... 96 Remainder scattering.

Mr. Ford was declared elected. Mr. Morris (Ill.) was elected Door-keeper on the Committee on Elections by Catolic. Mr. Colfax (Ind.) reported a bill authorizing publishers to print on their papers the date when a subscription expires, and it was passed. A large number of private bills were passed, and the House adjourned till Monday.

THE OVERLAND MAILS.

The Tribune correspondent says:

"The Senate Post-office Committee will report a bill for carrying a semi-weekly mail from St. Joseph to Pike's Peak for $200,000 per annum, and for a semi-weekly service from Fort Smith to the Crossing of the two forks of the San Antonio and El Paso route, at $250,000 per annum. This line, with the Butterfield route, will complete the tri-trips per week from the Atlantic States to California, carrying about 1,000 letters each trip.

"The Post-office Committee has been in session, but nearly published. It advertises for bids to carry five expresses per week Mail, reports and letters, from New York by days from each point on the Mississippi and the Missouri River, and for another new daily overland, from Francisco. Bids are also to be invited for a semi-weekly service, letters via Panama, to Oregon, and for a weekly, weekly, in thirty. Mr. Colfax estimates that the daily service could be performed for $100,000 or $150,000, and the semi-weekly and weekly service for $100,000."

THE LATEST FROM THE "HUNGARIAN."

The agent of the steamer Hungarian at Shediac have received a statement from Mr. Andrew Crawford, who was in charge of the boat. He found nothing except the starboard bow from the break of the forecastle. The boat had not been burned, and in a waggon-load have been drifted eastward. None of the goods have been taken or stolen. A large quantity of provisions have been found at the fishermen's houses, and there are twelve of them. The Immigration Department has in effects belonging to the passengers have been seen which could be identified.

A later dispatch from Halifax states that it is now ascertained to a certainty that there are no survivors of the disaster to the Hungarian. Only three bodies have been found—those of a woman, a man, and a child two years old. Three buildings have been obtained at Barrington, and the goods have been placed in charge of responsible men. The ship's articles, which have been found, show that the crew numbered seventy-two. The passenger list had not yet been found. The only passengers known to have been aboard are Williams, Dickinson, of Sackville, New Brunswick, and Dr. Barrett, of New York. Mr. Dickinson's box belonging to the latter drunks have been found, one belonging to Margaret Robertson, at Barrington, one to Robert Martin, of Pictou, and one to W. R. Crocker, of Norwich, Connecticut. It is to be presumed these parties were also lost.

CONTINUANCE OF THE BIG GROWING.

From the Rio Grande we learn that Captains Tobin's and Tumlinson's Rangers have disbanded and gone home. Cortina is in possession of the west bank of the Rio Grande, and holds his depredations in that region. The border is guarded by Captain Stoneman's Cavalry and Captain Forbis's Rangers to the extent of their ability.

HOW TO GET ON IN LIFE.

Mayor Wood, in his harangue to the cartmen, told them the following interesting story of his success in life:

"It has been one of the secrets of my little success in life that I have never said, 'I can not.' (Applause.) I have always said, 'I would' (Good.) I have done it if I could. I did it when I had the misfortune to lose everything that I had exhausted every energy of my life and being to accomplish it. I have succeeded in as many as I have set it to any other men. Wealth is open to you as it is to other men. Success is limited most in the exact much poorer than any of those sitting within the sound of my voice. There is no man here who is not as well to-twenty-one was more, more obscure, than the humble individual who addresses you before you. I do not in this manner become a source to be any thing; but I have been in your place now, by those hands. I am not in the city of New York by those hands. I am not Mayor of New York by those hands. I am not Mayor by no such good chance. I have shared under the great mass of you, and I feel that I am one of you, and I say that the American conclusion is that of his children. You have life, energy, youth, and all you want is determination, vigor, and honorable perseverance."

HOW LUCY STONE LIVES.

The New York (lady) correspondent of the Springfield Republican writes as follows of Lucy Stone's appearance last week at the Cooper Institute:

"It is somewhat difficult to locate the Lucy Stone on Thursday evening identical with the Lucy Stone of four years ago. The little chicken was gone, and in her figure, the musical voice; but the old assurance, the perfect self-possession, the rapid, confident, singing manner were all waiting. She did not even lean earnest, but less assured. She told her old story of unequal legal disability and wrongs, but not in the old demanding and vehement tone. The mother's heart was gone, the woman's voice, and what was once pertness is now pathos; what was then shrill is now vigor. It has gained in clearness. Those who listened to Lucy Stone Blackwell, and to her audience, Antoinette Brown Blackwell, before their marriage, can not fail to observe the great change which has come over the public mind to which the ladies since that event. Although they still adhere to their text and to the ordered logical arrangement, leave their homes and their babies to talk on a public platform, they have lost much more subdued and weary way than of old. The brothers Blackwell married into a full knowledge of their strong points, and

THE GALE OF FEBRUARY TENTH IN NEW YORK BAY.—BY C. PARSONS, ESQ.

THE GALE OF FEBRUARY TENTH IN NEW YORK BAY.

WE publish on the opposite page an engraving of the gale of 10th February in the Bay of New York, showing those ancient landmarks, Castle Garden and Castle William. As the imitated will readily understand, it would have been impossible to publish the engraving sooner, and, at the same time, to do justice to Mr. Parsons's admirable design. The following description of the gale we abridge from the New York Herald:

"About ten o'clock on the evening of 9th the wind, which during the day had been blowing gently from the southwest, veered round to the west, and finally to the northwest, from which point it began to rush with great fierceness. A light fall of snow occurred about the same time, lasting for fifteen minutes, when a shower of rain fell, and the whole sky became overclouded, as if with a black pall. The wind increased in violence all the time, and the sombre aspect of the heavens likewise continued until midnight, when the sky cleared off splendidly, and the moon and stars shone out with unusual splendor.

"The temperature changed almost as suddenly as the wind—a cold, sharp, biting frost immediately taking the place of the pleasant warmth that prevailed during the day time. From twelve o'clock until daylight the storm blew fearfully, and one of the most terrific hurricanes experienced in this neighborhood for years swept over the city, whistling through the keyholes, howling through the chimneys, shaking the windows, and even houses, and making altogether such discord as rendered sleep entirely out of the question, and frightened nervous people almost out of their senses. It was emphatically a fearful storm; and the wonder is that half the frail, insecure structures abounding all over the city were not tumbled down on the sidewalks and roads, with the customary loss of life usual on such occasions. As it was, the roaring of the wind, slapping of the shutters, and tossing and tumbling of badly secured signs and awnings, occasioned a din and uproar scarcely inferior to that which we may suppose would have resulted had an earthquake, instead of merely a furious puff from old Boreas, taken place.

"The storm did not abate during the whole of the 10th, and the scene presented in the streets of this city, Brooklyn, Hoboken, Williamsburg, and Jersey City can be more easily imagined than described. The roofs of several houses were found to be completely blown away, sometimes a distance of several hundred feet; innumerable chimneys dashed to pieces; awnings, signs, railings, fences, and lamp-posts rent, torn, and scattered in every direction; trees uprooted, broken glass glittering on the sidewalks, shutters unhinged and smashed to atoms, and small wooden sheds of every description knocked into the most irreparable ruin.

"About ten o'clock on the morning of the 10th the storm swept so violently along Broadway that pieces of timber, stones, and large lumps of frozen clay were hurled by the wind into the door-ways and against the magnificent store-windows, with an effect it is unnecessary to describe."

ENCAMPMENT OF THE ARGENTINE TROOPS ON THE TIGRE.

WE publish herewith, from a sketch by Mr. J. K. Keller of United States steamer Pulaski (late Metamora), an engraving of the encampment of the Argentine troops on the River Tigre, awaiting the arrival of the vessels which were to convey them to Rosario.

The war between General Urquiza, President of the Argentine Confederation, and the Province of Buenos Ayres was brought to a close, and a treaty of peace signed on the 11th November, 1859, the Province coming into the Confederation, as one of the States thereof. By a stipulation of the treaty General Urquiza engaged to have his troops removed out of the Province of Buenos Ayres within fifteen days, and the landing on the River Tigre, a short distance above the anchorage of the United States steamer Pulaski, was selected as the place of embarkation. Early on Sunday morning, the 13th, the troops began to arrive, and by noon of the same day the vast plain lying between the river and the town of San Fernando was covered with cavalry and infantry (numbering 18,000 men) awaiting the arrival of the vessels chartered to convey them to Rosario.

The cavalry in their flaming red dresses, with myriads of gay pennons of the same color fluttering from beneath the glittering spear-heads of their lances, as they galloped hither and thither, or seated, en bivouac, round the camp fires, relieved by the dark blue of the infantry, drawn up in long lines, with thousands of horses and cattle grazing about, formed quite a picturesque, brilliant, and animated scene. The above sketch represents General Urquiza, seated by a tree, with some of the officers of his staff round him, and orderlies standing by, ready to convey orders. The centre of the foreground is taken up with groups of mounted men, in their peculiar costume, fully equipped, and some of Urquiza's officers, African, native, and European. The party on the left, roasting beef, boiling yerba tea, and playing cards. Apulparce, on a high knoll, fills up the back-ground on the right, and the troops, drawn up in line for roll call, the centre and left.

THE ENCAMPMENT OF THE ARGENTINE TROOPS ON THE TIGRE.—FROM A SKETCH BY J. K. KELLER, ESQ., U. S. STEAMER "PULASKI."

THE Uncommercial Traveler.

NO. III.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

As I shut the door of my lodging behind me, and came out into the streets at six on a drizzling Saturday evening in the last past month of January, all that neighborhood of Covent Garden looked very desolate. It is so essentially a neighborhood which has seen better days that bad weather affects it sooner than another place which has not come down in the world. In its present reduced condition it bears a thaw almost worse than any place I know. It gets so dreadfully low-spirited when damp breaks forth. Those wonderful houses about Drury Lane Theatre, which in the palmy days of theatres were prosperous and long-settled places of business, and which now change hands every week, but never change their character of being divided and subdivided on the ground-floor into mouldy dens of shops where an orange and half a dozen nuts, or a pomatum-pot, one cake of fancy soap, and a cigar-box, are offered for sale and never sold, were most ruefully contemplated that evening by the statue of Shakspeare, with the rain-drops coursing one another down its immonest nose.

And yet, on such a night in so degenerate a time, the object of my journey was theatrical. And within half an hour I was in an immense theatre capable of holding nearly five thousand people.

What Theatre? Her Majesty's? Far better. Royal Italian Opera? Far better. Infinitely superior in its latter fact to anything in Italy—superior to both for seeing in. To every part of this Theatre spacious fire-proof staircases of ingress and egress. Every part of it convenient places of refreshment and retiring rooms. Every thing to eat and drink carefully supervised as to quality, and sold at an appointed price; respectable female attendants ready for the commonest women in the audience; a general air of consideration, decorum, and supervision, most commendable; an unpresentionably humanizing influence in all the social arrangements of the place.

Surely a first Theatre, then? Because there were in London (not very long ago) Theatres with entrance-prices as high as half a guinea a head, whose arrangements were not half so civilized. Surely, therefore, a dear Theatre? Not very dear. A gallery at sixpence, another gallery at fourpence, a pit at sixpence, boxes and pit-stalls at a shilling, and six private boxes at half a crown.

Such a commercial curiosity induced me to go into every nook of this great place, and among every class of the audience assembled in it—amounting, on that evening, as I calculated, to about two thousand and odd hundreds. Magnificently lighted by a framework of sparkling chandeliers; the building most ventilated to perfection. My sense of smell, without being particularly delicate, has been so offended in some of the commonest places of public resort, that I have often been obliged to leave them when I have made an unconscientious effort expressly to look on. The air of this Theatre was fresh, cool, and wholesome. To help toward this end, very sensible precautions had been used, professionally combining the experience of hospitals and railway stations. Asphalte pavements substituted for wooden floors, honest bare walls of stucked brick and tile—even at the back of the boxes—for plaster and paper, no benches stuffed, and no carpeting or baize used; a cool material in all right places and surfaces having the covering of the seats.

These various constructions are as well considered in the pit and gallery as if it were a Peer's Hospital; the result is, that it is sweet and healthful. It is not to be appreciated from the ground, the roof with a careful reference to sight and sound to every corner; the result is, that its form is beautiful, and that the appearance of the audience, as seen from the proscenium—with every face in it commanding the stage, and the whole so admirably well-to-do and turned to that centre, that a hand can scarcely move in the great assemblage without the movement being seen from thence—is highly favourable to its union of vastness with compactness. The stage itself, and all its appurtenances of machinery, cleliverage, height, and breadth, are on a scale more like the Scala at Milan, or the San Carlo at Naples, or the Grand Opera at Paris, than any notion a stranger would be likely to form of the Britannia Theatre at Hoxton, a mile north of Saint Luke's Hospital in the Old-street-road, London. The Forty Thieves might be played here, and every thief ride his real horse, and the disguised captain bring in his oil jars on a train of real camels, and nobody be put out of the way. This really extraordinary place is the achievement of one man's enterprise, and was erected on the scene of an inconvenient old building, in less than five months, at a round cost of five-and-twenty thousand pounds. To dismiss this part of my subject, and still to render to the proprietor the credit that is strictly his due, I must add that his sense of the responsibility upon him to make the best of his audience, and to do his best for them, is a highly agreeable sign of these times.

As the reason at this theatre, for a reason I will presently show, were the object of my journey, I entered on the play of the night as one of the two or three and odd hundreds by looking about me at my neighbors. We were a motley assemblage of people, and we had a good many boys and young men among us; we had also many girls and young women. To represent, however, that we did not include a very great number, and a very fair proportion, of family groups, would be to make a gross misstatement. Such groups were to be seen in all parts of the house; in the boxes and stalls particularly, they were composed of persons of very decent appearance, who had many children with them. Among our dresses there were most kinds of shabby and greasy wear, and much fustian and corduroy that was neither sound nor fragrant. The caps of our young men were mostly of a limp character, and we wore them then, slouched, high-shouldered, into our places with our hands in our pockets, and occasionally twisted our cravats about our necks like eels, and occasionally tied them down our breasts like links of sausages, and occasionally had a scrap in our hair over each cheek bone with a slight Thief-flavor in it. Besides prowlers and idlers, we were mechanics, dock-laborers, costermongers, petty tradesmen, small clerks, milliners, stay-makers, shoe-binders, slop workers, poor workers in a hundred highways and byways. Many of us—on the whole, the majority—were not at all clean, and not at all choice in our lives or conversation. But we had all come together in a place where our convenience was well consulted, and where we were well looked after, to enjoy an evening's entertainment in common. We were not going to lose any part of what we had paid for through any body's caprice, and as a community we had a character to lose. So we were closely attentive, and kept excellent order, and let the man or boy who did otherwise instantly get out from this place, or we would put him out with the greatest expedition.

We began at half past six with a pantomime—a pantomime so long that before it was over I felt as if I had been traveling for six weeks —going to India, by the Overland Mail. The Spirit of Liberty was the principal personage in the pantomime, and the Fairy who presided at the World came out of the globe, glittering, and discoursed with the Spirit, who sang charmingly. We were delighted to understand that there was no Liberty any where but among ourselves, and we highly applauded the agreeable fact.

The Pantomime was succeeded by a Melo-Drama. Throughout the evening I was pleased to observe Virtue quite as triumphant as she usually is out of doors, and Justice rather more sure to. We all agreed (for the time) that honesty was the best policy, and we were as hard as iron upon Vice, and we were quite free of Villainy getting on in the world—no, not upon any consideration whatever.

Between the pieces we almost all of us went out and refreshed. Many of us went the length of drinking beer at the bar of the neighboring public-house, some of us drank spirits, crowds of us had sandwiches and ginger-beer at the refreshment-room established on the first floor. The sandwich—as substantial as was consistent with portability, and as cheap as possible—we hailed as one of our great improvements. We talked of it way among us at all stages of the entertainment, and we were always delighted to see it; its adaptability to the varying taste following strange conundrum: "Why do white sheep eat more than black ones?"

Taken aback at once by the strange simplicity of the question, which, on account of the well-known ability of the interrogator, was supposed to involve a most intricate maze of solution, not one of the noble, learned, and accomplished guests could give an answer! They were fairly nonplussed. Said the Archbishop: "Do you give it up? Do you give it up, Miss Lind?" (for the world-famed and accomplished cantatrice was present.) "Do you give it up, my Lord Chief Justice? Do you give it up, Mr. Vice-Provost? Why! all give it up? Well, then, is it because there are more of them?"

THE SNOW IS COMING DOWN.

Hey! boy, hitch up the chestnut mare,
The snow is coming down;
From every street the clang of bells
Is waking up the town,
Is waking up the town, my boy,
Is waking up the town;
So, please the Lord, we'll ring a chime
For snow while coming down.

Jump in, my own, my Fannie dear,
The mare is fresh and new;
She's good for two, short, forty-six
I named her after you.
We'll show the eager, staring crowd
The very reason why
That nags were made to travel fast,
And feathery flakes to fly.

By Jove! the town is far behind!
Sit closer, love, to me;
We while away the slows,
They haven't time to see.
You'll not object—I know you won't—
To this arm, gently—so;
Because—I love you, Fannie dear;
You knew it long ago.

How spotlessly the hills are dressed
In all their silver sheen!
Fair brides, enrowned with flowers of white,
With peeping leaves between.
So, Fannie darling, will I crown
The one that I love best;
The dearest girl in all the world,
Whose head is on my breast.

Keep close, my love, beneath the robes,
The flakes are falling still;
Draw nearer, nearer to my heart,
You know the wind is chill.
Now, darling, press your lips to mine,
One long-drawn kiss of love;
While fleecy snow lies white below,
And skies look black above.

Fly on, my noble steed! you bear
My fortunes on your wing.
My bride of bride, beneath the robes,
Are sweetly blossoming.
To me the hours so swiftly go,
They seem like specks of time,
When dancing flakes the music wakes
Of merry sleigh-bells' chime.

Fly on, my gallant steed! two hearts
Are flying in your track;
Of two you bore so boldly forth
But one you'll carry back.
For, Fannie darling, you and I
Beneath these robes are one;
The old life goes as melts the snows,
The new life has begun.

THE STORY OF THE GOOD SHIP "ANN."

On the twenty-fifth of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty, I, Thomas Jefferson Adams, mariner, of Philadelphia, signed articles with John Owen, captain and owner of the ship Ann, bound from that port for Liverpool, with a full cargo of cheese and flour. At the request of certain persons, who have at times been part of the story, I am going now to set down what befell me on that voyage. And every word is as true as the tides that ebb and flow day after day, and year after year, forever and ever.

There were fourteen of us besides the Captain, all told. He was a bluff, true-hearted sailor and a good man, with a wife as much like him as one person can be like another; and when he was at home, as pretty a half-dozen children climbed about him as it ever warmed a man's heart to see. The mate was a more reserved and distant man, but a good sailor, and did his duty always. The crew were all experienced hands, and worked with a will. I was the youngest on board, being then nineteen. I will not describe myself—those who know me don't need that I should, and there's no use in putting down words that never did yet paint the face of man or woman. The ship was nearly new. The season was favorable. And as our sails turned and filled before a pleasant breeze, while the golden sunshine danced upon the waters, and the green hills and trees and fields were all covered with the glories of summer dawning brighter every day, we all burst forth with "Hail Columbia," as if by way of goodby to home for but a little while.

We had two passengers. Mistress Dartford and her only daughter, Grace, were bound on a visit to the old country, where they had relations, and were entitled to some little property which it was needful they should see to themselves. Mistress Dartford's husband being dead. Our Captain was a friend of the family, and so came to offer her the passage and his own cabin for their use. The mother was a stern old lady enough, and didn't seem likely to make herself very much at home with us. But Miss Grace—well, that's twenty years ago, but her brown hair waves as softly over her brow as it did then, her kind-looking brown eyes look as tender and loving as they did then, and her gentle voice is as low and sweet as it was when, on that spring afternoon, it mingled sweetly with our rough chorus as we sang Dibdin's songs. I do not know that that voyage of the good ship Ann. What harm could befall a ship with such a crew on board, was the thought of all of us as she stood at the stern watching the shore as it gradually sunk down in the west—the hearty cheers and the gay ribbons of her hat fluttering together in the wind. But harm did befall us, as shall presently be told.

For eleven days that breeze never slackened, nor did the weather change. We all had a pleasant time. Miss Grace and I soon got acquainted, partly, I suppose, because when she asked the Captain all our names, he called me a lucky lad, and, pinching my ear, told her that he had known my father, who was drowned at sea years before, and that his wife and my mother were girls together, which was all quite true. That very evening I had grown intimate enough to make her up a seat on deck, and tell her some of the many stories I had heard of life at sea, of shipwrecks and storms, and of love born amidst danger and death from winds and waves, or amidst fire and flashing steel; and I was with her most of the time all those eleven days, for there was not much to do. I forgot to say that she and I were of an age, but her years were so much older than mine that I almost looked upon her as a woman grown before whom I was but a rough sailor boy. It is true she told me not to call her Miss, but only plain Grace, but I never forgot to for all that.

Well, we went on thus, as I said before, for eleven days—eleven happy days. On the twelfth certain signs began to appear to me which gave that a change was at hand. A strange feeling in the air—wind dropped—all but a kind of sighing among the ropes and spars—a few sable-colored clouds in the horizon—that was all. But the Captain called me to him, and said he, "Tom, there's dirty weather over there. We shall have it within an hour's time. Now, I'll leave the ladies to you—mind they don't be frightened or get into any hurt." I said I would do my best, and I did.

Presently the cloud, at first "no bigger than a man's hand," rose up and spread over all the sky. The water changed, as it always does, from blue to black, and an indescribable gloom seemed to rest upon all nature. None but those who have seen and felt it know what a mysterious time seems to take place before the tempest bursts its first stroke at the devoted ship. It generally seems as if the sea and sky almost dreaded to begin the dreadful conflict that would convulse both as if with terror and rage.

We had not long to wait. There was barely time to make all fast, to double-reef every sail, and to fasten down the hatches before the fierce wind was sweeping over the water, and covering the tops of the waves with foam, and bending our ship down till her main-yard dipped into the foaming sea. One moment we were tossed like a dead leaf before an autumn gale; then up, up, higher, higher upon a wreath of water, from whose summit we could see all the sea and sky roaring and wrestling in wild confusion; then down, down! the wind and life seemed shut out by the hills and precipices of water that hung over us and shut us in; then the hill of water that had rolled on over us to toppled over and fell, beating us down as a drowning fist is beaten down to die, while every man clung to ropes or spars till they rose and, shaking the water from her decks, staggered on bravely, bravely. That was twenty years ago, but I see the scene now with all its wild terror. I also see a form that never left the deck for hours, a face that never blanched with fear all that night. She would not go below; I could not make her. At last she begged so hard to be let stay on deck that I wrapped her up in one of our coats, and gave her a turpentine hat, which she tied on, and then lashed her fast to a spar and there she staid. There all that night she staid, and never left me, but stood off Captain looked grave, and a wreck drifted past—a confused mass of wood and sails and cordage—she never quailed, but staid steadily on deck amidst with her curls dripping with the salt waves. Once she shrieked and hid her face—a tremendous sea had swept over it, and I thought we were all lost—but a man was gone. All we could see of his fate, though we knew what it was too well, was a floating object like clothes tossed away into the darkness—all we could hear was one cry that was drowned by the din around as soon as his drowning terror made him utter it.

Then Miss Grace shrieked and begged me to help her below, where she wept bitterly, whispering to herself, oh, cruel, cruel sea!

But our ship was spared. The good ship Ann weathered that fearful night. Morning came rising sun poured his flood of golden light athwart the waters, the blue sky looked calm; and the only signs of last night's storm were the rolling billows which seemed to heave and swell like the bosom of a sobbing child, and the vacant place of our poor unmanned, but not unmanly, crew. Any more, and to whose poor young wife we should have to tell the news when we came home.

We soon forgot troubles, like never, and that very afternoon Miss Grace and her mother took their usual seat on deck—I talking all the nonsense I could to make them cheerful. How I succeeded may be judged from the fact that hours after the moon rose we were there still.

Another day came. And on the morning of that day came the great trouble which befell us all on that last voyage of the good ship Ann.

That next morning we had all had breakfast, and were washing the decks, when Miss Grace ran up the cabin stairs and came to me in a great state of fright. When she could speak she whispered that I was to come below and see what was the matter—what she could not tell, but something dreadful she was sure—for her cabin was swarming with rats! I never down, and more grinning there they were, running as if wild all about, or crouching in heaps in the corners.

Mrs. Dartford was calm enough, but her manner frightened me most of all. She desired me to fetch the Captain—for there was great danger—"but not a moment," she added, "and, young man, recover your nerves—you will have need of all your courage and will—God help us all!" The Captain came. I saw in a moment what the lady meant. The good ship Ann had sprung a leak, and while we stood there more rats crowded up from the hold into which the water was pouring like a sieve.

No efforts with the pumps could save us. The ship had been too much damaged evidently for us to look for escape except by the boats.

All hands were summoned, and in a few manly words told what had happened, and that the boats were our only chance. All hands set about preparing them without a murmur, and as if without fear.

We had two boats, and were thus distributed: in one, the ladies and babies, and five men, besides myself. In the other, the mate and six men. Each boat was provided with stores of salt meat and biscuit, water, and the Captain's oath was a strong sea-going boat, such as all of us might well be thankful to possess. Within one hour from the discovery of the leak we were all embarked and lay at a short distance from the ship. It was not long before she gave a lurch and roll, and then went down, head foremost. It was not till then that we realized the loneliness of our situation, gazing upon the few scudding sticks which marked the grave of the good ship Ann.

Well, we had orders not to separate and to steer for the Azores, which we knew to be four that we would if we could help it. But God forgive the man, whoever he was, by whose forgetfulness it came to pass that we were cast adrift in the midle of the Atlantic Ocean without compass, or chart, or oars.

I said we were to keep together. We did so for three days and nights. On the fourth day we saw a sail, which only just lifted above the horizon and then disappeared. That day the mate, who was in the other boat, fell ill, and we could hear him raving in delirious madness all the next night. In the morning he was not in the boat. Two days more—two dreary days, during which we saw another sail, which only just showed itself long enough to make us sick with hope deferred. In the evening the other boat's crew hailed us, and inquired if we had had any brandy. We gave them all we could spare—about two quarts. And then the darkness came down once more—the, that darkness, how fearful, how hopeless it was!

Before the day dawned again we heard yells and cries of rage and terror, and other sounds impossible to discribe told plainly of a deadly conflict which we had no power to check, helpless as we were ourselves. Next morning when we looked for her she was gone. None of us spoke, but all knew full well that our wretched comrades had revenged themselves in the night and were all drowned.

Seven days were gone—seven weary days. On the seventh one of our number began to rave just as the mate had done, and flung himself suddenly overboard.

Eight days were gone. On the eighth the Captain told us we must be put on half rations. We all prayed together that day—it was Sunday. There was no sail, nor help, nor hope yet.

Two more days passed. An old man, the oldest of the crew, died that day in spite of his age, fell ill. He begged the Captain to bleed him—he dreaded fever. This was done; and in the night he tore off the bandage and died in a pool of blood at the bottom of the boat.

We were now restricted to four ounces of bread each a day. A cask of water was all that each could be spared.

The next five days passed over like a dream. Few of us spoke much, and when we looked at each other it was with a kind of apathetic despair. Our number was but nine. One more had been committed to the deep.

At last we began to starve. How the two ladies bore it we were not able to tell at all; but at length Mrs. Dartford told us she could not hold out much longer, and she began to fade away every hour before our eyes. Grace sat with her mother's head in her lap, white as a sheet but cheerful. But I could see that she, too, was failing; and sure enough she fainted as the sun went down, and lay as like death as a living woman could be. It was a mercy that she did so. For before day broke her poor mother had been taken from her, and with reverent words and tender care we had committed the poor worn body to the deep. We covered Miss Grace's head, and held her resting in my arms till she should wake and I could whisper such consolation as a poor fellow like myself could offer. Thus, hour after hour, did I hold her to my breast till she came to herself. She only shivered and wept closer to me, and when I kissed her pale lips she only smiled faintly. She had seen her mother's vacant place, but life had grown to be so like death that it seemed only natural that she should be gone.

Twenty-seven days had gone by. We were now but five altogether—Miss Grace, the Captain, and two besides myself. We all knew that our time was coming fast, for we were all too feeble to help ourselves or each other, and all would be over soon. As to thoughts of rescue we never seemed to dream of it, but lay feeble and speechless.

I never knew when or how it was—for I became insensible myself for many hours—but when I came to myself, there was Miss Grace leaning over me and moistening my lips with a handkerchief wet with rain. I think that rain saved both our lives. We were then alone—alone without any to see or aid us. All the rest had gone. I asked no questions, but feebly pressing her to me—she was all the world to me now—resigned myself to die.

Total eclipse of sight—no speech for each other —hardly a pulse left in our hearts—all was over at last.

But not all over. For when I woke, as I did from a sleep which was not like sleep, strange figures flitted round me, and new voices whispered in a language I did not know.

And so it was. And I was saved. But what of Miss Grace? Those round me told me she was safe. I should see her soon.—"Did I understand them?" Oh, yes! I understood well—for the wandering eyes, they told me afterward, closed peacefully on her own again.

Oh, blessed waking! Whose soft tresses touched my face, as I lay, half fearing to open my eyes for fear I should scare the blessed vision away? Whose soft breath mingled with mine—whose warm lips pressed mine—whose dear form was once bending down lovingly over me, until the heart beat, I knew, for me was throbbing against my own—whose happy tears fell from her loving eyes?

Yes, I never doubted. Out of that great peril had grown love between us two—mighty, enduring love. No need to tell it. We both knew it well.

What need for more? We were saved, and were in good time safe at home. God bless the sailor who first saw us, a speck on the wide ocean! God bless the brave crew who saved us! They come and see us still, though that was twenty years ago; and when they do, there is dear woman, whom I never called Miss Grace after our rescue from our great peril in that last voyage of the good ship Ann.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the Southern District of New York.

The New Partner

IN

"CLINGHAM & CO., BANKERS."

BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW,

AUTHOR OF "THE HASHEESH EATER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

IN WHICH A FAMILY TREE IS CLIMBED, WITH PECULIATIVE INTENTIONS.

THE Main Street of Chesswick roars with a roar that intimates that of tradesmen as the roar of a little boy in tears imitates that of a big lion in displeasure. The Main Street of Chesswick is also bustling. A nervous thrill of market wagons and trotting sulkies—for there are both a race-course and a trotting district neighboring—runs through it all day.

But about twenty rods above the Bank a little alley lets out of this bustle, passing under an archway between two of the oldest moss-shingled houses, so unobtrusively that the casual passer might very naturally suppose it some private entrance with the gate left unlatched by accident. Most eccentric is its course. As it pushes bravely on with this most unconquerable determination to be an ideally straight line, then it dives downward, growing steeper and steeper, now helping itself by time-shattered steps of rough limestone, now plunging to precipitancy that it seems seeking the centre of things; then it crooks abruptly to the right; then, with a graceful curve, it bends over to the left; then it assembles by more steps and more steeps; and, finally, when the traveler is just about questioning whether a retreat is not the only means of safety, the chronic dislocation of joints and obliquity of eyes through excess of tortuosity, he suddenly discovers that his troubles are over and he has no farther to go—if it is Blinker's Court he's seeking. At this moment he will find himself in a square yard, space, perhaps ten or twelve rods across, and his first impression will be that a remarkably large number of fine houses are condensed into a remarkably small compass on each of the four sides of the quadrangle. Red brick walls, rising to the height of five stories and a garret, make the place sombre as the bottom of a well, save at exact noon; and as a consequence of this fact, vegetation does not flourish with tropical luxuriance in Blinker's Court. It is full June, all lavish of living green and pink, and time would fail to tell what other glories of the infinite summer-day flourish

There is a Blinker's Court in every man's life; some place, spot, or incident in his heart or outside—close on the verge of his daily business, but perfectly deaf to the tumult of it—out of earshot, out of eye-shot, quite a little cavern in a rock, though accessible from loud, storming life at a moment's notice, and by some such tortuous alley as led to this place.

But every body is not so fortunate as to have Mr Blinker's Court and the real, old original one estimable. This was the case with the favored apprentice of Clingham & Co., Chesswick Branch. And thitherward, after his unexpected departure from the room of Mr. John Manton, on the afternoon whose history was given in our last chapter, did Mr. Luke Green bend his way. Had walls ears, the walls of that alley might have heard more objections made to their crookedness, and that quality of them consigned to more unpleasant destinies, than ever before since they stood. It was as if Mr. Green's mind was accessible only by a slow match, the external end of which had been lit by the smoulder resentment from Mr. Manton, the inner end being just now reached, with a result direly incendiary and explosive. Little pebbles, in themselves of no consequence, were squirring away from Mr. Green's foot as far as they could in any one direction without hitting in an angle. The earth beneath, which could not be squirred or stirred, was kicked rather than trodden on by him; and as he emerged into the open square of Blinker's Court he looked up at the arrested storm of clothes which darkened heaven—for it was wash-day in Blinker's—as if he wished his eye were a meat-knife, and he could run its edge back and forth once or twice over each of those lines.

Toward Number 3 he made his way with a directness that proved him no stranger—dodging, with a half-suppressed oath, between moist sheets and garments having lower limbs—through a group of old women who attended around the pump to assist the said clothes to dry—among kneeling urchins, whose mothers he knocked out of the ring in so adroit a manner as to explain the admiration with which they saked if he wouldn't like to come back, and try it over again—and finally opened the door bearing the number which he sought, passing in without any forewarning of bell or rap. He mounted a narrow and almost perpendicular staircase, which fared him as he came in, and at the top of the third flight passed along the entry to its farther end, and knocked on the grenay panel of an old and much battered door opening on the right hand. Knocked again, and that the knob. That door was locked.

"The devil!" said Luke Green. "Her eare grow worse and worse!"

Whereupon he began playing a reveille with both fists, until his knuckles smarted, and the door communicated its jar to the partitions. He heard a resting inside, and redoubled his efforts. Then came a sound of hobbling feet, and a very attenuated, tremulous voice asked, querulously, through the keyhole, "Who's there?" He put his mouth to the same opening, gave a short whistle, and the door was opened instantly.

A very old woman stood in the door-way. A snowy cambric cap, with ruffles severely starched, and, for the present fashion, enormous, was drawn lightly down over her head, so as to display just the faintest line of thin white hair at the front, and tied under her chin with two green bows, large in proportion, as the wings under the tiniest heads in the old masters, and suggesting those, save that the old woman was so much too old to be a cherub; or, indeed, taking into consideration the other portions of her physique, an angelic being of any kind. A perfectly clean but very coarse blue bedgown, of some woolen stuff, reached a trifling distance below her knees; stockings of the same material and color; and a long pair of man's India-rubbers completing her attire below; while, above, a green baize jacket, apparently the lining of some gentleman's greatcoat, which had once if only a few times before his decease, hung loosely on her shoulders. But the most curious part of her, as of all people worth five minutes' examination, was her face. Her eyes, black as jet, but sunken till they seemed no larger than pin-heads, lay, each like a crafty little spider, parda at the centre of its cobweb of converging wrinkles; and when she turned upon Luke Green, looked just ready to leap out and spring back again with a fly in their claws. Her nose extended in a perfectly straight line forward and downward, making an angle sharp as the beak of a goldfinch as it returned toward the lip, and had a suspicious air, a look of inspection about it that made one feel uncomfortable who had any family secrets—a real jack-desk, probing into one nose it was. To these graces add a long upper lip, with a not invisible grizzled mustache, and a short, square chin, with an evident muscular possibility of bite in it, and the old woman is drawn who opened the door for Luke Green.

"I didn't know as I ever should get in," said the Bank superintendent, in a reproachful tone.

"Oh, Lukey, Lukey—the impotent boy he was! Couldn't he wait just one minute for the poor old woman to wake up, and give her eyes one little wipe, before she opened the door? It might be pickpockets—it might be highway robbers. Then, again, it might be arson, or somebody wanting to come in and murder me, glory. Or it might be murder—murder, Lukey! Just think of that—and poor old mother here all alone! There's that box under the bed to think of. It's all yours—every bit on't—when the old woman's gone. Come in, Lukey—come in, boy—come and sit down with his mother, that's a dear, and take a little bite and sup. Come, Lukey!"

While she said this she drew him into the room and locked the door after her.

It was a very neat room, but furnished no more expensively than the room which serves as kitchen, parlor, and bedchamber is usually furnished among the better class of the poor. Luke Green drew two chairs into the middle of the room, and having done this and thrown a pair of cushion to the old woman, took the other himself.

"Well, mother," he began. "I've had trouble enough since I saw you. When was it I was here last? Let's see—oh yes, to-morrow week was the last time. Well, I've had my fill. I've had vexations enough to make a man want to get out of the earth—any where, almost. Vexation on my fine prospects!"

"Poor Lukey! poor Lukey! who's been a-hurting my boy now? I never let 'em do it; I never did. Why, you remember when you used to go to the old stone school-house, just across the brook from where we lived, by the big chestnut-tree—Why, some one's been trying to get off that tree! You don't see any thing like 'em now, Lukey—do you? Where's the red apples mother time? Oh you little rogue! What boys were they? Speck, they were Joe Burrill's boy and Jerry Spencer. They begin to lick you. Don't you remember how I came out with the churn-dasher, and the way I put it round their shoulders, and they set out in front of our house—saucy little brats! I gave it to 'em! I'd just been churning; I could make butter then—sweet butter, I hear! those very times! But that must be thirty-six years ago come next August. I didn't let them hurt my Lukey! They sha'n't hurt my Lukey now. I won't let 'em! Who's been a-doing it, Lukey? Tell your old mother."

Luke Green sat thinking for a moment after his mother had finished these words, either having been absorbed in something else, or thinking she had more to say; and then, bringing down his fist on the elbow of the chair she sat in so violently as to start it, he exclaimed fiercely,

"I believe I shall lose that girl; and if I do, then—I'm lost!"

"Lost, Lukey—lost! why, what do you mean? Haven't you got me to support? There's always always be a home for you in this old heart, Lukey, till it stops a-benting, here in Blinker's Court—"

"D—n Blinker's Court!" said Luke Green, angrily.

"There's worse places than Blinker's Court, a great deal. Oh, Blinker's Court isn't a bad place, only there are plenty of neighbors."

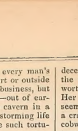
"Never mind about Blinker's Court, mother. Just listen to me for a minute. I came to Chesswick to take care of Clinghams' business."

"So you did! so you did! I always knew you would rise, Lukey."

"Can you stop and let me talk? Or would you like to keep on? I can wait till another time."

The old woman shook her head in a deprecating manner, put her hand over her mouth, and Luke Green continued:

"As I said, I came here to be head of the Bank. As you too said, I did rise. It was a rise that I had earned, if ever man did, by working like the devil in a soul-tying, brain-racking business for other people. I was glad to come here, for a good many reasons. One was that it made me head of something, after having been all degrees from the other end up. Another was that I liked to be by you. And another was this girl."



"Oh Lukey, Lukey! you're in love, Lukey!"

"Love to the devil! Do you think me a calf? You know why I ever thought of her. If it hadn't been for you I never would have bothered my head if she'd been knocked on hers. I'm not a woman's man, I fancy. D—n them, they've always been a curse! They've always bound to be a vexation to somebody till the world ends! But never mind. I'll go on. Let me paint the picture of my life for the last three years. You begin by telling me to put in for that girl. I sak why? You answer that you know she is not Nora Manton; it is really Nora Clingham. I am surprised, of course, ask you how you know—why you think so?"

"Lukey, Lukey, hain't I told you a hundred times? And now I'll tell you again. It does seem as if you never could believe me; but I'll tell you once more, and this is the last time."

"I wish to God it might be! I'm tired enough of hearing it."

"Don't make any rash prayers, my boy; no good ever comes of it. It may be the last word, and then you'd be sorry you'd ha' said it. But I'll tell you all about it.'

BLINKER'S COURT.

"GO ON, AND GET THROUGH."

Like a man who sees no way to leap over a stream, and braces himself to go through it, Luke Green prepared to hear the most intolerable story, which his mother hardly exaggerated in saying she now told him for the thousandth time. With a resigned expression on his mouth, his right elbow resting on his left palm, his chin on his disengaged hand shading a pair of very sullen eyes, he simply said to his mother, "Go on, and get through."

THE STEAMER "PEYTONA."

We present herewith an engraving of the steamer Peytona, of the Louisville and New Orleans Louisville line; a vessel now which is attracting attention in the West. We take the following description of her from a Louisville paper:

"Her draught of water light, and in trim, is barely 2½ feet. She has also many accommodations for 150 passengers, in addition to which the texas can accommodate thirty-two more, as good as these in the cabin. The outfit of the cabin is rich and unique, consisting of Brussels or tapestry carpets, lace curtains, and rich drapery for all the ladies' rooms, together with fine linens, splendid table covers, costly curtains, beautiful chandeliers, &c.

"The Peytona was built expressly for the trade between Louisville and New Orleans, and special attention has been paid to the accommodation of passengers and consequently her tare stock, as her guards are covered in, and the deck room is commodious. Her capacity for freight is equal to the burden of 1000 tons of freight, with the same draw of the water. The hull is well fastened, with an easy model and ample power to make her fast and safe. The dimensions are as follow: Length over all, 205 feet, with 30 feet beam and 9 feet depth of hold, well fastened. Her motive power is ample and well applied, working an immense waterwheel with over 14 feet length of buckets. The cylinders are of 34 inches diameter, with 9 feet stroke, and 5 boilers 22 feet long and 42 inches in diameter. Her chimneys rise 50 feet high from the hurricane deck. She is furnished with a steam freight hoister, steam capstan, and all the late improvements.

"The cabin, one of the most beautiful on the river, has fifty-two state rooms. Every state room in the after cabin contains, in addition to the berths, a transom bed for the use of children, which will make her a very desirable boat for families. They are furnished with spring mattresses, linen sheets and linen pillow-cases, washstands, washbowls, bureaus, and every thing complete. Beyond the ladies' cabin is a fine promenade, which is made comfortable by a stove. Below the ladies' cabin is the nursery, which contains rooms for sixteen persons."

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE MISTRESS of The Parsonage.

BY ELLA RODMAN.

PART III.—Continued.

My music lessons with Mrs. Otcheson were commenced at once; and, according to her account, I made astonishing progress. I was surprised at myself, and began to feel almost as great an affection for the piano as though it had been a living thing.

Mr. Pendleigh was sometimes present at these lessons, and sometimes he was otherwise engaged. Mrs. Otcheson frequently called to him to come and note my improvement, and sometimes his voice, a magnificent bass, lent volume to our singing; but his manner to me was quite distant and respectful, and his mood one of settled melancholy.

I had seen very few different characters, and Mr. Pendleigh was a sort of enigma that I often found myself studying. But if I looked toward him I was sure to catch those deep eyes fixed upon me, and the glance rendered me uncomfortable.

On my birthday a handsome piano awaited me—a gift from Mr. Winnesiis; and this thoughtful kindness, together with the possession of so coveted a treasure, fairly brought the tears to my eyes.

I drummed upon it almost from morning to night; and I doubt if prima donna ever had a more admiring audience than those crude performances found in my husband.

Mr. Pendleigh came frequently to the Parsonage; sometimes to be closeted with Mr. Winnesiis, and sometimes he was bodily turned over to me. Sometimes Mrs. Otcheson accompanied him, and we rambled over the country, and sat down in the woods, where Mr. Pendleigh read to us, or repeated long poems, with which his memory seemed inexhaustibly stored. His voice was deep and thrilling; and I have frequently turned aside to conceal the tears called forth by passages from "Marmion," which never struck me before with such touching beauty.

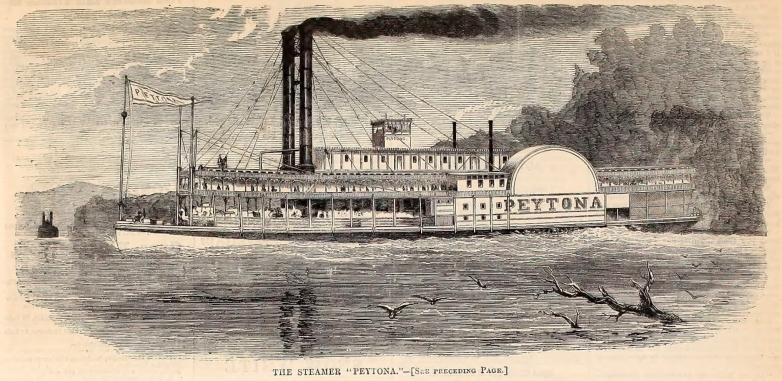
Gradually my thoughts of Mr. Pendleigh became softened; I felt for him a mingling of pity and admiration that wove off my restraint in his presence; and I liked to talk with him, although our opinions were very often at variance.

I argued with him about my beloved Church with more enthusiasm, probably, than judgment; for Mr. Pendleigh would smile good-humoredly, but appear still unconvinced. During one of these discussions he handed me a slip of paper, on which he had written:

"The country is God's ancient Church,
His house not made with hands;
Where every part is perfect grace
Which awes accordance stands."

This did very well, I thought, as far as it went; but seeing that I made very little impression on Mr. Pendleigh's judgment, I concluded that Mr. Winnesiis was better fitted to wrestle with him on questions of theology.

He had the utmost confidence, he said, in our goodness; he wished that he was half as deserving; but he had been peculiarly tempted, and it was therefore no wonder if he had peculiar views. And then he would gracefully dismiss the subject, as a matter of small moment after all, and turn to the pages of poetry that seemed to have so much greater attractions for him.



Mrs. Otcheson said that she never could feel sufficiently grateful to me—I was a perfect wonderful; I amused Oscar so much, and drew him off poor fellow! from the contemplation of his misfortune. He was so much improved since he had known me. And now she had something very delightful to propose! They were going to take a little trip to the sea-shore with the children, and if I and Mr. Winnesiis would join their party it would give them the greatest possible pleasure.

I thought so! I had never seen it; I wondered what it looked like! I was half wild to go; and I ran to Mr. Winnesiis to divulge the plan in quite a paroxysm of excitement. "I would do us all so much good," Mrs. Otcheson said.

My husband replied, with an indulgent smile, that "he was good enough already, as far as health went; but, from my flushed cheeks and sparkling eyes, I must be very much out of order, and therefore I had better take the prescription alone."

"Not alone!" I repeated, with a sudden conviction of the dreariness of the word. "I can't go alone!"

"Then you really dislike to leave your old husband?" as he drew me up to his chair.

THE STEAMER "PEYTONA."—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

"The very thought has taken the light from your eyes and the color from your cheek."

I could see that he was pleased at my unwillingness to leave him; and a half smile broke forth at the probable result of my application.

"Do you know, Fairy," he continued, "that you are getting to be a very dissipated little woman? We have had music, poetry, and moonlight walks; and now you must go to the seashore, like Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Smith. I expect that, next, you'll be applying to me for a set of diamonds?"

"You don't expect any such thing!" I exclaimed, pettishly, for I was impatient to have him say "Yes."

"Well," said Mr. Winnesilie, as he kissed the incipient pout from my lips, "you may tell Mrs. Otcheson that she can have you for a few weeks, without the incumbrance she had dreaded. I can not leave Meadowbrook, except for a day or two—but I will take an occasional trip to see you."

I was only half-satisfied with this; but my husband declared that the sea-air was just what I needed—I had looked rather pale and languid lately; and as he did not need it, he couldn't be excused for leaving his post.

So it was all settled, and Mr. Winnesilie's absence was looked upon as a very reasonable thing.

Mrs. Otcheson said, laughingly, that she thought she should pass me off as a young lady, a cousin of hers, who had just made her début in society. They all laughed at the idea; but I thought of my husband alone there at the Parsonage, and did not feel quite satisfied.

But all other feelings were soon absorbed in the delight of the new scene that opened upon me. How I loved the white, pebbly shore that seemed stretching away into regions of unknown space—the rising and falling waves—the deep, musical roar that reverberated from the fathomless waste!

Mrs. Otcheson was amused at my delight, and said that "I was a perfect child;" but Mr. Pendleigh looked at me half enviously that I could enter thus fresh and unsophisticated into what appeared to him a very commonplace scene.

From the dancing, dressing, flirting crowd inside I shrank in nervous embarrassment; and it was absolutely painful to me to enter the confined dining-room, where Mrs. Otcheson seemed perfectly at her ease. Hosts of acquaintances came thronging about her; and as in some instances she haughtily carried out her proposed intention of passing me off as an unsophisticated young relative, the surmises afloat respecting me were various and contradictory. I had attained to the dignity of twenty-one years, but people declared that I scarcely looked seventeen; and some persisted in considering me a school-girl, emancipated for a few weeks from thraldom.

Again, it was reported that I was the bride-elect of Mr. Pendleigh; a theory favored, perhaps, by our being continually together, for had not my husband given him to me as a sort of charge? I looked upon him now with most friendly eyes; and many a pleasant ramble we took on the sands, accompanied, generally, by the merry troop of children, running before or behind us, while Mrs. Otcheson dispensed tea and honeyed words in the drawing-room.

I had not been gone long before Mr. Winnesilie followed me. It was very surprising, he said, that he could not do without me, when Mimi made him twice as comfortable as I did, and the Parsonage was so still now, that he could write without the least interruption.

"But I don't like the stillness, Fairy," said he, "and I thought that if I did not come to look after you, you might perhaps get into mischief."

His stay was very short, though; the noise, he said, disturbed him, and he went back to his books.

Mr. Pendleigh had queer, wild moods sometimes, that made me think him a little crazy. He would start abruptly and leave me, or watch my movements to such a degree that I became uncomfortably conscious of his fixed gaze. I even wondered if it were not dangerous for him to be so near the sea, fearing that, in some strange mood, he might plunge in.

We had walked down on the sea-shore one evening, and he began to talk so wildly that I became frightened. He spoke of fearful destinies, and said that he felt convinced, from his hitherto miserable life, that some dark fate was in store for him—one plunge would end it all —why had not the thing created a right to give back its life into the Creator's hands?

I trembled with an undefined fear, and placed my hand on his arm to restrain him. It was a beautiful moonlight night, and as my fingers touched him he turned his face to me with a look that startled me.

I could not explain that glance, but it made me uneasy; and I was withdrawing my hand, when my other arm was suddenly seized, and I turned to face my husband.

Mr. Winnesilie had arrived unexpectedly, and come out on the beach in search of me. Without a word he drew my hand through his arm, and walked off at a rapid pace.

"Fairy," said he, at length, "this is no place for you—we must go home. I have been thoughtless in exposing you to such influences."

I did not say a word upon the subject, partly from fright, and partly from pride that my husband should fancy me so weak as to be led away, even in appearance, from the path of right; and when we reached our room I quietly began putting up my things, while Mr. Winnesilie leaned his head upon his hand and sighed.

I had wondered what they would think of our abrupt departure, but Mrs. Otcheson took it very smilingly; it was quite natural, she said, that Mr. Winnesilie should become impatient and take us, at length, by surprise; she was rather tired of the place herself, and would soon follow us.

Mr. Pendleigh shook hands with us very cordially, and seemed quite unconscious of any reason for our abrupt departure. Possibly Mr. Winnesilie thought that he had been too hasty; for he took leave with his usual kindness, and we were soon established again at the Parsonage.

"My birdling must not leave her nest again, unless accompanied by me," said my husband, as he welcomed me home.

I said nothing; but I could not help thinking that my jaunt to the sea-shore had not been so productive of pleasure as I expected.

When the Otchesons returned, Mr. Winnesilie said that I had better not resume the musiclessons; he was afraid that perhaps spending so much time there led me to neglect others.

"I will never go there again if you do not wish it," said I, with an injured feeling.

"Oh no," replied my husband, "go there the same as ever—there is no reason why you should avoid them—only don't spend quite so much time there as you have been in the habit of doing; it gives people occasion to talk."

It seemed to me that there was a coldness between us which Mr. Winnesilie did not choose to explain, and of which I was too proud to complain. He was kind still, but he was not exactly the husband of former days; and I began to fear that he looked upon me as that despicable character, a married flirt. I did not know then how his ears had been poisoned by those hangers-on who always abound at watering-places. While I was awaiting in dignified silence an explanation from him, he expected an explanation from me; and I passed lonely hours at my piano, while my husband shut himself up in his study.

Whenever I caught Mr. Winnesilie's eye it was fixed upon me with a sad expression; and I began to be afraid of him, for Arethusa had feared that these prolonged fits of melancholy might bring on insanity.

When Mrs. Otcheson returned her first visit was paid to me; and she appeared both surprised and disappointed when I told her that Mr. Winnesilie thought there was no longer any occasion for me to trouble her with my musical education, as I could now practice at home, and already accompanied myself in his favorite songs well enough to please his not critical ear.

I could not understand her dismay. She had hoped, she said, that our little musical gatherings would interest Oscar, who had often threatened to go to Europe; and as she did not consider it safe for him to go alone, and it was not then convenient for her to accompany him, she endeavored to amuse him as much as possible at home.

I said that I wondered he had not gone before; for a person of wealth and refinement, without any employment, nothing could be more natural; but Mrs. Otcheson was evidently not pleased with these remarks, and changed the subject as soon as possible.

"A story," said she, with emphasis, "feels very differently; but let us talk of something else. If you are no longer to take music-lessons, I do 'it pray, desert us altogether, or Mendolbrook will become insupportable; for you know that we consider you and Mr. Winnesilie the only civilized portion of the population."

I willingly acceded to her request to "turn over often," for I felt an unusual weight of loneliness; and when Mrs. Otcheson and her feathers had disappeared in the distance, I sat there in the little parlor buried in a profitless reverie.

I was unhappy and wicked; and instead of saying, "I will arise and go to my Father," I sat feeding my imagination with forbidden fancies. My husband no longer cared for me; I was an unloved wife; and it might have been so different! Perhaps, had I remained in my humble position of school-teacher, free as before I saw Mr. Winnesilie, I might—

One Sunday, to my great surprise, Mr. Pendleigh was at church. His manner was so reverential and subdued that Mr. Winnesilie remarked it with much pleasure.

"Perhaps, Fairy, your counsels have not been in vain," said my husband, with the old smile; "but I began to fear that Mr. Pendleigh might not attend so much to the teaching as to the teacher. I hope that I have not done him injustice; but old men are always jealous, you know."

I was so perfectly firm in my own strength that I had no sympathy for my husband's weakness; and something like contempt rose in my heart when he spoke of Mr. Pendleigh.

Mr. Winnesilie saw it, and the next day, when Mrs. Otcheson called in her phaeton, driven by her brother, for me to take a drive, he urged my acceptance of the invitation.

With a significant glance at my husband I had proudly declined, but Mrs. Otcheson persevered. It would do me good, she said—I looked pale—would soon return, etc.; and Mr. Winnesilie insisted so pertinaciously upon my going that I did not dare to refuse.

I threw a black lace mantilla over my head, and Mr. Winnesilie having put a warm shawl in the carriage, we were soon whirling along at a rapid pace. The fresh air was invigorating, the motion delightful, and my elastic spirits rose at once. I felt gay and mischievous; my cheeks burned with excitement; and Mrs. Otcheson exclaimed that I made the prettiest and most romantic picture she had seen in a long while.

At this Mr. Pendleigh turned to survey me; and I blushed and laughed as I said that I had forgotten to label myself, "Eyes off!"

ON THE BEACH.

"Gabrielle!" exclaimed her brother, suddenly, "didn't you intend stopping at one of these queer places for something to satisfy the coarser demands of nature?"

"Yes," she replied; "and of course we have passed it! The children will never forgive me if I don't bring their 'round-hearts.' There is a man out here"—turning to me—"who keeps a little cake-shop, and makes excellent round-hearts. The children, who are not accustomed to luxuries, declare that 'round-hearts are good enough for any body;' and I promised to bring them some 'Johnny-cake.'"

The horses were turned around, and the cake-shop hunted up.

"Don't get out," said Mrs. Octheson, as I prepared to follow her; "it is such a little place; and you will only soil your dress."

"We will take a turn up the road," called out Mr. Pendleigh, "while you are making your bargains."

Mrs. Octheson nodded her head, and pushed vigorously against the little door of the shop.

I felt uneasy, I knew not why; nor was this feeling lessened when Mr. Pendleigh seized my hand and exclaimed, imperiously,

"I must speak to you, and I will! I have loved you since the first day I saw you, and imagined you the daughter of that prematurely old man. What but the perverse fate that has followed my footsteps from the cradle gave you to him? I could have surrounded you with wealth, luxuries, and refinements; watched your every look; enshrined you as my bright-est gem in a casket of magnificence; you should not have known a wish ungratified; and now—"

I felt like one in a dream; his violence terrified me. Mr. Winnielie's pale face, with its stern look upon it, rose up before me; and had it been for life or death I could not have spoken. Mr. Pendleigh was encouraged by my silence to proceed:

"Do not judge me too harshly, Ernestine—how often have I repeated that name when alone! You see before you an unfortunate man, the constant victim of a designing sister. You look surprised. She acts well her part, does she not?—this scheming, loving Gabrielle! She has been an accomplished actress ever since she could walk. In the bloom of her early girlhood she sacrificed her youth, beauty, and purity on the unhallowed shrine of the Juggernaut—Gold; and when my misfortune—caused by the carelessness of an uncle—was repaid, as he considered, by leaving me his fortune, Gabrielle became suddenly roused to my welfare, and took me under her especial charge. She feared that a wife might interfere with the claims of her children upon their rich uncle, and she watched me with a jealousy that more than equalled his saw through this; but I remembered that she was my sister, and I could not determine to cut myself off from my only relations. And fate threw you in her way; you were young, beautiful, and married, therefore a perfectly safe tool for her to use against all dangerous fancies. You were surprised that I addressed you as 'Miss Winnielie' in the early part of our acquaintance—that was part of Gabrielle's plan; she wished to keep me in ignorance of your position until my affections were engaged beyond all power of recalling them; then she could smile at all danger from meanowning mammas or beautiful daughters. With me it has succeeded but too well; and you, Ernestine? You are pale and sad of late—"

He stopped suddenly, for my eyes were fix-d, as with a spell, upon an approaching figure that I recognized but too well.

The coming had rested by the roadside when out of sight of the shop; but Mr. Pendleigh, with a fierce expression of defiance, as though the appearance of Mr. Winnielie had awakened him, urged the horses forward, still retaining a tight grasp upon my powerless hand.

Varied pictures flashed before me in that half-trance: Mrs. Octheson's heartless duplicity; the insult of Mr. Pendleigh's avowal; the cold set expression of my husband's face; a future lifetime of wretchedness.

Mr. Winnielie had seized the horses and stopped the carriage. I heard his voice, as he addressed Mr. Pendleigh:

"To you, Sir, I have nothing to say. Read the parable of the ewe-lamb, and your own conscience will make the application."

I was unlocked, and he lifted me out in his arms.

When I recovered I was sitting in a countryman's wagon with my head leaning on my husband's shoulder. I raised my eyes to his face, but I was frightened, and closed them again with a shudder. I relapsed into unconsciousness; and when I opened my eyes again I recognized myself as the one leading to Hog's Point. I knew not what was in store for me; and I felt so weak from the late excitement, and the days of sumptuous whitjck had quenched it, that I cared very little what became of me. It was a silent drive of two or three hours; my husband's face was rigid, and his eyes studiously avoided mine.

Arethusa had seen the vehicle in the distance; and she stood at the gate, her face shaded by a huge sun-bonnet, peering out at the travelers.

"Well, I declare!" was her salutation, "I should as soon have expected to see you drive up in a wheel-barrow, or on a wooden rocking-horse! Whatever possessed you to come in this style? How do you look, Fairy!" and my sister-in-law bustled around, untying my bonnet-strings, shaking up a cushion and depositing me upon a sofa.

I glanced appealingly at Mr. Winnielie.

"Ernestine is not well," said he, "and I have brought her to you, in hopes that the change may do her good."

Arethusa said that was all right; but I read in this speech a painful significance, and I hastily brushed off the two large tears that rolled down my cheeks.

After tea Arethusa took me up stairs to "the spare-room," where my comfort had been formerly cared for; and I sank down into an easy-chair with queer fancies respecting the high, old-fashioned bed.

It was so large and white; it seemed to take the shape of a truckless field of snow, and I was plunging madly through the drifts, calling wildly to my husband, but he would not come and rescue me. Then I experienced the sleepiness so often described as the last sensation of freezing; I knew that I was dying, but I could not rouse myself; and I gradually drifted off into the dread expanse.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Throat Affections.

From Rev. E. Bowles, A.M., President Athens College, Athens, Tenn.—"I have found great benefit from the use of 'Brown's Bronchial Troches,' before and after preaching, as they prevent hoarseness, to which I am very subject. I think from their good effect they will be of permanent advantage to me. Several clergymen of my acquaintance to whom I have given the Troches have been benefited by them."

Harnden's Express.

—DAILY—

Forwards Valuables and Merchandize to and from, and collects drafts, bills, &c., in all parts of the

EAST, WEST AND SOUTH.

Will receive goods, or orders to "call," at

74 Broadway.

BEAUTIFUL BALLADS.

By the favorite composer, J. R. THOMAS.

HAPPY BE THY DREAMS.

THE LIFE THAT FELL IN SPRING.

THE WITHERED ROSE.

Published by W.H. HALL & SON, N. Y.

CARD.

A. & G. A. ARNOUX, so long and reputably known as Fashionable Tailors, beg to announce to the public that they have added a department for boys' Clothing to their establishment, in which all the finest and newest styles of goods will be kept. This will enable our customers to obtain all the goods they may be in need of for themselves and the male part of their families at one house.

Of our Men's Furnishing Department it is unnecessary for us to say any thing, as it already has the name of having the best goods, the best fits, and low prices to be found in the city.

521 Broadway, under St. Nicholas.

Mr. McGune, formerly of Genin's Bazaar, will be happy to see his friends at his new location, to whom not only he, but Mr. Isolton, the Superintendent there of the Boys' work have removed.

New Voluntaries, Preludes, and Interludes.

For the Organ, Harmonium or Melodeon

By C. H. Rink

Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., 317 Washington Street, Boston.

Something New.

DR. A. H. SMEDLEY, of No. 648 Broadway, invites especial attention to his recent and method, original, and practical cure by himself, of the wife, speedy and permanent cure of "stammering," by eicoricity. Hours, 10 to 2 o'clock.

Stop Bleeding—Stop Spitting Blood. REMEDY READY.—A certain cure for Hemorrhage. Highest testimonials. Send for circular. In boxes containing 25 powders at $5, or sent by mail in envelopes; 6 powders for $1 12. Sold by Wholesale and retail, No. 145 Fulton Street, N.Y.

GREAT CURIOSITY—Particulars sent free. Agents wanted. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.

O'Conner & Collender, 65 to 69 Crosby Street.

To Wholesale Dealers in Jewelry.

The undersigned being about to go to Europe, in his usual annual facilities, he is able to offer to the Trade Jewelry of any description on better terms than any other house in New York.

All orders will receive the most careful and prompt attention.

W. A. HAYWARD,
109 Broadway.

Bound Volumes of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

NINETEEN SEMI-ANNUAL VOLUMES of the Magazine have been published. We will send by Mail, postage paid, to any place in the United States within 3000 miles of New York, any of these volumes, neatly and uniformly bound in Muslin, upon the receipt of Two Dollars per Volume. When complete sets are purchased, we will make a discount of Twenty-five per cent., forwarding the volumes by express, the freight being at the expense of the purchaser.

These Nineteen Volumes of the Magazine contain matter equivalent to more than One Hundred ordinary Octavo Volumes, and are illustrated by more than Six Thousand Engravings, executed in the highest style of the art.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

For Description, see Harper's Weekly, Feb. 11th.

Clothing, Time, and Labor Saved.

No Rubbing and No Wear.

Indispensable to Housekeepers.

A laundress attends daily to show the operation of the Machine.

439 Broadway, above Howard Street, second floor.

Also—D. Hodgers, 104 Jones Alley, Philadelphia, is Agent for Pennsylvania.

Wholesale orders received at our office, 84 Beekman Street, New York. Hotels and County rights for sale and machines furnished to purchasers on liberal terms.

SULLIVAN & STAUT,
Agents for the Patentee.

"Trefelio!" "Trefelio!"

NO LADY OBJECTS TO A BEAUTIFUL COMPLEXION, yet many society ills success to obtain it.

We are positive that a single Bottle of the elegant French Floral Extract — "Trefelio" — will convince the most skeptical of its super-excellent qualities as a Restoring and Beautifying medium. Try it.

Retail, HEGEMAN & CO., and all Druggists.
Wholesale, LAZELL, MARSH & GARDINER, 10 Gold, Street.

SOMETHING ENTIRELY NEW!!

PHALON'S SNOW WHITE ORIENTAL CREAM

—FOR—

Whitening and Beautifying the Complexion, and Removing all Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Blotches, Sunburn, and Curing all Diseases of the Skin.

PHALON'S SNOW WHITE ORIENTAL CREAM is a delightful vegetable, fragrant, and delicately scented, to be used in the Toilet, imparting beauty, comfort and health to the skin. It will effectually remove TAN, PIMPLES, FRECKLES, and all blemishes of the skin, and prevent its shrinking and becoming spotted. It will give the skin a soft and flexible surface, and by persevering in the directions, the skin will become entirely free from all imperfections.

The Money Phalon in offering the Snow White Oriental Cream, a new article of their own invention, (and for which they have a copyright,) guarantee that there is nothing in its composition that is at all injurious, in any way, entirely different from any other preparation ever made.

Directions accompany each Bottle, but for the purpose of showing all how easily it is applied, we publish them below.

DIRECTIONS.

Shake the bottle well, then apply the SNOW WHITE with a sponge, and when dry wipe with a clean towel or flannel.

For sale by all Druggists and Fancy Dealers, and by the manufacturers,

PHALON & SON,
No. 1 Astor House, New York.

LE BON TON is the best LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen copy, with two patterns, will be sent for 30 cents.
S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 467 Broadway, N. Y.

This sweetest in the world. So considered by those who use it.
CASWELL, MASON & CO., 5th Avenue and 24th Street, Fifth Avenue Hotel, N. Y.

HOW TO LIVE.
SAVING AND WASTING; OR, DOMESTIC ECONOMY ILLUSTRATED by the Life of Two Families of Opposite Character, Habits, and Practices, in a pleasant tale of real life, full of
USEFUL LESSONS IN HOUSEKEEPING,
How to Live, How to Hate,
How to Gain, How to be Happy.
Including the story of the Needlewoman who supported herself and four children on
A DIME A DAY.
No man, woman or child can read this book without being interested in a pleasant narrative and exposition of human character, and instructed in its lessons of economy in things that pertain to every-day life in every family.
Price, post-paid, 87 cents. FOWLER & WELLS,
308 Broadway, New York.

ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, 66 and 68 West Thirteenth Street.—Acute, chronic and nervous diseases, of every description, successfully treated without medicine. Private parlors and female attendants for ladies. Good board and attentive nurses. Medicated electrical baths, 50 cents.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.
PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWER,
Wholesale Druggists,
15 Beekman Street, New York.

From Halsted's Late Treatise on Motorpathy.

"Mr. C——, aged 35, had an attack resembling cholera, which left him with a general prostration of the whole system. He suffered from constant palpitation of the heart, and a general nervous debility. He could not walk across a room without producing a fit of violent trembling with twitching of the muscles, over which he seemed to have all control. His intellectual powers suffered in proportion with the physical. He was incapable of any mental effort. A few weeks' treatment produced an entire renovation of his system. He could walk a distance of several miles at a time, and enter into the various exercises and amusements of the fashionable world. Joy and animation."

This Treatise can be obtained on return of mail by inclosing 75 cents to H. HALSTED, M.D., Round Hill Water Cure, Northampton, Mass.

JOSEPH MERWIN,

Manufacturer, and Manufacturers' Agent for the PURCHASE AND SALE of Guns, Rifles, Pistols, PERCUSSION CAPS, &c.,

267 Broadway, near Chambers Street, NEW YORK.

WHERE MAY BE FOUND THE NEWEST AND MOST PERFECT STYLES OF FIRE ARMS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

Walsh Fire-Arms Co. new 12-Shot Revolver, 60 balls to the lb.

Lindner's "Young America" 2-Shot Deringer, 60 balls to the lb.

Smith & Wesson's Seven-Shooter.

Allen & Wheelock's " " "

Pottenger Six-Shooter, imitation Colt's new model.

Excelsior Revolver, " " old "

Colt's old, and Warner's old and new model.

I. X. L. Self-cocking Revolver.

Wesson's new Breech Loading Repeater.

Genuine Deringers, at Trade Prices.

A new Cartridge Pistol, 60 balls to the lb., superior to the other styles.

Also, sole Agent for the United States for the Volcanic Repeating Rifles and Pistols, Wesson's new breech-loading Rifles and Pistols, American G. B., C. T., & B. Hat and Water-proof Percussion Caps, with a full and complete assortment of Single and Double-barrel Guns, Rifles and Pistols of the most approved manufacture: Powder Flasks, Shooting Caps, Powder Flasks, Shot Bags, Sporting Powder of the best Quality, &c., &c.

Lord Elgin's Mission to China and Japan.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.
Have just Ready:

Narrative of the Earl of Elgin's Mission to CHINA AND JAPAN,

IN THE YEARS 1857, '58, '59.

By LAURENCE OLIPHANT,

Private Secretary to the Earl Elgin, Author of the "Russian Shores of the Black Sea," &c., &c.

Illustrations. 8vo. Muslin, $2 75.

From the Edinburgh Review, January, 1860.

Lord Elgin's Mission to the Courts of Pekin and Yeddo has been extremely fortunate in its historiographer. Few men of letters have seen more of the globe than Mr. Oliphant, or have described what they have seen with more eyeopes.  Several circumstances conspired to give Lord Elgin and his suite peculiar opportunities of exploring some of the great lines of river communication in China than ever were enjoyed before; the successful cession of a large territory on the Amoor beyond all comparison the most curious and important addition yet made to our knowledge of that most remarkable country.

From the London Athenæum.

Mr. Oliphant is an observer—an artist—a man with hand, eye, and brain, and his pictures are as distinct as landscapes and groups in the stereoscope, with all the colors of the East upon them, and that East the quaint, evil, and unique kaleidoscopic Orientalism of Japan and China. **

This account of the Mission to Japan is shorthingly interesting. It was made by a man of ability who cares to note, under the guidance of an accomplished traveller, the manners and customs of two Eastern empires not more unlike the rest of the world than they are contrasts one to another.

From the London Critic.

One of the most solidly interesting and instructive books of travel which have appeared for some time. **

From the London Literary Gazette.

A work upon one of the most important missions that has issued from our shores for many a long day, written by a gentleman connected with it in a highly graceful style, and who, and within his reach means not accessible to ordinary writers.

From the London Leader and Saturday Analyst.

Mr. Oliphant's observations of Japan will be new to Nagasaki, at Hondo, and at Jeddo, are in the highest degree curious and entertaining. His observations confirm in a remarkable manner the glimpses we possess of Japanese civilization given by all previous writers.

From the London Publisher's Circular.

A work of such sterling value and solid information.

From the Athlon.

Few books of travel seem to have attracted so much attention in England.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of $2 75.

THE ART JOURNAL—1860—

LONDON.

The February number of this popular work is now ready, and contains the second part of a NEW series of Papers, descriptive of the Course of the Hudson, from its Source to its Sea, by Bayard J. Lossing; profusely illustrated with original engravings on wood from actual sketches taken in the Autumn of the past year. THE COMPANION GUIDE BY RAILWAY IN SOUTH WALES, by Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, is illustrated by J. D. Harding, Birket Foster, &c., &c.

THE TURNER GALLERY.—Ere long, the subscribers to the ART JOURNAL will obtain engravings from pictures by that great master. The Art Journal is a work especially suited for connoisseurs, Artists, and all lovers of the Fine Arts. Each number contains three beautiful Steel Engravings and numerous illustrations on wood. Subscription—$3 per year or 75 cents per number.

VIRTUE & CO., No. 26 John Street, New York.

Winant's Excelsior Billiard Tables.

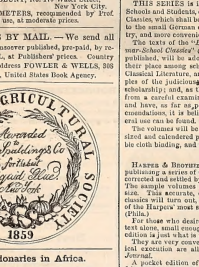
Manufactory 71 Gold Street, N. Y.

To Surveyors and Farmers.

The attention of Surveyors is called to our superior 7 and 10-inch Theodolites, made on the plan of Gambey, and which have been approved by the U. S. Coast Survey. The Compasses are of the best quality and style. The graduation is to 10 seconds, and for its accuracy and elaborate finish of the entire instrument, refer to the official letter in our Catalogue from Mr. J. E. Hilgard, Assistant Coast Survey.

Our TRANSITS, LEVELS, Surveyor's Compasses, and other Surveying Instruments are made with the same care and attention as the Theodolites, and every one is guaranteed to be of the very best quality. Level Rods, Targets, Mounting Tapes, Chains, &c., &c.

Instruments, circles, &c., graduated.



Catalogues sent when desired.

E. & C. W. BLUNT, No. 179 Water Street, New York City.

ANEROID BAROMETERS, recommended by Prof. Silliman for Farmers' use, at moderate prices.

GOOD BOOKS BY MAIL.—We send all books, by whomsoever published, pre-paid, by return of FIRST MAIL, at Publishers' prices. Country Dealers supplied. Address FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York, United States Book Agency.

The Missionaries in Africa.

Scenes of Every-Day Life in Africa.

BY SHERIF G. BRITTAN.

1 vol. 12mo, 400 pp., Price $1 in Muslin.

With Superior Illustrations.

This most interesting volume, written by

A LADY MISSIONARY, and long a resident in Africa, gives a faithful narrative of the deeply-interesting

WAY AND MISSIONARY LIFE, in their endeavors to spread a knowledge of Christianity among

THE AFRICANS OF A BENIGHTED CLIME, as well as a full and valuable account of the domestic manners, customs, and social habits of

THE AFRICANS ALONG THE SEABOARD.

The second edition of this volume, which has created a perfect excitement in the reading and religious circles, from its accuracy and novelty, is now ready, and will be sent free by mail on receipt of price.

PUDNEY & RUSSELL,

No. 79 John Street, N. Y. City.

MOORE'S RURAL is the paper for every man who has a family or farm, or cultivates a garden or flowers. For specimens, (free,) or a yearly copy, ($2) send to D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

THE WATER CURE JOURNAL for

MARCH contains one of Dr. Jackson's Familiar Letters—a Special Practice of American Women—the causes of the Throat and Lungs, by Dr. Trall, illustrated, an extraordinary insanity; Poetical Darling the Idol Tamer, Health of the City, Plain Talk, Nutritive Value of Food, Dr. Trall's Food for Cattle, Forty Years in the Wilderness of Pills and Powders, Female Physicians, &c., &c. Now is the time to begin. The Water Cure Journal is published monthly, at One Dollar a year, by FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES would grow upon your face, use my original and celebrated IMPROVED MEDICATED WASH. Sent by mail, post free, to any address. R. G. GRAHAM, 102 Nassau Street, New York.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of

1500 Pages and

1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, the plan of whose Special District will be given, and other inducements offered. Applicants should name the counties they would prefer. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOTH SEX-

ES.—Married or Single, in health or disease.—MEDICAL ADVISER AND MARRIAGE GUIDE, 300th edition, over 400 pages, 12mo. cloth, and above 100 Engravings, price 1s. Prize $1. By a celebrated Paris and London Physician and Surgeon, now of New York City. This interesting book should be in the hands of every adult person, as it imparts knowledge all have sought for in vain. Sent by mail, post paid, by Dr. LA RENUE, No. 1 Vesey Street, Astor House.

List of New Books.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, N. Y., MAR. 10, 1860.

LORD ELGIN'S MISSION TO CHINA, &c. Narrative of the Earl of Elgin's Mission to China and Japan, in the Years 1857, '58, '59. By LAURENCE OLIPHANT, Private Secretary of Lord Elgin. Author of "Russian Shores of the Black Sea," &c., &c. Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $2 75.

ÆSCHYLUS. Ex Novissima recensione FREDERICI A. PALEY. Accessit Verborum quæ præcipue notanda sunt et Nominum Index. 18mo, Muslin, Flexible Binding, 40 cents.

HORATIUS. Quinti Horatii Flacci Opera Omnia. Ex Recensione A. J. MACLEANE. 18mo, Muslin, Flexible Binding, 40 cents.

 Æschylus and Horace are the first two volumes of HARPER'S GREEK AND LATIN TEXTS, CAREFULLY EDITED FROM THE BEST EDITIONS.

THIS SERIES is intended to supply, for the use of Schools and Students, cheap and accurate Editions of the Classics, which shall be superior in mechanical execution to the small German editions now in use in this country, and more convenient in form.

The texts of the "Bibliotheca Classica" and "Grammar-School Classics" (London), so far as they have been published, will be adopted. Very full editions have taken their place among scholars as valuable contributions to Classical Literature, and are remarkable for the good qualities of the judicious and practical natures of English scholarship; and, as the editors have formed their texts from a careful examination of the best editions extant, and have, as far as possible, avoided mere speculative emendation, it is believed that the text-author for general use can be found.

The volumes will be handsomely printed on superfine sized and calendered paper, in an 18mo size, with flexible cloth binding, and will be issued at short intervals.

HARPER & BROTHERS, of New York, have commenced publishing a series of Greek and Latin authors, the text corrected and edited by the most learned men of the age. The separate volumes are of a most convenient pocket size. This accurate, elegant, and cheap edition of the classics will be, we confidently predict, to be one of the Harpers' most successful publications.—The Press (Philada.).

For those who desire a cheap and neat edition of the text alone, small enough to be carried in the pocket, this edition is just what is wanted.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

They are very convenient editions, and in typographical execution are all that could be desired.—Boston Atlas and Bee.

A pocket edition of classical authors which can not fail to please, from the exquisite neatness of its preparation. Just the thing a scholar will love to peruse at a rainy day.—Boston Courier.

Cheap, accurate, and elegant editions—very heartily prized.—Detroit Daily Advertiser.

JUVENAL, LITERALLY TRANSLATED.

The Satires of Juvenal, Persius, Sulpicia, and Lucilius, literally Translated into English Prose. With Notes, Chronological Tables, Arguments, &c. By the Rev. LEWIS EVANS, M.A., late Fellow of Waltham College, Oxford. To which is added the Metrical Version of Juvenal and Persius. By the late WILLIAM GIFFORD, Esq. Portrait. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

Juvenal forms the 20th Volume of

HARPER'S NEW CLASSICAL LIBRARY.

Literal Translations of CÆSAR. SALLUST.

VIRGIL. HERODOTUS.
HORACE. THUCYDIDES.
SALLUST. HERODOTUS.
CICERO'S ORATIONS. 2 vols. SOPHOCLES.
CICERO'S OFFICES, &c. ÆSCHYLUS.
TACITUS. 2 vols. EURIPIDES.
TERENCE. DEMOSTHENES. 2 vols.
JUVENAL, &c.

12mo, Muslin, 75 cents a Volume.

LIFE AND TIMES OF GEN. SAM. DALE, the Mississippi Partisan. By J. F. H. CLAIBORNE. Illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

LUCY CROFTON. A Novel. By the Author of "The Days of My Life," "The Laird of Norlaw," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

LIFE IN SPAIN: Past and Present. By WALTER THORNBURY, Author of "Every Man his own Trumpeter," "Art and Nature," "Songs of the Cavaliers and Roundheads." With Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

SELF-HELP. With Illustrations of Character and Conduct. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "The Life of George Stephenson." 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

MISREPRESENTATION. A Novel. By ANNA H. DRURY, Author of "Friends and Fortune," "Anthony," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE—COMPLETE.

FIRST SERIES.—From the Commencement of the French Revolution, in 1789, to the Restoration of the Bourbons, in 1815. 4 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $8 00; Sheep extra, $2 00; Half Calf, $10 00.

SECOND SERIES.—From the Fall of Napoleon, in 1815, to the Accession of Louis Napoleon, in 1852. 4 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $8 00; Sheep extra, $2 00; Half Calf, $10 00.

☞ The Work Complete in 8 vols., Muslin, $13 00; Sheep extra, $14 00; Half Calf, $20 00.

☞ The Volumes sold separately.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 300 miles), on receipt of the Money.

JUST PUBLISHED.

SOUTH & NORTH;

OR,

Impressions Received During a Trip to Cuba and the South.

BY

JOHN S. B. ABBOTT.

1 Vol. 12mo. 383 pages. . . . Price $1 00

CONTENTS.

I.—The Voyage. II.—Tropical Sea. III.—Cuba.—The Coolies. IV.—The Slave's Cabin and the Freedom's Cottage. V.—Geography, Social, Philosophical, and Political. VI.—The River, the Swamp, the Forest. VII.—Energy of Blacks, and Energy of Whites. VIII.—Insurrection; Its Menace and Prevention. IX.—The Remedy for Slavery. X.—Slavery and Social Science.—The Motive Power of Wages. XI.—The Impertinent Intermeddler of the North. XII.—Southern Agression; A Northern View. XIII.—Slavery, Its Philosophy and Its Fruits. XIV.—Conclusion of the Voice.

FOR SALE BY ALL BOOKSELLERS.

The Trade will find it for their interest to send their orders direct to ABBEY & ABBOTT,

Publishers, 119 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

A PICTORIAL PAPER for Farm and Family.—MOORE'S RURAL. Each of the past six numbers contains from 6 to 12 useful and beautiful Engravings. For specimens address

D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

IMPORTANT TO COUNTRY NEWS

AGENTS.—MOORE'S RURAL CONDENSER & PARTIALLY Wholesale Dealers in Newspapers, Magazines, Books, &c., are prepared to supply, at lowest rates, and at all the earliest moment, everything in their line of business. Their Advertising Circular and Price List will find that we are determined, by fair dealing, promptitude, and economy, to deserve their patronage.

Our trade lists will be mailed on application.

HAMILTON, GAY & COMPANY, 8 & 9 FAIRFIELD, Wholesale News Agents.

Buildings, Court Street, Boston.

W. J. SHARP'S BILLIARD TABLE

Manufactory, 148 Fulton Street, New York.

CANVASSING AGENTS WANTED

In every county of the South and West to sell some of the most popular books ever published. Apply at once to BILL & BROTHERS,

Louisville, Ky.

HARD TIMES NO MORE—Any Lady or

Gentleman in the United States possessing from $3 to $1 can realize as large and respectable business as that which from $5 to $10 per day can be realized. For particulars, address (with stamp)

W. R. ACTON & CO.,

41 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia.

TWO UNIQUEITES.—

A Medical publication which never advises medicine, A Publication entitled OUR HEALTH, $1 a year. And a Family Magazine, which excludes fiction, and is devoted to Science, Literature, and Practical Life, is THE FIRESIDE MONTHLY; $1 50 a year; or both for $2. Address Dr. W. W. HALL, No. 67 Irving Place, New York.

PERSONS afflicted with inflamed Eyelids, or commonly called Sore Eyes, can obtain immediate relief by using Dr. THOMPSON'S EYE WATER, which immediately completes a cure after a few applications.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.

SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $90.

HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $60 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, &c., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,

No. 458 Broadway, New York.

☞ EXCELSIOR" is the glorious Motto of MOORE'S RURAL, and the paper manifests it in Contents, Typography, and Typographical Execution. Only $2 a year. Specimens free to all applicants. Send your address to D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

THE FINE ARTS.

ART SCHEFFER & DELABOCHE'S WORKS ON PHOTOGRAPHY JUST RECEIVED.

GOUPIL & CO., M. KNOEDLER, Successor,

No. 772 Broadway, corner 9th Street, N. Y.

PHOTOGRAPHIC CAMERAS.

C. J. Fox's first-class American Cameras. 1-4 tube will take 2 1-2 by 2 1-2 inch size $50. Complete outfit and instructions $30. Enlarging sun cameras for life-size Photographs, Ambrotypes, &c. Circulars sent on stamp.

C. J. FOX, 691 Broadway, N. Y.

DICKENS—PICCOLOMINI—and Twenty-Seven Others.—Portraits of DICKENS, POLEON III.—EUGENIE. Either of these portraits, engraved on steel, will be sent with the

ILLUSTRATED NEWS OF THE WORLD,

for one month, on receipt of 10 cents. Any address, post-paid, on receipt of 15 cents, by HENRY A. BRUNS & CO., 13 Hanover Street, Boston. The seven portraits sent for $1 05.

SECRET ART OF CATCHING FISH as fast as you can pull them out, and no hooking. Sent for $5. Address, Professor HARRIS, E. B. Philadelphia.

Private Hair Dyeing Rooms, for ladies, at Batchelor and Brown's Hair Dyeing and Wig Establishment, 16 Bond Street, Private Entrance. Only one address, 16 Bond Street.

Send pre-paid by First Post, for 15 cents,

NEW ALMANAC, Rich, Handy, Instructive, for 1860. INVENTORS, PHRENOLOGICAL and WATER CURE. Sent for 15 cents, by FOWLER & WELLS, New York.

THE ORANGE BLOSSOM WEDDING EN-

VELOPE, just issued, very beautiful (copyright secured), at PUDNEY'S Wedding Card Depot, No. 302 Broadway, cor. Duane Street. Also, French PAPER.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

IN GUANO. This GUANO from JARVIS ISLAND, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale and retail at less than two-thirds the price of Peruvian Guano, and is warranted to be GENUINE. Send for Circular. American Guano Co., 66 William Street, New York.

To the Book Trade.

HARPER & BROTHERS' SPECIAL TRADE CIRCULAR FOR THE SPRING OF 1860, was issued February 20th, and may be obtained by Booksellers on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.

B. G. Wilder & Co., 251 Broadway.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 70 to 80 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

—THE Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE have the pleasure to announce that they have made arrangements with the Author, by which they secure to the pages, early Parts of THACKERAY'S New Novel, "Lovel the Widower." Of its Author's high position in England we need not say. The First Part appears in the present Number of the Magazine. The Tale will comprise about Eight Parts, one of which, with the original Illustrations, will be published in each succeeding Number.

The Publishers renew the assurances which they have so often made, that HARPER'S MAGAZINE will continue to maintain the sound conservative position which it has sustained. They do not underrate the importance of the questions at issue between the different sections and parties of the country. A work of Literature especially devoted to its advocacy and maintenance. The Publishers, of HARPER'S MAGAZINE deem it of profound importance that there should be a periodical which, leaving the discussion of these vexed questions to their own especial advocates and opponents, shall inculcate those principles and that spirit which are essential to the safe and patriotic relations of every section can heartily concur. Their Magazine will be, as heretofore, the organ of no party in politics or sect in religion; but a National work, devoted to the literature, the progress, and instruction from every quarter. The Contributors whose papers appear in its pages are numbered by every writer of the country have, of course, different personal opinions upon the exciting questions of the day. These opinions, however, are, or how they are expressed, beyond the pages of the Magazine, the Publishers cannot think it out of their province to inquire; but they will exercise the most watchful care that nothing shall find place in any department of the Magazine which shall render it an unwelcome visitor in any household.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year. $3 00
Two Copies for One Year. 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy to the Getter-up of Clubs of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

The postage on "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE DOLLARS A NEWSPER. $2 50 A YEAR.

The First Number of the Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY appeared on the 4th January, 1860. Last year 406,000 Copies of HARPER'S WEEKLY were sold, nearly half of which have been bound for reference. In commencing the new volume, the publishers desire to state that it has been their aim to render HARPER'S WEEKLY, in the best sense of the word, a NEWSPAPER. A NEWSPAPER—a pictorial history of current events, equal to the daily press in fulness of information, and superior to the daily press as combining illustrations with facts. How far they have attained this object the first three volumes now published will show. The Illustrations in the First Volume, which bear evidences to the world with which every important event of the past year has been recited and illustrated in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. They would refer especially, in this connection, to The Indian War, the Capture of Walker, the Progress of Harper's Ferry Outbreak, the Utah Expedition, the Paraguay Expedition, the Japan Embassy, &c., &c. The Weekly will be best realized by supposing that it did not exist, and by then taking up a number. It will be found very strange of passing events if they have not been so written descriptions shown. In this respect, no expense or labor in securing your are more than adequate. . . . . they have been. HARPER'S WEEKLY Artists and Correspondents in almost every quarter of the globe, and numbers of the principal events of the day will be illustrated, moreover, in order to present to the reader as large a variety of subject as possible, engravings in future to be pages the best and most interesting. In a word, the subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely upon receiving, week by week, an accurate, well-drawn, well-engraved, and well-printed history of every occurrence of interest, with the most attractive of every men who attracts the general attention of the world at this eventful time.

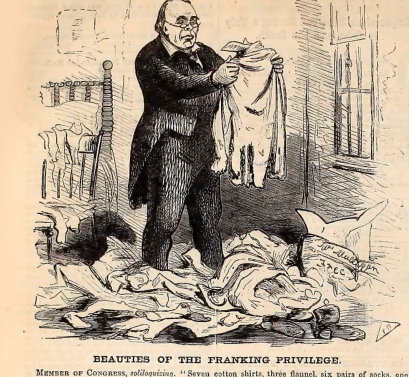
HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best tales and serial stories that can be procured from the first writers of fiction. It has already published A Tale of Two Cities, by CHARLES DICKENS, and The Woman in White, also drawn for HARPER'S WEEKLY; What will he do with it? by BULWER LYTTON (Author of "Pelham," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "The Caxtons," &c., &c.); Hide and Seek, by WILKIE COLLINS; Lois the Witch, by MRS. GASKELL; A Good Fight, by CHARLES GIBBON; Mad Love, by WILLIAM CHETTLE; it is now publishing The Uncommercial Traveller, by CHARLES DICKENS; Sir Brook Fossbrooke, by CHARLES LEVER; The Women in White, by WILKIE COLLINS; and Lovel the Widower, by W. M. THACKERAY; and Tom Brown at Oxford, by THOMAS HUGHES, Esq., both of which are illustrated by JOHN LEECH, Esq., and The Adventures of Philip, by ELLA ROBINSON, illustrated by WINSLOW HOMER, Esq. So far as letters can constitute a literature, either of equal merit will be encountered, it being the intention of the publishers to secure every work of undoubted excellence that is written here or abroad. It is hardly necessary to add, that the foreign serials which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased from their authors by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, in many instances, give for a mere right of priority what amounts to a handsome copyright to the author.

In addition to serials, each number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain a short complete tale or story, or fragment from an unfinished work by a celebrated author. In respect to these tales, as with the serials, the publishers will publish the best that they can obtain, without regarding their origin.

The other departments of HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue to receive careful attention at the hands of the publishers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for Thirty Weeks 1 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00



An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $4 00.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A LIBERAL DISCOUNT will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

BEAUTIES OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

MEMBER OF CONGRESS, soliloquizing. "Seven cotton shirts, three flannel, six pairs of socks, one collar, five pocket-handkerchiefs, three pair of drawers, two linen coats—that's all, I guess; and as the mail's just closing, that must do for to-day."

[Mails his clothes-bag under his frank, and has his linen cheaply washed at home in Wisconsin.]

DELIGHTS OF HOUSEKEEPING.

The JONESES are tired of hiring shiftless Irish servants, and Mrs. J. concludes a bargain with a tidy little German girl, who comes well recommended. Sensation in the bosom of JONES, when the tidy little German girl makes her first appearance at dinner-time.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

Have renewed their Stock of

China, Glass, &c.,

To No. 479 Broadway, New York,

(between Grand and Broome Sts.)

We invite the Public to examine the quality and styles of our goods, comparing the prices, which are

Low for Cash.

One Price—No Deviation.

Established in 1834.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,

Manufacturer of the Overstrung

GRAND & SQUARE PIANO-FORTES,

Manufactory and Warerooms

76 to 86

East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five Years, and Prices are moderate.

"This book of travels has never been surpassed, whether we consider it in reference to the interest of the narrative, the completeness of its facts, or the elegance of its style."

THOS. WITHE the Editor of the Southern Christian Advocate of Adventures and Observations

ON THE

West Coast of Africa and its Islands.

With Historical and Descriptive Sketches of the

MADEIRA, CANARY, BIAFRA, AND CAPE VERD ISLANDS;

Their Climates, Inhabitants, and Productions; Accounts of Places, Peoples, Customs, Trade, Missionary Operations, etc., etc.

BY REV. CHAS. W. THOMAS, M.A.,

MEMBER OF THE GEORGIA CONFERENCE; CHAPLAIN OF THE AMERICAN SQUADRON IN 1855, 1856, AND 1857.

With Illustrations from Original Drawings.

One large and handsome 12mo.

Price, $1 25.

☞ Single copies by mail on receipt of price.

DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers,

NEW YORK.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S

Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,

For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the normal habits of female life superinduce a variety of diseases which this Catholicon will counteract and cure. It can be relied upon in any case of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, Ulceration of the Womb, Sterility, Leucloche, &c. When every thing else has failed, this article is never taken without benefit. No suffering female should leave it untried. A pamphlet, with full symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered by any Agent. It is sold in every town, or sent by express. Be cautious of an imitation, &c. Address LAUNES & MARCHISI, No. 13 Park Row, N. Y.; J. D. PARK, Cincinnati; PARK, Chicago; WEEKS & POTTER, Boston; or CALLENDER & CO., Philad.

J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Utica, N. Y.

SENT BY EXPRESS EASY RATES.

WARD'S

PERFECT FITTING

SHIRTS!

INCLUDING SIX SPECIMEN SHIRTS, $15 per doz. or SIX for $8. Made of the best Linen Bosoms, Linen Wristbands, Linen Backs, Linen Fronts, Made with the Improved Neck-band to wear Open or Closed, Made in Seven Sizes, Sent to any part of the Country, Measure by Rule, Sent by Express, At Cash Prices.

$1.50 $2.00 $2.50 $3.00

TRY WARD'S SHIRTS!

P. S.—Those who think I cannot make a good Shirt for $15 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $15 fine shirts.

20 yards New-York Mills muslin at 14½c. per yd. $1 35
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard, ... 3 50
Making and cutting, ... 6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c. 1 50
Profit, ... 2 65

Total, ... $15 00

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE, $2 EACH, MADE TO MEASURE.

SELF MEASUREMENT FOR SHIRTS.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

The Express charges on one dozen Shirts from New York to New Orleans is only $1.

WARD, from London,

387 Broadway, up stairs,

Between White & Walker Streets, NEW-YORK.

Please copy my address as other houses in the city are selling inferior made shirts at my prices.

To SPORTSMEN and GENTLEMEN

of the

ARMY and NAVY.

Just Received

The Celebrated English

Telescopes,

4 inches long, by which a person may be clearly seen and known at 14 miles, and an object at 12 to 14 miles distant, and with an extra astronomical eye-piece, Jupiter's moons, Saturn's rings, and double stars are distinctly seen. This instrument combines 12 and 18 lenses and is the Greatest Glass

ever used in England by SPORTSMEN and GAME KEEPERS, and are adopted by the English government for the Coast Guard Service

on

Day and Night Glasses.

Also Waistcoat Pocket Double Glasser, weighing only 4 ounces, containing 12 lenses, will show any person at the distance of 24 miles with sufficient distinctness to know them.

Also a fine assortment of OPERA, FIELD, and CAMP GLASSES.

BRAZILIAN PEBBLE SPECTACLES, &c., &c. For sale at

SEMMONS & CO.,

No. 630 Broadway, under the Lafarge House.

NEW DIME BOOKS NOW READY.

No. 8. No. 9. No. 8.

BEADLE'S Dime Song-book. No. 8.

BEADLE'S Dime Letter-writer

BEADLE'S Dime Book of Dreams.

BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF ETIQUETTE.

A PART OF CONTENTS.

Entrance into Society, ... Forms of Introductions, On Dress and Ornaments, ... Laws of Home Etiquette, Balls, Evening-Parties, ... Entertainments, Receptions, Dinner-Parties, ... Etiquette of Horseback Riding Etiquette of the Street, ... Love, Courtship, Marriage, Observances for Visits, ... Cards of Invitation, Etc., Etc.

OTHER DIME BOOKS.

Beadle's Dime Speaker, Beadle's Dime Dialogues, Beadle's Dime Cook Book, Beadle's Dime Recipe Book, Beadle's Dime Melodist, music and words, Beadle's Dime Song Books, No's 1, 2, 3, and 4.

For sale by all book and news-dealers. By mail, postpaid, ten cents each; $1 per doz. Address

IRWIN P. BEADLE & CO., 121 William St., N. Y.

Female Agents Wanted.

At home or to travel, on Salary or Commission, for the "MAMMOTH FAMILY PICTORIAL," the largest Illustrated Family paper in the world, at Only ONE DOLLAR a year. Also for a Periodical of pure Morality and Common Sense, exclusively for the female sex, at only 50 cents a year.

"THE WOMAN'S FRIEND,"

$90 A WEEK is now made by Female Agents. For "Confidential Terms" to Agents, and a copy of both Papers, enclose a three cent stamp to MARIE LOUISE HANKINS & Co., 346 and 348 Broadway, New York City

Louisville Artesian Water.

S. T. THOMPSON, Agent,

632 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

United States Carbon Filter Company.

CARBON FILTERS of all sizes and descriptions, adapted to the Hydrant in Dwelling Houses, Factories, &c. Also, a great variety of Portable Self-Acting Filters, for Sportsmen, Travellers, Druggists, &c., &c.

164 Broadway, N. Y.

More Popular than ever! Its Sale Unprecedented!

LYON'S KATHAIRON

FOR THE HAIR

Is, beyond question, the Best and most popular article ever made. Nothing has ever given such universal satisfaction. It restores the Hair, preserves and beautifies it, and removes all Dandruff, &c. If you do not use it, try it. Sold everywhere for 75 cents per bottle.

Advice to Parents.

MEASLES, MUMPS, SCARLET FEVER, WHOOPING COUGH, SORE THROAT, CROUP, SMALLPOX, and other contagious diseases, are at present prevailing to an alarming extent throughout the U.S. DR. RADWAY'S REGULATING PILLS and RADWAY RELIEF we have a certain preventive against all; when attacked they are safe, and a speedy cure for those who are afflicted.

RADWAY'S REGULATING PILLS are purely vegetable; they are a substitute for calomel and mercury, are elegantly coated with gum, and will not offend the taste. One pill is sufficient for a child under ten years; their operation is prompt and pleasant; they never produce sickness, nor gripe. Do not fail to keep them on hand of sickness from either of the above-named maladies may be, if the premonitory symptoms of ringing down one of RADWAY'S PILLS fifteen minutes, the life of the patient will be saved. Be sure to hold that these pills arrest the progress of diseases before an evacuation from the bowels takes place, and to have them after a dose of RADWAY'S PILLS are taken, a pleasant and healthful evacuation follows.

RADWAY'S READY RELIEF should be given the sick child in water or weak tea—say six to ten drops—of the Relief to a table spoonful of tea, and the throat, neck, and chest of the patient bathed with the Ready Relief—if under ten years, dilute; otherwise with it clear. Let the hundreds of parents having sickness in their families make a trial of Radway's Pills and Ready Relief at once. Your sufferer will be restored to you with renewed health. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

RADWAY & CO., No. 87 John Street, New York.

Coleman's Eutaw House,

Baltimore.

This popular House has been thoroughly renovated, and opened by ROBERT B. COLEMAN, late of the Astor House and St. Nicholas Hotels, and offers superior accommodations to families and travellers.

Perry's Japanese Boot and Shoe Polish.

Splendid gloss. No rubbing. Soils nothing. Sold everywhere.

JAPANESE POLISH CO.,

No. 447 Broome Street, one door west of Broadway.

Attractive NEW BOOKS.

WOMAN (La Femme). By Michelet. $1 00
LOVE (L'Amour). By Michelet. 1 00
THE HAUNTS OF GOOD SOCIETY 1 75
THE GREAT TRIBULATION. 2 vols. 2 50

* Sold by all booksellers, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by FIELD & CARLETON, Publishers, 130 Grand Street, New York.

!! SOMETHING NEW !!

A HEMMER, TUCKER, FELLER, BINDER, and GUAGER COMBINED, just patented, simple, beautiful and with and thickness of cloth either side, applied to any Sewing Machine by any one in a few minutes. Retail price $5. LIBERAL DISCOUNT TO THE TRADE. Orders by mail supplied (with complete instructions), postage paid. Send for a circular.

UNIVERSAL HEMMER CO., 429 BROADWAY, N. Y.

A Beautiful Picture.

The engravings from the new plate of PEALE'S COURT OF DEATH are alluded to in the following terms, by a distinguished clergyman, in a letter to the publisher:

"But to my agreeable surprise, it proved to be from an entirely new plate, and in point of artistic finish, surpassing the first, almost as much as a copper-plate engraving does a common wood-cut. The delicacy and richness of the coloring—the fineness of the lines, recalling the soft shading of the successful; the perspective and beauty and life-like expression without of the features of the different personages, with the evident hand displayed in the whole, remitted at once the original, and I found myself riveted in admiration before it. If you not in a frame, nor under glass, but the execution appeared artist-like."

Mr. Peale certifies: "It is an accurate and admirable copy of the original painting." Size 22 by 31 inches.

For one copy $1, and 13 cents for postage; or six copies for $5, without postage. Troy will be sent by mail, rolled in a strong case. Write the Name, Town, and State plainly. Address G. GILTON,

P. O. Box 3391. No. 37 Park Row, New York.

4 Powerful Microscopes of different powers sent by mail for $1 60. Same to California $1 50.

"It magnifies more than Gold Beaters' Skin, Brannan, little and effective microscope."—Gallaher's Pictorial.

"A wonderful magnifier for 25 cents."—Sunday Ledger.

UNDERWOOD, 174 Hanover Street, Boston.

Barney's Opera Perfume.

DEDICATED TO MLLE. ADELINA PATTI.

A new and elegant Perfume, combining the most delightful and exquisite odors; as truly fascinating as the beautiful photographic likeness which adorns each bottle. More than 3000 bottles were sold in a few days while this favorite artist was in Boston.

Sold wholesale by J. W. NOBLOSS & Co., No. 91 Fulton Street.

Retailed by all Druggists and Fancy Good Dealers.

Quern's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly

The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, in taken without nausea.

Also,

Quern's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil—The greasy sensation of the oil is obviated, and it does not cause any constipation after use. The best purgative for children. To be had at the Inventor's Office, No. 125 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. ROSEFOLD, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 19 Beekman Street.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IV.—No. 168.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 17, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

ANOTHER NEW SERIAL.

We shall shortly commence a new serial Tale of American Life by an eminent native author. This tale will be illustrated.

We continue in this number our other serials, to wit:

1. THE WOMAN IN WHITE, by WILKIE COLLINS, with MCLENAN'S illustrations—commenced in No. 152.

2. THE NEW PARTNER IN CLINGHAM & CO., an exquisite Story of American Life, by FITZ HUGH LUDLOW, illustrated by MCLENAN—commenced in No. 159.

3. THE MISTRESS OF THE PARSONAGE, by ELLA RODMAN—another charming Tale of Country Life in the United States—with HOMER'S illustrations—commenced in No. 164.

On or before the conclusion of these tales, others of equal merit will be commenced, it being the intention of the publishers to secure every work of undoubted excellence that is written here or abroad. The foreign serials which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased from their authors by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, who, in many instances, give for a mere right of priority what amounts to a handsome copyright to the author.

We can furnish back numbers on receipt of the money.

HON. JOHN WENTWORTH, MAYOR ELECT OF CHICAGO.

HON. JOHN WENTWORTH, OF CHICAGO.

We publish herewith a portrait of the Hon. John Wentworth, who was elected Mayor of Chicago on Tuesday last. Mr. Wentworth has many friends, and perhaps a few political enemies, who will be glad to see his bold face.

He was born forty-five years ago, in the town of Sandwich, in the State of New Hampshire, of poor parents. His family are of English origin, and claim descent from a noble family in the old country. While quite a lad he taught school for his support, and earned money enough to pay his expenses at Dartmouth College. At the close of his collegiate career he removed to the West, and settled at Chicago as a student of law. On his admission to the bar he speedily obtained some practice, and his courage and energy attracted attention. He shortly afterward connected himself with the press, and made himself known as a powerful writer. Embarking in politics, he was elected a representative to Congress in the year 1843, and sat twelve years in that body, winning respect from his fellow-members. On his return home he was elected Mayor of Chicago—an office to which he has just been re-elected, after a contest of unexampled bitterness. He was the candidate of the Republican and anti-Douglas party.

TERRIBLE ACCIDENT AT CINCINNATI.

We engrave herewith, from a sketch by Mr. E. Fraser, the shocking accident which occurred at Cincinnati on 1st inst. A Cincinnati paper thus describes the sad event:

"About half past eight o'clock this morning a wall of St. Xavier Church, on Sycamore Street, between Sixth and Seventh Streets, now being demolished, suddenly fell, crushing beneath its weight a large number of the laborers, and killing many outright. The disaster occurred on the west side of Sycamore, north of Sixth. The St. Xavier Church was the oldest Roman Catholic Church in the city. It was originally a frame building, located some distance from the street. A brick addition was built in front of the old frame, and in the course of time the original building was demolished, and its place supplied by a brick addition to the newer part. The whole is now being torn down to give place to an entire new Church. The Church formerly belonged to and was the re-blessed of Bishop Purcell, but he dropped out of a number of years ago to the Jesuits, whose property, with the College adjoining it, it now is. The congregation is almost exclusively Irish, and partakes largely of the laboring classes resident in the Thirteenth Ward.

FRIGHTFUL ACCIDENT AT THE ST. XAVIER CHURCH AT CINCINNATI, MARCH 1, 1860.—[FROM A SKETCH BY MR. E. FRASER.]

"The society determined not to give out the demolition of the old building by contract, the object being to give employment, so far as possible, to members of the congregation. Mr. Peter Ryan, a very worthy man, was engaged to superintend the work, and had charge of all the men employed. The demand for work was very great, as much so as to prove a great annoyance to Mr. Ryan. All who had contributed to the new Church confounded they must be employed.

"The roof was stripped from the building last week, and this week the laborers were engaged destroying the walls. The very dangerous plan was adopted of undermining a portion of the wall at the time, and letting it fall into the inferior. The front portion of the north wall, that portion which throws down yesterday, sixty-two men then being in the employ of Mr. Ryan. This morning it was deemed prudent to reduce the force, and a number of laborers were reduced to thirty-five.

"Those who were retained were, of course, much reduced at the fact, and went to work with unusual energy.

"Mr. Ryan ordered fifteen men to the rear portion of the north wall, for the purpose of undermining and throwing it down. The balance of the force was disposed of in other parts of the building, some being at work on the top of the south wall. The fifteen went to work with their picks just above the foundation, digging out the lower inside row of bricks. The wall was about twenty feet high, a foot in thickness, and thirty feet long. It seems that the rain of yesterday had affected the foundation somewhat, and as soon as it was loosened a little the wall gave way, and suddenly and unexpectedly fell in.

"The workmen engaged at it dropped their tools immediately, and endeavored to escape. Only one, named Mormon, succeeded. He had been working on the south side, and had just passed to the interior, through an aperture in the inner south wall, when he heard the crash behind him. He looked up and saw it falling toward him. In a moment he darted through the aperture, and barely escaped being injured at work at the wall.

"His fellow-workmen were not so fortunate. None of them saw outwardly, hoping to escape the falling bricks. The wall caught them, however, and they were crushed down all in a heap. The rest ran northwardly, and not the same fate.

"It was some minutes before the dust cleared away sufficiently to view the surviving workmen, and those attracted by the crash, to remove the ruins in search of the victims. Mayor Wood, the Superintendent, and a street at the time of the accident, and as soon as he could be got to work at work at the ruins.

"While the search was being prosecuted women ran through the crowd, screaming and inquiring for their husbands. As soon as they knew them one was not there to recognize it. Wives threw themselves, screaming, upon the mangled and bloody forms of husbands who an hour before had left them in the bloom of health. And in their frenzy they would embrace and kiss the crushed heads of those so dear to them. The peculiar trailing of the hair, therefore was terribly revolting.

"And then came children, presenting the most touching scene of all. A little boy, going to school, heard of the accident.

"Not knowing that his father was at work there, he came over to gratify his curiosity. While standing and looking on, he saw the body of his father taken from the ruins, and almost recognizing it, threw away his books, and, with a shriek, threw himself upon the mangled remains. The scene caused a cessation in the labor of recovery, for tears were few who witnessed it but had to have to wipe away the tears of sympathy that flowed for that aggonized little heart.

"At another place, a girl ten or twelve years old sat beside the body of her father, screaming and moaning mournfully. She would lavish kisses upon the cold hand that had been her protector, but cast he so no longer.

"There are a list of the killed and injured. It is correct and full, with the exception of the names of two, taken at an early hour by exhibitors:

"Stephen Gischlin—fatally injured. He has a family.

"Martin Maughen—dead. He resided on Sixth Street, near Culvert, and leaves a large family.

"John Kelly—dead. When taken out of the ruins life pulse was beating, but it soon ceased. He also leaves a family. He lived in the Sixth Ward.

"Timothy Sullivan—dead. He was an elderly man, having children married. He leaves a wife and several small children. He lived in the neighborhood of the church.

"Timothy Shay—dead. He leaves a wife and a small family of children. He lived in the Thirteenth Ward.

"Patrick Gallagher—dead. He lived in the Fifth Ward, and was a man of family.

"James Kelly—dead. He was a single man, recently from Devon county. He came to the city to pursue studies, and has taken a situation as laborer there to aid him in that purpose.

"John Russell—dead. He lived in the Thirteenth Ward, and was a single and too children.

"Daniel Brady—dead. He resided on Sixth Street Hill, and leaves a family.

"Thomas Shiras—dead. Leaves a family; resided on Sixth Street Hill.

"John Duffy—dead. He leaves a family, who, up to eleven o'clock, had not heard of his death. He resided somewhere on Second Street.

"Richard Fitzgerald—dead. He was a widower, and leaves three young children to mourn his loss.

"These make eleven dead, and one fatally injured, which, with the two carried away by relatives, and the one who had such a narrow escape, accounts for the fifteen that were engaged about the wall. The deaths by the calamity number fourteen."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17, 1860.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

THE time for the assembling of the national conventions is fast approaching, and, as usual, the friends of the various possible candidates for the Presidency are busily engaged in presenting them in the most favorable light before the public eye. The leading daily papers are full of biographical sketches and personal appeals. If the nominating conventions make a bad choice, it will not be for want of information.

On the Democratic side the leading candidate for the nomination is Senator Douglas, of Illinois. We have published two portraits of Senator Douglas,* and have given a very full account of his life and public services; it will suffice here to say that he is the first choice of the entire Northern Democracy, but is opposed by those Southern Democrats who claim that the Constitution carries slavery with it, and that no Territory can make a law to exclude the institution. In Louisiana, Georgia, and some other Southern States, however, there is a Douglas party of some strength.

Next to Senator Douglas, on the Democratic side, come President Buchanan, Vice-President Breckinridge, Senator Lane, Senator Hunter, Senator Davis, ex-Governor Pierce, Mr. Guthrie, and a number of others. Of these ex-President Pierce may be ruled out without difficulty. Mr. Buchanan is, for obvious reasons, not very favorably regarded by the North, except the nomination. Senator Davis, as a representative of the fire-eating section of the South, though a man of marked ability (we published his portrait and biography in No. 54), may perhaps be ruled out on the ground that his views would not be palatable at the North. Senator Hunter (whose portrait we published last week) is a very able man, and has been for many years Chairman of the most important Committee of the Senate. The recent proceedings of Governor Wise in reference to the John Brown affair appear to have strengthened Mr. Hunter very considerably in Virginia. Still he is not a man about whom any enthusiasm would be excited; and though in ordinary times he would be an unexceptionable candidate, and, if elected, a very able chief magistrate, it is possible that the Democracy may prefer a champion with more personal popularity. Governor Wise probably has the merit of having discharged the duties of Secretary of the Treasury in an admirable manner; he has proved himself a great man of business, a safe financier, and not chimerical to violent animosity from any side. He has the advantages of coming from a border State, and one which has been true to the Democratic nomination by the Republicans, might possibly be a doubtful one. Between him and Mr. Breckinridge the contest may be close. The latter is a man of great ability. He comes of a famous and distinguished family. He is young, and might be presented before the public in what the old Romans would call the toga. He has no enemies. His Frankfort speech, which was intended for Southern consumption, is his only vulnerable point. Lane, the Senator of all, is Senator Jo Lane, of Oregon. Senator Lane is an old soldier of the Mexican war —a man, it is said, of great decision of character, resolute and self-reliant. He is understood to be the second choice of the all extreme Southern men; Mr. Jefferson Davis is said to be especially very strong in his favor.

Passing to the candidates of the Republican party, Senator William H. Seward stands forth in prominent relief as the legitimate chief of the anti-slavery faction. He is the head of the Republican party; and if no considerations of policy or availability were permitted to interfere with the nomination, he would be in a matter of course. It appears doubtful, however, whether he could carry Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Illinois; and hence many minor Republicans are looking elsewhere for a more available man.

The principal Republican organ in this city has pronounced Mr. Edward Bates, of St. Louis, a Fillmore Whig, whose recent convictions are said to lean to the Republican side. Mr. Bates has never published any statement of his political belief which justifies these assertions on his behalf; he has always acted as an opponent of the Republicans. Still, Mr. Greeley and others believe in him, and his nomination rests chiefly on the prospect of his uniting the various elements of the Opposition to the Democracy—will be warmly urged on Chief Justice Chase, the newly-elected Senator from Ohio, has many friends. Mr. Chase is a man of great courage, learning, and eloquence; his nomination would be popular in the Northwest. He is a thorough, out-and-out Republican, and could hardly expect to conciliate doubtful constituencies. Governor Seward, of Michigan, will have friends at Chicago. He is an eminently available man; self-made, and, like many self-made men, of considerable force of character, but by no means a brilliant leader. Governor Wise, in reference to the John Brown affair appears to have strengthened Mr. Hunter very considerably in Virginia. Still he is not a man about whom any enthusiasm would be excited; and though in ordinary times he would be an unexceptionable candidate, and, if elected, a very able chief magistrate, it is possible that the Democracy may prefer a champion with more personal popularity. Governor Wise probably has the merit of having discharged the duties of Secretary of the Treasury in an admirable manner; he has proved himself a great man of business, a safe financier, and not chimerical to violent animosity from any side. He has the advantages of coming from a border State, and one which has been true to the Democratic nomination by the Republicans, might possibly be a doubtful one. Between him and Mr. Breckinridge the contest may be close. The latter is a man of great ability. He comes of a famous and distinguished family. He is young, and might be presented before the public in what the old Romans would call the toga. He has no enemies. His Frankfort speech, which was intended for Southern consumption, is his only vulnerable point. Lane, the Senator of all, is Senator Jo Lane, of Oregon. Senator Lane is an old soldier of the Mexican war —a man, it is said, of great decision of character, resolute and self-reliant. He is understood to be the second choice of all the extreme Southern men; Mr. Jefferson Davis is said to be especially very strong in his favor.

Passing to the candidates of the Republican party, Senator William H. Seward stands forth in prominent relief as the legitimate chief of the anti-slavery faction. He is the head of the Republican party; and if no considerations of policy or availability were permitted to interfere with the nomination, he would be in a matter of course. It appears doubtful, however, whether he could carry Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Illinois; and hence many minor Republicans are looking elsewhere for a more available man.

The principal Republican organ in this city has pronounced Mr. Edward Bates, of St. Louis, a Fillmore Whig, whose recent convictions are said to lean to the Republican side. Mr. Bates has never published any statement of his political belief which justifies these assertions on his behalf; he has always acted as an opponent of the Republicans. Still, Mr. Greeley and others believe in him, and his nomination rests chiefly on the prospect of his uniting the various elements of the Opposition to the Democracy—will be warmly urged on Chief Justice Chase, the newly-elected Senator from Ohio, has many friends. Mr. Chase is a man of great courage, learning, and eloquence; his nomination would be popular in the Northwest. He is a thorough, out-and-out Republican, and could hardly expect to conciliate doubtful constituencies. Governor Seward, of Michigan, will have friends at Chicago. He is an eminently available man; self-made, and, like many self-made men, of considerable force of character, but by no means a brilliant leader. Governor Wise, in reference to the John Brown affair appears to have strengthened Mr. Hunter very considerably in Virginia. Still he is not a man about whom any enthusiasm would be excited; and though in ordinary times he would be an unexceptionable candidate, and, if elected, a very able chief magistrate, it is possible that the Democracy may prefer a champion with more personal popularity. Governor Wise probably has the merit of having discharged the duties of Secretary of the Treasury in an admirable manner; he has proved himself a great man of business, a safe financier, and not chimerical to violent animosity from any side. He has the advantages of coming from a border State, and one which has been true to the Democratic nomination by the Republicans, might possibly be a doubtful one. Between him and Mr. Breckinridge the contest may be close. The latter is a man of great ability. He comes of a famous and distinguished family. He is young, and might be presented before the public in what the old Romans would call the toga. He has no enemies. His Frankfort speech, which was intended for Southern consumption, is his only vulnerable point. Lane, the Senator of all, is Senator Jo Lane, of Oregon. Senator Lane is an old soldier of the Mexican war —a man, it is said, of great decision of character, resolute and self-reliant. He is understood to be the second choice of all the extreme Southern men; Mr. Jefferson Davis is said to be especially very strong in his favor.

* See Nos. 93 and 104.

PROGRESS OF JOURNALISM.

A NEW daily newspaper is announced on the basis of not giving the news. We are assured that it will be a perfectly safe and reliable paper, enjoying intimate connections with persons of the highest respectability; but the chief claim which it makes to public favor rests, as we said, on its promises not to give the news which might conflict with the views of its founders. It is intended for the perusal of a choice and select circle, who may rely on never finding any thing in its columns that shall irritate or annoy them. The world may wag as it pleases; vice may exist, and may escape or be punished; heterodox opinions may be uttered in virtuous journals, and may prevail or be crushed out; but the new daily paper will take no cognizance of any thing but the progress and development of its own special doctrines.

This is no new experiment. In the days of Mrs. Partington, I long memory, likewise of General Jackson, there were journals published on precisely the basis on which the new daily proposes to plant itself. Those journals were called political party organs. They were published for the edification, instruction, and fortification of the faithful; and were cautious never to admit to their columns a single word that might tell against the party of which they were champions. Unhappily, a day came when reckless and unprincipled followers began to publish such newspapers, but they ran the news without regard to party, sect, opinion, prejudice, or bias; and the pig-headed public subscribed to these independent sheets, and left the old party organs to die out. We trust this may not prove the fate of the new daily.

There are in London, rather more daily journals in New York, with 800,000 inhabitants, than there are in London, with 2,500,000; but what matters that? Are we not a great people, and despotism dead, after all, even in view of the talent and experience and energy and skill and nothy which are devoted by the Herald, Tribune, Times, and other papers to the collection of news, who can say that a paper which openly announces its intention of avoiding the beaten path, and of leaving out Sunday, and dispensing with all this energy and experience, shall not succeed as a novelty? So many daily papers have tried to command success by the old methods of getting the news, that it is really an open question whether the founders of the new paper are not displaying their wisdom by announcing their intention of not giving the news. True, it will cost the owners about three hundred thousand dollars all told to get a foot-hold; but what are three hundred thousand dollars in the eyes of a man who pays five or six per cent upon of consecutive losses the new paper may, perhaps, sustain itself; there may then be a race for news it want a paper without the news; and then the new daily will flourish.

We shall rejoice to see the experiment tried. A neighbor—Mr. Stephen Smith—has started an excellent paper, the Spirit of the Press, on the plan of the Paris Gaîgnani, and many friends think he has rather a better prospect of success than the new daily, for he not only gives all the news, but comments from all the leading papers besides. Still, we should like to see the new daily started. The abstraction of capital is one of the best signs of civilization; and the expenditure of two or three hundred thousand dollars in an attempt to publish a daily paper without the news will be an auspicious event.

THE LOUNGER.

AUTHORS UPON AUTHORS.

WHAT are authors to do about speaking of each other in print? Of course they view the vast enormous authors are also editors, the occasion must often arise for them to speak of the works of others, and shall they be silent? Or may they sometimes, if they keep silent, or say what they do not think, or what they do?

Lamartine has lately answered the question for himself, by a notice of Thiers' Consulate and Empire, in which, according to the report, he speaks "of all the vulgarity of Thiers' style and taste, his superficiality, and his love of grandiose and false." Assuming that such was Lamartine's real opinion of the author, as critic of another, ought to say what he thinks. The interesting question, of course, is how would such free words, however honest, publicly speaking, affect the private intercourse of the reviewer and reviewed?

Suppose upon the day on which this little expression of opinion appeared Lamartine and Thiers had been asked to the same dinner, would they have met cordially? If they had parted the night before warm friends, would there be any perceptible coolness in their greeting? Why should there be? Is it in literature as in sporting circles, Love me, love my dog? Must Lamartine like Thiers' books because he loves Thiers? Must he also swear that Thiers is a man of perfect taste, that he knows all about pictures, and statues, and wines? Does friendship require that he should pledge his honor that Thiers is six feet four inches high, that he knows more than any body that ever lived, and that he is as good as he is great, and has just the pounds of the Apollo Belvedere?

Why not? Do you say that friendship does not require him to say these things because they are palpably untrue? But that is no answer, because an untruth is an untruth whether palpable or not. Every body can see that if Lamartine declares Thiers to be seven feet high that he is saying what is not true. But if Lamartine knows that Thiers has not a twilight taste, when he thinks he has; that he is telling just as great an untruth, although without any one's knowing it, apparently, friendship no more requires a man to tell one kind of untruth than another. Friendship, indeed, may tell him. It often does. It is notorious that Jones positively believes Jenkins to be a great epic poet simply because Jenkins writes rhymes and Jones loves him.

Then, also, friendship may hold a man's tongue. It generally does. Brown knows perfectly well that Black's huge picture is a huge daub, but in his notices of the Exhibition he says nothing about it. And if Black has not lost the power to ask him why, Brown will tell Black what he thinks of the picture, but he will not tell the public.

So it is tolerably clear that Lamartine is not a very warm personal friend of Thiers. For he would either not speak of the work, or he would speak of it to some of the public. It altogether fits the case if he would censure as delicately as he could; while he praised, for the same reason, with the greatest warmth. Friendship is founded, not upon what we do, but upon what we are.

CARELESSNESS AND CRIME.

THE verdict in the Pemberton Mill case suggests the inquiry, When does carelessness become crime, and therefore amenable to law?

If a man let fall from a window into a crowd and kills some one, it seems to be clear enough that he is guilty of some punishable offense. But the plea that he meant no harm; for common sense instantly replies, "If what you say be true you are a lunatic, and must be treated accordingly." But if you have your wits, you know it is impossible to fire a gun into a crowd without injury to some one. The intention of injury, or insanity, must therefore be assumed, and you must suffer accordingly."

The verdict in the Lawrence case declares that the building fell from the insufficiency of the two pillars, and that Mr. Bigelow ought to have tested them so thoroughly as to have known that they were defective. On him the responsibility, therefore, falls upon him. And yet it may be a case of ignorance as well as of carelessness. You, indeed, only pronounce the question one step further: for a man who is ignorant of the matter undertakes to erect a house which fall in consequence of that ignorance, and buries the inmates, his very ignorance becomes criminal, does it not? Suppose a person is taken ill, and a neighbor says that he knows all about it, and gives poisons—through sheer ignorance—which prove fatal, ought he to suffer only public contempt?

Probably yes. For it is not a case in which malice can be presumed. Neither can you presume it in the Pemberton Mill case. But a terrible punishment will follow. Besides the difficulty of farther employment in his profession, such an unfortunate is necessarily always accompanied by the terrible consciousness of a tragedy to which he owed such fatal accessory.

But because the building that fell chanced to be a mill it is simply absurd to speak of the catastrophe as if it were a sin of exceptional blackness. Not to say that capital is too wise to desire or to conceive at a total loss of property, it is enough to observe that the buildings which are erected for all our mills nor other structures full of people, but stores and warehouses. The defect is not so much—so far as property is the moral extent of capital as in the ignorance or carelessness of mechanics. If bloated capital insists upon having the mills watered, and the sugar sanded, and human misery generously built, it would be powerless unless labor helped in and fulfilled the bargain. Every workman knows whether he is doing honest work; and if he is not, he can not shuffle off the responsibility upon the boss or the proprietor. If he and all the rest refused to do dishonest work it could not be done. If it be done, he and all the rest at least share the guilt with the proprietor.

If therefore the Pemberton Mill was insecurely built, it is the fault of all who helped build it, unless they were deceived or ignorant. Every bricklayer, for instance, of intelligence and experience, knows about how thick the wall of a certain house should be. If he quietly help erect a wall only half thick enough, he knows that he is imperiling the property of all who are to work in the mill. The contractor is, of course, officially responsible. But each individual workman is equally so. It certainly would be very unfair to hang Mr. Bigelow or Mr. Fuller because the Pemberton Mill fell. But it is not likely that any one will ever again employ the one to cast columns or the other to erect mills.

THE INQUISITION.

THE difference between what people really are, and what they are supposed and represented to be, is an edifying study. And so with parties. The story of the five hundred cats is still a good satiric commentary upon this. How furiously we write, and talk, and preach about matters of which we know nothing except by rumor and the report of those who are quite as likely to be wrong as right in their comprehension of the point. There are whole classes of people traditionally denounced. Every monster of a party, or race, or sect, or class is held responsible for all the sins of all the other members. One would think there were an absolete free-masonry in opinion—whereas the truth is that no two people in the world either think precisely alike, or express their faith by exactly the same formula.

Thus it does not follow that we ought to suppose a man to be a bad and immoral man because his political philosophy seems to us false and dangerous. Probably ours seems equally so to him. We think his views, if carried out into practice, would produce anarchy; so we call him incendiary, and disapprove—we cut him in the street, and thank God we are not as other men are. Now the ludicrous point it, that he does precisely the same thing to us. He thinks our views are dangerous and false, and destructive to society if carried out. He denounces us as incendiary and infidel, and cuts us, and won't have us to dinner.

What, then, becomes of society if honest difference of opinion is to be the signal for such violent and injurious conduct? For suppose that there be an absolutely true political philosophy—an absolutely correct view of any institution or law—is yours or mine the true philosophy, the correct view? You believe with all your heart in yours. Yes: so do I in mine. Now is there any common standard by which the question between us may be tried and determined? Suppose there be such a standard, shall I take your interpretation of it, or will you take mine? And if you decline to take mine, and hold by your own, shall I call you bad names, and carry the world against you? And shall you do the same toward me?

The case is clear enough. In the first place, don't suppose that you know what a man thinks or even says, until you have heard him, or read his authorized statement. And, secondly, don't read as you have no reason to suppose him to be dishonest, remember that he is not a worse man than you merely because he holds a different view of any subject of thought whatsoever. If we are to suppose that men are bad men because they do not agree with us, we found our philosophy of life upon the Inquisition. In fact, any man, any where, who endeavors to fix a stigma upon another, else for a difference of belief, however dangerous he may consider that belief to be, is a little Torquemada, is a Grand Inquisitor in the extent which public opinion, not his own private hatred, allows. If he can excite others, either as a mob or a committee, to injure the person or reputation of the offender, he helps truth and honesty. God just as much as the Spanish Inquisition did, and no more. Of course, under the domination of such a spirit all truth is obscured, all inquiry is paralyzed, and the progress of individual liberty stops.

To the question whether, if a majority honestly consider a certain opinion radically wrong, and its consequences socially dangerous, they may not justly restrain its expression, the answer is instant—No: because they can not be sure that their opinion is right. They are no more sure of it than the remnant of his. And, if it were possible to ensure that they had this absolute certainty, then, instead of repressing discussion, they would earnestly invite it that the doubters might be converted to their all error overthrown. For the debate the moment you try to gag an opponent every spectator is at once convinced that you are afraid that if he spoke he would have the better of the argument. Their minds, therefore, remain undecided until he does speak, and all their sympathies are enlisted for him.

It is in this sense that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church. Persecution is a suicidal plan. It prepares the material and it becomes the tenderest roollet and to fructify the smallest seed of the truth. And it is in no trust of more important of thought as it is of religious discussion. Kill a man for saying any thing whatsoever, or for holding any opinion, and every drop of his blood springs up a harvest of supporters. Let a man talk, and if his views are only wind they will blow themselves away. If they are more than wind, the world has a right to them—the world wants them, and if you try to stop his mouth—why you only invite him, when the world has come over to his side, to stop yours.

For not only is the blood of the martyrs the seed of the church, but whatever takes the sword takes also the risk of perishing by it.

"UNTER DEN LINDEN."

UNDER the spreading Linden tree
We sat in the twilight still,
While the slim brave shadows glided on Stealthily up the hill.
Only, we sat the stately hall that rose
In its turreted pride near by;
And she named them—and I envied him not,
For, a happier man was I.

Ah! happy, I true, was I, as I sat
Under the Linden tree;
For a golden head lay close to my heart
As I held my love to me.

Under the Linden tree I sit
To-night in the darkness still,
And the slim brown shadows have glided on Silently up the hill.
Oh, grand does the stately mansion stand,
In its turreted pride near by;
And the master there—oh, I envy him not,
Though a sorrowful man am I,
For his gold has stolen the tickle heart
That plighted its faith to me,
And alone with a memory and I sit,
Under the Linden tree.

EDGAR POE AND HIS CRITICS.

In reading the exquisitely tender, subtle, symmetrical, but profoundly appreciative sketch of Edgar Poe, which has been just issued under this title, it is impossible not to remember the brave woman's arm thrust through the slide to serve as a bolt against the enemy. The praise and the blame which have been cast upon the life and genius of Poe have been almost fierce and frantic. By how many is he not still regarded as a heartless, unprincipled, ruthless vagabond? By how many is he not sternly worshiped and openly extolled as our only great, original poet? And this, at least, is true, that he has exercised more direct influence upon the form of our poetry than any of his contemporaries.

The author of this little book (it has only eighty pages), with an inexpressible grace, reserve, and tender, heroic charity—having a right which no other person has to speak, tells, in a simple, transparent, and quiet strain, what she thinks of his career and genius. She omits nothing that is worthy of mention. It is no special Prince of fairy she delineates; but a fellow-man of ours, greatly gifted, greatly erring; often from his own faults—often falling in the dark ways where we all stumble, but still looking for light—not a model man, by any means, but one from kind and intelligent hands he has been so often represented. the delicate reticences of the book—in its tone toward music, as if the temptation to speak of the mystery of the song she sings—there is a pensive and peculiar charm. But it is not a eulogy. It is a criticism which is profound in the power of sympathy, and vigorous by its clear comprehension. Thus, we shall hardly have a finer statement of Poe's intellectual and moral position than "Wanting in that supreme central force or faculty of the mind whose function is a God-conscious and God-reverencing faith, he was yet endowed with extraordinarily for such solution of the great problems of thought as were almost attainable by the mind buried from its infancy by the abnormal preponderance of the subjective and imaginative faculties. It was this very disproportion which rendered it impossible for some of those marvelous intellectual creations which, as we shall hope to prove, had an important significance, to be otherwise than morbid in the tone."

It was Poe's intricate and misfortune to wage war upon the false-others. In a series of papers upon the "Literati" he seems like a frenzied East Indian running amuck through the quiet, unoffending crease in hand. But those of us who belong to an epoch just after his—who were not grabbed at or even assailed—can afford to hurled from personal prejudices to appraise, and only that charity in our hearts which contained genius and weakness and error must always be remembered—as of the last decade must needs turn these pages with a singular interest and sadness; not without a secret prayer, perhaps, that his life may be fully recorded, and the stains we have left upon so many pages of our books, and our lives are pointed out to public contempt, may be effaced from and gentle as this may pull away the briers to plant rosemary where we lie.

NAHLOTYPES.

AN "Engraver on Wood," D. V. V., writes to the Lounger from Buffalo, enclosing a specimen of work similar to Mr. Ehninger's "photographic etching," which were executed two or three years since, by a process then in common use by Mr. Arthur Nahl. The result is very delicate, and pretty, and forcible; precisely how it differs from Ehninger's process the Lounger is unable to say. His correspondent writes:

"If you will take the trouble, with a strong magnifier, to carefully examine one of the cuts I enclose you, and you will see that there could be no improvement as regards superficial finish of working out; for the lines are exceedingly fine, perfectly opaque, and adhere to the glass so firmly, that the finest cross-hatching can be made, and still perfectly clear. There is also an advantage of their present ground in that it is white, so that the lines have their full effect unbroken as to sharpness. As before stated, it can be put into the relief-engravers and linked at the same time, and there never is no cracking, nor peeling up of the ground, so that finer work can be executed on it than you generally see in the finest steel engravings."

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

C. H. M., Fort Wayne.—Your letter is the author of whom you speak. He exhibited all the celebrated modesty of authors under such circumstances. He said that he was "glad you were very kind;" and he was "glad if any of my poor," etc. Altogether he thanks you the exercise Lounger will do you very glibly, and hopes (with all the celebrated modesty of authors) that he may some day be permitted to meet you more in the place and under the circumstances you suggest.

—Perhaps claims that the postmaster ought to be as much favored by the public as the editor or newspaper as a clergyman or schoolmaster, saying that the postmaster "makes" the magazine. The reason of this preference we plain enough. Clergymen and schoolmasters are both accepted literary judges in their communities; that they are supposed to correct their sentences upon the reading neighbors; and, third, they are both unsalaried. For these reasons the Lounger thinks that postmasters are, as a class, accepted literary judges, or exercise a literary influence, or are unsalaried (!), we can continue the argument.

—An Octogenarian asks whether the artist, in his illustrations of Dickens' "Old Curiosity Shop," has not given the wrong date for the year 1715 to the year 1715. But our friend will remember that the story extends over several years and that it would be very difficult for him—as would it not?—to indicate the yearly changes of a fashionable. The costumes of the period, therefore, are general, and, according to the authorities, they are correct. The Lounger would gladly have the date 1715 corrected.

—C. H. The wave of Eugene Aram sow a real incident, and was not invented either by Bulwer or Hood. He was born in 1704, and in August, 1759, after a trial at York, he was executed for the murder of a shoemaker named Clark, at Knaresborough, and was hung three days after the trial. He was a man of unusual accomplishments, and was engaged in preparing a comparative lexicon of the English, Latin, Greek, Celtic, and Celtic languages when he was arrested on the charge of murder. Passages from his defense of this accusation are said to be extant. He defended himself at his trial with great ingenuity, and after his condemnation confessed his guilt. He declared that he was instigated by jealousy of Clark, whom he suspected to have made love to his wife. The night before his execution he tried to commit suicide, but he was discovered and the deed prevented. Eugene Aram left a wife and six children. Both Bulwer and Hood have invested his fate with a romantic interest. Walter Scott, to whom it was dedicated in December, 1831, praised Bulwer's novel highly; and Hood's ballad is prominent in English literature.

—J. W. D. The ode on the death of Washington Irving is declined, with thanks.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

An old Frenchman in our town has carried on the contentionary business for half a century. Before it became so convenient to lay in his stock at New York he used to make annual visits to Paris for that purpose. On his return from one of these trips he was welcomed in the street by a friend, whom he had invited to visit his "Magasin," to look at his importations. The invitation was accepted; and after admiring his wonderful contradictions of French genius exhibited on the first floor, he was taken to the upper chambers, where he found the more supplies of bonbonnes, etc. When about to retire his host presented him with a box, which concealed a protected some object. His curiosity being excited, he asked what it was. Monsieur excitement, which had been great all along, was now wonderfully increased. "Take it home with you, and you will know it," was the reply. On his station on one side, he gathered up the folds of the paper, and found that it was a small piece of the finest cloth an air of the greatest satisfaction. Within a niche, specially formed for it, lay a small monument of human consequence and elegant elaboration. Their strange to tell, a pair of breeches! Now this is what we do not understand its meaning.

"What is this, monsieur?" he said. "May I ask what it is intended for?"

"Why, Sare, it my own con-pe-si-tion; that, Sare, was in de for me by one of the first artist of Paris under de Empire. Dey was made for Napoleon, but I have exert to be necessary of my dear departed Madame P., and see, my dear Sare, dey fit me!"

George —, a graduate of one of our Northern universities, was a student at law in his native village. His father was a man of wealth, and his son, after the fashion of students, discovering no talent in his head, about his time was spent in the usual manner. All went on swimmingly Rinkydink, and every day, for nearly a week, the "Old Gentleman" was in the habit of calling at the office before. Tired of this, as he did not seem to mind it, George said to him, "Father, I wish you would call some well," said he, "only there is a little too much nonsense about it."

THE SYMPATHIZING WOMAN.

If we were to ask Mrs. Dobbs what Mr. Dobbs was should, without hesitation, call her a sympathizing woman. Nobody was more ready to feel for others in their sorrows. Nobody knew all about it by experience, and was sympathize with them from the bottom of her heart.

Mr. Turner met her about when our day Mr. Dobbs came along dragging the real toward his house, he knew, in the absence of his wife, it would be called upon to the attention but so he resolved to play a little on the good woman's sensibilities for a joke.

"Mrs. Dobbs," said Mr. Turner, he wrapped himself up in it, and turned himself to the door, "I'm sorry to tell you, ma'am, that Mr. Turner, are you sick?" asked Mrs. Dobbs, as she saw his agitation.

Mr. Turner could not guess the imaginary invalid.

"What's the matter?" said Mrs. Dobbs.

"Oh, a great many things. First and foremost, I've got a conception of the liver."

"Dear, dear!" sighed Mrs. Dobbs. "I come pretty near dying of it ten years to come next spring. What else?"

"Dropsy," again groaned Mr. Turner.

"Dear me!" sympathized she with you. I was troubled with it, but finally got over it."

"Neuralgia," added Mr. Turner.

"Nobody can tell Mr. Turner, what I've suffered from neuralgia. Oh, it's awful!" sighed she.

"Rheumatism," added Mr. Turner.

"Yes, I've been pretty likely to go along with neuralgia. It did with me," suggested Bob.

"Yes," sighed Mr. Turner," said the sympathizing woman, "how I thought I should have gone distracted with the rheumatism!"

I thought it was with great difficulty that he could relate all his complaints.

"I am suffering a good deal over a sprained ankle," said Mr. Turner, "and—and—and—" Mr. Turner, I'm sorry to hear it," said Mrs. Dobbs, "but the fact is"—here Bob groaned—"I'm afraid—" the doctor was with me, that my trouble is—" in short, "I'm afraid I'm going to die."

Bob got home, and wondered what Mrs. Dobbs could say to that.

"Mr. Turner, is it possible?" exclaimed the sympathizing woman. "Is he terrible? I know it is. I frequently have spell-ings-and-sinkings and that's awful."

Bob could stand it no longer; he burst into a roar of laughter that shook the house. The poor woman, in the violent paroxysm of insanity, she was led to take a hurried leave.

The following is a verbatim copy of a notice to work a road:

November 26th 1859

MR. DR. F——

You are hereby notified to work on the Monday and Tuesday, the 5th & 6th next as you are there days behind company to the amount of one hundred and ten days which you are hereby notified to work. Road overseer."

Franklin, on hearing the remark that what was not on earth went to the moon, asserted that there must be a deal of good advice accumulated there.

The wonderful power of steam, said man's minds. But most of the expedients foreshortening a man's day shorten his days.

A man said to another, "Which is the heaviest, a quart of rum or a quart of water?" "Rum, most assuredly, for a quart of water is nothing," replied the staggering under a quart of rum, when he would have carried a gallon of water with ease.

A "Bridget" who, as usual, entertains an exalted opinion of the great things of the old country, was asked by a fellow-servant in the room where she formerly lived in Ireland. "Yes, and sure they do." "What kind of pies?" "Mutton pies, to be sure."

The reason why whales frequent the Arctic Seas is, probably, because they supply the "Northern lights" with oil.

It is a legal maxim that "the law does not concern itself about small matters;" but lawyers and law-makers often do.

A young gentleman of our acquaintance says he thinks that young ladies who refuse good offers of marriage are like "Looking by Moonlight."

A rascally old bachelor says a man frequently admits that he was in the wrong, but a woman never—she was "only mistaken."

There is a lawyer so excessively honest that he puts all his money in a savings-bank, so determined is he that every thing shall have its due.

A business man of our acquaintance is so scrupulously exact in his dealings that, whenever he pays a visit, he always will insist upon taking a receipt.

Of all "quits that are done for hearing," we should say that the lovesick with a rich widow that was deaf of both ears was about as difficult as any to win.

A young lady, a few evenings since, said to her revered Pastor "Please don't my cloak?" "Certainly," said he, clasping his arms around her, "and the contents too."

THE METAMORPHOSIS.

Maid, closely turn, remember this:
You take his nature with his name.
Ask, too, what his religion is.
For you will soon be of the same.

A CHEAP MAN'S PATRONAGE.—The Prince of Conti was embarrassed for want of money—would to Heaven that the want were confined to the Prince of Conti! People reduced any longer to live on. His cochman came to him one morning and said:

"Give me horses, my lord, or send hay and corn."

"Give them hay and corn, then," replied the Prince.

"But, my lord, the farmers and the corn-chandlers refuse to supply me any more until their accounts are discharged."

"And what does the matter," quoth the Prince, very gravely.

"But, highness, what shall the horses have?"

"Have! called out the Prince.

"Have nothing, sir, I suppose."

"So the coachmaker and farmer refuse us credit—the rascals, do they?" said the Prince.

"Yes, my lord."

"Enough! I will not give them credit?"

"No one, your highness?"

"No one."

"Yes, now I think of it, my lord, the pastry-cook does."

"Honest fellow, we must encourage him," cried the Prince. "Harness the horses, let him be settled; give the horses cheese-cakes and custards."

A beggar boy made an application to a farmer's wife to forward her relief, and was refused on the ground that she "had no copper;" to which the little urchin ingeniously and very coolly replied, "I'm willing to wait."

An old butcher who had procured a marriage license for a friend, while glancing over it, was heard to ejaculate, "Good Lord! what a name!" "Why, what's the matter?" said a wife—would like to have a wife—but most so without a copper." "Why, sir, here's a man who is to be married to Miss Sweetbread!"

"There was a run on the farm," said Agricola, "as no horses for sale." "Then," said Mr. Dobbs, interrupting and who stood in so much need of moral suasion as the dog. "what Would you do with the horses?" "Why," said the consequence was that the dog never looked a sheep in the face again. He is now a reformed dog in his body, literally. Woodcuffs uplifted was the ram aforesaid to his master, by his insolence became intolerable, he was sore to pitch into whomsoever went nigh him. "I'll fix him," said the lad, "I'll put a stick in his cross-bar out of a hole in the barn, point foremost, and hang an old hat on the end of it. You can't help but laugh, when you see a bat, whether there is a head in it or not; how then, would a ram? And I'll warrant he'll not be very long a good marksman from long practice, the bar broke in between his horns. And one time it did break. This little admonition effectually cured him of butting."

THE MAIDEN'S TEARS.

"Say, maiden fair, why dost thou weep?
Some cause for grief must be Within thy heart, is bringing
Into thine eyes these pearly tears,
Sweet memories of by-gone years,
Thou fondly dost recall,
Of unequited love, a dream
Written from its hidden source the stream
That down thy cheeks is stealing?"
"Nay, sir, not for love," "What then? Oh, say?"
"Well, then, we dine on goose to-day."
The tears were gone.

WRESTLING WITH AN ELEPHANT.—A rather curious scene has occurred in Blackburn during a performance in a menagerie. A young man, who had taken more than sufficient to overcome his monster elephant, determined, like a Hercules, to show the full force of his strength of the huge bulk of flesh with his own. There is at the back of the elephant's cage a pillar of wood, and on this he, on one rod, binding one tusk to the other. One hero seized the trunk, and both began to show their whole weight upon it. The elephant, not altogether liking this sort of treatment, first endeavored for his part to push the audacious antagonist. He raised his great head aloft, and with a trunk which was strong enough from the pillar, he almost touched the canvas covering, and was no doubt much higher than the head of any man ever carried him. The animal repeated this, and a second time he succeeded in the pillar, and the man, perhaps perhaps thinking it best to temper justice with mercy, wrapped the trunk round the wrestler's body, and instantly lumbered youth, and very unceremoniously laid him in the mud that overspread the floor. Then, as the man rose, the elephant coming off the victor, while his combatant stood blinded with mud, and, amidst the hearty laughter of the spectators, vanished.

The doctrine of "Popular Sovereignty" being largely understood in Missouri, Governor Stewart has undertook to define it in a recent speech, which he did so clearly and in such plain terms that every man in the State will cease to maintain the principle there in the eyes of the nation. He said:

"Mr. Chairman, what is Popular Sovereignty? I know what it is, and I will tell you what it is, fellow-citizens. Popular Sovereignty is the great principle of Democracy. The Democrats. It gives to every man, the right to regulate your own domestic matters in your own domestic affairs, according to your conscientious lights. You can have your chickens fried, Mr. Chairman, in the pan or boiled, or roasted, and Congress has no right to interfere. You can have beef-steak for breakfast, Mr. Chairman, if you like it, or you can have it for tea if you like it, according to your own domestic institution, without any to the contrary notwithstanding. And Congress can not interfere with your domestic institutions. That is what it is, Mr. Chairman and fellow-citizens!" [Tremendous applause.]

Judge Barker, of Indiana, was one of the men who never let an opportunity slip for obtaining information. He could never be satisfied with general statements, however clear, but always required references that his fund of useful information had not, during a somewhat long life, been neglected.

At one time the Indians, George Crog—Halsted and Charles Bullock, Esqs., were invited, with Governor Ward, member of the Aborigines,' and the Governor's attention for such "facts" as would be useful to the Indians, and of which information might be gleaned. When the party returned

"I wish to ask you one question. Which are the most savage—the Seattle Indians, or those that you met?"

"Why," said Bullock, "the Seattle Indians are the most savage."

"Then," said Governor Stevens, "I will not ask the others."

Colonel General Johnson had another association. He was showing his garden to Colonel Scott, who remarked, "Why, Johnson, you have a fine show of horseradish."

"Oh! yes," he replied, "I was always great for horseradish."

At the March Term, 1859, of the Montgomery Circuit Court, Indiana, just closed, a prisoner by the name of Keeney was tried upon a charge of an assault and battery with intent to commit murder. He was a butcher by profession, and had always been deemed alive to the importance of procuring patrons and customers. The jury, after a short retirement, returned into court a verdict of "Not Guilty." Keeney looked around as if something was expected of him, and was quickly, he turned to the jury, bowed to them with a grateful air, and remarked, "Gentlemen of the jury, I am much obliged to you for your very liberal patronage."

What kind of fruit is never sold single?—The pear.

THE LADY IN BLACK.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE MISTRESS OF The Parsonage.

BY ELLA RODMAN.

PART III.—Concluded.

I HAD been very ill; for weeks I was lying there in almost total unconsciousness; but at length I awoke.

"My husband?" were the first words framed by my parched lips.

"Hush! dear, he will come soon," whispered Arethusa, as she bent over me soothing a refractory child.

Something seemed to tell me that this was a subterfuge; and catching Arethusa's hand, as she leaned over me, with a grasp that frightened her, I exclaimed:

"Arethusa! where is my husband? Tell me now!—instantly!"

"He is gone," was the sad reply.

"Gone where?" said I, wildly. "Is it possible that he would desert me when I was so ill?"

No; he had watched tenderly beside me, half distracted, it seemed, between his love and sorrow; but when I evinced signs of improvement he tore himself away to avoid a parting scene that would have been painful for both.

"But why must there have been a 'parting scene?'" I exclaimed; "and why am I here? Why am I not at the Parsonage?"

"There is another clergyman at the Parsonage now," said Arethusa, hesitatingly. "Arthur has gone to a missionary station at the Far West. 'Henceforth,' he said, 'his life should be devoted to his Master.'"

"How dared he go and leave me, his wife?" I exclaimed, in a tempest of anger. "What have I done that I should be treated thus?"

Arethusa gave me an inquiring look that I understood at once. Yes, I remembered it all now, and she had a right to my confidence.

"Arethusa," I exclaimed, with sudden earnestness, as I seized both her hands, "I do not know what Arthur has told you; but I can not blame him for his misconceptions: I have been placed in such unfortunate circumstances, the only wish to tell you the story as it really is, for I can not bear to lose your good opinion. You have been a kind sister to me, dear Arethusa, and although you know me to be very foolish and inexperienced, you believe in my truthfulness, do you not?"

Arethusa pressed my hand affectionately, and I could see that the tears in her eyes prevented her from speaking. I told her every thing that had occurred from the first arrival of Mrs. Otchesons, omitting nothing of my own weakness or Mr. Winneslie's trustfulness.

It was a long story, and at the close I sank back exhausted.

"You poor, dear baby!" exclaimed the tender-hearted Arethusa, while the tears rolled down her cheeks, "you've been most outrageously treated; and I don't care if Arthur is my brother, he's not a bit too good to be eaten up by the Indians! I feel so angry at him! instead of waiting until you told him how things were, to go stalking off to that outlandish region! I'll sit right down and write him a letter, and tell him all about it."

"No," said I, restraining my sister-in-law's impetuous movement; "he didn't love me any longer, Arethusa, and I don't wish to call him back unwillingly. Wait, and perhaps he will begin to think that I am not quite so bad."

"You know, Fairy," said the kind-hearted creature, "how low-spirited he used to be; and when a child he was always queer; you can scarcely expect him to act like other people, and I think he'll get enough of the Indians before long. You just stay here and make yourself comfortable; this is your home, remember, for you always seemed to me just like a child."

I was much comforted by my sister-in-law's idea of "making myself comfortable," and I had other plans in my busy head.

There was something hard under my pillow, and Arethusa drew forth my Bible and Prayer-book.

"Arthur put them there," said she, "as he bent down to kiss you for the last time."

He had kissed me, then; he did not quite hate me; and I bent down over my treasures to hide the tears.

How vividly the Prayer-book called up the day of my baptism! My husband had given it to me on that morning; and I gazed on the Maltese cross on the side, and the purple velvet cover glistened with the drops of holy water that had fallen upon it, with sad feelings of reproach. How had I kept those vows? For had I withstood the world, the flesh, and the devil?

The Sacred Volume and its companion were seldom out of my hands during my convalescence; and I daily drank healing draughts from the pure fountain. But giving myself up entirely to severe lectures upon the impropriety of sinking into a state of dependence, and the healthfulness of action, I felt greatly fortified; and proceeded forthwith to horrify Arethusa with my intention of going to the city.

"I don't see any thing to discourage me, dear sister," said I, seeing her about to speak; "I feel perfectly convinced that this is the right course for me to take; and I have come to think more of that now than of any thing else. I shall return to my occupation from which your brother took me; I have now obtained a sufficient number of scholars to keep me from starving, and the discipline will do me good."

"I can look on both sides yet," urged Arethusa, "and have no doubt that I always shall look so, in my reply; 'so that must not always be.'"

"Well, remember, Fairy, that when you are weary with teaching you must take a run out here to get a mouthful of fresh air and some of my new cream. Whatever happens, you are my sister, and I shall always love you dearly."

Yes, I could rely upon Arethusa's affection, so that life was not all dreary.

The winter was setting in; the apples had all been gathered; various household preserving-agements accomplished, and I set off without delay.

I had several scholars to attend to, and I resolved to do my best. My pupils were from the humble ranks of life; and were generally deplorably ignorant, not only of the rudiments of education, but of the first principles of religion. I had a two-fold task before me, but I endeavored to discharge it conscientiously; and conquering my natural timidity, I ventured to visit the parents.

Sometimes I was repelled, sometimes encouraged; and in many instances I had the delightful consciousness that I was doing some good. I had put on the robes of widowhood, for had I not lost my husband? And "the lady in black" was the name by which I was soon known in the humble streets through which I passed.

Thoughts of the past were many; but I could not shake them off; and often the recitations of my scholars sounded in my ears like the drowsy hum of the bee, and I was once more at Meadowbrook, sitting beneath the rose-vines, or wandering with Mr. Winneslie in the lanes around.

I permitted myself the extravagance of taking a church paper, because now and then, at rare intervals, the name of the Rev. Arthur Winneslie was mentioned in it; and sometimes a communication, written by himself, giving an account of the progress of the mission. How I devoured those brief accounts! They seemed like letters from my husband to me; and when I read of toils and hardships, just slightly glanced at, with his characteristic self-denial, I felt ready to fly to him at once and abandon his self-chosen life as a martyr. I could. But ah! I remembered that I had not deserted him—he had deserted me; and I could not force my society upon him.

It was a pleasure to me to emulate, in some degree, his privations; and the missionary little thought from whence came the contributions of "Mispah," which were always acknowledged in the paper. I loved that motto: "The Lord watch between thee and me when we are absent one from the other;" and I cheerfully ate my crust, without lamenting the flesh-pots that had been sacrificed in so good a cause.

I carefully avoided the street in which stood my grandmother's residence; our last meeting had not been productive of pleasure, and I shrank from Hester's cold, stony eyes, so utterly devoid of any thing like sympathy. Some time passed without our meeting, and I congratulated myself daily.

But one afternoon, just before the holidays, I returned from school more than usually depressed. My pupils had been fractious and the school-room cold; the streets through which I passed were filled with pedestrians, all happy and bustling; the shops were thronged with purchasers; and I drew my vail more closely about me, as the full sadness of the word "alone" seemed whispering to my heart.

Seated by my little stove I suffered the tears to course down my cheeks unchecked: for the season was one in which the light-hearted are gayer, and the sad-hearted more depressed. I started to remember my duties, and I felt that I did not murmur—no, I deserved it all; I only wept uncomplainingly, for my lonely heart sent up such a strong cry for my husband—for the love that was mine in the past.

I was startled by the opening of the door; and I know not what sent a thrill of half-expectant joy through my frame—but, alas! the tearful eyes encountered a most unwelcome apparition. The spare, wiry figure of my Aunt Hester loomed up distantly before me. Her relapse upon the bare floor of my room were made to be opened, she made it a rule to omit the ceremony of knocking—her reply to any remonstrance being that "no one should never do things at which they was ashamed to be caught."

As I was doing something at which I was very much ashamed to be caught I suffered accordingly.

"Well all," said my relative, with a grim smile, as I sat looking at her in a kind of frightened surprise, "why don't you say that you're glad to see me? You look delighted!"

"Aunt Hester," I replied, controlling my tears as much as possible, "you are welcome to my hospitality as it is—and if there is any thing that I can do for you, I will do it willingly."

"Come, now," said my aunt, as she deliberately put aside a huge cotton umbrella, "I like that. If there is any thing that you can do for me!—perhaps, ma'am, you can present me with a fine place in the country? I shouldn't mind what sort it was, so long as I could get away from here," she continued, with a sort of malicious cheerfulness; "it'll never always upends; and I'm sure that you must be scandalously there at Meadowbrook that your husband had to leave you? I thought no good would come of all those fine feathers!"

I passed a moment to keep down my rebellious spirit; and the words, "The cup which my Father has given me, shall I not drink it?" seemed to whisper encouragement, and I replied, quite calmly:

"Aunt Hester, I have no doubt that I have been very much misrepresented, and it is, perhaps, natural that you should believe what you have heard of me; but if you choose to listen to a long story, I will relate to you the facts of the case."

"Well," said Aunt Hester, incredulously, "let's hear what you've got to say for yourself." It seemed as if she had taken her hair and some of my new cream. Whatever happens, you are my sister, and I shall always love you dearly."

Yes, I could rely upon Arethusa's affection, so that life was not all dreary.

The winter was setting in; the apples had all been gathered; various household preserving-agements accomplished, and I set off without delay.

I had several scholars to attend to, and I resolved to do my best. My pupils were from the humble ranks of life; and were generally deplorably ignorant, not only of the rudiments of education, but of the first principles of religion. I had a two-fold task before me, but I endeavored to discharge it conscientiously; and conquering my natural timidity, I ventured to visit the parents.

Sometimes I was repelled, sometimes encouraged; and in many instances I had the delightful consciousness that I was doing some good. I had put on the robes of widowhood, for had I not lost my husband? And "the lady in black" was the name by which I was soon known in the humble streets through which I passed.

Thoughts of the past were many; but I could not shake them off; and often the recitations of my scholars sounded in my ears like the drowsy hum of the bee, and I was once more at Meadowbrook, sitting beneath the rose-vines, or wandering with Mr. Winneslie in the lanes around.

I permitted myself the extravagance of taking a church paper, because now and then, at rare intervals, the name of the Rev. Arthur Winneslie was mentioned in it; and sometimes a communication, written by himself, giving an account of the progress of the mission. How I devoured those brief accounts! They seemed like letters from my husband to me; and when I read of toils and hardships, just slightly glanced at, with his characteristic self-denial, I felt ready to fly to him at once and abandon his self-chosen life as a martyr. I could. But ah! I remembered that I had not deserted him—he had deserted me; and I could not force my society upon him.

It was a pleasure to me to emulate, in some degree, his privations; and the missionary little thought from whence came the contributions of "Mispah," which were always acknowledged in the paper. I loved that motto: "The Lord watch between thee and me when we are absent one from the other;" and I cheerfully ate my crust, without lamenting the flesh-pots that had been sacrificed in so good a cause.

that you've been humbled, if you choose to behave yourself properly. I shall consider it my duty to come and see how you're getting on. If you want a dinner, or a tea, or any thing, I s'pose you can have it where you've often had it before. Don't be so pressing. Tea-ea, I can't stop all night."

The cotton umbrella and the stiff figure vanished together, and I sank down upon the bed and fainted from sheer wretchedness.

Years, weary years, passed on, and my poor heart sent up the frequent cry: "How long, O Lord? forever?"

No communication passed between Arethusa and her brother; the distance was great, and the means of conveying letters uncertain; the few crumbs afforded by my church paper were all that I had to feed upon. Communications from others gave an account of the failing health of the missionary—toils and privations were doing their work; and my agony became almost insupportable at the idea that he would probably die without a reconciliation, with no loving hand to smooth his pillow.

He must forgive me—must know that I was innocent; and I sat down, in the excitement of the moment, and wrote a long letter. I told Mr. Winneslie of my perfect unconsciousness of any wrong—of the trust he himself had reposed in the man whose name I could not bear to write—of my wretchedness at the conviction that I was no longer loved—and of the scene in which I had acted so passive a part. I told him that we should probably never meet again in this world. I did not write this as an inducement to return to me; but before either of us passed into the presence of our Judge, I desired a full understanding and reconciliation.

I left the letter with Arethusa—she thought she might be able to send it—and with the consciousness that I had been my seldom spirit, and accomplished a painful duty, I returned to my daily tasks.

I am sitting here this damp autumn day, pouring out my sorrows to myself, and blotting what I write with my tears. Will my husband die? Shall I never behold his living face again?

I hear heavy footsteps approaching my room. Aunt Hester calls all shoes "paper-soled" that do not make noise enough for half a dozen men; and as it is about time to expect another infliction from her, I may as well nerve myself for the "tug of war." . . . .

I know not where to begin. My cup of joy is full to overflowing. My neglected manuscript was broken off abruptly, and for the sake of those whom it may teach in after-years, I must put the finishing touches.

Nearer sounded the ominous footsteps—fainter grew my heart with a dread of Aunt Hester—but the opening door disclosed a figure that darkened on my vision as I sank into the outstretched arms.

Words of tenderness wooed me back to life:

"Ernestine! my wife! my poor, injured wife! Only say that you forgive me!"

I clasped him closely—he had come at last—and now only death should separate us. He was changed—thinner and paler than of old, and his hair more thickly streaked with silver.

"These poor, pale cheeks," he murmured; "what has become of my Fairy's bloom?"

"Gone," I replied, "with my weakness and folly. I am strong, now, dear husband; suffering has purified me."

The tears were in his eyes, and I saw them although he turned aside. But a wild happiness had taken possession of me, and I sat there smiling in perfect contentment.

"Not one word of reproach?" asked Mr. Winneslie; "no questions as to how I came or what brought me?"

MEADOWBROOK PARSONAGE.

"You are here," I replied, "that is enough—I have been so lonely."

"Poor child!" said he, tenderly; "poor, suffering child! And I promised to cherish and protect her. But my mind was unsettled, Fairy—I accustomed to look only on the dark side of things, I took the reality of my misery for granted, and the blow stunned me. I wished to shut myself out from the face of man—to bury myself in the wilderness; and fearing that your grief and loveliness might move me from my purpose, I stole away while you were unconscious, and left you to the care of Arethusa, who would, I knew, discharge her trust with affection and tenderness. There I expected you to remain; and when I felt that my health required relaxation, I resolved to go to my sister's and see you once more. But what was my astonishment to learn from Arethusa that you had left her house, as soon as you rose from your sick-bed, for a gloomy home in the city, guided by your daily toil? She handed me your letter, and my heart bled at the idea of your sufferings. I lost no time in seeking you—and I am here, a repentant, and, I hope, a better man, to ask you, my darling wife, if you can overlook my past and return to me? Shall we go together and work in the vineyard where I have spent these weary years away from you?"

"Whither thou goest, I will go!" were the words that came from my willing heart; and the announcement of years was gone as if by magic. To the North pole, or the South pole, it was alike indifferent to me; for wherever I went I would not be alone.

My husband took me at once to Arethusa's, and we fell to talking over our plans for the future. My sister-in-law was decidedly opposed to our missionary project; we both needed nursing, she said, and were not fit to go off among savages, who, she appeared to think, were converted as much by bodily force as by Gospel preaching.

But Mr. Winnesile said that he knew of no other field of usefulness, and he could not be contented to stand in the market-place idle.

"Look at that!" exclaimed Arethusa, pointing energetically to me, as I happened to cross the room, "what kind of a figure is that for toil and hardships? Why, a good strong wind would take her off!"

My appearance was rather shadowy; and my husband's eye followed me with a troubled expression. Nothing more was said on the subject then, and my worthy sister-in-law fancied that she had triumphed.

That very day Mr. Pling, one of the old church-wardens of Meadowbrook, called to see Mr. Winnesile, and had a long conference with him.

"How would you like to go back to Meadowbrook?" asked my husband.

Meadowbrook! the name awakened associations both pleasant and painful. The painful, however, predominated; there were too many people there whom I never could meet again.

But Mr. Pling had come laden with a heavy budget of news. The whole Osborne party had sailed for Europe immediately after our departure, and the house had passed into other hands. Mrs. Osborne having voted Meadowbrook the most stupid place she ever was in. The Simeses, root and branch, had moved to a neighboring town, and the Rev. Gilbert Mucross, the clergyman installed in Mr. Winnesile's place, having entirely failed to please his flock, or they him, found Meadowbrook a most uncomfortable residence, and sent in his resignation. The poor Meadowbrookians were, therefore, left in spiritual darkness, occasionally lightened by a visit from the Bishop, or some wandering clergyman; and when they heard that Mr. Winnesile had returned, they resolved to do their best to get him back. So said Mr. Pling, adding that Mr. Winnesile was very much admired in Meadowbrook, and that perhaps it stood as much in need of his services as the place with the unpronounceable name which he had left.

As if to crown the matter, a letter from the Mission announced two new recruits just entered upon their labors; and advised Mr. Winnesile, in consideration of his delicate health, to seek a more favorable post.

"Well," said Arethusa, when all this news had been imparted, "where are you going now?"

"Fairy shall decide," replied my husband, smiling.

"Then," said I, "I decide to go to Meadowbrook."

And to Meadowbrook we went.

Busy hands had put the old rectory in complete order; various improvements had been made; and a number of warm friends welcomed our return. Once more in my dear old room I shed tears of perfect happiness, and breathed a prayer of gratitude to the Giver of all good gifts for both the sunshine and the storm.

I am writing in Mr. Winnesile's study; from the window I see my husband just returning from a pastoral visit, and, I fancy, I detect the improvement in his whole appearance which a little good nursing has effected. As for me, I am growing so fat, with this country air and happiness, that Mr. Winnesile says it is quite a misnomer to call me "Fairy," and I am reluctantly compelled to agree with him.

Dear Arethusa no longer finds the closets "at sixes and sevens," and my husband declares that there is not a better housekeeper in Meadowbrook. I love to have him praise me, but now I strive to deserve it; for I have again a home, and a noble heart to fold me in its loving depths.

THE END.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

The New Partner

IN

"CLINGHAM & CO., BANKERS."

BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW,

AUTHOR OF "THE HASHEESH EATER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER IX.—Continued.

THE FAMILY TREE CLIMBER.

"YOU see, I was remote to Mr. Joseph's family—Mr. Joseph Clingham's; though, because there were so many of them, they always used to say Mr. George, Mr. Joseph, and so on, without putting any Clingham. Oh what a house that was, Lukey! The child that was born into it might have crowed day or night and to think of his good luck. There was a carriage for the use of the nursery, all alone by itself, and every day when the weather was fine the coachman was told to come and take out me and the children. Such rides! How I wished my little Lukey could be along with me! But then no, he couldn't ride—he had to rise; and rising and riding don't go together, not at first, though he will have a carriage now some day Lukey? Then he was off, all the year round, at some bank a great way out of town, and I thought I'd ed for him except come Christmas and New-Years; and even then I didn't always see him, poor boy! now a-swelling and now a-fainting and carrying, now a-writing till twelve o'clock at night; but he was a-rising, a-rising all the time —wasn't he?"

"Yes, yes; get on, mother, get on."

"Don't hurry the poor old mother, sonny, I'm a-getting to it. Let's see, where was I? There were plenty of daughters in that Clingham family—the other brothers used to say they were like Jacob's sons because they envied Joseph, but he didn't feel much like being envied. For though there were all pretty dear little young ones, those girls, they were so cruel and Joseph did mightily want to have a son. At last another child was expected. Well, we got all ready for it in the nursery; and every body had been expecting and hoping and praying for a boy so long now we felt sure it would be that kind of a baby. Even the little girls, down to the shortest little mite just learning to talk, kept running up to my side a dozen times a day to say, 'Won't we have a little brother —won't we have a dear little brother, nurse?' That shows how much it was thought about.

"Well, the time came, and the provoking little beast didn't. I know it isn't right, Lukey, but I can't help it; that's just the way we felt about it—that it was desperate mean of him. Though it wasn't his fault, poor thing! Girls will be girls, and this one was. Of course I didn't have much to do with the young Clinghams for some time after they were born—a woman in the wet line, or else Mrs. Clingham herself taking care of them till they were enough along to eat like other Christians. So I was very much surprised to have the waiter come to me one day, and say, 'Mrs. Green' (he always was very respectful), 'Mrs. Green, please to go to Mr. Clingham's study; he wants to see you.' and when I got there, to hear Mr. Clingham say he had sent to have a talk with me about the baby. 'Nurse,' said he, 'can you keep a secret?' 'Lord bless me, Mr. Clingham!' says I, 'if I should tell all I know now I guess some folks wouldn't be out of jail. Though they say women do let out every thing they know, I've always found that when people were in my trade enough to come to me with it, being though I'm a woman, but I may be different from most of 'em.'

"BOUND TO RISE, HEH, SONNY?"

"'Very, nurse,' says Mr. Clingham, 'you're going to have a boy.'

"'Lor' bless you, Sir,' says I, 'course me, but you're not sure of that yet. Mr. Green has been dead—dear soul!—this dozen years, and I'm a member in good standing. I hope you don't really think it of me.'

"'You don't understand me, nurse,' says he. 'I ought to have said, more correct perhaps, we are going to have a boy. There'll be a fine one here—to be a candidate for your nursery—if we can help it so, some time next week.' In other words, and to speak plain, Mrs. Clingham and I have concluded to change babies with Mrs. Joseph Clingham's next. Remember, keep mum about it; and now I want you to help us. Will you do it?' 'If I can, and I'm sure I will, and I suppose it is, for it's you that does it.' 'You'll be well paid,' says he. 'Very well, what is it?' says I; and then he told me that I was to take little Nora—the very same, dye see, Lukey? he called her just the same that this little girl's called here—I must go by steamboat up the river to Hyde Park. There I'd find a carriage waiting for me, and I was to tell the servants, I must go to the nearest station and start off with her and a trunk full of baby clothes they'd have ready for me, and, moreover, to all the servants, I was going to Meadowbrook, and that perhaps it stood as much in need of his services as the place with the unpronounceable name which he had left.

"As if to crown the matter, a letter from the Mission announced two new recruits just entered upon their labors; and advised Mr. Winnesile, in consideration of his delicate health, to seek a more favorable post.

"Well," said Arethusa, when all this news had been imparted, "where are you going now?"

"Fairy shall decide," replied my husband, smiling.

"Then," said I, "I decide to go to Meadowbrook."

And to Meadowbrook we went.

Busy hands had put the old rectory in complete order; various improvements had been made; and a number of warm friends welcomed our return. Once more in my dear old room I shed tears of perfect happiness, and breathed a prayer of gratitude to the Giver of all good gifts for both the sunshine and the storm.

I am writing in Mr. Winnesile's study; from the window I see my husband just returning from a pastoral visit, and, I fancy, I detect the improvement in his whole appearance which a little good nursing has effected. As for me, I am growing so fat, with this country air and happiness, that Mr. Winnesile says it is quite a misnomer to call me "Fairy," and I am reluctantly compelled to agree with him.

Dear Arethusa no longer finds the closets "at sixes and sevens," and my husband declares that there is not a better housekeeper in Meadowbrook. I love to have him praise me, but now I strive to deserve it; for I have again a home, and a noble heart to fold me in its loving depths.

THE END.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

The New Partner

IN

"CLINGHAM & CO., BANKERS."

BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW,

AUTHOR OF "THE HASHEESH EATER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER IX.—Continued.

THE FAMILY TREE CLIMBER.

"YOU see, I was remote to Mr. Joseph's family—Mr. Joseph Clingham's; though, because there were so many of them, they always used to say Mr. George, Mr. Joseph, and so on, without putting any Clingham. Oh what a house that was, Lukey! The child that was born into it might have crowed day or night and to think of his good luck. There was a carriage for the use of the nursery, all alone by itself, and every day when the weather was fine the coachman was told to come and take out me and the children. Such rides! How I wished my little Lukey could be along with me! But then no, he couldn't ride—he had to rise; and rising and riding don't go together, not at first, though he will have a carriage now some day Lukey? Then he was off, all the year round, at some bank a great way out of town, and I thought I'd ed for him except come Christmas and New-Years; and even then I didn't always see him, poor boy! now a-swelling and now a-fainting and carrying, now a-writing till twelve o'clock at night; but he was a-rising, a-rising all the time —wasn't he?"

"Yes, yes; get on, mother, get on."

"Don't hurry the poor old mother, sonny, I'm a-getting to it. Let's see, where was I? There were plenty of daughters in that Clingham family—the other brothers used to say they were like Jacob's sons because they envied Joseph, but he didn't feel much like being envied. For though there were all pretty dear little young ones, those girls, they were so cruel and Joseph did mightily want to have a son. At last another child was expected. Well, we got all ready for it in the nursery; and every body had been expecting and hoping and praying for a boy so long now we felt sure it would be that kind of a baby. Even the little girls, down to the shortest little mite just learning to talk, kept running up to my side a dozen times a day to say, 'Won't we have a little brother —won't we have a dear little brother, nurse?' That shows how much it was thought about.

"Well, the time came, and the provoking little beast didn't. I know it isn't right, Lukey, but I can't help it; that's just the way we felt about it—that it was desperate mean of him. Though it wasn't his fault, poor thing! Girls will be girls, and this one was. Of course I didn't have much to do with the young Clinghams for some time after they were born—a woman in the wet line, or else Mrs. Clingham herself taking care of them till they were enough along to eat like other Christians. So I was very much surprised to have the waiter come to me one day, and say, 'Mrs. Green' (he always was very respectful), 'Mrs. Green, please to go to Mr. Clingham's study; he wants to see you.' and when I got there, to hear Mr. Clingham say he had sent to have a talk with me about the baby. 'Nurse,' said he, 'can you keep a secret?' 'Lord bless me, Mr. Clingham!' says I, 'if I should tell all I know now I guess some folks wouldn't be out of jail. Though they say women do let out every thing they know, I've always found that when people were in my trade enough to come to me with it, being though I'm a woman, but I may be different from most of 'em.'

"'Very, nurse,' says Mr. Clingham, 'you're going to have a boy.'

"'Lor' bless you, Sir,' says I, 'course me, but you're not sure of that yet. Mr. Green has been dead—dear soul!—this dozen years, and I'm a member in good standing. I hope you don't really think it of me.'

"'You don't understand me, nurse,' says he. 'I ought to have said, more correct perhaps, we are going to have a boy. There'll be a fine one here—to be a candidate for your nursery—if we can help it so, some time next week.' In other words, and to speak plain, Mrs. Clingham and I have concluded to change babies with Mrs. Joseph Clingham's next. Remember, keep mum about it; and now I want you to help us. Will you do it?' 'If I can, and I'm sure I will, and I suppose it is, for it's you that does it.' 'You'll be well paid,' says he. 'Very well, what is it?' says I; and then he told me that I was to take little Nora—the very same, dye see, Lukey? he called her just the same that this little girl's called here—I must go by steamboat up the river to Hyde Park. There I'd find a carriage waiting for me, and I was to tell the servants, I must go to the nearest station and start off with her and a trunk full of baby clothes they'd have ready for me, and, moreover, to all the servants, I was going to Meadowbrook, and that perhaps it stood key! Sonny, sonny, you make me think of that tea-kettle: you're shiny and quiet outside; you wouldn't think you were cross to look at yourself in the glass now, though you do hurry up your old mother so, but inside I'll bet you're biling. Well, well, let's have tea. I won't say any more about the baby. Only just think: you want to know how I know that this girl here is Nora Clingham, and no Nora Manton anyhow. I'll tell you. When I stopped at that house in Hyde Park, it was just a month after the birth of the baby, and I looked in the west parlor of the house, and I saw the man that gave me his baby-boy for Mr. Clingham's daughter right in the full glare of red light that came through the open window. He was a very peculiar-looking man — I marked him particularly — I have known him by any where after that in a crowd of thousands and thousands. And I handed him our baby, and told him to call it Nora—that was Mrs. Clingham's wish, if it was agreeable to him. Now, when I come to Greenwich, just five years ago last August, who should I meet one day a-walking in the street but this very same, peculiar, marked looking man—just the same rosewooded mug, only a little more by years, as was ma'ral—just the same drooping lip and chin that run back, with a deep dimple in it, and just the same mournful, seeking sort of look about the eyes. And he had a girl with him, I heard him call her Nora!—Nora! d'ye mind it, Lukey? And when I asked some body who that was, that man and girl, I was told it was John Manton and his daughter Nora. And then the whole truth came up to me, and I seemed to see that Hyde Park house dark, and by letting on that you can guess more, I wasn't much surprised when I found whose tenants John Manton and his daughter Nora were. And daughter Nora! Humph! That's all."

"I WILL GO!" HE TURNED YOU OUT OF DOORS, DID HE?"

"Now you've told your story," said Luke Green, "and I've listened patiently to it, though I knew it by heart before, I beg you'll keep still and listen to what I have to say. No preserves, I thank you. I'll answer your eyes you've told me the facts. You told me, too, that Joseph Clingham had died, and that, if there was no will, one-fifth of all his real property and interests in Clingham & Co. would belong to this girl, who is supposed to be Nora Manton, but is really Nora Clingham. That was ingenious in you—a mighty clever and far-reaching thought for one of your sex, who are generally either peaceful or geese."

"Oh, Lukey, Lukey, don't tickle the old woman's ears with such cudgeling sayings."

"Is it like me to flatter? I know I can do it. I know I do do it; but not when I can help it. That sort of a thing is cheap stroke for a woman to think of, and I followed up the idea. I found that Joseph Clingham hadn't left any will—that he died suddenly of destruction of the heart, when he supposed he had full twenty years lifeless longer. His heart turned into bone, you know—like; what oscillations and pulsations did stone, which is petrifaction, and would be a much properer, prettier word, if a gentleman in business on Change to die of. Well, as you know, I immediately began to put in for the girl, according to your bright suggestion. She was young and raw then, but I thought I'd begin early. So I commenced playing the devoted to a baby in-deshabille, who wore nice little bibs down her back and tied with blue ribbon. Lord! wasn't I ardent? In short, I was as sweet as I knew how to be."

"Oh, Lukey, Lukey, boy, that was a deal too sweet."

"Never mind. Now it was a picture—now it was a silver kickshaw for nosegays—now it was a card-table—now it was something else. I didn't get a bite. I was getting mad—the girl grew older and older."

"Women grow so," said Luke Green's mother, sententiously, and with a sigh.

"And," continued Luke Green, without noticing the interruption, "I didn't seem to take like my native"—but, saucy minx! she quite avoided me. Yet I kept on, day and night planning and trying different styles of address on the young woman—both because you always would bid me on when I felt like giving up the job, and because the chance of recovering the girl's share in Joseph Clingham's estate out of his administrators wasn't to be sneezed at, when it amounted to a cool hundred thousand, to say nothing of such part of the partnership interest as would descend to her. So I've stood away like a dog—now pulling this wire, now that—for all these long months and years. At last I got all I can, I suppose. He can't die, and I should have his help. I thought then that I was made. He told me she was a poor, penniless girl, which showed he didn't suspect what I wanted her for; and I answered back—Heavens! so piously—that my humble income was enough for me and her lowliness was an abundant dower. As I said, I supposed, because the girl seemed to think so much of the old man, that, when he wanted her to do for him'd take right to me—or mind him, any way. I was wrong. I know, for he told me so, and after that she didn't avoid me so much, though there wasn't any other change. I supposed she was my own woman, and would cling to her me. To cut the story short, I had every hope of getting her, by look or by crook, until this very day in the Bank, in stepped a Jew beggar that was turned out by James Clingham, a rascal—I—a him a thousand times!—and I have every reason to believe that the fool is in love with him."

And Luke Green indulged in an imprecation which is as unpleasant to write as it would have been to hear.

"Not in love with my Lukey—my dear, sweet Lukey? She shall be in love with you—we'll make her. We won't lose her—we will we, sonny?"

And the spider eyes of the old woman retreated up into their network of wrinkles as if to be out of sight, with the intensity of her determination; while as that cruel, square lower jaw of hers came up with a crunch against the crust she was nibbling, the likeness of the mother to the son became fearfully apparent; and had you been there, you would have thanked your stars that neither of them disliked you, and held your finger where the crust was. Here's the story continued:

"What's the name of the man that comes in between you and the girl, Lukey? What's his name? Tell me, for I've forgot."

"Ernest Beckford," answered Luke Green, with a look and in a voice that were curse enough without further words.

The old woman's twin spiders sprang out as if they had the very fattest fly right on the edge of their cobweb.

"Ernest—Ernest—Ernest? Let me see! Ernest, you say? I've found that name somewhere. Where. Where was it, now? I used to know an Ernest. Oh, I can't think! Deary me, Lukey, I'm getting to be a terrible forgetful old woman!"

"Oh, it is not likely you could have ever heard of him. He's a perfect stranger to most of the firm, I believe, except that he had done them some service abroad where he came from. But, as I was saying, I know she does; and to-day, when I went to old Manton's to talk about him, what do you think she said? Ire, ire, d—n him!"

"What, Lukey? What?"

"He turned me out of doors! By——, if I have not come to you, I'll—I'll—"

And at the same time the lower jaw of the man and the woman ground audibly, and with a force which would have split a walnut. The old woman put down her cup, and leaning on the elbows of her chair, lifted herself to her feet. Her face was very pale, and her lips trembled, though her teeth were shut.

"Let me go, Lukey—let me go!" she muttered, trying to shake her shoulders loose from his grasp. "I will go! He tossed you out of doors, did he? I'll toss him out of doors! I'll and drag him out of his house! I'll bring him out by the hair! I'll spit on him! I'll show him to the street! I'll—I'll—Lukey, the man that sold his son for a daughter! Baby-changer! Let me go, Luke Green! Let me go! I'll—I'll—find me, I'll—I'll—your mother! Turned you out of doors, did he? He!"

It required all the strength even of a grown man, like Luke Green, to restrain and hold down the struggling old woman, endued as she was with a preternatural force through rage. But at length she sank, or rather fainted; and, all limp and shivering, she fell back on her chair like an exhausted tiger-cat, and looked at her son.

"Am I going to ruin me? Do you want to make yourself a cursed old fool and a laughing-stock, and a prison, Lukey? Get down! Get down! Sit down, and be still, or your mother! Turned you out of doors, did he? He!"

It required all the strength even of a grown man, like Luke Green, to restrain and hold down the struggling old woman, endued as she was with a preternatural force through rage. But at length she sank, or rather fainted; and, all limp and shivering, she fell back on her chair like an exhausted tiger-cat, and looked at her son.

"Am I going to ruin me? Do you want to make yourself a cursed old fool and a laughing-stock, and a prison, Lukey? Get down! Get down! Sit down, and be still, or your mother! Turned you out of doors, did he? He!"

"Yes; he owes me three hundred dollars now. I've got his note for it. It isn't worth a cent!" And Luke Green contemptuously snapped his fingers.

"I lent it to him knowing I couldn't get it again unless I got that d—d woman. It was a venture, mother."

"Never mind, never mind! Hark, Lukey, you just take that note and show it to the girl, and tell her that if she don't get you it's hers. But if she don't take you, then it goes into the hands of the Jew, and he'll make them gets sold out on execution. And just you hint to her one other little thing—you needn't tell her right out that it is so, and that you're not just hard that, maybe, her father knows more about the disappearance of certain bank money than he'd like to tell, and that, when you caught him at a little operation of that kind, he gave you that note to cover you in case you were blamed; and, Lukey, tell her that it may go hard with her father if it's found out, but it never shall be found out if she'll marry you. And then strike while the iron is hot—two moments she gets frightened, and says Yes, take her right off to the nearest parson's, and marry her directly! What do you think of that, boy?"

The superintendent stood silent for a moment after the old woman had finished, still clutching him by both wrists, peered up into his face—and then replied, slowly, and considerately:

"By G—d! I believe I'll try that."

He hid his mother good-night. She kissed him repeatedly on the mouth so hard as malignly set, for every other thing and creature.

"I will rise, Lukey, you'll see! bound to rise, heh, sonny? Those words were the last that resounded on his ear as he went down the stairs.

And as he crossed the palace of the front room on the lowest floor the lodger therein opened it for a moment, and on the wall opposite there hung, to a decorated frame, and upon by the full flame of the jest lighted candle, a colored engraving of Hannah's gallows and elevation. "Bound to rise, Lukey, you'll see!" Those words seemed sinking through the air like a plummet from third pair back. And Mr. Luke Green shouldered slightly, though the evening was warm, as he passed out into the street.

LITERARY.

THE BEREAVED will, we think, be interested by an advertisement in another column directed to them.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, March 5, in the Senate, Senator Hunter (Cal.) presented the credentials of Milton S. Latham, Cal.'s five-minute man, who was sworn in. Senator Seward (Mass.) introduced a resolution calling upon the President for information of all correspondence relating to propositions on mail-line and next at right by the Tehuantepec route. Adopted. March 6, 1856. The bill authorizing the sale of arms to the States was taken up. Mason Senator Davis (Mr.) moved an amendment prohibiting any State or Territory from purchasing a greater number than its Congressional quota. No action was taken on the amendment, and the bill was laid aside. In the House, Mr. Bocock (Va.) and Mr. Alex Boyard (Del.) explained its provisions and advocated its passage. Mr. Sherman (O.) moved an amendment requiring that an appropriation be made by Congress before a contract is let out for the Pacific Road. Some discussion was had, when the motion to amend was lost. The previous questions were proposed and seconded, when, after discussion, the Senate adjourned without disposing of the bill. On Tuesday, March 6, Senator (Va.) moved that the House proceed to the election of a Speaker to-day. Mr. Clingman (N.C.) moved to vote viva voce. A discussion ensued, and Mr. Millson's motion was withdrawn. Mr. Clingman then made an ineffectual effort to have the bill regulating the salaries of ex-members of Congress referred to twenty cents per mile, straight line traveling, taken up. He gave notice that he would call it up to-morrow morning. Mr. Bocock asked consent to move that the select of a Pacific Railroad be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Objection being made, the motion was withdrawn. Mr. Curry (Ala.) moved that the House proceed to the election of a Speaker, which was agreed to, and the motion adopted. Mr. Burnett (K.Y.) moved that the House proceed to the election of a Committee of nine to inquire into the expediency of asking for a Committee of investigation to be sent around the Falls of Niagara. Objection was made. Mr. Bidlebaugh (Penn.) moved to suspend the rules to refer upon the 4th of June as the day for the adjournment of Congress. Adopted. Mr. Florence (Pa.) objected to offer a resolution for the appointment of a Committee of five for the purpose of ascertaining whether the President or any other officer of the Government has, with money, improperly used his official influence sought to influence Congress or any Committee thereof with regard to the passage of the Kansas Bill. Objection was made. Mr. Florence (Pa.) objected to offer a resolution ance to the administration of revenue law, and indeed to its actual intelligibility. It is a simplification in the wisest flemency afford. Mr. Cochrane has found out in the wisest course is exclude from it all innovations of an experimental character, leaving to the work of fit and unquestionable character. A bill of such magnitude and importance as this will of read not one in an this can be read with any to be as familiar with its a hundred could be pronounced so consequently he wishes it details as to understand the object proposed by this bill is understood that the chief objects laws, and the collation of the the repeal of all restrictions upon the importation of sugar, said and judiciously supported laws by a high, uniform, and discriminating duty, according to the standard of saccharine matter, as adopted by the regulations of the Treasury Department. He is opposed to the repeal of the drawback, but without assertion proved practicable by an understood that an improvement of law. Then it is proposed to make the law take effect in one month. The principle of this bill is simple, and when made, its law is to be perfected, if in any part defective, in the light of experience. The bill is short, and will probably have a special and early day set apart for its consideration."

CONSTITUTIONAL LANGUAGE IN CONGRESS.

The following is the report of a recent occurrence in Congress, from Globe:

MR. VAN WYCK. "Sir, I will indulge in no unkind remarks in regard to the feelings of any man; but I will assert, must be met, and history vindicated, let the consequences fall on whom they may. One act of cowardice on the part of Massachusetts burning witches in the ancient times. Does he not know that your gods people with slaves at the stake, and it seems to waken no horror in your minds."

MR. DAVIS of Miss. (interrupting). "I pronounce the gentleman's last observation unqualified. I pronounce the man's assertion falsehood."

MR. VAN WYCK. "My time is short, and I hope not to be interrupted."

MR. DAVIS of Miss. "You have no right to utter such foul and false slanders."

MR. GROW. "I rise to a point of order. It is that no member upon this floor has a right to libel the people of any portion of this country, and then deny the characteristics of that people the right to reply. I protest against the time continually being taken from me unfounded."

[Cries of "Order" on the Republican side.]

MR. VAN WYCK "I have heard such words before, and I say now, as I have declared on former occasions, the blustering of that sort. I am not here to libel any part of the Union."

MR. DAVIS, of Miss. "Will you go outside the District of Columbia and test the question of personal courage with any Southern man?"

MR. VAN WYCK. "I travel anywhere, and without fear of any one. For the first eight weeks of this session you stood upon the floor continually libelling the South and the people of the Free States, charging them with treason and all manner of crimes; and you yes but never in a great rage when I told you a few facts."

MR. DAVIS of Miss. "Mr. Chairman—"

THE CHAIR. "The gentleman from New York can not be interrupted except by a point of order, and the Chair appeals to the gentlemen of the Committee not to violate the rule of order in the House. The Chair trusts they will do so."

MR. DAVIS, of Miss. "I shall observe them, Sir, if others do not; but I certainly will not permit Southern people to be slandered."

MR. VAN WYCK. "If gentlemen are so sensitive in regard to these matters, I ask them to be as sensitive as to the feelings of others; if they were, we would not have had such a treasonable demonstration in the North as we had during the first eight weeks of the session."

AFFRAY AT WASHINGTON.

"An encounter occurred on March 7, between Colonel Fred. W. Lander, of Washington's, superintendent of the overland wagon road expedition, and W. H. F. Maguay, of Kansas, foreign correspondent of the Washington Sentinel of the same expedition. It will be recollected that an attack was made last winter in the Senate chamber upon Willard's Hotel, by Mr. Maguay, upon Colonel Lander. In this affray, it is said, Colonel Lander, who had been received four terrible blows—the first struck while his back was turned—but reacted Maguay to the floor, knocked down and beat him until pulled off by the bystanders. Maguay went away, and while Colonel Lander was present in the Rocky Mountains, stayed in St. Louis then he had whipped him in the fight, and at the same time supplied opprobrious epithets to him. Directly after the occurrence, Maguay sent two gentlemen to Colonel Lander begging him not to renew the difficulty which had originally grown out of Maguay's refusal to fight Colonel Lander a duel, or make required apology. Colonel Lander returned to California shortly after, and when the steamer arrived yesterday. To-day Colonel Lander met Maguay in front of Kirkwood's Hotel, and struck him a slapping. Maguay got out of a hack, with some friends. Lander was unarmed, but Maguay was. The gentleman to whom Maguay had made the aforesaid remarks. Colonel Lander said: 'Mr. Kinnaid if you are a gentleman, call your remarks to this gentleman.' Maguay stepped back upon the steps of the hotel, followed by Colonel Lander, who grew put his hand to his pocket and muttering, 'Damn you,' Lander struck him again, and Maguay drew his knife, saying, 'Apeat up, and speak loud, Sir!' Lander then struck Maguay again, upon the hotel. 'Yes,' said Lander, 'speak loud enough.' While the two were closing, attempted to go into the hotel; Lander stopped him, saying, 'Come round here, Sir,' and face to face, and unarmed, at the same time turning him rudely round by the shoulder.

HOW IT ENDED.

"Hereon Mr. Kirkwood, the proprietor of the hotel, in the most gentlemanly manner, interposed, requesting Lander not to create a disturbance in the house, telling him that the front door-keeper was very near, and pointed at the noise of the altercation. This for an instant parted the combatants, and permitted Maguay to get a weapon into fact. He immediately drew his pistol, and pointing it to Lander, said, 'Approach me again, and I will blow you a dead man.' Lander jumped to attack him, saying at the same time, 'I am unarmed, you cowardly—' It was no matter," Mr. Kirkwood again interposed. Colonel Lander said, 'Come out on the avenue again.' 'I will have this gentleman from this affair here, take your pistol, and I will point you at I am, unarmed, and you Maguay refused. Lander then, after stigmatizing him as a liar, a coward, a blackguard, and scoundrel, struck any one of the crowd to step forward—if which there were more than forty—and take up the gauntlet in the friend of Maguay. None up to king, Colonel Lander retired. The last parliamentary board was, 'I will be found my challenge; you have refused to name your time and place, and your own weapons, and now you shall have struck me with a billy and were whipped by me for it, and have lied to the contrary, and now you have sounded, you refuse a scratch fight; you with a loaded pistol and I unarmed—I shall never speak to you more.' Colonel Lander then made his apologies to the proprietors of the hotel, which he was in the habit of visiting, and retired. Colonel Lander was accompanied by Major Yates, and after the altercation joined by his brother, W. H. Watt, who took no part in the affair whatever. Colonel Lander is a Massachusetts man, and says for the honor of his State he will never carry concealed weapons, though he will fight any one who assaults him with or without them."

MURDER OF JOHN BROWN APPALD.

"In Grand Jury of Jefferson County, Virginia, having given indictments against Owen Brown, son of John Brown, and Hiram Morrison, two of the Harper's Ferry insurgents, Governor Letcher has made a requisition upon Governor Beriah Magoffin, of Kentucky, for the arrest and delivery to Virginia officers of said persons, and states that he has already given his reasons to Governor Letcher."

TRAGEDY AT SYRACUSE.

A terrible tragedy was enacted on Thursday in Syracuse. A husband, whose wife's honor had been tempted with by a Scotch boy, and pursued his two children and then himself, the poison proving fatal in each case. The man's name is Tinker, and that of the physician Searles. The latter has been indicted by the Coroner's Jury for this act from the indignation of the citizens.

A SAD STORY.

The Troy Times of the 25th ult. details the following: "Not a very great while ago—at least within the memory of the oldest inhabitant—a gentleman of wealth and position, who lives on the Fifth Avenue in New York, came to this city for the express purpose of seeing the rural elephant. He soon became acquainted with the different varieties of the animal, and among that he was very much pleased, as subsequently appeared, altogether too rapidly with the Circassian Girl. Some time since the New York gentleman became acquainted with a woman who bore a striking resemblance to the Circassian, and about any thing but virtue. She was a married woman, with as well as very fond of her husband. Her conscientiousness be possessed of his wherewhals. He was not a man to be trifled with, and the fair Circassian soon was unmoored and he would die. This alarmed the woman, who, in the course of a few days simply swore. The wife, thus left without restraint, took upon herself the management of affairs, and in the course of a few weeks, while he was confined to his room, nursed him assiduously. But all in vain. The husband grew worse, and not only returned, but made an application for a divorce, which was granted him by the Court, after having no defense to make. Since the severance of her connection with the husband, the woman has been more and added intemperance immorality. On Friday night last, after having spent the evening in a drinking saloon before returned to, a black mass of putrefactory loss and penury and misery, she committed suicide by drowning herself in a canal near the wages arrested the challenge, and the Coroner's inquest was held on the body on Saturday last. He at first declined to marry them, but upon being assured by the parties that they would be married with reluctance on account, and he performed the ceremony. The distinguished gentleman left the city on the next train, when the woman was taken to the house of her father, in this city, where she has since remained, and where she now lies dead, and offered a rich reward for the discovery of a husband. The husband of the woman is a respectable man, and her father is also respectably connected in this city."

TRAGEDY IN VIRGINIA.

We read in the Richmond Dispatch, February 29:

"The usually quiet and law-abiding people of Powhatan county, on the Richmond and Lynchburg road, were put three or four days, in consequence of a terrible tragedy, or series of tragedies, which occurred in their midst on Saturday last. The particulars reached this city last evening, and were communicated to us. The details, although not so full as we shall doubtless, be hereafter, are given at no time, are sufficiently startling to thrill of horror at their mere recital.

It appears, according to the version given us, that, some years since, a grand-daughter of the venerable and highly respectable Mr. Langhorne, of Powhatan county, married a gentleman from the adjoining County of Henrico, named Richard Clements. Of the latter gentleman we have been unable to ascertain. The maiden name of Mr. Winkler's grandson was Mary Ann Watt. The parties lived happily together until about eighteen months since, when, upon the most trivial provocation, as we have been informed, Mr. Clements desired a separation from his wife, and forthwith instituted proceedings for a divorce, at the same time impeaching her home as a place unfit for her.

"Last Saturday was set apart for the taking of depositions in the case, at the residence of Mr. Langhorne, in Mr. Henry County.

Mr. Watt, the father appeared to defend the suit and protect the honor of his grand-daughter.

While the taking of depositions progressed, and after the plaintiff had finished with a witness, Mr. Wither Watt, a brother of the defendant, arose and said the husband, Mr. Clements. He immediately arose, drawing a bowie knife as he did so, and made a lunge at Mr. Wither, it seems, who rose and drew a pistol from his pocket, and fired at Mr. Clements, the second penetrating the abdomen he fired, striking Clements in the forehead and killing him instantly.

"A nephew of Mr. Wither, and a Mr. Smith, brother of Mr. Clements, were present at the time of the affair in the room. A brother of Mr. Clements, who had also been present during the trial, was shot dead by the hand of Mr. Wither, the ball taking effect, and producing, it is feared, a fatal wound. Mr. Wither then shot himself, Mr. Vincent Wither again fired, striking Clemmens No. 2, in the left breast.

"At this stage of the sanguinary affair Mr. Smith, a brother of Mrs. Clements, who had been out of the room, securely unsheathed the blade when he was fired upon by a second brother of Mr. Wither, and he fell mortally wounded in the shoulder, and producing a painful wound. Influenced by the scene, Mr. Smith shot himself through the mouth, and with one powerful thrust of the knife completed the destruction of his life. Mr. Smith's countenance was falling dead on the spot.

"Three of the parties died, and the other three all wounded, the terrible tragedy here ended."

HORRIBLE DEATH.

The Providence Journal says: "A melancholy and fatal accident occurred about nine o'clock Monday morning, at the Dyerville Mills, in the town of Cumberland, Rhode Island. Mrs. Potter, wife of Asa Potter, who lived in the upper story of the basement of the mill, was passing near the upright shaft, when her dress caught on the lower end of the shaft, and wound on the shaft, winding it around the shaft, throwing her down, and her head striking the floor, was instantly killed. Her body, the shaft making one hundred revolutions per minute. The shaft was stopped as soon as possible, but she was dead when disentangled from it. While the machinery was in motion, the belts and pulleys were constantly thrown against the contiguous machinery in a very fearful manner, and the body was dashed with crush and mangle the bones and flesh of her head, neck, shoulders, arms, and upper portion of the body. The husband had charge of the room, and was present when the sad accident occurred. He left two boys, the youngest about four years of age.

THE CORONATION OF NAPLES.

The London Times of the 16th ultimo says: "Mr. Hewson, the American consul, has been known in the island of Jersey, Mr. Hewson, the American consul, has been known in the island of Jersey, Mr. Hewson, the American consul, has been known in the island of East Hartford, adjoining the city of Solihull, and the Rev. Mr. Sparrow, the officiating minister. The forthcoming contest with Sayers for the championship of England.

FRANCE.

GRAVE LOOK OF AFFAIRS.

The Herald of Freedom says: "In France affairs wear a grave look. The protectionists are doing all in their power to defeat the accomplishment of the new commercial treaty, but the Emperor has evinced so great a determination to carry out his favorite policy that the machinations of the foe against the interests of the many have been, up to the present time, baneful. The protectionists were unable to understand that any attempt at protection by their representatives in the Corps Legislatif would be the signal for the working-classes would be dealt with in a most severe and summary manner. The result has been a cessation of all manner of manifestations of insubordination among the operatives. In the mean while the treaty has been published, and the public are about to judge for itself that the interests of all parties were cared for thereby. A consequent reaction has set in many of the hitherto violent political clubs, has taken place, and the Government may now confidently look an easy transition into wiser and more liberal commercial relations with all the world, should not the intelligent and shrewd police of the communities facing that of England succeed in overthrowing a treaty that is but the forerunner of similar treaties with all other commercial nations."

It is said that in France affairs wear a grave look. I refer thereby to the machinations of the clergy, who are frightened at the liberal opposition by to the Emperor than his Holiness, he should be meek and lowly notwithstanding the temporal power really remained to Pius IX. The pope man is gentle enough himself, but he no more dreams of Antichrist, who will appear in the time of the end, than of Antichrist, who urges him on to acts of violence and persecution. He is the victim of fear for the cause of the Church. Each day the ranks of the papal army are thinned more and more, and the order for a more imminent between these restless mercenaries and the people of Rome.

THE QUESTION OF SAVOY.

The London Morning Post contains the following important statement:

"This question no longer adds to the complications of Europe. The cession of Savoy and Nice is definitively ascertained of France. The Emperor Napoleon had foreseen the difficulty which would arise in Italy. Since one of events pushed in the direction of an Italian kingdom, he had sought to find a compensation that public opinion would raise from the French shores of the Alps between the Emperor and the Sardinian Government for the cession of Savoy. The French Government has been however, prevented from carrying out this for the decision that was to be carried at by the great Powers of Europe. The Treaty of Zurich, of last year, in addition may therefore be considered as definitely obsolete."

THE CONDITION OF NAPLES.

He added: "Allow me, one closing day letter, to assure you that I have not lost the hope of seeing once that he rests, sleeps, and takes his usual outdoor exercise, and that, in the midst of the anxieties of his position, the tremendous responsibility of the country establishment, he is in the enjoyment of health and spirits. Some people in Majesty, and observed that he was gay, and cut his cigar with his usual coolness and dexterity. I am sure that he never had but extraordinary spinal diseases or dental affections, and that his wife has also enjoyed a good deal of secret mail shots and blades scenes. The Empress and Princess Imperial are also in excellent health."

ITALY

PROBABLE WHOLESALE EXCOMMUNICATION.

A letter from Rome in the Nord says: "Violent movements are said to be in preparation among the highest personages in the Government. The first would be a wholesale excommunication of the Emperor and of the sovereigns who may assist him; next, the placing of Rome under interdict. The bull of excommunication by the Pope of a general council to examine the question relative to the rights of the temporal power of the Popes may not be ascribed to the ingredient contained therein, but may be fee to assume the attitude to those concessions ought not to be retracted as concerns to the principle of religion. Such are the wild projects put forward by ultramontanism."

CONVULSIONS.

At latest accounts from Naples rumors that Victor Emanuel had loaned an address urging Naples and Sicily to the cause of Italian unity. Great armaments were being secretized. A Congregation at the Vatican had been convoked to consider the affairs of the Romagna, no matter what political events might supervene.

LITERATURE & ARTISTS AT HOME.

The Editorial Correspondence of the New York Albion, dated at Rome, gives the following interesting account of the state of the arts there:

"With a facility of adaptation that seems to be the peculiar gift of the Italian artist, Mr. Hicks has been taken her plate suddenly among sculptors, and promises to become one of the most distinguished artists. It might have been guessed, it might have been the instant he arrived in Rome, that he would take to it, for he arrived upon a car-car. Many have tried to discover the secret of his success in his new profession, but indeed, it will not—it is, otherwise with this lady. Intuitive genius, that instantly grasps the spirit of any thing, and has already executed in marble a pair of statuettes, the first of which is the size of life, and the second of which will be greatly admired when they are seen. The first is a figure of a young girl, standing in a lovely attitude, and with a most charming face. Close to order, the order entailed uncommon difficulty. They were to be in the costumary costumes of our day; and, being intended for sprite and sorrow niches in a handsome drawing-room, the sculptor was obliged to the leading sculpture decline positively to sanction the innovation of modern dress. Gentlemen that would not say may be represented as they really are, in the material which the most industrially employ, but when a young lady are doing save reality. Mr. Gibson would not undertake, at any price, that which he considered unworthy of art, and generally are in the year of grace 1859. Not so Miss Hosmer. She has adopted the magical maxim of modern civilization, and is determined that it was not a hopeless one."

SPAIN

THE WAR WITH MOROCCO.

At latest dates Marshal O'Donnell was actively engaged in forwarding the war preparations and in reconsidering the terms of peace with Morocco. He had received eleven delegates sent by Muley Abbas to ask on what conditions he would grant peace. Marshal O'Donnell replied that the Queen alone had the right to fix the conditions of peace, and, however, sent a messenger to Madrid on the subject.

The Madrid Correo of the 16th says that General Ortega had left for Ceuta with the conditions upon which peace will be granted.

The Correspondencia de Espana believes the war will continue.

MEXICO.

REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS.

Advices from Northern Mexico, received via Galveston, report that Miramon had left Monterey with 2,000 men for Zacatecas.

It is also reported that Miramon has ordered Cortina to hold out until March, when he would receive reinforcements.

WEST INDIES.

FIRE IN TRINIDAD.

A very destructive fire occurred in Bridgetown, Barbadoes, on the night of the 22d ultimo, which laid waste Swan Street, Coleridge, and spread over to Nelson Square, consuming many dwelling-houses and other buildings. The loss is estimated at $2,500,000. Messrs. Griffith and Co., agents of the Phœnix company, and Messrs. Cook in Bridgetown and New York, were entirely consumed. Their books and papers, which were fully insured for insurance. G. and S. Shook were fully covered by insurance in a highly respectable Jersey company, and all their consignments abroad were fully insured in Liverpool. Lloyd's risk at $6 25 to $7 in Bridgetown.

NOVA SCOTIA.

THE LATEST FROM THIS "HUNGARIAN."

The steamship Hungarian is expected to be sold at Barrington on the 23d instant, for salvage.

The body of another man, supposed to have been a passenger, has been found. Two of his teeth were filled, one with silver and the other with gold. The body was buried.

The books and letters of Clement B. Fassett, M. D., of New York, and the personal effects of his daughter Ada, have also been found also the letters of G. Bancroft, of Brighton, England, and of Mark Downes, of Dublin.

"FOR WHILE THEY THE HOUSE WERE HOLDING, BALLS THE WIVES WERE FASTLY MOULDING."

THE SACK OF DEERFIELD, MARCH, 1704,

A BALLAD OF MASSACHUSETTS.

BY THOMAS DUNN ENGLISH.

Or the onset fear-inspiring, and the firing and the pillage
Of our village, when De Rouville with his forces on us fell,
When, eve dawning of the morning, with no death-portending warning,
With no token shown or spoken, came the foemen, hear me tell.

High against the palisadoes, on the meadows, banks, and hill-sides,
At the frill-sides, over fences, lay the lingering winter snow;
And, so high by tempest rifted, at our pickets it was drifted,
That its frozen crust was chosen as a bridge to bear the foe.

We had set at night a sentry, lest an entry, while the sombre,
Heavy slumber was upon us, by the Frenchman should be made;
But the faithless knave we posted, though of wakefulness he boasted,
'Stead of keeping watch was sleeping, and our solemn trust betrayed.

Than our slumber none profounder; never sounder fell on sleeper,
Never deeper sleep its shadow cast on dull and listless frames;
But it flew before the crashing of the portals, and the flashing
And the soaring and the roaring and the crackling of the flames.

"HUGE HE WAS AND BRAVE AND BRAWNY, BUT I MET THE SLAYER TAWNY."

Fell the shining hatchets quickly 'mid the thickly-crowded women,
Growing dim in crimson currents from the pulses of the brain;
Rained the balls from firelocks deadly, till the melted snow ran redly
With the glowing torrent, flowing from the bodies of the slain.

I, from pleasant dreams awaking at the breaking of my easement,
With amazement saw the foemen quickly enter where I lay;
Heard my wife and children's screaming, as the hatchets wake their dreaming,
Heard their groaning and their moaning as their spirits passed away.

'Twas in vain I struggled madly as the sadly-sounding pleading,
Of my blessing, dying darlings fell upon my tortured ears;
'Twas in vain I wrestled, raging, fight against their numbers waging,
Crowding round me there, they bound me, while my manhood sank in tears.

At the spot to which they bore me, no one o'er me watched or wavied;
There unguarded, bound and shivering, on the snow I lay alone;
Watching by the firelight ruddy, as the butchers dank and bloody,
Slew the nearest friends and dearest to my memory ever known.

And it seemed as rose the roaring blaze, up soaring, redly streaming
O'er the gleaming snow around me through the shadows of the night,
That the figures flitting fastly were the fiends at revels ghastly,
Madly urging on the surging, seething billows of the fight.

"FELL THE SHINING HATCHETS QUICKLY 'MID THE THICKLY-CROWDED WOMEN."

Then I felt, though horror-stricken, pulses quicken as the swarthy
Savage, or the savage Frenchman, fiercest of the cruel band,
Darted in and out the shadows, through the shivered palisadoes,
Death-blows dealing with unfeeling heart,
and never-sparing hand.

Soon the sense of horror left me, and bereft me of all feeling;
Soon, revealing all my early golden moments, memory came;
Showing how when young and sprightly, with a footstep falling lightly,
I had pondered as I wandered on the maid I loved to name.

Her, so young, so pure, so dovelike, that the lovelike angels whom a Sweet aroma circles ever whersoe'er they wave their wings,
Felt with her the air grow sweeter, felt with her their joy completer,
Felt their gladness swell to madness, silent grow their silver strings.

Then I heard her voice's murmur breathing summer, while my spirit
Leaned to hear it and to drink it like a draught of pleasant wine;
Felt her head upon my shoulder drooping
as my love I told her,
Felt the utterly-pleased flutter of her heart respond to mine.

Then I saw our darlings clearly that more nearly linked our gladness;
Saw our sadness as a lost one sank from pain to happy rest;
Mingled tears with hers and chid her, bade her by our love consider How our dearest now was nearest to the blessed Master's breast.

I had lost that wife so cherished, who had perished, pass'd from being,
In my seeing—I, unable to protect her or defend;
At that thought dispersed those fancies, born of woe-begotten trances,
While unto me came the gloomy present hour my heart to rend.

For I heard the firelocks ringing, fiercely flinging forth the whirring,
Blood-preferring leaden bullets from a garrisoned abode;
There it stood so grim and lonely, speaking of its tenants only,
When the furious leaden couriers from its loop-holes fastly rode.

"THEN WE HEARD DE ROUVILLE'S ORDERS, 'TO THE BORDERS!'"

Suddenly my gloom was lightened, hope was heightened, though the shrieking,
Malice-wreaking, ruthless wretches, death were scattering to and fro;
For a knife lay there—I spied it, and a tomahock beside it,
Glittering brightly, buried lightly, keen edge upward, in the snow.

Naught knew I how came they thither, nor from whither; naught to me then
If the heathen dark, my captors, dropped those weapons there or no;
Quickly drawn o'er axe-edge lightly, cords were cut that held me tightly,
Then, with engines of my vengeance in my hands, I sought the foe.

Oh, what anger dark, consuming, fearful,
glooming, looming horrid,
Lit my forehead, draped my figure,
kept in fury from my glove;
Midst the foemen rushing frantic, to their sight I seemed gigantic,
Like the motion of the ocean, like a tempest my advance.

Stoutest of them all, one savage, left the ravage round and faced me;
Fury braced me, for I knew him—he my pleading wife had slain;
Huge he was and brave and brawny, but
I met the slayer tawny,
And with rigorous blow and vigorous clove his tufted skull in twain—
Madly dashing down the crashing bloody hatchet in his brain.

As I brained him rose their calling—"Lo! appalling, from you meadow
The Moncda of the white man comes with vengeance in his train!"
As they fled, my blows Titanic falling fast increased their panic,
Till their shattered forces scattered widely o'er the snowy plain.

Stern De Rouville then their error, born of terror, soon dispersing,
Loudly cursing them for folly, roused their pride with words of scorn;
Peering cautiously they knew me, then by numbers overthrew me;
Fettered surely, bound securely, there again I lay forlorn.

Well I knew their purpose horrid, on each forehead it was written—
Pride was smitten that their bravest had retreated at my ire;
For the rest the captives' durance, but for me there was assurance
Of the tortures known to martyrs—of the terrible death by fire.

And the seven who kept it stoutly, though devoutly triumph praying,
Ceased not slaying, trusting somewhat to their firelocks and their wives;
For while they the house were holding, halls the wires were fastly moulding—
Neither fearful, wild nor tearful, toiling earnest for their lives.

Onward rushed each dusky leaguer, hot and eager, but the seven
Rained the levin from their firelocks, as the Pagans forward pressed;
Melting at that murderous firing, back that baffled foe retiring,
Left there lying, dead or dying, ten, their bravest and their best.

Rose the red sun, straightly throwing from his glowing disk his brightness
On the whiteness of the snow-drifts and the ruins of the town—
On those houses well-defended, where the foe in vain expended
Ball and powder, standing prouder, smoke-begrimed and scarred and brown.

Not for us those rays shone fairly, tinting rarely dawning early,
With the pearly light and glistering of the March's snowy morn;
Some were wounded, some were weary, some were sullen, all were dreary,
As the sorrow of that morrow shed its cloud of woe forlorn.

"THEN I CUT THE CORD THAT BOUND ME, PEERED AROUND ME, ROSE UPRIGHTLY—"

Then we heard De Rouville's orders, "To the borders!" and the clarion[1],
Dark, abysmal fate before us opened widely as he spoke;
But we heard a shout in distance—into flutter-ing existence.
Brief but splendid, quickly ended, at the sound our hopes awoke.

'Twas our kinsmen armed and ready, sweeping steady to the nor'ward,
Pressing forward fleet and fearless, though in scanty force they came—Cried De Rouville, grimly speaking, "It's our captives you are seeking?
Well, with iron we environ them and wall them round with flame.

"With the toil of blood we won them and undone them with our bravery;
Off to slavery then we carry them or leave them lifeless here.
Foul my shame so far to wander and my soldiers' blood to squander
'Mid the slaughter free as water, should our prey escape us clear.

"Off, ye scum of peasants Saxon, and your backs on Frenchmen turning,
To our burning, dauntless conquer prospect tribute promptly pay;
Do you come to seize and beat us? Are you here to slay and eat us?
If your meat be Gaul and Mohawk, we will starve you out to-day."

How my spirit raged to hear him, standing near him bound and helpless!
Never whelpless tigress fiercer howled at slayer of her young,
When secure behind his engines, he has baffled her and vengeance,
Than did I there, forced to lie there while his bitter taunts he flung.

For I heard each leaden missile whar- and whistle from the trusty
Firelock rusty, brought there after long-time absence from the strife,
And was forced to stand in quiet with my warm blood running riot,
When for power to give an hour to battle I had bartered life.

All in vain they thus had striven; backward driven, beat and broken,
Leaving token of their coming in the dead around the dell,
They retreated—well that served us! their retreat from death preserved us,
Though the order for our murder from the dark De Rouville fell.

As we left our homes in sashes, through the lashes of the sternest,
Welled the earnest tears of anguish for the dear ones passed away;
Sick at heart and heavily loaded, though with cruel blows they goaded,
Sorely cumbered, miles we numbered footsore alone that weary day.

They were tired themselves of tramping, for ensuring they were ready,
Ere the steady twilight newer pallor threw upon the snow;
So they built them huts of branches, in the snow they scooped out trenches,
Heaped up firing, then retiring, let us sleep our sleep of woe.

By the wrist—and by no light hand—to the right hand of a painted,
Murder-tainted, loathsome Pagan, with a paler face than I,
Soon was tied:
And the one to whom they bound me, 'mid the scoffs of those around me,
Bowing to me, mocking, drew me down to slumber with him, too.

There I lay—no muscle stirring, mind unerring, thought unswerving,
Body nerving, till a death-like, breathless slumber fell around;
Then my right hand cautious stealing, o'er my bedmate's person feeling,
Till each finger stooped to linger on the belt his waist that bound.

'Twas his knife—the handle clasping, firmly grasping, forth I drew it,
Clinging to it firm, but softly, with a more than robber's art;
As I drove it to its utter length of blade, I heard the flutter
Of a snow-bird—ah! 'twas no bird! 'twas the flutter of my heart.

Then I cut the cord that bound me, pierced around me, rose uprightly,
Stepped as lightly as a lover on his blessed bridal day;
Swiftly as my need inclined me, kept the bright North Star behind me,
And, ere dawning of the morning, I was twenty miles away.

THE CASH-BOY.

"WELL, John, you can tell your mother that we do not want you any longer."

Thus spoke Mr. Augustus Ledger, head book-keeper and prospective "Co." of the Broadway dry-goods firm of Muzzlin & Measure—meantime care fully arranging the curl over the left ear by the aid of a small mirror balanced against an inkstand.

A plaintive, sacred voice came up through the bars of the desk, "asking one word of incredulousness—" Sir?" and a pair of pitiful little chapped hands fell to twirling a button on the shabby coat from pure nervousness.

"I say," continued the elegant Augustus, "you can tell your mother that we don't want you any longer. That pore monnie has never been found, and we can't trust you."

The poor little cash-boy turned away from his harsh judge with a spot of red on either cheek that told how he had felt the insult. The incident referred to was the unaccountable disappearance of a pocket-book that Mrs. Velours had declared to have been stolen from her while in the store. She was quite sure where she had laid it while deciding upon the merits of some laces, and positive too that the little "light-haired boy" was the only creature near it. Three days had passed since then, and no traces of the missing article came to hand; and the exquisite Augustus declared that "it would not do to have such a baby-looking boy about them any way," and he coolly crushed out hope in the poor little heart in every vestige of which the most bitter were those, "You can tell your mother."

Mr. Ledger was a widower—had laid in a grave to which she gladly went, a fair-haired wife. He had fancied her beauty once, but soon tired of it, and his restless, vacillating nature should not be true to any thing but his own supreme selfishness. So she had died one spring day when her baby boy was three weeks old. Every body said she was a frail creature, and could not be expected to live. Augustus said so, and thought to himself how irresistible he should look in full mourning; and if there ever came a thought that perhaps a true manly heart and gentle protecting arm might have saved the poor flower, he banished it. He gave himself credit for being a "real good fellow," and so he was good to himself. He ran some up with hired nurses; and another, any other contingency that drifted about him. He too was a "cash," pet and idle, but well favored and successful. He was the one who laughed loudest at Johnny's queer coat and patched boots. His father could not appear in the time-honored "best suit" to which every boy he sure," he thought, "all that was well enough for women;" "but—" And he would shrug his shoulders, and cry to think of Augustus, also. There were times that would come to him when the echo of his dead wife's prayers came like a fer-off sound of solemn music, and the orchestra of the theatre soon drove it away. Such was Augustus Ledger, widower, head book-keeper, and prospective "Co."

John was a little fellow, and this was his first start in life, so it was not to be wondered at that "telling mother" brought the tears to his eyes. He went for his shabby cap and to say good-by to Lewis; the only boy about the place who had humanity who had stopped in the mad race for preferment to care for a poor little weed straggling for life on the barren sands of Wall street. He it was who had slyly slipped a stray dime now and then in the boy's hand for his mother; he it was who had shielded him when Junius Ledger had made fun of the merino coat, stigmatizing it as "woman-made" (that coat in whose history was bound up more of real pathos and unwritten sacrifice than in many a moving tale of fiction)—and he, too, who had interceded for the three days' absence. "Good by, Master Grey!" and the little thin hand trembled as Lewis grasped it in his own. Lewis was what every body called "a weak man;" he never knew how to do a thing gracefully; couldn't dance better than a bear; and above all, couldn't endure to have any one know how self-sacrificing he really was. If a beggar crossed his path he would answer her gruffly "No," and then, perhaps, turn back two blocks to bestow a gratuity, and bury that face and brown eyes that were not afraid to look at you; but his mouth was awake, his nose nothing to speak of, and his complexion not to be compared to the pink and white that appeared in the face of Augustus Ledger. He started at the feverish thin hand was laid in his own, and his first impulse was to cut—to be the little fellow in his arms and fight somebody: he didn't know who; his second thought was, that that course wouldn't be best: so he only said, almost gruffly, to cover his feelings at the sight of the frail boy's misery, "Now, Johnny, John, don't give up the ship;" and then he wheeled straight round and turned his back to him, and Johnny quietly walked away. What made Lewis Grey stand and stare at a pile of gray and brown calico—why he should use his handkerchief so unnecessarily—or why he should remark to his neighbor, when he turned around again, "Very bad weather for colds this," I don't know, but that was the performance.

John walked out into the sunshine with a heavy heart; past the long rows of shops, where every body seemed to have something to do and some place in this world; past the brown stone fronts, where rosy children looked out of the windows; past the long markets, where provisions were so plenty it seemed as though no one ought to be hungry in the world; and past the quiet old churchyard, where, long ago, the dead were laid, but where, now, the sod was unbroken from the first of summer sunshine until the last whirling leaves of autumn played at hide-and-seek among the tombstones. He stopped and looked through the iron fence at this quiet spot. A daisy, a real live daisy, grew within his reach, and as it bent toward him with the gentle wind, it put him in mind of the days "when father was alive," and they lived in the country. He was thirteen years old and now, but it seemed as though ages had passed since that happy time two years before, and the boy sighed wearily. The daisy kept nodding and nodding to him, as much as to re-echo Lewis Grey's words, "Don't give up the ship." Then, in a fit of childishness, he would not call it a daisy. "Oh yes, it's very well for you to be so jolly: you don't have any trouble—we folks have to pay for being alive, when we don't owe a cent, and are alive a single day, and, daisy! you ain't tired either; your back don't ache as mine does, I know, or you wouldn't keep on bowing so; and nobody's ugly to you." As he spoke there came a great gust of wind around the corner, and, sweeping all into a heap, laid the flower down for him to pick. In a moment the breeze had passed, and then it was up again and nodding to John as much as to say, "You couldn't but mind at it, and at the same moment felt a light touch on his shoulder, and, turning, saw a young girl with a bundle and some books in her hand.

"Well, my little friend," said she, in the gentlest voice in the world, "don't you see how patient the daisy is?" at the same time smiled kindly as he looked up in her face. "I heard you talking just now, and I wondered whether you thought that God put you and the daisy there for the world because he had something for you each to do?" and her kind dark eyes looked inquiringly at the small grumbler. He knew from her tone and bearing where he had been sitting, and answered, frankly.

"Oh, yes, Miss, I know—mother tells me such things, and sometimes I try to feel right, but I have felt pretty bad to-day. I am not very well nowadays."

A boy's confidence is easily won, and as he walked beside Miss Katie Bonn, before he was aware of it he had told all his simple troubles in a few childhood until now, sewing gladly for the smallest pay; how hard she had worked to get the place where she was, and how she liked it. "And now," said he, "she will be so sorry about it—to think that any body should call me a thief;" and here the trembling lip quivered too much to form the words. Sweet Katie Bonn! she listened till her own blue eyes were filling up too; but she put her hand on the boy's shoulder, and said, cheerily,

"Keep up your courage, Johnny; I think I can get you back to your mother to-day, and you shall come and see her to-morrow. Here are some tracts, and I'll write my name and number on one, and you must come and bring home work sometimes. Good-by. I am going up home now."

The widow Mead had just finished her household work. "The last of seven was as bright as cleanliness could make it; the striped rag carpet was unlitterel by a shred; through the open closet door the shelves were shining as scrubbing and clothes brush could make them; the bright cookstove was a mirror, and the bedcovering was clean and trim. The widow had only one article of Johnny's stocking-ing, and when many a modest little bit of an air-castle was woven as well as the heel of the well-worn stockings; and when she should get to the dark by-and-by, and then rise to be a "Co.," and then they would have a fine house with fine clothes she had built, for them without the city. There should be honey-suckles trained over the windows and mignonette be-neath; there should be a garden and red roses every where, and a shady porch in the midst of them; and Johnny would be grown so tall and stout, and have such a deep voice, and such a—and—as was the pleasant dream running on, when in the midst of it the door opened, and with the sound of its latch fell the little fabric she had built, for there was Johnny, poor little Johnny, tired and sick at heart. The tears would come now, and he sat down on the door-step and let his mother's feet and cried bitterly, telling her as well as sobs would allow his tried and disgrace.

"Oh, mother! I can't stand it—I can't! Mr. Ledger is too bad; he knows I didn't touch the money; you'd believe me, mother, you know. Jim, too. You need not shake your head, mother, I do; he has had lots lately."

"Hush, my son," said his mother, stroking down his fair hair with caressing hand, "my dear son, don't talk so; you must not accuse another when you do not so badly about it yourself. It will be found out, I am sure, who took it; and perhaps you can get another place: I am sure God has not left us badly about it yourself. It will be found out, I am sure, who took it; and perhaps you can get another place: I am sure God has not left us badly about it yourself. It will be right. It is pretty hard to forgive Mr. Ledger; but we ought to try to do it, and maybe he will be sorry himself."

Then she wiped his eyes and talked cheery and hopefully, though she could not but see that the failure of his petty salary was starvation to them. She brought him some bread—the last loaf and a little drink of milk, and sighed as she saw how weak and pale he looked. Poverty was coming pretty close now. She could get no work, and the few pence that she earned for the last piece were all that she could depend upon for food for the morrow. But with the trusting faith of a true Christian she nerved what she said, when in her nightly prayer she asked, "Give us this day our daily bread"—ready to go out on the morrow to seek for it in every honest and laborious way; but trusting still that His hand would guide her steps.

We left Lewis Grey wiping his eyes and clearing his throat behind the counter of Muzzlin & Measure, declaring that it must be he had taken cold. The slim little figure, clad in faded pants and coat of uncouth cut, the drooping eyes and hot hands haunted him; and Lewis was desperately vexed to think he had let the boy go home with them finding where he lived. "By George!" said he to himself, "I don't believe he has enough to eat." He would fain have started off in hot pursuit in his usual better-clothier manner, but a fat dowager demanded his undivided attention while she selected some sort of a "popolorum" fabric as he called it. She was dispatched at last well satisfied, and her place was taken by a fair young girl, no older than our sweet friend Katie Bonn, who, after leaving our little friend, bent thither her steps. She had been in the store several times before, and Lewis always blushed tremendously when she appeared. Her graceful form and movements seemed something wonderful to him, who never knew what to do with his hands and feet; her quiet womanly self-possession, a marvel he could not sufficiently admire. He had found out, in a roundabout fashion, one day too, that she was "Miss Bonn!" that her father was of the great and mighty firm of "Bonn & Bonn;" and, moreover, that Augustus Ledger was thinking, in the most sublime assurance of success, that he might as well make up his mind to sacrifice his elegant self in consideration of the sum which might reasonably belong to "Old Bonn's" only daughter. But Old Bonn's daughter had an idea of such a thing. She laughed a little to herself as she saw his growing devotion, and thought that it would be well to be any harm to bring out him to her feet, just to tell him "No, I thank you." Lewis was a very conscious trembling the silk as he could be; but nevertheless the fates would get turned in the most aggravating manner, and loudly he resolved to push a piece in her lap. Then he had to apologize, and as the little woman laughed merrily and returned it with quiet grace, he felt that he was the rather vexed that he was angry, as though his hair wasn't brushed right; in fact, as though he wasn't worthy to stand before her at all.

She was indeed a most a pretty and fascinating person he was, and what good, honest eyes he had, and speculating whether, if he married at all, it could be for any thing but love. In the course of this, and was rather relieved when she turned away to examine something out of the counter, which, he remembered too the discarded cash-boy, and started in a hurry to look for him.

He found out Katie knew one of the clerks say, "There goes Grey. He'll chase a dozen blocks after that cash-boy, I bet you!" In a moment it flashed through Lewis's mind that this must be Lewis Grey—no other than the kind friend that little John loved so well. She stopped to look at it, and had to long that the clerk was obliged to recall her.

"Would this suit?"

"No! I am sure not that, something heavier." The fair hands were turning over coarse muslins and flannels, for she "remembered the poor," and, with a little flush in her cheek, showed others more. She hired poor women to make garments that were sold at high rates in the store, and did this quietly, and in many a poor home they thanked God for sending her to them in their times of destitution. And yet no one ever openly conversed or associated with Katie Bonn. The cloth was purchased, and as she passed Augustus she looked so sweet and innocent that he had to lap his head on the counter at once. One hundred thousand dollars—sweet face, little Methodistical—break her of that soon—yes, oh, yes, would do very well.

Three weeks had slipped away with its burden of joy and sorrow, cares and hopes. The sun of April was reflected back from the tall, fair towns and glorious brick of the city. The widow odors came up from reeking streets, even to the windows at high up in the room where Johnny Mead lay ill. Yes, he was very ill. The excitement and grief of that day had brought on a brain fever that had nearly worn him out. Like a ministering angel, Katie Bonn had come and gone—come from the luxurious drawing-room to those poor rooms, had given food and wine and work, had cheered the poor mother, and helped her bear this saddest trial of all. It was a blessing to her to be able to call only have the sweet charity and humble spirit of this young girl!

The boy's eyes brighten as, propped up on pillows, he waits her coming—listens for her footsteps on the creaking stairs. Ah, she is here. Her bright and expressive face beside him, and her voice speaks:

"How is my little friend? See, I have brought you some nice jelly and some oranges. I borrowed on purpose for you yesterday when I was out of town;" and she put in his hand a bunch of roses, syringia, prickly interwoven with fresh sweet sprays, clover-heads, and daisies. How he held them all, cool and dewy as they were, to his hot cheek and lip—it did not feel that he should thank her otherwise. His mother's eyes were full of tears as she thanked the kind friend God had raised up for them. But Katie had hard work to keep still as some one she left them it was all arranged that she should call every day on her way to the store of her carand take the sick child and his mother in her carriage out to the country of her father's estate of Green Lawn. A little bit of a cottage, then, through Katie's instrumentality, had been fitted for them, and she thought that she could give Mrs. Mead enough employment to supply her daily wants. What a happy prospect! Katie had declared that if it could only be found out that he had not committed the theft, and if he could only see Lewis Grey before he went to sea, he should be almost perfectly happy. He concluded at last to write a note to Lewis, which he did, in scrambling, unformed characters, thus:

"MR. GREY—I hope you have not forgotten me: I am little Johnny the cash-boy that you used to be so clever to. I am pretty sick—the Dr. says that maybe the country air will do me good; and oh! I have got such a kind friend—she is going to take me and mother to Clover-land, or some such name, next week. Oh, Mr. Grey! hasn't my lady found out about that money I said I didn't take? Please come to see me. I am tired now. Good-by, dear Sir, JOHN MEAD."

This letter was finished with much weariness and labor, under the supervision of Katie's soft blue eyes, and her practical thoughtfulness added what he had forgotten, the number and street, and as Johnny was too tired to finish the superscription, it was written in her own fair round hand, and posted on her way home, and not a day passed after that without Lewis's kindly face. A week more and again we are at Johnny's bedside. Gone now are all the hopes of health or life. With bowed head and form, the mother looks at the child she loves as he lies so faint and white. The doctor stands beside him; but in his pitying eye there is no ray of hope.

The river is wide open, and the sounds of busy life come up from the street below, dimly, and as though the roar had come from the same world as that within the sick chamber. Katie is there, watching every movement, proffering the iced drinks, changing the pillow, and praying in her heart like Job when death all things well would comfort the mother. Now and then the boy's mind would wander off among the scenes he had loved; and then, like a cloud, would come the great sorrow, and the stoutest heart would have melted to hear those painful, wandering, and troubled thoughts.

"Oh! I never stole—oh no, no, never. I didn't eat the money; did you, Jimmy? Now I must tell mother—she will be so sorry :" then, changing his fancies, his eye would light up as he said, "The daisies," "the daisies," they are calling me. Mother I must go; the daisies, they are calling me to stay with them. Then a mean—and a few moments' deep and unclouded sleep.

All held their breath as the sick child slept; and when a low tap at the door was followed by the entrance of Lewis Grey, who seemed eager to speak some good tidings, Katie laid her finger on her lip and pointed to the bed. The noise of his entrance, however, awoke him, and he had become calmed and conscious in this interval. He held out his hand to Lewis who sat beside him. As he was gone to speak to him, but the words choked him, and he whispered to Miss Katie to tell him that the child had discovered to be Jimmy Ledger, and that every body knew now that John was true. Johnny held out his arms, and with the one word, "Mother" he gave her to lay her head beside him then, with a face of perfect peace, he began to make his childish preparation for that letter land.

"Good by, Lewis, you have been very good to me, and I hope I shall know you when you go to heaven.

"Miss Katie, I should like you to plant a few daisies on my grave."

On the pavement words between mother and son we will not intrude; of the child's hope through Him who blessed little children, we may speak: of the agony of love that cheered him as he was "going to the daisies," when, with the eyes raised, the weak voice whispered, "Now I lay me down to sleep." Then no shame to Lewis Grey's manhood that he cried like a child; for his guardian angel was by him, then unseen, to bid him look to that Saviour who carried this sufferer to peace down the dark valley. A few more murmurings, a few faint sobbing breaths, and the Cash-boy had closed his account.

THE CADET'S BABY.

I AM a military man—not a private in the ranks, but an officer these many years. I have seen service in Florida, in Mexico, on the borders, and a hair of 'hominy's' own. a few.

When I was just seventeen, a cadet at West Point, I was on my way home for the first time with my uniform, and (I grow up now) was not a little conscious or indifferent as I seemed to the many admiring glances young ladies bestowed upon it and the martyr-like coldness of general within.

Toward the middle of the forenoon an Irishwoman got into the cars. They were crowded, and she, no doubt, had no respect for the military while others had had, took what was almost the only unoccupied seat, and by my side. I am, or was, a Democrat, the woman was well clad and clean, so I kept my place. In her arms she held a child —a young babe of some six or eight months. It was a plump, beautiful, happy little thing. I had a very unmanly and uncadetish weakness for both babies and mothers, and it was so long since I had been so near to either that I petted and noticed this little creature not a little.

At most of the stops it stopped for five minutes. Most of the passengers got out. I meant to have the novelty of a six o'clock dinner in Boston, so I did not stir from my seat. Seeing that I did not, the woman begged to know if I would hold her baby for her a few moments while she got out. I assented. She took the child in my arms and vanished. The minutes passed away; one by one the passengers returned; presently, when the bell rang, a crowd came with a rush to resume their places; the locomotive started; we were off; and where, in the name of horrors! where was the woman? My hair began to rise, and the sweat to start from every pore; still I waited, hoping that the woman was trying to get through the other cars, and would come finally to assume her responsibility.

A quarter of an hour elapsed; every body was quietly seated, and still I held that child. People began to stare, young ladies to titter. I felt myself as red as a lobster. The conductor passed through. I stopped him. With a shaking finger I pointed to the burden in my arms, and stammered out something about the mother having been left behind.

"What the d—l!" he exclaimed, as his eye fell on the child. "Well, you're in for it, and no mistake. I saw that woman after she got out streaking it like mad away from the depôt, but I thought she had her young one with her. You're nicely took in and done for, that's a fact."

"But what's to be done with this child?" I asked.

"Don't know, I'm sure. How far are you going?"

"To Boston (a-sigh."

"Then I guess you'll have to carry it as far as there. Then you can take it to one of the hospitals or asylums; that may attend to this sort of business, and leave it. Perhaps some of these ladies will help you to take care of it till we get to Boston," and the conductor passed on.

As he went forward, evidently he told the story, for heads began to turn, and then men and boys came scanning it from the aisles to see the fellow that had the baby left with him. Plenty of jokes were cracked at my expense, for every now and then I heard a laugh, a burst, and some such phrases as, "Precious green, eh?" "Such a go!" "Looks father!" etc., etc.

I was in a rage. My blood boiled furiously. One minute I wanted to swear, the next to kick everybody and thing in the car. I soon saw by my passion I gave the poor little thing in my arms a grips, for she uttered a quick, little cry. She stopped at a moment, and I was sorry. She lay in my arms so innocent, and helpless, and fair, and white, and looked up at me with such complacent, happy love, that I was young and green. Shy owing out in spite of me—my embarrassment too.

"I may as well be a man as such a contemptible sneak," I thought. "I was a military company to get saddled in this way, to be sure, but that's my fault, and not this poor little baby's, and I may as well bear it through. As for those confounded fools, just let 'em laugh, that's all."

So I settled myself coolly to her care of my baby. People after a while grew accustomed to see her in my arms, and most of the afternoon she slept soundly.

But oh, how heavy she grew! I seemed to have a leaden weight tugging heavier and heavier upon me. Her little head would fall upon my shoulder, day after day, in the way they do? For me, I'm certain I'd rather move, though I never tried it.

However, at last we got to Boston, the baby waked; and waked fretful and hungry, I suppose. She began to cry; a long, dreadful, and evidently uncompromising cry. She began to look again, curious to see what master nurse would do.

I tied every possible corner up with the child; my watch, my eagle buttons, held it up to the window, I dandled it, I nearly turned it upside down in me. Every prayer I remembered, every miserable efforts to make it forget its needed and rightful consolation, and cried louder and louder till at last I seemed to hold nothing but a head that was an immense squall. A man could stand it no longer, let alone a cadet, and I rose desperately from my seat, determined to appeal to some one or woman for assistance. As I passed through the car, some of the younger ladies broke into their senseless titter again, the older ones looked at me with contempt, and the men eyed with a knowing sort of leer, that had not my arms been occupied, they would have had a lit enough with their shoulder for.

Another looking person whom I approached hopingly, trembled me with a look of disgust, and glass, that made me shake in my shoes as if I had committed the unpardonable offense. I gave up in despair, and was about to return to my seat, when a gentleman at the extreme end of the car beckoned me forward. It was a little family party, the gentleman, his wife, and a few girls with them, who held their babe in her arms. The gentleman and his wife were both young, and evidently Southerners.

"We heard about this baby from the conductor," said the gentleman, as I came near. "My wife has been fidgeting, ever since it began to cry. Can we do any thing for you?"

The lady looked her assent.

"Will you let me look at your baby, Sir, a moment?" she asked in, it seemed to me then, the sweetest tone I had ever heard.

She held out her arms, and I laid the baby in them.

"Such a young child—and so pretty, too! How it cries! What is the matter with it?"

"I don't know, madam, unless it's hungry," I answered. "It has been with me some hours, and a woman got in this morning. I don't know what to do with it."

"Poor little love!" exclaimed the lady, "what a shame a woman could be cries!" She hesitated, glanced at her own baby in her servant's arms, at her husband, then, blushing like any rose, the sweet mother laid my baby on her bosom, beneath her shawl, and looked down on it as if it had been her own—of her very flesh and blood.

Her husband smiled, and leaning forward as if to protect her from the rude glances, made room for me on the seat with their nurse.

I explained the affair to him, told him my name, and found that my father was an acquaintance to him. As we talked, I saw that his wife, listening, examined the dress of the child on her lap, felt of its texture, and finally took off a little cloak that it held up its sleeves. A little miniature was set in the clasp of each. She looked at them, then she said, "I'm afraid, my dear, that this woman has abandoned this child in your care is not its mother. The fine gold clasps, the material of the baby things, then this babe's clothing is of the most exquisite make and quality, and in these sleeve-chains are two unmistakable initials. The woman is not a mother, lets, the other a beautiful woman, evidently a lady. Depend upon it the child is a stolen one, or came to her hands by some unfair means. What shall be done?"

"Do not be troubled, madam, about the fate of this child. After the possibility or probability you have suggested, I shall not leave it in Boston. I will take it now; I will advertise the case. Or if its parents are found, I shall be glad; and if not, I think my mother will care for the rest. Only," I added, "I wish the meeting were safely over."

The lady's eyes sparkled through tears. "I can't tell you," she said, "how what you have done, and are doing, seems to me, but I think you too noble to dread any thing. I will answer for the mother who has such a son!"

"Softly, softly, if you please," expostulated her laughing husband; "don't be quite oblivious of the fact that I exist." She turned to him with a look that must have silenced the veriest grumbler in the world.

We reached Boston, took a carriage together, and only at the hotel entrance did my new friends bid me adieu. "God bless you!" said the beautiful, noble woman, as she gave me back my baby. I should have knelt and kissed the hand of such a princess, but my arms and I were then so awkward at taking, that the embrace was somewhat a possible accomplishment at one and the same time.

The clerk glanced suspiciously at me and my burden.

"We are full, Sir. Not a room to be had."

I sent for a messenger, and again my name vouched for me. What it is to have a family in the land! "But where in the world, Mr. Edward," he demanded, "did you get that child?" I told the story. He shook his head, but said nothing.

I sent for a chambermaid to come to my room. I thought she looked old and sore for it that evening the night. At first she was hard to awaking. I put my hand in my pocket. I gave her a ridiculously large fee, but I was young and green.

She took the child.

"But stop—you'll not—not the young gentleman that did after laving yez've baby? Holy Virgin! my carachter od be ruined intirely, intirely!" I assured her of the rectitude of my intentions, and sent her off, but she was at my door in the morning before I had left my bed, and nothing would induce her to keep the child a moment.

I took the stage for my country home. The driver recognized the lad he had driven so often over the stones years before.

"How you're grown, to be sure, Mr. Edward! Your folks won't know you. I'm thinking, specially the little ones. Why, you've grown as tall as Sam Pettingue to be a family man a leetle too early."

I laughed and took my seat. But as we began to move, I felt myself to be terribly nervous and cowardly. The house stood back some distance from the road, and I could wind up from the gate I saw the whole family gathered on the piazza to welcome me. I think I should rather have walked up to the house alone. My sister started and down the steps to meet me, then stopped. I stepped up on to the piazza. My mother, pale as death, looked into her son's face. My pretty cousin, Ella, on whom I had always, from round-jacket days, been sweet in a sneaking sort of way, darted an amiable, mischievous look at me, and put on support my mother. My father advanced.

"What do you dare to bring here, you shameless young puppy?" he said in a passion. He stood down so angry that utterance was absolutely impossible. At any other time I should have shouted with laughter, but I was in a condition similar to present; now I only hesitated to tell my story. In a few moments my mother's arms were around me, my sister and cousin were contesting a Penn for possession of my baby, and my father recovered from his hyper critical astonishment enough to say, though I did hear him growl through his white beard, "Confounded goosey!"

I advertised far and wide to no purpose. But my baby grew so into the affections of all the household that I took more steps to lose.

We named her Perdita, and I left her with my mother. When I returned year after year I found her such time gentler, sweeter and prettier, and the each time manifested an affection for me charmingly legitimate. She was she not "My Baby?" As such I cherished her.

She was six years old when I left West Point for active service. Before that I had a wandering and adventurous life for years "by flood and field."

"My Baby" wrote me, at first, often. Her first letters were scrawls—blots—half written, half printed, and sometimes her meaning eked out with rude drawings. In those days she was charming-ly pretty. Now, I'm not so—I think so and so—I love so and so." But years changed her calligraphy, and, alas! the feeling of her letters. Now, I am charmed with her characters, stood, "Your mother does so and so;" or, "Your sister thinks and loves," etc.

"My mother wrote: "We can't call Perdita your 'Baby' any longer. She does not permit the title, and I am sure I don't. In fact, could accustom me that our fair young queen was ever a baby. I am old to be enthusiastic, but our darling is surely the loveliest child and the most ever treated one. She makes hearts ache, but as yet their pain is vain. We tried to be so cautious; but she has somehow learned to love you fondly, and it is his her knowledge to the proud little heart. It may be that that makes her melt out to us. Will you never come home to see us and her?"

It was in the spring of the year 1856. I was on my way home to America. An elderly gentleman, who had evidently been a soldier, occupied the state-room next to mine. A similarity of tastes and habits brought us much together during the voyage.

We had been absent from his country many years.

"When I left it," said he to me, "I meant never to revisit the shores that had been accursed to me. But I dream of it often, and could under the circumstances; and I could not remain. I thought then I could never see again spots that had been so fatal to me. And yet I return now, impelled by some feeling which I can neither account for nor resist. I dream that I am going to see my child —sometimes, even in waking moments, I am fully convinced that I shall find her."

"How," I interrupted, in spite of myself; "is not your child dead?"

"Alas! I do not know."

"You do not know?! did she not die before you left America?"

"No. Three months ago I should have said I wished she had rather than live last to me, exposed to fates I shudder to think of. Now I am hopeful. Mere—trustful. It seems to me she has been kept pure, and that I shall know her. And yet—and he sighed heavily—I haven't the shadow of a reason for such hope and trust."

I was excited—I compared my remembrance of the miniature on "My Baby's" sleeve-chain with the picture before. I made him explain all. He told me of the child's birth—the delicate health of his wife afterward, his taking her to Cuba, leaving the child in, as he supposed, trusty care, the death of his wife in Havana, and while he was still in the first anguish of her loss, news from his child's nurse of its death, and of her own speedy return to Ireland. He came to New York too late to find her, and left America at once—forever as he supposed. Two years afterward, he had met a servant who had been with him during his married life, and who declared to him positively that his child was not dead at the time on which the woman had written him; but further than that he could not say, as he had left all the fortunes of another master. The unhappy father sought vainly for the woman, and now returned as a last means of search. He showed me the child's miniature. It was the woman who had abandoned her charge in my arms, and the face was the changed, aged one of Perdita's miniature. What days thereafter I restored to my friend his so-early lost child, and gave up "My Baby" to her rightful father.

Without a pang? Yes. Did I console myself with her pretty cousin after-mentioned? She hadn't had patience to wait that! I might—husband, and several olive-branches precluded that. Did I then?

I saw "My Baby" a stately, radiantly, beautiful woman. She called me Major ——, she treated me in the most precise and formal manner. Her most favor she bestowed upon me was the slightest possible touch of the fingers as she bade me good-night or good-morning, and I am not ashamed in my idolizing father's arms lavishing the tenderest caresses upon him. Would I have it otherwise? No. But there is a dearer child in the arrears with which I was treated—the faintest flush that ever tinged a maiden's cheek was near her, or addressed her, had for me an inexpressible sweetness. But I wouldn't have bartered for aught on earth short of what I ever received. What? Love, of course! I mean that you, a scarred old veteran of fifteen thirty and forty, dared— Didn't I? Hum! And that was the way of it. In my military capacity I was invited to West Point. I went, and my friend and his daughter accompanied me. I sat beside her at the table. The band performed, at a little distance, read diligently. I said,

"Perdita! you have traveled this route before with me, you remember it, you remember us all?"

She blushed scarlet, and looked at me beseechingly.

I went on.

"To think what a heavy, hungry, unpacifiable baby I carried that day, and the way that poor Cadet's humanity was ridiculed!"

The tears started, and the young lady at my side bowed her head slightly head.

"And the worst feature in the case is that he has never had any suitable recompense. A good deal is due reward, to a soldier, in course of course; but in this case every feeling of my soul, every fibre of my heart, demands something more than a mere reward—something more. Perdita! my darling these seventeen years, I lost you to your father; but I can not be. Be generous. Here, here where I have held my Baby," give, O give her back to me!"

She raised her head.

"If she were as much trouble now as then?"

"My darling, don't trifle! Am I to have you?"

My young lady answered me, and then coquettish herself with deliberately drawing off her glove. Then she turned to me.

"Since you will be troubled," and she laid her hand hand in mine. Mine again.

Shortly after we were married. I carried Perdita during our wedding tour to the friends I had found for her and me in the cars seventeen years before; found them, and most reverently kissed the gracious hand that had then so sweetly tended what was now become my earthly all.

NELSON'S GOLD-WASHER.

WE publish on page 172 an engraving of another of the ingenious machines by which the earth is forced to render up its golden wealth—the gold-washer, patented by Mr. Nelson, of 206 William Street, New York. Mr. Nelson says of it:

"It is now used to do a larger amount of work, and to save the fine gold, with less labor and expense, than has heretofore been done by the shoveler process. The object which I have designed to obtain is, to have a portable machine, which the miner can take apart and move from place to place with ease; and which can be moved from the earth or stone as it may accumulate to obstruct the working of the machine, and thereby save the expense and time of erecting long sluices. There is only required a flat piece of iron to set in bringing, as it inclines, and to allow the miners room to shovel the earth in. The sluice should discharge the earth and stone at the entire width of the machine, and be placed at an incline of sufficient pitch to allow the water to carry the earth and stone off without clogging. The end of the sluice should be elevated, or perforated with holes, so as to allow a sheet of water to be discharged over every part of the screen, so that as the screen rotates the water comes in contact with every part of the earth or stone. The spring rods, which are hinged above the screen, as it revolves come in contact with the stone, clay, earth, etc., and, by their elasticity, throw over the surface, forcing the stones, as fast as they accumulate, over the edge—the water and earth passing through the screen into the tin pans underneath, which have stirrers back of each of the rims, to keep the earth loosened up so that the joining motion which is given to the pans by the ball and eccentric, on the top of the machine, causes the fine gold to be deposited back of the rims and in the bottom of the pans, which without the stirrers and vertical motion would pass off with the earth and water. The amount of work which the machine is capable of doing, if rapidly worked, would be several thousand bushels per day."

Mr. Nelson expects that these machines, which only cost $200, will become very popular in California.

HON. ELIHU B. WASHBURNE,* OF ILLINOIS.

ELIHU B. WASHBURNE, the present Representative in the national councils from the first Congressional District of Illinois, is a brother of Hon. Israel Washburn, of Maine, and Hon. Cadw. C. Washburn, of Wisconsin, both of whom are prominent members of Congress. Born at the family homestead in Livermore—then in Androscoggin County, Massachusetts, now in Oxford County, Maine—young Washburne received the advantages of public school education, and then was a student at Kent's Hill Seminary. Afterward he served an apprenticeship in the printing-office of the Kennebec Journal (then conducted by Hon. Luther Severance), and acquired the rare benefits of typographical knowledge, so well calculated to qualify intelligent minds for any position in public life. Nearly a score of the members of the present Congress can claim a printing-office as their alma mater.

In 1838 young Washburne entered the office of Hon. John Otis, of Hallowell (afterward a member of Congress), as a student-at-law. In the following year he entered the Law School of Harvard College, where he graduated, and was afterward admitted to the bar. At that time the tide of emigration was setting toward the northern portion of the Mississippi Valley, and Mr. Washburne turned his footsteps toward that fertile region, so truly styled an extensive field of generous rivalry, where honor and distinction are achieved by those who are capable of grasping and worthy of holding them.

Mr. Washburne settled in the picturesque town of Galena, then the head-quarters of those engaged in mining lead, which is found thereabouts in great abundance. Commencing the practice of law, he soon acquired the respect and confidence of the hardy and adventurous people among whom he had located. Basing his professional action on the truth and justice of the law, he acquired an enviable reputation as an able, a reliable, and a candid lawyer, and thus secured a lucrative practice.

In 1845 Mr. Washburne married Miss Adele Granger, of Galena, a daughter of Colonel Henry Gratiot, well known as a pioneer in the settlement of the Northwest, while his brother, General Charles Gratiot, was the principal engineer officer in the Indian expeditions conducted by General W. H. Harrison and others in that region. Although decided in his attachment for the principles of the Whig party, Mr. Washburne took no active part in politics, preferring the quiet pursuit of his profession and the comforts of domestic life.

He was called from this retirement, however, in 1852, when he was nominated by the Whigs as their candidate for Congress in opposition to the Hon. Benajah Campbell, who then represented the district. After an animated contest Mr. Washburne was elected, and has since been three times re-elected. In 1852 his majority was two hundred and eighty-six; in 1856 it was twelve thousand one hundred and seventy-four, and his District gave Colonel Frémont the largest majority of any district in the United States.

Mr. Washburne was an active opponent of the Kansas-Nebraska Bill, and subsequently distinguished himself by his exertions in behalf of the "Free-State" people of Kansas. His speeches on this question are characterized by logical arrangement, legal learning, and a fearless avowal of the views of his constituents so unmistakably expressed at the ballot-box.

After the pro-

* This Mr. Washburne has a first cousin, but his brothers do not use it in spelling their names.

HON. ELIHU B. WASHBURNE, OF ILLINOIS, CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.
[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

NELSON'S GOLD-WASHER AT WORK AT THE MINES.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

longed contest for the Speakership of the Thirty-fourth Congress was terminated by the election of Mr. Banks to the Speaker's chair, Mr. Washburne was placed at the head of the Committee on Commerce—a marked compliment, as that position had generally been filled by the Representative of some commercial sea-port. In the Thirty-fifth Congress he was retained on this Committee by Speaker Orr; and now that the Thirty-sixth Congress has at last been organized, we find that Speaker Pennington has restored him to his former position as Chairman of the Committee. This was in accordance with the generally expressed desire of members of all parties, who wished to see "the right man in the right place."

Since Mr. Washburne has been a member of the Committee of Commerce he has paid great attention to the codification of the Revenue Laws of the United States, which have been accumulating, unrevised, since 1793. He has also urged the proper improvement of harbors on the Western lakes, and of dangerous rapids in the Mississippi River. The great scheme for connecting the Atlantic and the Pacific has found in him an earnest advocate: "I am," said he, in debate, "for a Pacific Railroad, earnestly, sincerely, and in good faith. I do not care from what side of the House the proposition comes; whether it be from the Republican side (from which nearly the whole number of votes that are to carry the measure are to come), or whether it be from the Democratic side. I care not what party or what individual shall have the credit of the measure, provided the credit belongs to such party or such individual."

Mr. Washburne has earnestly endeavored, year after year past, to suitably amend the Act of Congress better to provide for the security of the lives of passengers on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam. The owners of steamers, who would be subject to heavy expense in complying with the proposed requisitions, have thus far succeeded in opposing Mr. Washburne's projected law. But the frequent disasters that follow in too rapid succession have aroused the attention of the public, and imperative demands are now made for some regulations by which a recurrence of these terrible calamities may be prevented.

Mr. Washburne is ever on the alert to assert and to maintain the rights of his constituents. In the tariff agitated, he demands that the interests of the lead-miners shall be remembered. If money is to be appropriated for public buildings, the custom-houses and post-offices at the Northwest must not be left unfinished; and manfully has stood up in behalf of Rock Island in the Mississippi River, one of the most beautiful spots in the Republic. "I contend," said he, "that this Rock Island reservation ought never to be sold. I never want to see it go out of the hands of the Government. I appeal to all Western men to stand by that beautiful island, and to protect it from the gang of trespassers, speculators, and plunderers who are now spoliating and destroying it. Protect it, I say, from those who now seek, not only to despoil it by stripping it of its timber, but to secure the title to it at a nominal price. I want that island reserved. I am against its sale in any way or shape. I want to see it reserved and protected in its original beauty. I expect, at no very distant day, to see it the site of some splendid public work. It is one of the most fitting sites for a national armory or a military hospital for the Northwest. It should never be sold; and we should do something to protect it."

Mr. Washburne is a thick-set, well-made, middle-aged gentleman, with light hair, a pleasnnt expression of countenance, and that rare quality for which Themistocles was famed—the ability to impare confidence. What he says, either in private or political life, he means. Unbending integrity marks his official career; while he is equally distinguished by his active sympathy for the oppressed, his assiduous labors in promoting the social advancement of his adopted home, and his devotion to his numerous friends.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

(Printed from advance proof-sheets purchased from the author exclusively for "Harper's Weekly.")

MISS HALCOMBE'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

July 4th. The misery of self-reproach which I suffered yesterday evening, on hearing what Laura told me in the boat-house, returned in the loneliness of the night, and kept me waking and wretched for hours.

*I lighted the candle at last, and searched through my old journals to see what my share in the fatal error of her marriage had really been, and what I might have once done to save her from it. The result soothed me a little; for it showed that, however blindly and ignorantly I acted, I acted for the best. Crying generally does me harm; but it was not so last night—I think it relieved me. I rose this morning with a settled resolution and a quiet mind. Nothing Sir Percival can say or do shall ever irritate me again, or make me forget, for one moment, that I am staying here, in defiance of mortifications, insults, and threats, for Laura's service and for Laura's sake.

The speculations in which we might have indulged this morning on the subject of the figure at the lake and the footsteps in the plantation, have been all suspended by a trifling accident which has caused Laura great regret. She has lost the little brooch I gave her for a keepsake on the day before her marriage. As she wore it when we went out yesterday evening, we can only suppose that it must have dropped from her dress either in the boat-house or on our way back. The servants have been sent to search and have returned unsuccessful. And now Laura herself has just gone to look for it. Whether she finds it or not, the loss will help to excuse her absence from the house if Sir Percival returns before the letter from Mr. Gilmore's partner is placed in my hands.

One o'clock has just struck. I am considering whether I had better wait here for the arrival of the messenger from London, or slip away quietly, and watch for him outside the lodge-gate.

My suspicion of every body and every thing in this house inclines me to think that the second plan may be the best. The Count is safe in the breakfast-room. I heard him through the door, as I ran up stairs ten minutes since, exercising his canary-birds at their tricks: "Come out on my little finger, my pret-pret-pretties! Come out, and hop up stairs! One, two, three —and up! Three, two, one—and down! One, two, three—twsi-twi-twi-twee!" The birds burst into their usual ecstasy of singing, and the Count chirruped and whistled at them in return, as if he was a bird himself. My room door is open, and I can hear the shrill singing and whistling at this moment. If I am really to slip out without being observed, now is my time.

Four o'clock. I come back to this journal with sensations filling my mind which it would be useless for any woman to attempt to describe. The three hours that have passed since I made my last entry have turned the whole march of events at Blackwater Park in a new direction. Whether for good or for evil I can not and dare not decide.

Let me get back first to the place at which I left off, or I shall lose myself in the confusion of my own thoughts.

I went out, as I had proposed, to meet the messenger with my letter from London, at the lodge-gate. On the stairs I saw no one. In the hall I heard the Count still exercising his birds. But on crossing the quadrangle outside I passed Madame Fosco, walking by herself in her favorite circle, round and round the great fish-pond. I at once slackened my pace so as to avoid all appearance of being in a hurry; and even went the length, for caution's sake, of inquiring if she thought of going out before lunch. She smiled at me in the friendliest manner—said she preferred remaining near the house—nodded pleasantly—and then entered the hall. I looked back, and saw that she had closed the door before I had opened the wicket by the side of the carriage gates.

In less than a quarter of an hour I reached the lodge.

The time outside took a sudden turn to the left, ran on straight for a hundred yards or so, and then took another sharp turn to the right to join the high road. Between these two turns, hidden from the lodge on one side and from the way to the station on the other, I waited, walking backward and forward. High hedges were on either side of me; and for twenty minutes by my watch, I neither saw nor heard any thing. At the end of that time the sound of a carriage caught my ear; and I was met, as I advanced toward the second turning, by a fly from the railway. I made a sign to the driver to stop. As he obeyed me a respectable-looking man put his head out of the window to see what was the matter.

"ARE YOU GOING BACK TO THE HOUSE, MISS HALCOMBE?"

"I beg your pardon, I said; "but am I right in supposing that you are going to Blackwater Park?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"With a letter for any one?"

"With a letter for Miss Halcombe, ma'am."

"You may give me the letter. I am Miss Halcombe."

The man touched his hat, got out of the fly immediately, and gave me the letter.

I opened it at once; and read these lines. I copy them here (without the address to me or the writer's signature); thinking it best to destroy the original for caution's sake.

"Private and Confidential.

"DEAR MADAM,—Your letter, received this morning, has caused me very great anxiety. I will reply to it as briefly and plainly as possible.

"My careful consideration of the statement made by yourself, and my knowledge of Lady Glyde's position, as defined in the settlement, lead me, I regret to say, to the conclusion that a loan of the trust money to Sir Percival (or, in other words, a loan of some portion of the twenty thousand pounds of Lady Glyde's fortune), is in contemplation, and that she is made a party to the deed, in order to secure her approval of a flagrant breach of trust, and to have her signature produced against her if she should complain hereafter. It is impossible, on any other supposition, to account, situated as she is, for her execution to a deed of any kind being wanted at all.

"In the event of Lady Glyde's signing such a document as I am compelled to suppose the deed in question to be, her trustees would be at liberty to advance money to Sir Percival out of her twenty thousand pounds. If the amount so lent should not be paid back, and if Lady Glyde should have children, their fortune would then be diminished by the sum, large or small, so advanced. In plainer terms still, the transaction, for any thing Lady Glyde knows to the contrary, may be a fraud upon her unborn children.

"Under these serious circumstances I would recommend Lady Glyde to assign as a reason for withholding her signature, that she wishes the deed to be first submitted to myself, as her family solicitor (in the absence of my partner, Mr. Gilmore). No reasonable objection can be made to taking this course—for, if the transaction is an honorable one, there will necessarily be no difficulty in my giving my approval.

EXPLOSION OF A STEAMER ON THE DELAWARE, MARCH 6, 1860.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

"Sincerely assuring you of my readiness to afford any additional help or advice that may be wanted, I beg to remain Madame, your faithful servant,

I read this kind and sensible letter very thankfully. It supplied Laura with a reason for objecting to the signature which was unreasonable, and which we could both of us understand. The messenger waited near me while I was reading to receive his directions when I had done.

"Will you be good enough to say that I understand the letter, and that I am very much obliged?" I said. "There is no other reply necessary at present."

Exactly at the moment when I was speaking these words, holding the letter open in my hand, Count Fosco turned the corner of the low from the high road, and stood before me as if he had sprung out of the earth.

The suddenness of his appearance, in the very last place under heaven in which I should have expected to see him, took me completely by surprise. The messenger wished me good-morning, and got into the fly again. I could not say a word to him—I was not even able to return his bow. The conviction that I was discovered—and by that man of all others—absolutely petrified me.

"Are you going back to the house, Miss Halcombe?" he inquired, without showing the least surprise on his side, and without even looking after the fly, which drove off while he was speaking to me.

I collected myself sufficiently to make a sign in the affirmative.

"I am going back too," he said. "Pray allow me the pleasure of accompanying you. Will you take my arm? You look surprised at seeing me?"

I took his arm. The first of my scattered senses that came back was the sense that warned me to sacrifice any thing rather than make an enemy of him.

"You look surprised at seeing me!" he repeated, in his quietly pertinacious way.

"I thought, Count, I heard you with your birds in the breakfast-room," I answered, as quietly as I could.

"Surely. But my little feathered children, dear lady, are only too like other children. They have their days of perversity; and this morning was one of them. My wife came in, as I was putting them back in their cage, and said she had left you going out alone for a walk. You told her so, did you not?"

"Certainly."

"Well, Miss Halcombe, the pleasure of accompanying you was too great a temptation for me to resist. At my age there is no harm in confessing so much as that, is there? I desired my hat, and set off to offer myself as your escort. Does the last old man my friend—now by better than no escort at all? I took the wrong path—I came back in despair—and here I am escorting (may I say it?) at the height of my wishes."

He talked on in this complimentary strain, with a fluency which left me no exertion to make beyond the effort of maintaining my composure. He never referred in the most distant manner to the letter he had seen in the house, or to the letter which I still had in my hand. This ominous discretion helped to convince me that he must have surprised, by the most dishonorable means, the secret of my application in Laura's interests, to the lawyer; and that, having now assured himself of the private manner in which I had received the answer, he had discovered enough to suit his purposes, and was only bent on trying to quiet the suspicions which he knew he must have aroused in my mind. I was wise enough, under these circumstances, not to attempt to deceive him by plausible explanations—and woman enough, notwithstanding my dread of him, to feel as if my hand were palsied by resting on his arm.

On the drive in front of the house we met the dog-cart being taken round to the stables. Sir Percival had just returned. He came out to meet us at the house-door. Whatever other results his journey might have had, it had not ended in softening his savage temper.

"Oh! I see two of you come back," he said, with a lowering face. "What is the meaning of the house being deserted in this way? Where is Lady Glyde?"

I told him of the loss of the brooch, and said that Laura had gone into the plantation to look for it.

"Brooch or no brooch," he growled, sullenly, "I recommend her not to forget her appointment in the library this afternoon. I shall expect to see her in half an hour."

He turned from the Count's arm, and slowly ascended the steps. He honored me with one of his magnificent bows, and then addressed himself coyly to the scowling master of the house.

"Tell me, Percival," he said, "have you had a pleasant drive? And has your pretty shining Brown Molly come back at all tired?"

"Brown Molly be hanged—and the drive too! I want my lunch."

"And I want five minutes' talk with you, Percival, for," muttered the Count, "five minutes' talk, my friend, here on the grass."

"What about?"

"About business that very much concerns you."

I lingered long enough, in passing through the hall-door, to hear this question and answer, and to see Sir Percival thrust his hands into his pockets in sullen hesitation.

"If you want to badger me with any more of your infernal scruples," he said, "I, for one, won't hear them. I want my lunch!"

"Come out here and speak to me," repeated the Count, still perfectly unainfluenced by the rudest speech that his friend could make to him.

Sir Percival descended the steps. The Count put him by the arm, and walked him away gently. The "business," I was sure, referred to the question of the signature. They were speaking of Laura, and of her refusal to doubt. I felt heart-sick and faint with anxiety. It might be of the last importance to both of us to know what they were saying to each other at that moment—and not one word of it could by any possibility reach my ears.

My husband stood still, and from room to room, with the lawyer's letter in my bosom (I was afraid for the time even to trust it to my pocket and key), till the oppression of my suspense half maddened me. There were no signs of Laura's return to the house; and I thought of going out to look for her. But my strength was so exhausted by the trials and anxieties of the morning that the least effort of the slightest resistance, and after an attempt to get to the door I was obliged to return to the drawing-room and lie down on the nearest sofa to recover.

I was just composing myself when the door opened softly and the Count looked in.

"A thousand pardons, Miss Halcombe," he said; "I only venture to disturb you because I am the bearer of good news. Percival—with a capricious in every thing, as you know—has been fit to alter his mind at the last moment; and the business of the signature is put off for the present. A great relief to all of us, Miss Halcombe, as I see with pleasure in your face. Pray present my best respects and felicitations when you mention this pleasant change of circumstances to Lady Glyde."

He left me before I had recovered my astonishment. There could be no doubt that this extraordinary alteration of purpose in the matter of the signature was due to his influence; and that his discovery of my application to Easthope was known, and had led to his forcing an answer to it to-day, had offered him the means of interfering with certain success.

I felt these considerations in my mind, and seemed to share the exhaustion of my body, and I was in no condition to dwell on them, with any useful refinement, while I remained under the threatening future. I tried a second time to run out and find Laura, but my head was giddy and my knees trembled under me. There was no choice but to give it up again and return to the sofa, sorely against my will.

The quiet in the house and the low murmuring hum of summer insects outside the open window soothed me. My eyes closed of themselves; and I passed gradually into a strange condition, which was not waking—for I knew nothing of what was going on around me; and not sleeping—for I was conscious of my own repose. In this state my fevered mind broke loose from the one heavy load that was on it, and in a trance, or day-dream of mystery—I know not what to call it—I saw Walter Hartright. I had not thought of him since I rose that morning; Laura had not said one word to me either directly or indirectly referring to him; and yet there he was now as plainly as if the past time had returned, and we were both together again at Limmeridge House.

The scene was the same as one among many other men, none of whose faces I could plainly discern. They were in the open air, and under an immense ruined temple. Colossal tropical trees—with rank creepers twining endlessly round them, and hanging in festoons of thick glimmering and grinning at intervals behind leaves and stalks and branches—surrounded the temple, and shut out the sky. There was a dismal shadow over the forlorn band of men on the steps. White exhalations twisted and curled up stealthily from the ground, and approached the men in wreaths, like smoke; touched them; and stretched them out dead, one by one, in the places where they left off. A sense of pity and fear for Walter loosened my tongue, and I answered him to escape. "Escape! Can you escape back?" I said. "Remember your promise to her and to me. Come back to us before the Gentlemen reaches you and lays you dead like the rest!"

He looked at me with an unearthly quiet in his face. "Wait," he said. "I shall come back. The night when I met the lost Woman on the highway was the night which set my life apart for the instrument of vengeance that is yet unseen. Here, lost in the wilderness, or there, welcomed back in the land of my birth, I am still walking on the path which leads back me, and you, and the sister of your love and mine, to the days before Limmeridge and the evitable End. Wait and look. The Pestilence which touches the rest will pass me."

I saw him, as I had seen him in the forest, and the numbers of his lost companions had dwindled to very few. The temple was gone, and the idols were gone—and the ruins place, the figures of dark, dwarfish men lurked murderously among the trees, with bows in their hands and arrows fitted to the string. Once more I feared for Walter, and cried out to warn him. I have more to say, and will say it, in immovable quiet in his face. "Another step," he said, "on the dark road. Wait and look. The unseen must strike fire ere I spare me."

I saw him for the third time, in a wrecked ship, stranded on a wild, sandy shore. The overclouded boats were making away from him for the land, and he alone was left to sink with the ship. I cried to him to hail the hindmost boat, and to make a last effort for his life. The quiet face looked at me in return, and the unmoved voice gave me back the changeless reply. "Another step on the journey. Wait and look. The Sea which drowns the rest will spare me."

I saw him for the last time. He was kneeling by a tomb of white marble; and the shadow of a veiled woman rose out of the grave beneath and waited by his side. The immovability of his face had changed to an unearthly sorrow. But the terrible certainty of his words remained the same. "Darker and darker," he said; "farther and farther yet. Death takes the good, and Death takes the evil—and spares me. The Pestilence that wastes, the Arrow that strikes, the Sea that drowns, the Grave that closes over Love and Hope are steps of my journey, and take me nearer and nearer to the End."

My heart sank under a dread beyond words, under a grief beyond tears. The darkness closed round the pilgrim at the marble tomb; closed round the veiled woman from the grave; closed round the dreamer who looked on them. I saw and heard no more.

I was aroused by a hand laid on my shoulder. It was Laura. She had dropped on her knees by the side of the sofa. Her face was flushed and agitated, and her eyes met mine in a wild, bewildered manner. I started up the instant I saw her.

"What has happened?" I asked. "What has frightened you?"

She looked round at the half-open door—put her lips close to my ear—and answered in a whisper:

"Marian!—the figure at the lake—the footsteps last night—I've just seen her! I've just spoken to her!"

"Who, for Heaven's sake?"

"Anne Catherick."

FRIGHTFUL EXPLOSION ON THE DELAWARE.

We engrave on the preceding page the terrible explosion which took place on the 6th inst. on the Delaware River. The story is thus told by the Easton (Pa.) Express:

"This morning the shores of the Delaware, below the bridge, on both sides of the river, were crowded with persons to witness the departure of the little steamer which had been built at this place to run between Belvidere and Port Jervis. At 6 o'clock the steamer left the lock at Southtown, and made her way up the river against a swift current, and having on board about a hundred men. As she passed along the crowds on both shores cheered her on. She had being a most beautiful one. At the bridge she stopped, when a number got off, having stated above forty persons, and then went on up the river, the crowd returning, supposing that she would run safely to Belvidere. But how much were they saddened, sad and sad was the news which started the community at noon, when the report came that the steamer had exploded on the north side of the island near the Water-works!

"It appears that she was moored at that spot, and when all was ready to start the boiler exploded with a terrific crash, the pieces flying in every direction, and the hot steam enveloping the unfortunate victims. Some of the passengers on board were thrown fifty feet into the water, and were blown off into the water and slightly injured, and others again were dreadfully mangled.

"The sight upon the land, to which we hastened immediately upon hearing of the catastrophe, was beyond harrowing. The limbs of the poor sufferers, the presence of those who were in search of friends supposed to be among the dead or wounded, and the dead, together formed a sight to make the stoutest heart sad.

"The scene as it appeared to us can be explained, it is impossible to describe. Women who were fearful that relatives were on board, ran up and down almost distracted, questioning almost every one in regard to the dreadful affair.

"It was reported that a lady and two children were aboard and were lost, but we made inquiries, and found that no ladies were on the boat.

"A number of persons went to work at the wreck when we went to press, to ascertain whether there were any bodies in it."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

Premature Loss of the Hair,

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and it has never failed to arrest its decay, and in promoting a healthy and vigorous growth.

It is unrivaled as a dressing for the hair, a single application rendering it soft and glossy for several days.

The following is conclusive of its efficacy in the cure of Dandruff.

Boston, Oct. 20, 1859.

Gentlemen,—I have used your Cocoaine about six weeks, and am happy to say it has worked an entire cure. I deem it my duty to state it to you.

My worst complaint for several years has been Dandruff, with itching and inflammation of the scalp. After brushing my hair, my coat-collar would be covered with the white scales, (dandruff,) which looked like a shower of snow. My barber tried various applications without effect. His abuse of your Cocoaine, and his eloquence regarding its merits, induced me to procure and try it. I found to use it provoked me to procure a second bottle, which soon completed the cure. The dandruff, and the irritation which created it, have entirely disappeared, and my hair was never before in so good condition.

Your obedient servant,

A. A. FULLER.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by druggists generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

LE BON TON is the best LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen copies, with two patterns, will be sent for 20 cents.

S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 40 Broadway, N. Y.

Dr. Sweet's Infallible Liniment is truly a friend in need, and every family should have it at hand.—Rutherford County Gazette.

Brown's Bronchial Troches.

Whoever is troubled with Coughs, Hoarseness or Sore Throat, will find these "Troches" a most admirable remedy. Indeed, at this season of the year, those to an inclined to bronchial complaints should not be without them. They are prepared by Messrs. John I. Brown & Son, who, as Apothecaries, rank among the first in this city, and are held by all the principal druggists.—Boston Journal.

TO THE BEREAVED.

A unique and beautiful Book for the bereaved, and all admirers of elegant literature, is "The Loved and the Lost." Also, a great variety of Portable Solid Gold Lockets, for Sportsmen, Travellers, Druggists, &c., &c.

164 Broadway, N. Y.

The Lady's Guide to Perfect Beauty.

Being a complete Analysis and Classification of Beauty in Women; also, External Indications, or the art of determining the precise figure, the type of beauty, the mind, habits, and age of women, notwithstanding the Disguise of Dress.

One volume, price $1.00.

Single copies by mail on receipt of price.

DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers, New York.

CARD.

A. & G. A. ARNOUX, so long and reputably known as Fashionable Tailors, beg to announce to the public that they have added a department of Ready Clothing to their establishment, in which all the finest and newest style of goods will be kept. This will enable our customers to obtain all the goods they may be in need of for themselves and the male part of their families at our house.

Of our Men's Furnishing Department it is unnecessary for us to say any thing, as it already has the name of having the best goods, and best styles of goods, to be found in the city.

521 Broadway, under St. Nicholas.

Mr. McCune, formerly of Genin's Bazaar, will be happy to wait on his friends at his new location, which not only he, but Mr. Iselton, the Superintendent there of the Boys' work have removed.

Harnden's Express.

—DAILY—

Forwards Valuables and Merchandise to and from, and collects drafts, bills, &c., in all parts of the

EAST, WEST AND SOUTH.

Will receive goods, or orders to "call," at

74 Broadway.

Attractive NEW BOOKS.

WOMAN (La Femme). By Michelet.....$1 00
LOVE (L'Amour). By Michelet.....1 00
THE HABITS OF GOOD SOCIETY.....1 25
THE GREAT TRIBULATION. By Newman.....1 00

 Sold by all booksellers, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by DICK & CARLETON, Publishers, 130 Grand Street, New York.

Barney's Opera Perfume.

DESIGNATED TO MISS ADELINA PATTI.

A new and delightful Perfume, extracted from delightful and exquisite odors; as truly fascinating as the beautiful photographic likeness which accompanies the box. More than 3000 bottles were sold in a few days while this Perfume was at the Saloon.

Sold wholesale by J. W. NORCROSS & Co., No. 91 Fulton Street.

Retailed by all Druggists and Fancy Good Dealers.

Quern's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly

The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, is taken without nausea.

Also,

Quern's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil.—The

greasy nauseant of tea will be administered, and it does not cause any constipation after use. It is the best purgative for children, at Office, 164 at the Depot, corner of 13th and Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. PENDRELL, FARRELL & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 15 Beekman Street.

Crystal Battery Magnetic Machine,

For Extracting Teeth without Pain, and for Medical Purposes.

INVENTED by DR. S. D. SMITH. PRICE $12.

This is the only instrument in the world with both the Magnetic and Positive Currents. The Zinco never requires cleaning. Expense of running it, One Cent a week.

Address DR. S. D. SMITH, 323 Canal Street, N. Y.

Cassell's Illustrated Family Bible.

Agents continue to be appointed for the cheapest and most magnificent Illustrated Bible ever published, issued in 24 Parts, at 25 cents each. Price 15 cents. A copy will be forwarded free, by mail, on the receipt of 15 cents.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN, 37 Park Row, N. Y.

Roman Eye Balsam—Is a sovereign remedy for inflamed eyelids (commonly called sore eyes). It acts like a charm in relieving all irritation, and usually effects a complete cure after a few applications.

TO PHYSICIANS AND LADIES.—The Editor and Proprietor of Pantopathic Diet and kindred diseases by Motorpathic treatment has now become a well-known fact, attested by several thousand cases successfully treated in hospital and riding practice. On replacement by this method, the organ, ligaments and abdominal muscles are vitalized and immediately contract, so that no voluntary effort, as jumping or running up and down stairs, can again occasion displacement. In fact, it but causes a firmer contraction. This throws the treatment to be in harmony with the natural functions. It causes no pain or inconvenience, and the cure is as reliable as scarcely to admit of the possibility of failure. Even attended by the most violating effects, vomiting combined with some incurable malady. It would be but reasonable to suppose that treatment so natural and simples which genre to life-giving in one act of orgone, if judiciously applied to the seats of either disease or cause, could but be powerfully effectious. South the treatment of Mrs. Hill has proved visible in many cases have been made of stubborn complaints which had lingered without help for years. In success in the cure of premature consumption, spinal complaints, paralysis, and one of the seat of Rheumatism, is unprecedented. Its success has also been had in bronchitis, in restoring female sex-lower complaints, and in arresting fearful, rapid and debilitated systems to strength and activity. Dr. HALL'S Home, the known originator of Motorpathic treatment, of Round Hill Water Cure, Northampton, Mass., will be in N. Y. at the Metropolitan Hotel, March 14th and 15th, and will receive calls from 2 to 5 P. M. on those days. Pamphlets supplies as well as to see the sick. Physicians are cordially invited. His Water Cure is open summer and winter. It is overflowing with visitors in the warm months, attracted not only by its excellent management, but by delightful health, but by its good accommodations, mountain and far-famed scenery. The most special reference, however, are made in the cool months.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.

SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $50.

HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are capable of sewing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, machines, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,

No. 458 Broadway, New York.

SECRET ART OF CATCHING FISH as a fact as you pull them out, and as taught Sent for $1. Address Union Agency, Providence, R. I.

JUST PUBLISHED.

SOUTH & NORTH;

OR,

Impressions Received During a Trip to Cuba and the South.

BY

JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

1 Vol. 12mo. 350 pages.....Price $1 00

CONTENTS.

I.—The Voyage. II.—Tropical Seas. III.—Cuba.—The Coolies. IV.—The Slave's Cabin and the Freeman's Cot-tage. V.—Savannah, Charleston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. VI.—The River, the People, the Rooms. VII.—Washington and Mount Vernon. VIII.—Virginia. IX.—Insurrection. X.—Slaves and Freemen. XI.—Virginia Hospitality. XII.—Simplicity and Safety. XIII.—The Native Power of Negro. XIV.—The Injustice.—Intermeddling of the North. XII.—Southern Agriculture. A Day on the Farm. XIII.—Slavery. Its Philosophy and its Fruits. XIV.—Dissolution of the Union.

FOR SALE BY ALL BOOKSELLERS.

The Trade will be liberally dealt with for their orders direct to ABBEY & ABBOTT, Publishers, 119 Nassau Street, N. Y.

W. J. SHARP'S BILLIARD TABLE

Manufactory, 145 Fulton Street, New York.

HARD TIMES NO MORE—Any Lady or Gentleman in the United States possessing from $5 to $7 can entire into an easy and respectable business by which from $4 to $10 per day can be realized. For particulars, address (with stamp)

J. M. ACTON & CO.,

41 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES were given to every face, one my original, established 1852, which will force them to grow six weeks from the first application, and without staining the skin. Price $1. Sent by mail, post free, to any address. B. G. RAHAL, 109 Nassau Street, New York.

☞ Welling's Condition Powders.

For horses and cattle, made after Veterinary Physicians' recipes, are very efficacious when given to Horses suffering from Distemper, of the lungs, heaves, worms, colic, founding, or when hide bound. Testimonials from, farmers, stage proprietors, and other owners of horses, with directions for use, may be had on application to SAMUEL WELLING, Apothecary, Box 1,000, Post Office, Westchester county, N. Y. The trade supplied at $4 per dozen; large boxes of one dozen dozen cards. Retail price 50 cents per box. For sale by HEGEMAN & CO.

A SPLENDID GOLD OR SILVER WATCH for a $40 club at DAYTON & JONES' new Gift Enterprise. Send for particulars of the most extraordinary distribution of gifts ever offered.

ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, 66 East Wood street.—Acute, chronic and surgical diseases, of every description, successfully treated without medicine. Private parlors and female attendants for ladies. Good board and attentive nurses. Medical consultation, $1. Hours, 9 to 4.

TWO WORKS, VALUABLE TO THE SICK OR WELL, sent by mail, no pay required until received, and approved. Address, Dr. S. S. HAYWARD, New York.

1st. Its Causes, Symptoms, prevention, and cure of Lung Tissue, and its diseases; Rheumatism, and that and female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to 100 years. 260 pages, 36 engravings. Price fifty cents, in silver or postage stamps.

2d. A work on the Constitutional Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Fits, and Paralysis; why we grow old and what causes disease. 121 pages, 6 engravings. Price 25 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, State, county, town, and postoffice.

COUNTY AGENTS WANTED.

$50 A MONTH and all expenses paid, to intelligent men for NEW NATIONAL DISEASE, THE—for $20 complete instructions will be charged and the best. For circulars, with stamp, J. W. HARRIS & Co., Shoe and Leather Exchange, Boston Mass.

Sent pre-paid by First Post, for 15 cents.

NEW ALMANACS, Rich, Racy, Instructive, for 1860. Inventions, Philosophical and Water Cure. Each for 15 cents, by Fowler & Wells, New York.

THE ORANGE BLOSSOM WEDDING ENVELOPE, just issued, very beautiful copyright Second, at Herbert's Wedding Card Depot, No. 292 Broadway, cor. Duane Street. Agents Paper.

IRON IN THE BLOOD.

DYSPEPSIA, SCROFULA, GENERAL DEBILITY.

Affections of the Skin.

Headache.

Why in Iron beneficial in disease?

Why is efficacious in so many diseases apparently opposite in their nature?

Why is "PERUVIAN SYRUP," or Protected Solution of Protoxide of Iron combined, better than any other medicinal preparation of iron?

Since the remarkable cures effected through the Agency of the "PERUVIAN SYRUP" have been made public, the above questions are frequently asked regarding it. They are fully answered in a pamphlet on the "Iron of the Blood," which has been published, and is in application. The pamphlet contains also numerous certificates of remarkable cures following valuable physicians, clergymen and others.

Rev. John Pierpont, Rev. John W. Olmstead,
Rev. Warren Burton, Lewis Johnson, M.D.,
Rev. Arthur Fuller, Roswell Kinney, M.D.,
Rev. Asa. R. Pope, W. B. Kendall, M.D.,
Rev. Wm. Ware, W. D. Brigham, M.D.,
Rev. Sylvanus Cobb, Francis Dana, M.D.,
Rev. Thos. Whittemore, Jeremiah Stone, M.D.,
Rev. Richard Metcalf, Jose Antonio Sanchez, M.D.,
Rev. M. P. Webster, Marcelino Arnado, M.D.,
Rev. Abm. Jackson, Abraham Wenfield, M.D.,
Rev. J. Boynton, Jr., H. E. Kinney, M.D.,
Rev. Henry Upham, Jose d'Espinar, M.D.

Pamphlet sent on application, gratis, or to

S. L. CLARK & CO., Proprietors, Boston.

Sold by druggists generally in the U. S.

Sold wholesale and retail by

HARRIS & CO., 459 Broadway.

Scrofula, or King's Evil.

One quarter of all our people are scrofulous; their persons are invaded by this taint, and their health is undermined by it. To cleanse it from the system is the only means to secure the blood an alternative medicine, and invigorate it by healthy food and exercise. Such a medicine we supply in the most effectual remedy which the medical skill of our times can devise for this every where prevailing and fatal malady. It is combined from the most active remedies that have been proved by the best experience of this foul disorder from the blood, and the rescue of the system from its destructive consequences. Hence it should be employed for the cure of not only scrofula, but also those other affections which arise from it, such as Eruptive and Skin Diseases, St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Pimples, Pustules, Blotches, Blains and Boils, Tumors, Tetter and Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, Ulcerations, Syphilitic and Mercurial Diseases, Dropsy, Dyspepsia, Debility, and, indeed, all Complaints arising from Vitiated or Impure Blood. The popular belief in "impurity of the blood" is founded in the fact that scrofula is a degeneration of the blood. The particular purpose and virtue of this Sarsaparilla is to purify and regenerate this vital fluid, without which sound health is impossible in contaminated constitutions.

AYER'S

Compound Extract of Sarsaparilla,

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & CO.,

LOWELL, MASS.

Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

To Surveyors and Farmers.

The attention of Surveyors is called to our superior 7 and 10-inch Theodolites, made on the plan of Gambey, and which have been approved by the U. S. Coast Survey. The Telescopes are of the best quality made by Fitz. The graduations are by machines, and for its accuracy and the character of the entire instrument we refer to the official letter in our Catalogue. Every one of the kind is warranted to be of the very best quality. Level Plates, Compasses, Surveyors' Chains, &c., &c.

Instruments, circles, &c., graduated.

Catalogues sent when de-sired.

E. & G. W. BLUNT, No. 179 Water Street, New York.

ANEROID BAROMETERS, recommended by Prof. Agassiz for Topographical Surveys, $50 each.

Winant's Excelsior Billiard Tables.

Manufactory 71 Gold Street, N. Y.

☞ OLD DR. HEATH'S BOOK OF Thousand Secrets, or Manners and Arts of Indian Medicines, with full directions for the certain cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Coughs, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Fevers, Heart Disease, Scrofula, Cancer, Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Gravel and Urinary Deposits, Female Complaints, &c. Illustrated with hundreds of certificates of cures and engravings. For the purpose of reaching as many suffering fellow beings as possible from premature death, it will be sent to any part of the continent, by sending 25 cents to DRS. HEATH, 64 Broadway, New York City.

GREAT CURIOSITY—Particulars sent free. Agents wanted. CRAM & CRARE, Biddeford, Me.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

NEW LIST OF GIFTS FOR 1860.

G. G. EVANS & Co.,

PROPRIETORS OF THE ONLY ORIGINAL AND MOST EXTENSIVE GIFT BOOK STORE IN NEW ENGLAND.

No. 42 and 43 Cornhill,

Boston, Mass.,

Commence the year with a GREATLY INCREASED STOCK OF BOOKS, And an extensive and varied assortment of USEFUL and ELEGANT GIFTS.

During the last season, the business has been enabled, through the favors of our patrons, to add materially to the facilities for conducting it promptly, and we now stand prepared to fill all orders with a liberality and promptitude not exceeded by any house in the world.

Our Catalogue of Books embraces the productions of the best authors, and the publications of the

MOST EMINENT HOUSES IN THE TRADE, and comprises the Works in most

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE.

In addition to the Books, we have on hand, immediately after publication, all

NEW BOOKS AS FAST AS ISSUED.

Our Books are all new, and are substantially bound, and will be sold at prices as low as those usually made a volume be present with each Book at the time of sale.

GIFTS.

Consist of an almost endless variety of useful and elegant articles, viz:—

Gold Pens and Pencils,
Fifty cents to one hundred dollars each.

Among which will be found

GOLD AND SILVER WATCHES,
GUARD AND CHATELAINE CHAINS,
LAVA, CORAL AND ETRUSCAN JEWELRY,
GOLD STONE, MOSAIC AND FILIGREE SETS OF GOLD AND SILVER BRACELETS, PINS,
AND EAR DROPS,
GOLD PENCILS,
GOLD GIFTS
LOCKETS,
STUDS,
SLEEVE BUTTONS,
SLIDES,
LOCKETS,
PORTE MONNAIES,
PORTE MONNAIES,
PEARL HANDLED POCKET KNIVES, &c.

And as we are constantly receiving

NEW STYLES OF JEWELRY,

And adding to our stock other useful articles not heretofore enumerated in it, we are confident that, for

COMPLETENESS AND VARIETY, OUR SELECTION CAN NOT BE EXCELLED.

We allow to

MOST LIBERAL COMMISSION TO AGENTS,

And invite all who are desirous of earning a little money, or who wish to obtain a

LIBERAL GOOD AND CHOICE BOOKS

COMPARATIVELY SMALL OUTLAY OF TIME,

WITHOUT EXPENSE,

To act as our Agents.

We can refer to hundreds who already possess valuable collections of Books, which they have received as Commissions on sales, in addition to the present sent with each book.

To make all rich, or less through mail, if our directions are complied with.

A full and complete classified Catalogue sent free to any address on application.

Agents supplied with Show Bills and Circulars, and every information given.

Address G. G. EVANS & Co.,
42 and 43 Cornhill, Boston, Mass., or
G. G. EVANS, No. 439 Ridge road, Philadelphia.

BEAUTIFUL BALLADS.

By the favorite composer, J. P. KNIGHT.

SWEETLY SLEEP, MY BABY DEAR.
LOVING HEARTS AT HOME.
CHIMNEY ROOM.

Published by WM. HALL & SON, N. Y.

THE HORSE FAIR IN OIL COLORS.

The first impressions of a new and superb engraving of Rosa Bonheur's celebrated picture, printed in beautiful OIL COLORS, are now ready.

In order to meet the demand for this, engraving more than TWENTY DIFFERENT TINTS, SHADES AND COLORS, and in addition upon the whole of the paper, drawing-room, or art gallery, all the splendid effects of the original picture. The rich and costly an engraving has never before been sold in this country or Europe for less than $5 and $10. Every copy, yet sources of the sale of a very large edition, we shall furnish them at the low price of

$1.50 PER COPY.

Delivered, free of charge, at any Post-Office in the United States, and an extra copy of the picture

Is given with the United States Journal one year for $5 (or $3.50 to subscribers to the Year Book) or two years for $3.50.

Agents can make from $50 to $100 per month, taking orders and subscriptions. We present a splendid silver watch as a premium for a $75 club.

J. M. EMERSON & CO.,

Publishers of 25 Park Row, New York.

Publisher of
UNITED STATES JOURNAL,
DICKENS' ALL THE YEAR ROUND, &c.

OPERA of "MARTHA," by FLOTOW.

WITH English, German, and Italian Words, forming the tenth volume of Ditson Co.'s Edition of Standard Operas," elegantly bound uniform with previous volumes. Price $2 50. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.

PENFOLD, FLICKE & McGIVER,
Wholesale Druggists,
15 Beekman Street, New York.

HOW TO LIVE.

IN SAVING AND WASTING; or, DOMESTIC ECONOMY AS IT AFFECTS THE HEALTH. Two Lectures of Opposite Character, Habits, and Practices, in a pleasant tale of real life, full of

USEFUL LESSONS IN HOUSEKEEPING,

Health and Economy.

How to Gain, How to be Happy.

Showing the story of the Needlewoman who supported herself and four children on

A DOLLAR A DAY.

No man, woman or child can read this book without being interested in the pleasant narrative and exposition of human character, and instructed in its lessons of economy in things daily practiced in the life of every family.

Price, post-paid, 87 cents. FOWLER & WELLS,
308 Broadway, New York.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.

O'Connor & Collender, 63 Chatham Square, N. Y.

To Wholesale Dealers in Jewelry.

The undersigned begs to say that, owing to his unsurpassed facilities, he is able to offer to the Trade Jewelry of any description on better term than any other house in New York.

All orders will receive the most careful and prompt attention. W. A. HAYWARD,

205 Broadway.

Important Invention for married people. For circulars address, enclosing stamp, Dr. H. HIRSH-FIELD, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 459 Broadway, N. Y.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,

For the Insaf and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the normal habits of female life superinduce a variety of diseases which this fastidious will counteract and cure. It can be relied upon in any case of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, Ulceration of the Womb, Flatulence, Lassitude, &c., &c. When every thing else has failed, this article is never taken without benefit. No suffering female should longer remain in doubt. A pamphlet, with full symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent (gratis) by mail, or delivered by any Agent. Sold by Agents in every town, or sent by express. Be cautious of an imitation, Dr. Marchisi's name on the wrapper, on certificates attested, &c. Address BARNES & PARK, No. 13 Park Row, N. Y.; J. P. MARCHISI, Cincinnati or Chicago; HOSKINS & POTTER, Boston; or CALLENDER & CO., Philad.

J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Utica, N. Y.

Bound Volumes of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

NINETEEN SEMI-ANNUAL VOLUMES of the Magazine have been published. We will send by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States within 3000 miles of New York, any of these volumes, neatly and uniformly bound in Muslin, upon the receipt of Two Dollars per Volume. When more than one is purchased, we will make a discount of Twenty-five per cent., forwarding the volumes by express, the freight being at the expense of the purchaser.

These Nineteen Volumes of the Magazine contain matter equivalent to more than One Hundred ordinary Octave Volumes, and are illustrated by more than Six Thousand Engravings, executed in the highest style of the art.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 70 to 80 pages more than any other two half-numbers reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

NUMBER CXIX.] CONTENTS. [APRIL, 1860.

ARTIST LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS.

Illustrations.—The Highlands of New Jersey.—On the Road.—Upper Fall, Cornwall.—Leaving Cold.—Hook.—Bog-Trotters.—Shoeing.—Dripping.—Cotter Volume.—Bar for the Night.—Lord Stirling's Forge.—Entrance to Hibernia Mine.—Interior of Mine.—Mouth of Ore Bank.—Ore Bank.—Ore Bank at Ault.—Surface Works, Byram Mine.—Transit of Knowledge under Difficulties.—Degrees of Latitude.—Plumbing Ore Car.—Gallery in Byram Mine.—Surface Works, Dickerson Mine.—Ore Bank.—Driving a Road.—Tune-Table.

HOW WE GOT GOLD IN CALIFORNIA.

Illustrations.—Camp on the Stanislaus.—The First Gold Discovery.—Mexican Gold.—Digging.—Cradle-Rocking.—Washing with Long Tom.—River Operations.—Sluice Boxes.—Hydraulic Mining.—Flume.

THE FIGHT AT LEXINGTON. By Thomas Dunn English.

Illustrations.—The Fight at Lexington.—Battle-Ground.—Concord.

CAPTAIN TOM: A RESURRECTION. By Charles Nordhoff.

KATHIE MORRIS. By T. B. Aldrich.

LITTLE BREECHES. Part III.

THE ALEXANDRIANS.

YEH'S CHRISTMAS-BOX.

DOG—A REMARKABLE EXPERIENCE.

THE LITTLE ART-STUDENT.

LITTLE FANNY.

ON TWO CHILDREN IN BLACK. By W. M. Thackeray.

ORIANA INN: A DISPUTED POSSESSION.

THE LOST STEAMSHIP. By Fitz-James Green.

LOVEL: THE WIDOWER. By W. M. Thackeray.

CHAPTER IV. In which I Keep the Spy.

Illustration.—The Omnibus.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

MASTER CHARLEY'S FIRST PANTALOONS.

THE LOST STEAMSHIP. By Fitz-James Green.

Illustration.—At Night.—In the Street.—Appearance of Rockets.—Rockets and Pockets.—Vanity.—A Fall.—Consequences.—Degraded to Frocks.

A SHIRT FOR APRIL.

Illustrations.—Spring Parterre.—Home Dress.—Medallion Under-Sleeve.—Under-Sleeve.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 50
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

The Postage upon HARPER'S MAGAZINE, must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE COPIES A NUMBER; $7 50 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for Three Months 1 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one Year, $4 00.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

The Present Intelligence Offices having been found to work badly, Mrs. BLACKSTONE establishes an office on a new system—the Engagement of Employers by Servants. Mrs. BRIDGET O'FLAHERTY, who wants a place as cook, calls to inspect the employers present, and Mrs. BLACKSTONE presents Mr. JONES to her, and gives him a fair character.

THE SUPERINTENDENT OF POLICE IN THE PETTERS ARRANGED FOR HIM BY THE COMMISSIONERS.

COMMISSIONER B——. "Now, Mr. Superintendent, we've made you pretty comfortable, just look lively, and attend to your duties."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

Have removed their Stock of

China, Glass, &c.,

To No. 479 Broadway, New York.

(between Grand and Broome Sts.).

We invite the Public to examine the quality and styles of our goods, comparing the prices, which are

Low for Cash.

One Price—No Deviation.

LOUISVILLE ARTESIAN WATER.

S. T. THOMPSON, Agent,

632 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

"Medical Common Sense."

Send and get the Contents Table of this remarkable book; interesting to every body. Sent free by addressing DR. FOOTE, 346 Broadway, N. Y.

"Trefelio!" "Trefelio!"

The Secret of Beauty.

We are positive that a single Bottle of the elegant French Floral Extract — "Trefelio" — will convince the most skeptical of its super-excellent qualities as a Restoring and Beautifying medium. Try it.

Sold by HEGEMAN & CO., and all Druggists.

Wholesale, LAZELL, MARSH & GARDINER, 10 Gold Street.

The Latest English Sensation Novel.

In Press, and will be published in a few days:

RITA.

An Autobiography.

MAYHEW & BAKER.

Publishers, Boston.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.

B. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

Something New.

Stuffering and Stammering are permanently cured or No Charge, by DR. A. H. SMEDLEY. Office No. 648 Broadway. Hours 10 to 4.

SENT BY EXPRESS EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices.

Made to Measure at $18 per doz. or Six for $9.

MADE OF NEW-YORK MILLS MUSLIN,

With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2.50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $3 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I cannot make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken.... Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts.

3½ yards of New-York Mills muslin at 14½c. per yd...$4 55
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard..... 3 50
Making and cutting..... 4 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c..... 1 50
Profit..... 2 60

Total..... $18 00

Self Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and no easy to understand, that any fool can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cost to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

The Express charges on one dozen Shirts from New-York to New Orleans is about $1.

WARD, from London,

387 Broadway, up stairs,

Between White & Walker Streets, NEW-YORK.

Please copy my address as other houses in the city are selling inferior made shirts at my prices.

!!SOMETHING NEW!!

A HEMMER, TUCKER, FELLER, BINDER, AND GUAGE combined, just received, simple, hemming any width and thickness of cloth either side, applied to any Sewing Machine by any one in a few minutes. Retail price $5. LIBERAL DISCOUNT TO THE TRADE. Orders by mail supplied with complete instructions, postage paid. Send for a circular.

UNIVERSAL HEMMER CO.,

429 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Coleman's Eutaw House,

Baltimore.

This popular House has been thoroughly renovated, and opened by ROBERT B. COLEMAN, late of the Astor House and St. Nicholas Hotels, and offers superior accommodations to families and travellers.

Perry's Japanese Boot and Shoe Polish.

Splendid gloss. No rubbing. Soils nothing. Sold everywhere.

JAPANESE POLISH CO.,

No. 447 Broome Street, one door west of Broadway.

Established in 1834.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,

Manufacturer of the Over-string

GRAND & SQUARE PIANO-FORTES,

Manufactory and Warerooms

75 to 85

East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five Years, and Prices are moderate.

11 PULPIT AND ROSTRUM 11

NO. 11 HAS

HON. THOMAS S. BOCOCK'S

ELOQUENT

ORATION ON GEORGE WASHINGTON,

Delivered at the Inauguration of the Mills Statue, in Washington City, Feb. 23, 1860.

Terms, $1 a year; single number mailed for 10 cents. Sold by all booksellers.

No. 11 has a list of all back numbers.

11 H. H. LLOYD & CO., 11

No. 348 Broadway, New York.

What Everybody Wants.

Everybody's Lawyer

AND

Counsellor in Business.

BY FRANK CROSBY,

OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR.

IT TELLS YOU How to draw up PARTNERSHIP PAPERS and gives general forms for ASSIGNMENTS of all kinds, BILLS of SALE, LEASES and PETITIONS.

IT TELLS YOU How to draw up BONDS and MORTGAGES, ARBITRATIONS, POWERS of ATTORNEY, NOTES and BILLS of EXCHANGE, RECEIPTS and RELEASES.

IT TELLS YOU The LAWS for the COLLECTION of DEBTS, with the STATUTES of LIMITATION, and amount and kind of property EXEMPT from EXECUTION in every State.

IT TELLS YOU How to make an ASSIGNMENT properly, with forms for COMPOSITION with CREDITORS, and the INSOLVENT LAWS of every State.

IT TELLS YOU The legal relations existing between GUARDIAN and WARD, MASTER and APPRENTICE, and LANDLORD and TENANT.

IT TELLS YOU What constitutes LIBEL and SLANDER, and the LAW as to MARRIAGE HOWEVER, the WIFE'S RIGHTS in PROPERTY, DIVORCE and ALIMONY.

IT TELLS YOU The LAW for MECHANICS' LIENS in every State, and the NATURALIZATION LAWS of this country, and how to comply with the same.

IT TELLS YOU The LAW Concerning PENSIONS and how to obtain one, and the PRE-EMPTION LAWS to PUBLIC LANDS.

IT TELLS YOU The LAW for PATENTS, with mode of procedure in obtaining one, with INTERFERENCES, ASSIGNMENTS and TABLE of FEES.

IT TELLS YOU How to make your WILL, and how to ADMINISTER on an ESTATE, with the law and the requirements thereof in every State.

IT TELLS YOU The meaning of LAW TERMS in general use, and explains to you the LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE and JUDICIAL POWERS of both the General and State GOVERNMENTS.

IT TELLS YOU How to KEEP OUT OF LAW, by showing how to do your business legally, thus saving a vast amount of property, or cautious litigation, by its timely consultation.

Single copies will be sent by mail, postage paid, to EVERY FARMER, EVERY MECHANIC, EVERY MAN OF BUSINESS, and EVERYBODY in EVERY STATE, on receipt of $1 00, or in law style of binding at $1 25.

$1000 A YEAR can be made by engraining now everywhere, by selling the above work, as our inducements to all such are very liberal.

For single copies of the Book, or for terms to agents, with other information, apply to or address

JOHN E. POTTER, PUBLISHER,

No. 617 Sansom St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Admirable in Quality.

In Price Wonderfully Cheap.

12 CENTS	THE	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	THE	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	SHILLING	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	SHILLING	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	HAIR TONIC, BENZINE,	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	HAIR TONIC, BENZINE,	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	INDELIBLE INK.	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	INDELIBLE INK.	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	INDELIBLE INK.	TRY THEM

Sold by 3000 Druggists at Retail.

Wholesale only at 159 Water Street.

COURT OF DEATH.

For One Dollar and 4 postage stamps, the subscriber will forward, (post-paid) one engraving of this sublime painting. Address G. Q. COLTON, 31 Park Row, New York. P. O. Box 5201.

A NEW BOOK by Dr. CHAPIN. — EXTEMPORANEOUS DISCOURSES by the Rev. E. H. CHAPIN, D.D., reported as delivered, and revised and corrected by the author. First series, 358 pages, 12mo. Price $1. Extraordinary inducements to agents. O. HUTCHINSON, Publisher, at T. LYNCH'S Bookstore, Nos. 49 and 51 Nassau Street.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. IV.—No. 169.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

A NEW SERIAL.

WE shall commence in an early number a new Serial Story, entitled

CAPTAIN BRAND,

OF THE

SCHOONER "CENTIPEDE,"

BY

LIEUT. HENRY A. WISE, U. S. N.

ILLUSTRATED BY

C. PARSONS AND LUMLEY.

We publish in this number the Fourth Journey of THE UNCOMMERCIAL TRAVELER, by CHAS. DICKENS, Esq.

Attention is requested to the great variety of the illustrations, as well as the reading matter contained in this number of the Weekly.

Harper's Weekly is now the cheapest advertising medium in the country. Price 50 cents per line.

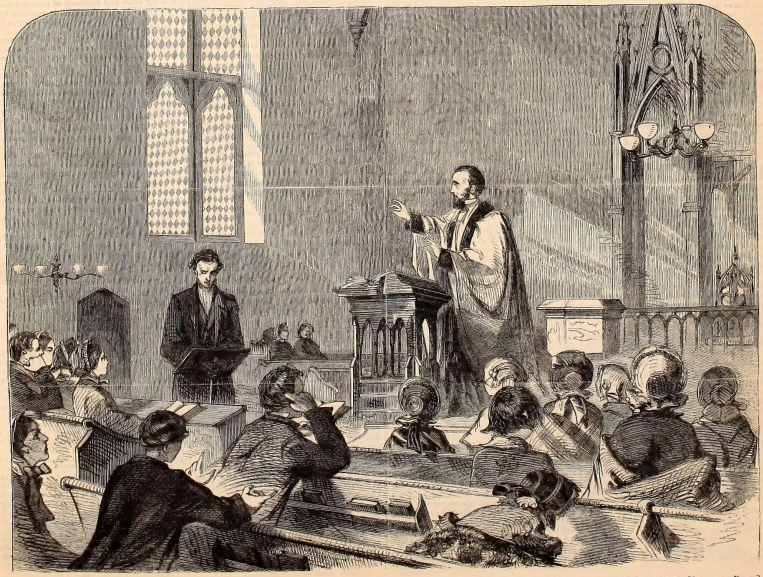
"COMES THE NEVER-FAILING ECHO—NEVER MORE!"

FLORINDA.

I.

Oh, love! thou gift divine,
Once so nobly, humbly mine:
Once so swift my coldest bidding to obey;
Oh, base, ignoble pride,
That cast the gift aside,
Like a flower idly pluck'd and thrown away.

II.



He loved her not at first,
In security accurst
I thought my power never could depart.
But, oh, with patient care
She has won my jewel rare,
And now I'm lost forever to his heart.

III.

I could tear her limb from limb,
If I thought his love a whim,
If I hoped to win a thought of his again.
But no! the time has past,
He has look'd and loved his last,
And I'd die to save his heart a moment's pain.

IV.

And his child—her little child!—
With those eyes so brave and mild,
Oh, would that there were poison in his kiss!
Oh, strange entangled fate,
How I love her, how I hate:
How I curse her, how I bless her for his bliss!

READING THE PARABLE OF THE PRODIGAL SON TO THE DEAF MUTES AT THEIR CHURCH IN EIGHTEENTH STREET, NEW YORK, MARCH 11, 1860.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

V.

There are voices in the roar
Of the breakers on the shore—
There are whispers in the wash of the sea.
There are echoes in the breeze,
As it murmurs 'neath the trees,
There are faces in the stars for me.

VI.

Those solemn voices roll
Through the desert of my soul—
They chill my bleeding heart to its core.
When I say that peace and rest
Once more may fill my breast,
Comes the never-failing echo—Never more!

PREACHING TO THE DEAF AND DUMB.

MANY of our readers may have heard of the church for deaf-mutes in Eighteenth Street in this city; but few, we presume, have witnessed its services, and all will be glad to see the faithful picture given on the preceding page.

The first services of this church were conducted by its present rector, the Rev. Thomas Gallaudet, in the smaller chapel of the New York University, on the first Sunday of October, 1852. In this place it struggled for existence during five years, gradually gaining in strength and means, until its removal to the Lecture-room of the New York Historical Society Building, corner of Second Avenue and Eleventh Street. Here its prospects improved so much that it was deemed expedient to purchase, in July last, the church and parsonage in West Eighteenth Street, originally built by Christ Church. In this church its services began on the first Sunday of August, 1859. Since then it has steadily worked its way toward permanent success.

In this church are gathered adult deaf-mutes (graduates of various Institutions), their families, and others willing to promote their welfare, the Sunday services being oral at half-past ten A.M. and half-past seven P.M., and in the sign-language at three P.M. We present a sketch of the latter service as the Rector and his silent congregation appeared on Sunday afternoon, March 11. The deaf-mutes sang one of the hymns we are using at clerk, giving the responses in the service according to the common Prayer-book. The rector translated on this occasion the parable of the Prodigal Son. This church is doing great good among the deaf-mute residents of this city and its vicinity. Its rector makes it his duty to visit deaf-mutes in their seasons of sickness and trouble, and to endeavor to help them to situations in which to earn their daily bread. Since he left his position as instructor in the New York Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, in which office he has found, by personal application, situations for upward of fifty deaf-mutes.

This is the first church of its kind in the world. Within the past year a similar one has been established in London. We close this brief sketch with a list of the present vestry: C. C. Lathrop and S. R. Comstock, Wardens; George R. Jackson, W. O. Fitzgerald, Josiah Jones, John C. Bronson, Dr. Alex. M. Badd, M.D., Franklin Campbell, D. Reynolds Budd, and James L. Harris, Vestrymen.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1860.

THE REVENUE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MR. SHERMAN, Chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means, has proposed to fund the twenty odd millions of Treasury notes now in circulation by the issue of a five per cent. Federal stock. It is intimated that this measure is but the cloak for a protectionist scheme devised in the interest of the Pennsylvania iron-makers and coal-diggers, and that the party design is to secure Pennsylvania for the Republicans next fall. If this be so, the project will probably fail; a decided majority of the House of Representatives—as of all intelligent bodies in the country—are and must be opposed to the imposition of fresh duties on imports. But in the main, and in respect to the main object of Mr. Sherman's Committee, the idea is sound.

There is no present prospect that the United States will be able to pay off the debt, incurred in consequence of the revulsion of 1857, out of the revenue derived from customs duties. The imports during the present fiscal year are the heaviest ever known; yet the income which they provide will hardly suffice for the current expenditures of the civil government. As to raising the duties, that is a method which does not commend itself to any enlarged mind. Our object should be, and is, to expand, not to contract commerce; to lighten, not to increase the burdens which press upon trade. As, therefore, we are not yet out of our notes at maturity, it is impossible to do better than to fund them, especially as the public will give one per cent. more for funded stock than for Treasury notes.

If ever an intelligent, self-reliant, and large-minded financier obtains the position of Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or Secretary of the Treasury, an effort at all events will be made to remedy the present absurd system on which the revenue of the Government of the United States is collected.

The whole scheme of rendering the Government incomes dependent on the produce of customs duties is wrong. It takes money, because it levies toll on commerce, which it should be the aim of our Government to foster, not to tax; secondly, because it is a fluctuating source of income, sometimes so prolific that the Government is driven to use its surplus in the purchase of its bonds at an enormous premium, and sometimes so scanty that the Administration is forced to borrow at high rates of interest to defray the ordinary expenses of the public service; and, thirdly, because it is an unfair, indirect, and roundabout way of raising a revenue, which might be all very well among people who are unfitted for the duties and responsibilities of self-government, but which is beneath the character of citizens of the United States.

If this country were peopled by a race of Spanish half-breeds, with a large admixture of negro, no sense of ambition or manliness, there might be some excuse for adopting a sneaking system of taxation which shall secure to a people's pockets without their feeling it. In Nicaragua, for instance, or some of the States of Mexico, one can imagine a sagacious statesman resorting to the tariff system on the ground that, though people would not pay a direct tax levied as such, they might not object to pay so much more for wine, sugar, coffee, tea, dry goods, and hardware. Such a statesman would act upon the assumption that the people for whom he legislated would be afforded him by an active commercial port; nor can the manufacturer prosper if he, too, be confined to the home market. Both must be free to thrive, require to be able to say to their neighbors:

"Gentlemen, you will not buy my corn or my boots? Very well; then I will send them to France, China, Africa, or Australia, where I can obtain a reward for my labor; and you will have to get your food and your boots where you best can."

If the farmer and the manufacturer have by unwise legislation been driven from the foreign trade of the country, by heavy tariffs or other legislative impediments reduced it within narrow limits, the consumers address them:

"Gentlemen, we will give you so much for your corn and your boots; you may take it or not as you please, but as we are the only customers you can get, you must either take our offer or lose your property and starve."

This is the legitimate and inevitable consequence of imposing taxes, tolls, and restrictions on foreign trade—such as customs duties.

If the commerce of the United States were abolished altogether, and the world around the United States created a free port, it would become the great emporium for the goods of all nations. All the manufacturers of foreign countries would come here to sell, and all the consumers to buy. We are so centrally situated here we say that, by the days of steam and telegraphs, the great cities of this country would, in this event, become the great mart for the trade, not only of America and Europe, but of Europe also. For, having no customs tariff to impede trade, and possessing within us the great raw materials of life and industry, it would be possible for us to undersell the world in all leading articles of commerce.

It is to be asked how, in such a case, would the Federal Government be supported?—the answer is obvious—by direct taxation.

The writer was present, a year or two since, in the United States Senate when the Hon. Jefferson Davis, one of the most clear-headed statesmen in the country, intimated his wish to see a system of direct taxation established in this country. He was answered by a very worthy man, Senator Simmons, of Rhode Island, who sneeringly inquired where the people would get the gold and silver to pay taxes, as he knew many localities where those metals were unknown, and inconvertible bank-notes were the only currency. He was unable to designate the localities to which the Senator referred, but if there be any such, we think it is high time that a sound currency were introduced into their currency systems, and we can not conceive any better way of achieving it than by the adoption of a Federal scheme of taxation. There are, it is commonly supposed, no less than $250,000,000 of coined gold, silver, and copper in circulation in the United States. It is not likely that the Government would hold over $50,000,000 of this at any time. Senator Simmons's objection will not hold water. Missouri, Illinois, Texas, and two other Western States are cursed by wild-cat banks, whose notes are practically inconvertible; but the people of these States are waging a vigorous war against these pests, and in a year or two they will be crushed out. Besides, even now, gold is never dearer at Chicago and St. Louis than 1½ per cent. premium for currency.

As to the difficulty of accustoming the people to direct taxes, we say, in the first place, there is no city or county in the country (the State of Camden and Amboy alone excepted) where the people do not pay some city, or county, or State taxes; if they pay these, why should they object to pay taxes to the General Government? In the second place, if, after all the brag and bluster we hear so often about the extraordinary and God-given capacity of our race for self-government, we don't know enough to pay the cost of our Government in a straightforward way, out of our own pockets, in gold and silver, then it is high time that the fact were known and proclaimed aloud. If we are such a miserable sneaking people that we won't pay our debts if they are presented to us fairly and squarely, but can be cheated into paying them in an underhand, indirect way, in the guise of a customs duty, it is of the first importance that the public should be made aware of the fact, and that historians and philosophers should be set on their guard.

We have cast these suggestions without any idea that they will be acted upon immediately, or for some time to come. But whenever the Treasury Department or the Committee on Ways and Means falls into the hands of an Independent thinker, then, perhaps, the obsolete absurdity of a Customs Revenue may be exploded.

HARRIET MARTINEAU ON SEWING.

I WEAR the people of a higher and a lower class, and American and other foreigners, would be made to understand how much domestic business is actually transacted by middle-class women in England. I do not like the discredit of the popular notion that our English girls are too genteel to understand how to cook, and to do shopping, and manage the house. Whether the business is properly done or not, women should insist on its being regarded as a duty, that there may be the better chance for its being done. If the daughter we are now contemplating is a rational girl, she will prepare to be in personal charge of the kitchen, and getting into training under her mother. She will be up early (thereby insuring the early rising of the servants), and off to the fishmonger's or the vegetable market—having the benefit of an early choice of good articles. She will have learned with her mother the dinners of the week (with a margin for unexpected occurrences); and therefore, when the cook has made breakfast, is ready for her conference with the cook. She chooses to know how to do every thing that she requires to be done; and so far as may be, by experience. She experiments upon cakes and puddings; and the syllabubs, tarts, and preserves are of her making, till she is satisfied of her proficiency. The linen in the housemaid's department is under her care, and it will be her fault if a table-cloth has a jagged corner or the sheets a slit in the middle. These matters, so far, occupy very little time, while they afford much less of exercise and amusement to a healthy mind.

The sewing is another affair. It is still the curse of profitless labor among the poor of the middle class. There can hardly be another woman in that class more thoroughly fond of the needle than myself: and I have, practically, have done needlework, of all kinds, in the course of their lives: yet it is my belief that thousands of parents are actually cruel to their daughters in withdrawing from them the amount of needle-work customary in this and a few other countries.

Fathers and brothers suppose that the women of the household are to sit down to make linen for the house and the inhabitants every week or fortnight, and to stick to the work all day, as the men do to their business. If they knew the strain upon the nerves, and the general unhealthiness of the occupation, when a certain limit of hours is past, they would forbid it as peremptorily as intemperance in stimulating morals. I fear it is still too often the case that all the girls of a family are seated at the work-table all day long, except when at meals, or when taking a walk; and that to one of them can attempt to steal half an hour's solitude in her own room without being sent for to join the sewing-party. There may be reading aloud—and this is a great improvement upon perpetual talk; but there is the need of solitude, and of freedom of occupation, is too often forgotten in households where needle-work is assumed to be the whole employment. If not the whole duty, of women. I could say much more under this head; but the advent of the sewing-machine supersedes much remonstrance and preaching. It will not, happily, take the needle out of women's hands, because there is much delicate and critical work which it can not do; but it will soon put an end to the slavery to the needle, under which so many English girls grow crooked, and sallow, and nervous, and miserable.

H. MARTINEAU.

THE LOUNGER.

PALMS WITHOUT THORNS.

IT sometimes happens that a man has all the honors of martyrdom without any of the pains. He has the halo of Saint Sebastian, but none of the arrows eating his flesh. He is called to the throne without peril, being unconscious of any thing but the kindest feeling and the most courteous conduct toward each other, that all sense and hear the noise of the battle which has been provoked in their names, but of which they are innocent.

Men who are sagacious enough to build up a great and prosperous business are usually sensible enough to see that the result is achieved by a strict attention to the laws of trade. A merchant who should say to a fellow-trader, "Sir, I can not buy those bales of goods of you until I know whether you are sound upon the Augustinian theology—whether you prefer German music to Italian—whether you are a free-trader or protectionist—and whether you think 'Adam Bede' as good a novel as 'John Halifax,'" would be a very unsuccessful merchant, to say the least.

For a man's views upon subjects that have no relation to the matter in hand are as much his private property as his coat. If Dickens's publishers should inform him that they would print no more stories for him if he persisted in wearing a hat instead of a cap. Dickens, as a large creditor, would probably see out a writ de lunatico, for he would be very sure that the worthy man had gone mad.

Whoever buys this paper, Harper's Weekly, buys it because he thinks he shall get its money's worth, or he is a very foolish fellow to buy it at all. As people who write the articles and draw the pictures which it contains are of all countries, sexes, ages, conditions, habits, tempers, manners, tastes, and opinions. But when they co-operate in the preparation of the paper they have but one aim, and that is to please. If they joke, or describe, or sing, or moralize, or satirize, or criticise, or speculate, &c., &c., they intend to do so reasonably. If they do not, you, discriminating reader, will not buy the paper. Now suppose that you knew all the people who contribute to make a single number of the Weekly—suppose you had discovered that you agree with them upon every possible point of human thought—and suppose moreover that what they wrote for your amusement was exactly dull—would you buy the paper? No, not if you were a discriminating reader.

Then suppose that you differed upon great subjects, but that they pleased you in what they wrote, and had the good manners not to introduce the topics of difference, are you going to cut your own nose off to spite yourself? Gentle Sir, you must be entreated. You are discovered. You are the author of that celebrated programme, "The Conservator; a new and popular magazine. First number will be issued on the first day of April. The largest sums will be paid for entertaining contributions. N.B.—If persons who do not exactly weigh more than a hundred and thirty pounds—who prefer quail peas to steel—or who are color-blind, need not apply." You would be as wise in writing those conditions as a railroad company in engaging engineers upon the same terms, and no wiser.

ONE HEAD.

It is a wise provision of nature that the human body is made with one head. For what labyrinths of confusion there would needs be if there were two wills to direct the action of the same body. The advantage of this single headship has been always acknowledged in military discipline. It is the key of the whole. It is the same in farming, in manufactures, where one man controls, and the rest, natural workers, by a perfectly faithful metaphor, are called hands. Cæsar, Hannibal, Alexander, Napoleon, Washington, were the directive will of the action of nations. The latter, indeed, held councils of war, but the will of the General is supreme over the whole, and the parts are all absolutely subject to their several heads. To disobey, to strike an officer, is death. It is the fundamental rule of all discipline, and of all success by combined human action. So in the June days of '48 in Paris, the government was obliged to send for Lamartine and his companions had equal powers of command; it was not until they had resigned, and the single power had of Cavaignac devolved on the whole, that the disturbance was quelled, and the republic restored. Cavaignac was not made dictator, but his single department he was supreme.

Now a police is a civil army. It can no more be efficiently directed by half a dozen heads than a regiment can be commanded by so many colonels. It must have one will to control it, made as responsible as you please, but supreme within its reasonable sphere. That is what has been forgotten in the recent action of the Police Commissioners in this city. The proof of it is here, that a threatening riot should suddenly arise, the Commissioners, by the necessity of the case, would invest their Superintendent with uncontrolled powers.

Undoubtedly a Superintendent is subordinate to the Commissioners. But undoubtedly, he, too, be justly removed only when he fails to perform the duties incident to his position, not when he protests against the interference of the Commission in discharging them. A gardener is responsible to his employer for the general care of the plot with which he takes care of the garden; but if the employer incessantly removes the plants and parallyzes the whole method of the gardener, a self-respecting intelligent man will resign his situation. And as you ascend in the scale of importance of employment, you find the probabilities of resignation increased. If the object of a Police Commission be the preservation of public order, it is surely not a wise thing to appoint an able and faithful officer, to resign by insisting upon interfering with the details of the discharge of his duty. If, however, the object of a Police Commission be something else—if it be, for instance, party discipline, and not public order—the Commission is undoubtedly the best judge of the method by which that end can be attained.

DEMOCRACY, DIRT, AND DISCOMFORT.

THE faithful student of the Latin Grammar remembers that poetry proves, Facta est Amica—a wise man learns of his enemy. Now English travelers and critics are not our enemies: but they occasionally see and say things very disagreeable which many of us see as plainly but are not so ready to say, and which a great many among us suppose are seen because they are not said. In fact, there is probably as little individual independence among Americans as among the citizens of countries which are not the greatest and most glorious of all countries in creation—as this country is. The foreigners who have crossed the sea, and who, upon their return, have laughed at our spitting, and bragging, and other minor offenses, are viewed as public enemies. Mrs. Trollope, for instance, and Captain Hall, and even Dickens—who objected to being regarded as a prize porker—have all fallen under our severe censure. Undoubtedly they said a great many foolish and flat things, and often ludicrously attributed to our political philosophy what was merely a solecism in good manners. Frequently, too, their profounder criticisms were so shallow and unjust that we were blind, through indignation, to their more reasonable remarks.

Thus one of the most unimportant of all the gentlemen who have come over to visit us lately—Mr. Grantley F. Berkeley—has been writing letters to some sporting journal, in which he apparently takes his revenge upon the whole country, because some Western railroad company did not transport hunting-dogs as Mr. Grantley F. Berkeley thought hunting-dogs ought to be transported. The chances undoubtedly are in favor of his knowing more about the matter than the company. But his criticisms upon our general habits and the spirit of our society and government do not show that in other and more important and serious matters the chances are in favor of his superior knowledge. And yet among his minor observations there are one or two worth attending, the observation of a very general popular error. For instance, he says, in a very ill-mannered way, but not without a little sting of truth:

"Lumbering along rails, tyrannizing over all other wheeled conveniences, there you have a cheap omnibus; and when I observed to a friend that I thought it would

'Bob-boys,' all of them spitting in chorus between their teeth, my democratic friend, who does not like sarcasm, assures me that in this land of freedom there can be but one price and one vehicle for all."

This remark of his democratic friend was not particularly apt in the city, because any one who chooses can take a carriage and avoid the public conveyances. But it is true enough as applied to the great railroad lines. And another observer—the author of one of the most delightful and valuable books ever written upon this country, a writer as different from Mr. Berkeley as a man of great intelligence, who comes to study the secrets of the amazing prosperity and progress of this nation, is from one who comes to shoot buffalo—Mr. James Skirling—says:

"The popular notion of equality is no less superficial than that of Liberty. The Democrat who is not satisfied with entering a railway by the mast have an outward monotony of condition. The people must all ride in the same car, eat at the same table, and vote at the same polling-place. * * * Why should not a poor man consent to ride in a less luxurious car, to dine at a cheaper table, as well as live in a less luxurious house, paying a proportionate rent?"

To understand the full force of such a criticism it is necessary to know the singularly sympathetic and intelligent spirit of Mr. Stirling's book. Thus, all he says Dickens and Mr. Jefferson Brick in mind, when he wrote:

"The stereotyped ideal of a Yankee editor is the vulgar English caricature of a Mississippian, with a pen in one hand and a bowie-knife in the other, stabbing, indifferently with either weapon, whosoever dares to differ from him. * * * Such an one, and find a scholar and a gentleman, who has probably traveled from one end of Europe to the other. This is an instance, among a thousand, of the extreme difficulty of estimating aright the civilization of a people at a distance."

Both these travelers have the sense to see—the one sneeringly, the other sagaciously—what there is a deeper significance in than appears. Each takes its character from a mean misapprehension of the democratic principle—a sort of do-as-you-please-as-good-as-anybody-else notion, which will degrade every thing to the level of the lowest intelligence. Let a man, for instance, step into a car on the night train, and observe that it is a black-hole of horror—filled with the poisonous exhalations of two or three hundred bodies, offensive to every sense, destructive of comfort, and deleterious to health. He would willingly pay twice the fare for a clean, cool, comfortable place to sit in for the rest. Yet if any company should make distinctions of price and place, except that between the emigrant and the first-class, the whole people who availed themselves of the preference offered would be denounced as "stuck-up aristocrats!" And yet for what is the first-class kept? For what it buys? And if a man is not a pampered minion of wealth and pride because he wears calfskin boots instead of patent leather, he is not to be so considered if he prefer to breathe fresh air, and to pay more for it, rather than suffer with the others of the train, and bring with clothes, and cheeks, and pea-nuts, and frizzled apple-parings, and saliva (red or pale) or fifty other pests.

The despotism of one ignorant man is bad, but that of a million ignorant men is a million times worse.

A LETTER TO ——.

DEAR LITTLE MISS,—You are fond of music, are you not?—for if not, why do you go to the rehearsal of the Philharmonic Society? If you do like it, you will listen with joy to the orchestra play. If you do not, you will have the politeness to keep silent, and let those hear who wish to.

I, for instance, dear little Miss, pay five dollars a year for the privilege of hearing Beethoven, and Mozart, and Haydn, and Mendelssohn, and Weber—I do not pay it to hear you cackle and tattle. When you sit by my side, with half a dozen other dear little Misses all cackling and tattling as much as mocker, and whisper, and rustle, you are a dear little band of highway robbers, swindling me out of the music I have paid for.

I said swindling, dear little Miss.

Why does not your mother or your responsible nurse keep you quiet? No person of ten years old should be permitted to go alone into places of public resort until he knows and obeys the rudiments of good manners. You do not, dear little Miss. You are an utterly under-bred and vulgar person. Because you wear tolerably fine clothes, and because the young men like your pretty face, you think that what you and your set do is all right. Little Miss, it is all wrong.

For instance, the other day at the rehearsal, when your tittering and gabbling became intolerable, I turned to you and asked you, in a perfectly polite way, if you would please allow me to hear the music. Do you remember what you did? You stared at me for a moment with an insolent boldness, which you meant to look like crushing contempt and superb disdain, and then you rattled on faster than before. Are you aware that you were deplorably vulgar in so doing? It showed such a poor, thin, shallow character—such weak conceit—such miserable selfishness—as I pitied you to see. I wanted to hear the music, so I left you. And, dear little Miss, if that kind of selfishness is the key-note of your character throughout life, you will constantly see people getting up and leaving you.

Don't do so, dear. If you want to flirt, stay outside. If you are afraid of losing the men, tell them that they will be let out during the music, and they will stick to you like her subjects to Maria Teresa. (She was Empress of Austria and Queen of Hungary, you know. Her Hungarian nobles said, "Moramur pro nostra rege." It was the Latin way of saying that they would die for her.) If you say to a youth who insists upon talking, "Frederick, or Robert, or Henry, or Thomas, there are some persons who like to hear the music, although I had rather talk with you," you will dance or immediately whether he be a gentleman or not. And do you wish to associate with those who are not? Yes, of course you do. Do you ask how I know? Because, dear little Miss, your conduct in other days has shown me that you are not a lady.

You see, dear, we have had quite enough of this business. You and the other girls and boys have lately taken possession of the concert-room—and it is not a concert that we hear, but only your whispering. The next time that I am disturbed by your fatal gabble, I shall not politely request you the playing until we can remove a very vulgar, little girl, who is annoying every body in her neighborhood by giggling and gabbling."

I hope you will think of these things, for I am really your friend.

THE LADY IN THE BLUE BONNET.

The above extraordinary letter has been intrusted to the Lounger to reach its destination. He cannot imagine to what it refers. It seems to be addressed only to dear little Miss ——; but he knows so many of that address!

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—Testimonial. The poem "Tristrum and Iseult" by Matthew Arnold, which has late Dr. Arnold, and was Regius Professor of Poetry at Oxford, England. The poem is dedicated to Arthur Hugh Clough, late of Oxford, and Iseult of Brittany. Arnold has published two volumes of miscellaneous poetry, and one volume containing the poem of Sir Tristrum.

DOOMED TO DEATH.

BY AN EX-CHAPLAIN TO A JAIL.

THE thoughts of almost every man condemned to die by the law are taken up with, and concentrated upon, the hope of reprieve. Notwithstanding that in many cases the doomed person is ready to admit the justice of his sentence—although I have my doubts whether there is much genuine candor in that statement, and am of opinion that it is commonly made with a view to obtain a portion of exciting commiseration, and eventually pardon —yet, it being in the power of his brother-men to save his life, the desire of life seems to him to be an action absolutely monstrous and incredible. That the prison authorities, the government, the nation, the whole world should quietly suffer him to be led out under the open sky to be put to death—to be hung by the neck till he is dead—appears to him not only cruel, but, although he knows it to be what has happened to hundreds of others before him) a thing utterly impossible. He cannot bring his eyes to the fate awaiting him as long as he can, almost always up to the last night he has to live, very often up to the moment when he sits his foot upon the scaffold itself. I believe that, in the majority of cases, the entire energies of the unfortunate wretch are directed to the unavailable attempt of gaining a reprieve. I mistrust for the most part, I am sorry to say, even his willing acceptance of my good offices, and his readiness to call his attention to more important matters. "More important?" thinks he: "What can be more important to me than the question of whether he is to die on Monday, Tuesday, to-morrow, in an hour perhaps—or whether he is to Live?"

Mary B——, was condemned to death for the murder, by poison, of her own sister, for whose husband she entertained a guilty passion. There was no doubt of her having committed the crime, or of her having deserved the punishment. She had, when I first saw her, nearly a week to live, it being about that time to the ensuing Monday. She told me, in our first interview, of how many minutes that space contained—for she had been allowed a pencil, with which (closely watched lest she should swallow it) she had made the calculation—and "Forty-seven hundred and twenty gone!" she whispered with a shudder, when I took my last leave of her. The hours, and even the minutes during this poor creature's last two or three days, whenever the great jail-clock struck the hour overhead, she would count them in pain; and upon waking in the mornings, would ask with eagerness what time it was, and then lamoan herself that she had slept so long. Her hours—passed in a miserable cell, shut out from any sight of the green earth (for it was mid-July), and almost every sound, except the footsteps of the two sentinels come up thither to remind her of the world with which she was never more to mix—must surely have been wretched indeed; and yet her cry was, "Oh, that they might be again!" Notwithstanding her evident agony at the thoughts of her approaching end, she actually attempted to anticipate it by some twenty-four hours by suicide; or rather, I think, she pretended to attempt it, with some faint notion that such an evidence of her utter misery might procure her pardon; for those miserable persons always imagine, in their frenzied terror, that the governor, the chaplain, nay, the very jailer himself, has power in the matter, and could get them off, or at least respited, if he pleased. How often, when I have been leaving some poor wretch's cell with the comfortable hope that what had been so coolly listened to by the ear, may have taken root in the heart also, have I been suddenly made conscious of the real motive that had actuated my unhappy convert, by his plucking up sleeve, and whispering in a tone of heartfelt earnestness which there was no mistaking: "And you will tell them, that I am penitent, chaplain; and that it will do no harm to let me live;" or by some assurance reiterated for the thousandth time that he is an innocent man. All these with how had any experience in this matter perceive the folly of the assertion that penal servitude, or any other punishment that may be possibly dreaded, is, or can be, equally dreaded with that of death itself. Men fear it every where, and the woman, who commonly fall after their sentence into a kind of stupor; and the case of Mary B—— was by no means worse than that of many others I have known. When not in a state of agonized despair, "The king!" "The good king!" "The merciful king!" was especially in her mouth; and she would only know of her condition, she expressed her confidence that he would have saved her. Her cell-door was never opened unexpectedly without her starting up at it with an air of hopeful eagerness. Again, with a certain tenderness of delicacy, she requested me not the minutest questions regarding the place of execution; whether it was in the prison-yard, or on the old hill-side behind the jail; and on being refused, inquired how many persons it was likely would be there to see "it." She always spoke of her execution as "it." Her last night she spent at the window, drinking in the quiet of the stars, and talking farewell, as it seemed, of their ineffable beauty. But this phase of her character was exceptional. I believe that from the hour of her conviction to that of her death, the thought of a reprieve never out of her waking mind for many consecutive minutes. When she slept, however, poor girl—for she was scarcely a grown woman—she dreamed of the days of her innocence; generally, as she told me, of her childhood; and her last look upon the scaffold was directed inland, as toward the jail, whither, as she knew, a reprieve, if reprieve there was, must necessarily come.

The case of Robert S——, under sentence of death at the same time, exhibited a marked contrast to that of this unfortunate woman. He had been convicted of burglary with violence, and there having been a previous conviction recorded against him the law, as often stood, would not certainly take its course. He seemed fully to understand and even acquiesce in this. The law and he, as it seemed to him, had been upon opposite sides in life, and at last the law had got the better of him. When the judge had told him to dismiss from his mind all hope of earthly pardon for his crimes it, I always found him, if not resigned and penitent, at least respectful and uncomplaining. He was grossly ignorant of religion, as of every thing else; but he was not one of those stupid thoughtless boys who form the most of his class. He showed a lively and laudable desire to leave something behind him for those who had been mainly dependent for their support upon him. In course he took to accomplish this would have been impossible in these days, but it was very common in. I was myself the agent of his intentions either assisting or opposing it. The prisoner asked leave of the jailer to send for a surgeon, in order that he might tell him some of his last words before execution, and his request was acceded to. Mr. M——, of our senior town, accordingly had an interview with the convict; he had a reputation more than provincial, and was exceedingly assistant in his manual of his darling profession. He was indeed pretty well known as a purveyor of bodies, and I guessed what he had come about when I saw him leaving Robert S——'s cell on the eve of the fatal day. He had, it seemed, given the poor fellow a soverign, but declined to have any dealings with him regarding the contemplated purchase. I was rather surprised to hear this, but asked no questions about it at that time. The next day Robert S—— was executed in accordance of his sentence, and buried within the prison walls. He was perfectly quiet and self-possessed to the last, and never expressed a wish to me to have saved any hope of escaping his fate. And yet the case had been in reality quite otherwise.

Meeting Mr. M—— a few weeks afterward at the house of a friend, he informed me of his reasons for not purchasing the body of Robert S——.

"The fact is," said he, "I bought that poor fellow's carcass once before. He was hung for burglary two years ago in the next county, and was carried to my house after execution. He frightened Mrs. M——a good deal that night by the noise he made in first coming to consciousness. It was annoying, of course, but my trade being to cure, and not to kill, I was obliged to do what I could for him, and he was well in a fortnight; and yet that lesson, severe as it was, had, you see, no effect upon him, and he has now been hung in real earnest. He did not know that I was to be the doctor sent for, and was taken terribly aback when he saw me. But he raised had never forgiven me my ten pounds, you see, and I was not going to pay for the same thing twice over. I should have declined any dealings of the kind, you know, besides, since his manner assured me that he had come device in his head of escaping the hangman. He then plucked out what that was now, for, between ourselves, I did get the body after all. He did not trust to chance, which through the mismanagement of the rope saved him on the former occasion, but had provided himself with a silver tube—a thing not of the slightest use, poor fellow! but which many of his class put on implicit trust in—which he managed to keep about him, and to place unobserved in his throat on the fatal morning. I found it there myself."

Thus, even in the case which I had judged to be an exception to the general rule, the one cause of apparent fortitude in the person irrevocably doomed to death was the secret hope of escaping it.

SENATOR TOOMBS, OF GEORGIA.

ROBERT TOOMBS, a United States Senator from Georgia, is emphatically one of the representative men of the republic. As Carlyle said of Danton: "No hollow formalist, deceptive and self-deceptive, ghastly to the natural sense, was this; but a very man—free from the dross of cant—fiery, real; from the great fire-bosom of Nature himself." Like the revolutionist statesman of France, he is no mere theorist; no speculative, dreamy philosopher; no man of words when the time for action has arrived. His intellect, his passions, his comprehensions, his actions—all are prominent as are the rugged outlines of his herculean frame—massive as the stalwart proportions of his form—in striking contrast with those around him on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. Toombs, like many other citizens who have made themselves men-orable by their public services, is the son of a Virginian, although we do not find his name on the genealogies of the "first families" of that glorious Old Dominion. His father, having marched Southward during the War of the Revolution, to aid in repelling a foreign foe, settled in Wilkes County, Georgia, where Robert was born, on the 2d of July, 1810. Early associations often have a powerful effect, and it is not at all improbable that the father's recital of his campaigns against the British or the Indians who yet lingered around the borders of civilization, inspired the son with patriotism and with courage. Brought up with simple, industrious, honest surroundings, young Toombs was emphatically a child of the people; and he has ever reflected the energy, the enthusiasm, the love of country, the stern courage, and the contempt for every thing mean, which characterized the pioneer settlers of the South and of the Southwest.

From an excellent mother (who was his father's third wife) young Toombs received the rudiments of education, and at an early age evinced quickness of appreciation, with ability to retain and to apply what he was taught. Having gone through the requisite academical studies, he entered the University of Georgia, at Athens. While in the senior class, he went to Union College, at Schenectady, in the State of New York, where he graduated.

In 1829 Mr. Toombs (not having attained the legal age) was admitted to practice law under a special act of the Legislature of Georgia, and he at once found himself sound as a counselor and able as an advocate. While sustaining the causes of his clients with great zeal, he displayed an unimpeached and unimpeachable honesty of purpose, a strong sense of justice, and a determination to wrong no man, which soon gave him a commanding position at the bar. Never, it is said, would he undertake a case which he did not believe, after examination, to be just and honorable; and this, doubtless, is the secret of his invariable success. Fortune crowned his labors, and by carefully investing his receipts, generally in unsettled lands, the poor boy became a wealthy man.

In 1836 Mr. Toombs was elected captain of a company of volunteers, at the head of which he hastened to join the force congregated to hold in check the Creek Indians, under Neamathla, who had been instructed by the success of the Seminoles to commence hostilities. By the prompt concentration of regular and of volunteer troops, under the command of General Scott, the campaign was of brief duration.

In 1837 Mr. Toombs was elected to the Georgia House of Representatives, in which he sat (with the exception of the session of 1841) until he was elected to Congress in 1845. Originally a Democrat, he had retired from General Jackson after the promulgation of the Proclamation against the South Carolina Nullifiers, and joined the State Rights party of Georgia, which recognized Governor Troup as its leader, and as the champion of its principles. Loyal to the Constitution of the Confederated States in all its expressly defined grants of power, and conceding the right of the Chief Magistrate to execute the authority so delegated, the State Rights' or "Troup Men" of Georgia stoutly resisted that latitude of construction which might consolidate power at Washington, until Republicanism would crystallize in monarchy. Mr. Toombs was not a disciple of Calhoun's. While admiring the glittering generalities and abstract theories of the gifted South Carolinian, the young Georgia legislator advocated MATERIAL PROGRESS! While a member of the House, he exerted himself manfully and successfully for the establishment of that system of internal improvements which has placed Georgia foremost among Southern States. He was the advocate and the founder of the system of public education adopted in Georgia, and so much better calculated than the system of New England to secure a general attendance of the children of the poor.

In 1845 Mr. Toombs was elected a Representative to the Congress of the United States, defeating Hon. Edward J. Black, who had represented the District since 1838. He was classed among the State Rights' Whigs, and in a speech delivered on the tariff in the Senate a year or two since, he referred to his first effort in the House, which was in favor of the tariff of '46. "The principle of that act," said he, in his more recent speech, "was to discriminate for the protection of the industry of the country; and as far as that bill did it, it met my approbation then, and does now. I would have twice the duty on sugar that I would on coffee, because coffee is not raised in this country. I would levy duty on an article raised by my own countrymen. In laying taxes for revenue, I would rather do it so as to benefit my countrymen than put them on what would not benefit them. These are the principles I have acted on through life. I have read and studied this question as thoroughly as I am capable of, and these are my opinions to-day."

HON. ROBERT TOOMBS, OF GEORGIA.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

While partially associated with the Whig party, Mr. Toombs never acknowledged fealty to either "caucus" or "convention," and he was ever opposed to the increasing power, patronage, and influence of the Executive Department.

In 1850 Mr. Toombs united with Mr. Howell Cobb (now Secretary of the Treasury) and other Democrats in the formation of a "Constitutional Union Party," based on the "Compromise Measures," which he had supported in Congress. In February, 1851, he wrote that, "apart from the question of Slavery, another great question is rising up before us, and becoming a 'fixed fact' in American politics. It is and has the will of a majority, sometimes called the higher law, in antagonism to our constitutional compact. If the first succeeds, we have no other safety except in secession; if the latter, 'Liberty and Union may be forever one and inseparable.' In all these questions it is our true policy to stand by those who agree with us—repudiate those who differ from us."

In April, 1851, at a caucus of the Whig members of Congress, called to make arrangements for a National Convention, resolutions were introduced indorsing the principles of neither one, but commending the Democratic nominees—Pierce and King. Against the election of General Scott he took decided ground, urging the Union Whigs by all honorable ways and means to defeat him. "If we succeed," said he, "we shall have 'conquered a peace,' a lasting, enduring peace; and whatever may be the result, we shall have done our duty to ourselves, our principles, and our country."

This fearless opposition to party rule was acceptable to the people of Georgia, who elected Mr. Toombs to fill the seat occupied by Hon. Robert M. Charlton, who had been appointed after the resignation of Hon. John M'Pherson Berrien.

At the commencement of the administration of General Pierce, Senator Toombs was dissatisfied with his course. At a barbecue gotten up at Oglethorpe, to welcome the Senator back to Georgia after the adjournment of Congress, he made a speech in which he denounced the President as having violated the pledges of his inaugural. "If" said the Senator, "he was honest in his promises, how dare he trifle with his official duties, and outrage public opinion by conferring important offices, at home and abroad, on notorious free-soilers and abolitionists?" The Kansas-Nebraska bill, however, changed the Senator's opinion of the President, and ever since he has acted with the Democratic party, although he has never worn its harness. Although he has on several occasions eulogized President Buchanan, he did not hesitate to denounce the message justifying the seizure of William Walker by Commodore Paulding on foreign soil, and he characterized the act as "a usurpation of authority not granted by the Constitution or laws, but in derogation of both."

In advocating the adoption of the Lecompton Constitution Senator Toombs explicitly stated that he was not at all fearful of endangering the interests of the South, neither did he sneer the acts of Northern politicians to sustain her domestic institutions. "The Slave States," said he, "will take care of themselves."

In advocating the acquisition of Cuba Senator Toombs declared that he was not actuated by a desire to add one more Slave State to the Union, or to increase the slave-holding vote in Congress.

"I never," said he, "considered that I held my rights of property by the votes of Senators. It is too feeble a tenure. If I did, I have shown by my votes that I have not feared them. Whenever any State, Minnesota or Oregon, or any other came, no matter where from, if she came on principles which were sufficient, in my judgment, to justify her admission into this great family of nations, I have never refused her the right hand of fellowship. I did not inquire whether she had seventeen or eighteen Free States. If you had fifty it would not alter my vote. The idea of getting one Slave State would have no effect on me. But Cuba has fine ports, and with her acquisition we can make first the Gulf of Mexico, and then the Caribbean Sea, a mare clausum. Probably younger men than you or I will live to see the day when no flag shall float there except by permission of the United States of America. That is my policy. I rose mere with a view to declare my policy for the future, that development, that progress throughout the tropics was the true, fixed, unalterable policy of the nation, no matter what may be the consequences with reference to European Powers."

As a statistician, especially on every subject connected with the revenue and the expenditures of the General Government, Senator Toombs has no superior in Congress. He is thoroughly "posted up" on the tariff and the public lands, as he is on every detail of expense. Never mean, he is the uncompromising enemy of extravagance, and he now protests against it. "Sooth," he says, "true retrenchment is with Congress; others say Congress can do nothing without the Executive. The truth is, the fault is with both; it is with the executive and with the legislative departments. They have both departed far from the true track; they have both encouraged extraordinary, unnecessary, profligate, and many of them corrupt, expenditures."

While opposed to a large standing army, and severe in his criticisms on the supercilious manner in which military men are too apt to speak of civilians, Senator Toombs has ever shown himself the firm friend of an efficient naval force. Opposed to the "right of search," he would not remonstrate against its exercise by the English cruisers, but order our naval officers to "seize or sink the aggressors, and get an explanation afterward." He was an earnest advocate in behalf of the officers struck from the navy list by the action of the retiring board, which he denounced as "the most infamous tribunal that ever disgraced any nation under the sun."

Senator Toombs has always urged that the Post-office Department be made to defray its own expenses; and he went so far last year as to take the responsibility of defeating the Postal Appropriation bill, rather than sanction large items in it of what he considered illegal expense. Indeed, his action in the Senate would imply that he stands clothed with the extraordinary powers given by the conscript fathers of Rome to one of their number, selected to see—"Ne Respublica detrimentum capiat;" "that the Commonwealth received no harm."

Senator Toombs remarks in debate about reporters were justly intended for the Senate purveyors of words for the Globe, who, "by the word syllable uttered, even on trivial questions of order. Truly did the Senator remark: "Why, Sir, you would have to give a great many persons in this country ten dollars a day to rank the Globe. Nobody reads it. I think it is a good burial-place. I do not know a more private place on the face of the earth to put any thing than one corner of the Washington Globe; and that is the security of one of the outrages and abuses of Congress. If there was a different system—if the newspapers circulated about the views taken on prominent questions before the country, as they formerly did, the real business of Congress would be before the people, and they would decide on it; but now we bury all in the Globe, and from there there is no resurrection. It is harmless, I admit, but expensive; and that is my objection to it."

The personal appearance of Senator Toombs, as he appears in the Capitol, is that of a demagogue—a leader of the people, not a cosmopolitic statesman. His long black hair hangs in disorder around his massive head, and his stalwart frame is carelessly attired; neither is he remarkable for courteous manners when excited in debate. Regardless of political, of sectional, or of social claims upon him, he speaks what he believes to be THE TRUTH, as a Senator of the Sovereign State of Georgia. Speaking with the inspiration of an improvisator, and with a tongue of fire, he scatters forth his invectives like burning coals upon the heads of his opponents, regardless of what they or the rest of mankind may think.

In the domestic relations of life Senator TOOMBS is said to be the very reverse of what he is before the public. The devoted husband of a most estimable lady, a kind father, a true friend, a hospitable host, and a public-spirited, useful, and charitable citizen, it would seem that "to know him is to love him." His frank bonhomie of manner, his fund of anecdotes gathered at home and abroad, and his originality of ideas, make him a welcome guest wherever he goes, and secure him the personal esteem of even his most bitter political opponents.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

(Printed from advance proof-sheets purchased from the author exclusively for "Harper's Weekly.")

MISS HALCOMBE'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

July 4th. I was so startled by the disturbance in Lemn's face and manner, and so dismayed by the first waking impressions of my dream, that I was not fit to bear the revelation which burst upon me when the name of Anne Catherick passed her lips. I could only stand rooted to the floor, looking at her in breathless silence.

She was too much absorbed by what had happened to notice the effect which her reply had produced on me. "I have seen Anne Catherick! I have spoken to Anne Catherick!" she repeated, as if I had not heard her. "Oh, Marian, I have such things to tell you! Come away—we may be interrupted here—come at once into my room!"

With those eager words she caught me by the hand, and led me through the library to the end room on the ground floor, which had been fitted up for her own especial use. No third person, except her maid, could have any excuse for surprising us here. She pushed me in before her, locked the door, and drew the chintz curtains that hung over the inside.

The strange, stunned feeling which had taken possession of me still remained. But a growing conviction that the complications which had long threatened to gather about her, and to gather about me, had suddenly closed fast round us both, was now beginning to penetrate my mind. I could not express it in words—I could hardly even realize it dimly in my own thoughts. "Anne Catherick!" I whispered to myself, with useless, helpless reiteration—"Anne Catherick!"

Laura drew me to the nearest seat, an ottoman in the middle of the room. "Look!" she said; "look here!" and pointed to the bosom of her dress.

I saw for the first time that the lost brooch was pinned in its place again. There was something real in the sight of it, something real in the touching of it afterward, which seemed to steady the whirl and confusion in my thoughts, and to help me to compose myself.

"Where did you find your brooch?" The first words I could say to her were the words which put that trivial question at that important moment.

"She found it, Marian."

"Where?"

"On the floor of the boat-house. Oh, how shall I begin—how shall I tell you about it! She talked to me so strangely—she looked so fearfully ill—she left me so suddenly—!"

Her voice rose as the tumult of her recollections pressed upon her mind. The inveterate distrust which weighs, night and day, on my spirits in this house, instantly roused me to warn her—just as the sight of the brooch had roused me to question her the moment before.

"Speak low!" I said. "The window is open, and the garden path runs beneath it. Begin at the beginning, Laura. Tell me, word for word, what passed between that woman and you."

"Shall I close the window?" she asked.

"No; only speak low: only remember that Anne Catherick is a dangerous subject under your husband's roof. Where did you first see her?"

"At the boat-house, Marian. I went out, as you know, to find my brooch; and I walked along the path through the plantation, looking down on the ground carefully at every step. In that way I got on, after a long time, to the boat-house; and as soon as I was inside it I went on my knees to look over the floor. I was still searching, with my back to the door-way, when I heard a soft, strange voice, behind me, say, 'Miss Fairlie.'

"Miss Fairlie?"

"Yes—my old name—the dear, familiar name that I thought I had parted with forever. I started up—not frightened, the voice was too kind and gentle to frighten me—but very much surprised. There, looking at me from the door-way, stood a woman whose face I never remembered to have seen before."

"How was she dressed?"

"She had a neat, pretty white gown on, and over it a poor, worn, thin dark shawl. Her bonnet was of brown straw, as poor and worn as the shawl. I was struck by the difference between her gown and the rest of her dress; and also saw that I noticed it. 'Don't look at my bonnet and shawl,' she said, speaking in a quick, breathless, sudden way; 'if I wasn't a poor white, I don't care what I wear. Look at my gown as much as you please; I'm not ashamed of that.' Very strange, was it not? Before I could say any thing to soothe her, she held out one of her hands, and I saw my brooch in it. She was so pleased and so grateful that I went quite close to her to say what I really felt. 'Are you thankful enough to give me one little kindness?' she asked. 'Yes, indeed,' I answered; 'any kindness in my power I shall be glad to show you.' 'Then let me pin your brooch on for you, now I have found it.' Her request was so unexpected, Marian, and she made it with such extraordinary eagerness, that I drew back from her or two, not well knowing what to do. 'Ah!' she said, 'your mother would have let me pin on the brooch.' There was something in her voice and her look, as well as in her mentioning my mother in that unprepared way, which made me ashamed of my distrust. I took her hand with the brooch in it, and put it up gently on the bosom of my dress. 'Do you know my mother?' I said. 'Was it very long ago? have I ever seen you before?' Her hands were busy fastening the brooch: she stopped and pressed them against my breast. 'You don't remember a fine spring day at Limmeridge,' she said, 'and your mother walking down the road that led to the school, with a little girl on each side of her? I have had nothing else to think of since; and I remember it. You were one of the little girls, and I was the other. Pretty, clever Miss Fairlie, and happy Laura Anne Catherick were nearer to each other than they are now!'

"Did you remember her, Laura, when she told you her name?"

"Yes—I remembered your asking me about Anne Catherick at Limmeridge, and your saying that she had once been considered like me."

"What reminded you of that, Laura?"

"She reminded me. While I was looking at her, while she was very close to me, it came over my mind suddenly that we were like each other! Her face was pale and thin and weary—but the sight of it startled me, as if it had been the sight of my own face in the glass after a long illness. The discovery—I don't know why—gave me such a shock that I was perfectly incapable of speaking to her for the moment."

"I am afraid she was hurt by it. 'You have not got your mother's face,' she said, 'or your mother's heart. Now I can see's face was dark; and your mother's heart, Miss Fairlie, was the heart of an angel.' I am sure I feel kindly toward you, I said, 'though I may not be able to express it as I ought. Why do you call me Miss Fairlie?' 'Because I love the name of Fairlie, and hate the name of Glyde,' she broke out, violently. I had seen nothing like madness in her face before this; but I fancied I saw it now in her eyes. 'I only thought you might not know I was married,' I said, remembering the wild letter which we got at Limmeridge, and trying to quiet her. She sighed bitterly, and turned away from me. 'Not know you were married?' she repeated. 'I am here because you are married. I am here to make atonement to you, before I go to meet your mother in the world beyond the grave.' She drew farther and farther away from me, till she was out of the boat-house—and then she watched and listened for a little while. When she turned round to speak again, instead of coming back, she stopped where she was, looking at me with a hand on each side of the entrance. 'Did you see me at the lake last night?' she said. 'Did you hear me following you in the wood? I have been waiting for days together to speak to you alone—I have left the only friend I have in the world anxious and frightened about me—I have risked being shut up again in the mad-house—and all for your sake, Miss Fairlie, all for your sake.' Her words alarmed me, Marian; and yet there was something in the way she spoke that made me pity her with all my heart. I am sure my pity must have been sincere, for it made me bold enough to ask the poor creature to come in and sit down by the boat-house by my side."

"Did she do so?"

"No. She shook her head, and told me she must stop where she was, to watch and listen, and see that no third person surprised us. And from first to last she has waited at the entrance, with a hand on each side of it; sometimes bending in suddenly to speak to me; sometimes drawing suddenly to look about her. 'I was here yesterday,' she said, 'before it came dark; and I heard you, and the lady with you, talking of me. I heard you tell her about your husband. I heard you say you had no influence to make him believe you, and no influence to make him silent.' Ah! I knew what those words meant; my conscience told me what I was listening. Why did I ever let you marry him? Oh, my poor, proud, nuncle, wicked fear!—" She covered up her face in her gown as she spoke, and moaned and murmured to herself behind it. I began to be afraid she might break out into some terrible despair—but suddenly she tore I could master. 'Try to quiet yourself,' I said; 'try to tell me how you might have prevented my marriage.' She took down her face, and looked at me vacantly. 'I ought to have had heart enough to stop at Limmeridge,' she answered. 'I ought to have had the courage of his coming there to frighten me away. I ought to have warned you and saved you from your fate. Why did I only have courage enough to write you that letter? Why did I only do harm, when I wanted and prayed for good? Oh, my fatal, my mad, miserable, wicked fear!' She repeated those words again, and hid her face again in the end of her gown and her shawl. It was dreadful to see her, and dreadful to hear her."

"Surely, Laura, you asked what the fear was which she called by those earnestly?"

"Yes; I asked that."

"And what did she say?"

"She said she dared not return, if I should not be afraid of a man who had shut me up in a madhouse, and who might shut me up again if he could? I said, 'Are you afraid still?' Surely you would not be here if you were afraid now?' 'Yes,' she said, 'I am afraid now.' I asked why not. She suddenly bent forward into the boat-house, and said, 'Can't you guess why?' I shook my head. 'Look at me,' she went on. 'I told her I was grieved to see that she looked very sorrowful and very ill. She smiled for the first time. 'Ill?' she repeated; 'I'm dying. You know why I'm not afraid of him now. Do you think I shall meet your mother in heaven? Will she forgive me if I do?' I was so shocked and so startled that I could make no reply. 'I have been thinking of it,' she went on, 'all the time I have been in hiding from your husband, all the time I lay ill. My thoughts have driven me here—I want to make atonement—I want to undo all I can of the harm I once did.' I begged her as earnestly as I could to tell me what she meant. She still looked at me with fixed, vacant eyes. 'Shall I undo the harm?' she said to herself, doubtfully. 'You have friends to take your part. If you know his wicked secret, he will be afraid of you; he won't dare use you as he used me. He must treat you mercifully for his own sake, if he is afraid of you and your friends. And if he treats you mercifully, and if I can say it was my doing—' I listened eagerly for more; but she stopped at those words."

"You tried to make her go on?"

"I tried; but she only drew herself away from me again, and leaned her face and arms against the side of the boat-house. 'Oh!' I heard her say, with a dreadful, distracted tenderness in her voice, 'oh! if I could only be buried with your mother! If I could only wake at her side, when the angel's trumpet sounds, and the graves give up their dead at the resurrection!'—Marian! I trembled from head to foot—I was horrible to hear her. 'But there is no hope of that,' she said, moving a little, so as to look at me again; 'no hope for a poor stranger like me. I shall not rest under the marble cross that I washed with my own hands, and made so white and pure for her sake. Oh no! oh no! God's mercy, not man's, will take me to her, where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.' She spoke those words quietly and sorrowfully, with a heavy, hopeless sigh; and then waited a little. Her face was confused and troubled; she seemed to be thinking, or trying to think. 'What was it I said just now?' she asked, after a while. 'When your mother is in my mind, every thing else goes out of it. What was I saying? what was I saying?' I reminded the poor creature, as kindly and delicately as I could. 'Ah, yes,' she said, still in a vacant, perplexed manner. 'You are helpless with your wicked husband. Yes. And I must do what I have come to do here—I must make it up to you for having been afraid to speak out at a better time.' 'What is it you have to tell me?' I asked. 'A Secret,' she answered. 'The Secret that your cruel husband is afraid of.' Her face darkened; and a hard, angry state fixed itself in her eyes. She began waving her hand at me in a strange, unmeaning manner. 'My mother knows the Secret,' she said, speaking slowly for the first time; 'weighing every word as she uttered it. 'My mother has wasted and worn away under the Secret half her lifetime. One day, when I was grown up, she told it to me. And your husband knew she told it. Knew to my cost. Ah, you don't know, Laura, what she told it.'"

"Yes! yes! What did she say next?"

"She stopped again, Marian, at that point—"

"And said no more?"

"And listened eagerly. 'Hush!' she whispered, still waving her hand at me. 'Hush!' She moved aside out of the door-way, moved slowly and stealthily, step by step, till I lost her past the edge of the boat-house."

"Surely you followed her?"

"Yes; my anxiety made me hold enough to rise and follow her. Just as I reached the entrance she appeared again, suddenly, round the side of the boat-house. 'The Secret,' I whispered to her—'wait and tell me the Secret!' She put out her left arm and looked at me, with wild, frightened eyes. 'Not now,' she said; 'we are not alone—we are watched. Come here to-morrow at this time—by yourself—mind—by yourself.' She pushed me roughly into the boat-house again, and I saw her no more."

"Oh, Laura, Laura, another chance lost! If I had only been near you she should not have escaped us. On which side did you first sight of her?"

"On the left side, where the ground sinks and the wood is thickest."

"Did you run out again? did you call after her?"

"How could I? I was too terrified to move or speak."

"But when you did move—when you came out—?"

"I ran back here to tell you what had happened."

"Did you see any one or hear any one in the plantation?"

"No; it seemed to be all still and quiet when I passed through it."

There was a moment to consider. Was this third person, supposed to have been secretly present at the interview, a reality or the creature of Anne Catherick's excited fancy? It was impossible to determine. The one thing certain was, that we had failed again on the very brink of discovery—failed utterly and irretrievably, unless Anne Catherick kept her appointment at the boat-house for the next day.

"Are you quite sure you have told me every thing that passed—every word that was said?" I inquired.

"I think so," she answered. "My powers of memory, Marian, are not like yours. But I was so strongly impressed, so deeply interested, that nothing of any importance can possibly have escaped me."

"My dear Laura, the merest trifles are of importance where Anne Catherick is concerned. Think again. Did no chance reference

"NOT NOW," SHE SAID; "WE ARE NOT ALONE—WE ARE WATCHED."

escape her as to the place in which she is living at the present time?"

"None that I can remember."

"Did she not mention a companion and friend —a woman named Mrs. Clements?"

"Oh! yes! yes! I forgot that. She told me Mrs. Clements wanted sadly to go with her to the lake and take care of her, and begged and prayed that she would not venture into this neighborhood alone."

"Was that all she said about Mrs. Clements?"

"Yes, that was all."

"She told you nothing about the place in which she refused to go after leaving Todd's Corner?"

"Nothing—I am quite sure."

"Nor where she has lived since? Nor what her illness had been?"

"No, Herbert, not a word. Tell me, pray tell me, what you think about it. I don't know what to think, or what to do next."

"You must do this, my love: You must carefully keep the appointment at the boat-house to-morrow. It is impossible to say what interests may not attend on your seeking that woman again. You shall not be left to yourself a second time. I will follow you at a safe distance, Nobody shall see me; but I will keep within hearing of your voice if any thing happens. Anne Catherick has escaped Walter Hartright, and has escaped you. Whatever happens she shall not escape me."

Laura's eyes read mine attentively while I was speaking.

"You believe," she said, "in this secret that my husband is afraid of?"

"I do believe in it."

"Anne Catherick's manner, Marian, was wild, her eyes were wandering and vacant, when she said those words. Would you trust her in other things?"

"I trust nothing, Laura, but my own observation of your husband's conduct. I judge Anne Catherick's motive by his actions—and I believe there is a secret."

I said no more, and got up to leave the room. Thoughts were crushing me which I might have told her if we had spoken together longer, and which it might have been dangerous for her to know. The influence of the terrible dream from which she had awakened me hung darkly and heavily over every fresh impression which the progress of her narrative produced on my mind. I felt the ominous Future coming close; chilling me with an unutterable awe; forcing on me the conviction of an unseen Design in the long series of complications which had now fastened round us. I thought of Hartright—of the love of him, in the body, when we said farewell; as I saw him, in the spirit, in my dream—and I, too, began to see now where the events were advancing, blindfold, to an appointed and an inevitable End.

Leaving Laura to go up stairs alone, I went out to look about me in the walks near the house. Only a momentary uneasiness under which Catherick had parted from her had made me secretly anxious to know how Count Fosco was passing the afternoon; and had rendered me secretly distrustful of the results of that solitary journey from which Sir Percival had returned but a few hours since.

After looking for them in every direction, and discovering nothing, I returned to the house, and entered the different rooms on the ground-floor, one after another. They were all empty. I came out into the hall, and went up the stairs to return to Laura. Madame Fosco opened her door, as I passed it in my way along the passage; and I stopped to see if she could inform me of the whereabouts of her husband and Sir Percival. Yes, she had seen them both from her window more than an hour since. The Count had looked up with his customary politeness, and had menaced, with his habitual attention to her in the smallest trifles, that he and his friend were going out together for a long walk.

For a long walk! They had never yet been in each other's company with that object in my experience of them. Sir Percival cared for no exercise but riding: and the Count (except when he was polite enough to be my escort) cared for no exercise at all.

When I joined Laura again I found that she had called for me in my absence, the imperiousing question of the signature to the deed, which, in the interest of discussing her interview with Anne Catherick, we had hitherto overlooked. Her first words when I saw her expressed her surprise at the absence of the expected summons from Sir Percival to the library.

"You may make your mind easy on that subject," I said. "For the present, at least, neither your resolution nor mine will be exposed to any further trial. Sir Percival has dropped his plans: the business of the signature is put off."

"Put off?" Laura repeated, amazedly. "Who told you so?"

"My authority is Count Fosco. I believe it is to his interference that we are indebted for your husband's sudden change of purpose."

"It seems impossible, Marian. If the object of my signature, as we suppose, is to obtain money for Sir Percival that he urgently wants, how can the matter be put off?"

"I think, Laura, we have the means at hand of setting that doubt at rest. Have you forgotten the conversation that I heard between Sir Percival and the lawyer, as they were crossing the hall?"

"No; but I don't remember—"

"I do. There were two alternatives proposed. One was to obtain your signature to the parchment. The other was to gain time by giving bills at three months. The last resource is evidently the resource now adopted—and we find fairly hope to be relieved from our share in Sir Percival's embarrassments for some time to come."

"Oh, Marian, it sounds too good to be true!"

"Does it, my love? You complimented me on my ready memory not long since—but you seem to doubt it now. I will get my journal, and you shall see if I am right or wrong."

I went away and got the book at once. On looking back to the entry recording the lawyer's visit, we found that my recollection of the two alternatives presented was accurately correct. It was without a relief to my mind as to Laura's to find that my memory had served me, on this occasion, faithfully as usual. In the perilous uncertainty of our present situation it is hard to say what future interests may depend on trifles in the accuracy of the entries in my journal, and upon the reliability of my recollection at the time when I make them.

Laura's face and manner suggested to me that this last consideration had occurred to her as well as to myself. Any way, it is only a trifling matter; and I am almost ashamed to put it down here in writing—it seems to set the fortunes of my husband and myself at a miserably vivid light. We must have little indeed to depend on, when the discovery that my memory can still be trusted to serve us is useful as if it was the discovery of a new friend!

The first bill for fifteen hundred pounded us as it had done ringing Sir Percival and the Count returned from their walk. We heard the master of the house enter the evening room for being five minutes late; and the master's guest interposing, as usual, in the interests of propriety, "Time, and time!"

* * * * *

The evening has come and gone. No extraordinary event has happened. But I have noticed certain peculiarities in the conduct of Sir Percival and the Count which have caused me a little feeling very anxious and uneasy about Anne Catherick, and about the results which to-morrow may produce.

I know enough by this time to be sure that the aspect of Sir Percival which is the most calm, and, naturally, therefore, the most secret, is his polite aspect. That long walk with his friend had ended in improving his manners, especially where I was concerned. I felt a new surprise, and to my secret alarm, he called her by her Christian name, asked if she had heard locally from her cousin Frederick, and—Vesey was to receive her invitation to Blackwater, and showed her out of the room with a politeness that he almost recalled the days of his hateful courtship at Limmeridge House. This was a bad sign, to begin with. But what I more than ominous still that he should pretend, after dinner, to fall asleep in the drawing-room, and that his eyes should cunningly follow Laura and me when he thought we neither of us suspected him. I have never had any doubt that his suddenly formed intimacy with the Count was meant to harm to question Mrs. Catherick—but the experience of to-night has made me fear that the question was answered in vain, and that he has got the information which he unquestionably left us to collect. If I knew where Anne Catherick was to be found, I would be up to-morrow with sunrise and warn her.

While the master of the house and Sir Percival presented himself to-night was unhappily but too familiar to me, the aspect under which the Count appeared was entirely new. It was entirely new in my experience of him. He permitted me this evening to make his acquaintance, for the first time, in the character of a man of excitement—of sentiment, as I believe, really felt, not assumed for the occasion.

For instance, he was quiet and subdued; his eyes and his voice expressed a restrained sensibility. His dress, for the first time, was some hidden connection between his shoveled hat and his deepest feeling: the most magnificent waistcoat he had yet appeared in, was relieved by a sea-green silk, and delicately trimmed with fine silver braid. His voice sank into the tenderest inflections. He was assiduous in attending to Mr. Fatherly admiration, whenever he spoke to Laura or to me. He pressed his wife's hand under the table when I proposed to her to retire with Laura at dinner-time. He took wine with her. "Your health and happiness, my angel!" he said, with fond, pathetic emphasis, "is all I drink or nothing; and sighed, and said, "Good Percival!" when Sir Percival drank to him. After dinner he took Laura by the hand, and asked her if she would be "so sweet as to play to him." She complied—and he listened attentively. Not, mat by the piano, with his watch-chain resting in folds, like a golden serpent, on the sea-green protuberance of his waistcoat. His immense head lay languidly on one side; and he gently beat time with two of his yellow-white fingers. He highly rewarded Laura's performance. He admired Laura's manner of playing—not as poor Hartright used to praise it, with an innocent enjoyment of the sweet sounds, but with a more cultivated, practical knowledge of the merits of the composition, in the first place, and of the merits of the player's touch, in the second. As the evening closed in he begged that the lively spring light might be left, because it "lighted up the appearance of the lamps. He came, with his horribly silent tread, to the distant window at which I was standing, to be out of his way and to avoid the very sight of him—he came to ask me to support his protest against the lamps. If any one of them could only have burned him up at that moment I would have gone down to the kitchen and fetched it myself.

"Surely you like this modest, trembling English twilight?" he said, softly. "Ah! I love it. I feel my labors exhilaration of all that is noble and great and good purified by the breath of Heaven, on an evening like this. Nature has such imperishable charms, such inextinguishable tenderness for me!—I am an old, fat man; talk which would become your lips, Miss Halcombe, sounds like a derision and a mockery on mine. It is hard to be laughed at in my moments of sentiment, as if my soul was like myself, old and overgrown. Observe, dear lady, what a light is dying on the trees! Does it penetrate your heart as it penetrates mine?"

He pointed, as he spoke, to the reappearance of famous lines of Dante on the Evening-time with a melody and tenderness which added a charm of their own to the delicate beauty of the poetry itself.

"Ah!" he cried suddenly, as the last cadence of those noble Italian words died away on his lips; "I make an old fool of myself, and only weary you. Let us look at the moon window in our bosoms and get back to the matter-of-fact world. Percival! I sanction the admission of the lamps. Lady Clare—Mrs. Vesey's brother's eldest daughter, my good wife—which of you will indulge me with a game at dominoes?"

He addressed us all three, but looked especially at Laura. She had learned to feel my dread of offending him, and she accepted his proposal. It was more than I could have done at that moment. I could not have sat down at the same table with him for any consideration. His eyes seemed to me to be positively soul though this thickening obscurity of the twilight. His voice trembled under every nerve in my body, and turned me hot and cold alternately. The mystery and terror of my dream, which had haunted me, at intervals, through the evening, now oppressed my mind with an unendurable foreboding and an unutterable awe. I saw the white figure again, with the veiled woman sitting out of it by Hartright's side. The thought of Laura walled up like a spring in the depths of my heart, and filled it with waters of bitterness, never, never known to it before. I caught her by the hand as she passed me on her way to the table, and kissed her on the right wrist to part us for ever. While they were all gazing at me in astonishment, I opened the nearest window which was open before me to the ground—ran out to hide from them in the darkness; to hide even from myself.

We separated that evening later than usual. Toward midnight the sultry silence was broken by the shuddering of a low, melancholy wind among the trees. We all felt the sudden chill in the atmosphere; and the Count was the first to notice the stealthy rising of the wind. He stopped while he was lighting my candle for me, and held up a hand warningly.

"Listen!" he said. "There will be a change to-morrow."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, March 19, in the Senate various unimportant matters were disposed of. Mr. Hammond offered his resolutions to commit Theddeus Hyatt to jail until he consents to answer the questions of the Harper's Ferry Investigating Committee. Debate ensued, in which Senators Hammond (S. C.), Fessenden (Me.), Hale (N. H.), Simmons (R. I.), Crittenden (Ky.), Pearce (Md.), Davis (Miss.), and Mason (Va.), participated, when the resolutions were adopted—Yeas 44, Nays 10. The Senate then went into Executive session and soon after the doors were opened Mr. Washburn (Wis.) offered a preamble and resolution, setting forth that the Governor-elect of Florida had been appointed upon the Menemenne Indians, and asking for a select Committee of investigation. Mr. Clingman (N. C.) reported a resolution from the Committee on Elections, requiring Mr. Broderick to appear before the Committee at once, and to serve on Mr. S., within ten days, a particular statement of the grounds upon which he claims his seat. Mr. from a minority of the Committee, submitted a minority report; pending which the Senate (P. V.) went up a resolution about the reception of the Seventh Regiment. The House refused to receive the report of the Committee. Mr. Lovejoy (Ill.) called up his motion to reconsider the vote by which the Committee of Ways and Means was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. Lamarsh, and the following Republicans: Messrs. Curtis, Morrill (Vt.) endeavored to introduce a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, providing for the payment of outstanding Treasury notes, authorizing a loan, and regulating and fixing the duties on imports. The preamble (Miss.) objected, and the House refused to suspend the rules—Ayes 97, Noes 114; not two-thirds.

On Tuesday, March 13, in the Senate, after various routine bills, etc., Mr. Bigler (Penn.) offered a Senate Toombs (Ga.), establishing uniform proceedings relative to land claims in California. Mr. Bigler, Mr. Latham, Mr. Wilson (Mass.) submitted a resolution, directing an inquiry as to the expediency of establishing a branch for the suppression of the African slave-trade has been exhausted, and recommending legislation in accordance on the subject. Senator Thomas objected, and the resolution was laid over. In the House, after the usual resolutions till Thursday, by Yeas 31 to Nays 22. The Court of Claims Bill was taken up. The bill was then discussed and amended somewhat, when it was passed—Yeas 34, Nays 10.——On Wednesday (2nd) Mr. Hunter reported the bill settling proposals for carrying the Pacific and Atlantic mails by the Isthmus. After some discussion the bill was passed. Mr. Adams (Ky.) reported a bill to establish mail routes in Kentucky. Mr. Simmons (R. I.) Mr. A. also reported adversely upon the bill providing for the erection of a monument to Commodore Perry, which was laid on the table. Mr. Sherman (Ohio) selected leave to report a bill to provide for the public Means a bill to provide for the redemption of outstanding Treasury notes, authorizing a loan and regulating and fixing duties on imports. Mr. Cobb (Ala.) objected. Mr. Sherman moved to suspend the rules—Ayes 97, Noes 114; not two-thirds. Mr. M'Queen (S. C.) removed the objection. Discussion ensued, in which Messrs. Sherman and Cobb took part, and the bill was finally postponing an increased tariff. The matter was then referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. Sherman moved to take up the bill for the appointment of the Consular and Diplomatic expenses. Mr. Pryor (Ga.) moved to lay the motion on the table—Yeas 99, Nays 114; not two-thirds. Mr. Kellogg (Ill.) and Mr. M'Clernand (Ill.) made long personal explanations of no public interest.

On Wednesday, March 14, in the Senate, after various minor matters, the Military Academy bill was taken up, and Senator Wigfall's (Texas) amendment, making an appropriation for the defense of the frontier of Texas, was adopted. Senator Hale (N. H.) moved an amendment providing that the acceptance of the regiment of mounted volunteers, under the act of April 7, 1858, be left optional with the Lieutenant-General. Rejected—Yeas 18, Nays 34. An attempt to reduce the term of study from five years to four also failed. The bill was then passed—Yeas 41, Nays 11. The bill for the protection of female emigrant passengers on ships was passed, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Hickman (Pa.) reported from the Judiciary Committee a bill establishing a paper circulation, upon a basis of uniform value, throughout the United States. It proposes that for all deposits of gold, silver, and bullion there shall be issued certificates to circulate as currency. The bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Mr. Hickman reported a resolution directing the inquiry into the necessity for further legislation for the protection of citizens going from one State into another to engage in private business. Mr. M'Queen (S. C.) expressed a desire to have an amendment to the resolution, and the matter was passed over. Mr. Hickman also reported from the Judiciary Committee a bill to amend the acts which were adopted, directing an inquiry into and report upon the authority for employing the army as a posse comitatus as to the legality of slavery in Territories; the propriety of paying the claims of the Seminole and other Indians for their legislation is necessary relative to the rendition of fugitives from service or labor, and also to report a bill for the consistent for a seat in the House shall be paid a salary of three thousand dollars, and limited to a seat. The House then took up the Consular and Diplomatic Bill. An amendment was adopted, appropriating $10,000 for the completion of the boundary survey between the British possessions and Washington Territory. The bill was then laid aside, to take up that making appropriation for the support of the Army for the Department. Mr. Corry (Ala.) spoke in defence of slavery, as also Mr. Vance (N. C.), Mr. Lovejoy (Ill.), and Mr. Kilfinger (Pa.) with whom the House adjourned.

On Thursday, March 15, in the Senate, the resolution of Senator Mason, instructing the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire what legislation may be needed to carry out treaty stipulations with China, Burmah, and Siam, was adopted. The bill incorporating the National Gallery and School of Arts was introduced by Senator Wilson (Mass.). The order of the day was the bill providing for the enlargement of the Louisville and Portland Canal, and for the construction of a branch. When it was taken up, Senator Wade, of Ohio, presented resolutions in favor of the project. Senator Bright procured the adoption of an amendment that when the Canal and branch shall be finished and paid for from the tolls received, the tolls shall be reduced to a point merely sufficient to keep the improvement in repair. Senator Toombs (Ga.) regarded the whole concern as one with which Government had nothing to do. Conference was then spoken, and the bill was finally passed.——In the House, the Indian and the Army appropriation bills were taken up, and after considerable debate the Army bill was passed. The greater part of the day was spent in that body in the discussion of the Whole standing amendments to the rules. Some discussion occurred on the question whether the Committee of Ways and Means, entrusted with amendments by the Senate, should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, or to the Military Committee. Without settling the point the House adjourned.

On Friday, March 16, in the Senate, communications were received from the President reporting the state of the Rio Grande frontier, and from the Secretary of the Treasury giving information in regard to our commerce with the British Provinces. The bill relative to Nations. An amendment was offered, as amended, and after some length, without final action. Private bills were then taken up, and a number of them passed. The executive session the Nicaragua Treaty was under review. After the addition of an amendment or two it was rejected.——The House devoted the day to the revival of its rules.

AFFAIRS ON THE RIO GRANDE.

Official advices from the War Department from army officers state that the troubles on the Rio Grande may be regarded as at an end. Cortinas, the Mexican Texan bandit, has given up the contest and retired into the interior of Mexico. These Mexican troubles, however, are restless fellows, and it would not be surprising if Cortinas should break out in a fresh place at any moment.

THE JAPANESE EMBASSY.

The Japanese embassy to this country, which was to have left Jeddo on the 21st of February for Washington, consists of seventy persons. They were expected to arrive at San Francisco on the United States steamer Roanoke about the 1st of March. Orders had been received at the Navy Yard, Mare Island, to have the Navy-yard dock in readiness in which to repair the Powhatan, before completing the voyage to Japan with her distinguished passengers en route to Washington.

THE VOYAGE TO AND TO THE PACIFIC.

The Herald correspondent telegraphs:

"An earnest and probably successful effort is making by the Government to secure the aid of the leading telegraph gentlemen of the country, to insure the prompt completion of the proposed line of telegraph from the Mississippi River to San Francisco. There are now present in the city, for consultation upon this subject, Hiram Sibley, Esq., President of the Western Union Telegraph Company; Mr. Creighton, Esq., President of the American Telegraph Company; T. R. Walker, Esq., President of the New Orleans and Ohio Company; Mr. Ellsworth, President of the Mississippi and Louisville Company; Judge Caldwell, of Kentucky; Mr. Patton, Esq., of Nashville; Mr. Cyrus W. Field, Esq., of New York; Ezra Cornell, Esq., of Ithaca, New York.

"Nearly all the Presidents of the various telegraph companies interested in the United States are here, looking after the bill before the Senate for a line of telegraph to the Pacific. The Government has a great pecuniary interests in behalf of this measure that it is likely to fail to the passage of these telegraph bills think that while they are asking aid from Government, they ought to have the line for the money the Government pays per annum instead of fifty. One, however, stands about as good as chance of passing Congress as the other. Congress will not appropriate a dollar for any such purpose."

THE CENSUS OF 1860.

He adds:

"Instructions for marshals and assistants in taking the census are being prepared. The appropriation from those of 1850 will be slight. A compliance with the recommendations of New York Chamber of Commerce, regarding commercial statistics, is not deemed practicable. The Government has no information about commerce is fully appreciated by the Census Bureau, but no method of collecting what which is valuable through the census, has been discovered. The multiplicity of exchanges which a single manufactured article undergoes in the course of sale, re-sale, and transportation from one end of the Union to the other, renders an accurate computation of the value of domestic commerce impossible. It is estimated that the cost of the census will exceed that which was paid before Congress next session, so that an appropriation must be made and passed at once. Nothing, we will not be in season to act upon the rolls for the Thirty-seventh Congress. The Census Bureau expects to have them elected previous to the commencement of the next session, but the returns from those States whose Legislatures meet biennially to apportion their districts for the next Congress before the members of the Thirty-eighth Congress are elected."

VIRGINIA DECLINES TO STEP OUT OF THE RINK.

The following resolutions have passed both houses of the Virginia Legislature by large votes:

"Resolved, by the General Assembly, That we have received with deep sensibility the commiseration which South Carolina and Mississippi have made to the authorities of this Commonwealth, through their Commissioners, Hon. C. G. Memminger and Hon. F. B. Starke, and we hail with lively gratification the renewed manifestations of that fraternal affection which has hitherto characterized, and we trust will always continue to characterize, the relations of South Carolina and Mississippi with Virginia.

"Resolved, That we perform a pleasing duty in recording and communicating to the authorities of South Carolina and Mississippi our high appreciation of the ability, dignity, and courtesy with which their Commission-ces have discharged the important duties of their mission.

Resolved, That the present General Assembly of Virginia, recognizing in our present relations with non-slaveholding States an imperative necessity for decisive measures, does not yet distrust the capacity of the Southern States, by a wise and firm exercise of their reserved powers, to protect the rights and liberties of the people, and to preserve the federal Union. For this purpose we earnestly desire the concurrent and respectful action of the States. But the General Assembly of North Carolina and Mississippi, for the entire States of the South, that Alabama and all our sister States safely had by such direct legislative action as the several States may in their sovereign capacities deem proper, that the agency of any assemblage which can exercise no legislative power except in the form and by the forms of law.

Resolved, Therefore, That in the opinion of the General Assembly it is inexpedient to appoint deputies to the conference proposed by South Carolina and Mississippi.

Resolved, That the Governor of this Commonwealth be requested to communicate the foregoing resolutions to the Governors of the States of South Carolina and Mississippi, and to the Governors of each of the other slaveholding States.

Resolved, That the President of the Senate and the Chairman of the House of Delegates transmit to Hon. C. G. Memminger and Hon. F. B. Starke a copy of the foregoing resolutions."

WHERE WILL THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION BE HELD?

The Herald correspondent says: "The subject of changing the place for holding the Democratic Convention to some other city is still agitated; but as the Cincinnati Convention fixed the place, and only left the National Committee the power to fix the time of holding it, it is a question whether the committee have the power to change the place. It is understood that several thousand gentlemen arrived here to-day and tendered the committee the use of the large Adrian church. If they to hold their convention; but no official action has yet been taken in the matter. The Charleston Convention letters will not make much out of the California and Oregon delegates, as they have made arrangements to take with them tents and camp equipage, furnished them by the War Department for the purpose, and they intend to a field and enjoy themselves in real border life style."

A subsequent member of the National Democratic Executive Committee thus replies to an inquiry as to changing the place for holding the National Democratic Convention:

"There is a good deal said seriously about it, much pressure for it, and if continued, the committee may be called together to consider it.

"From this the fact is apparent that there is no determination to change the subject."

NEW DISCOVERIES IN CALIFORNIA.

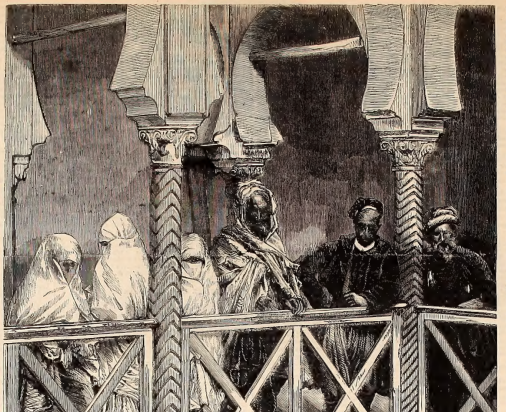
The mining news from all parts of California is very glowing; new discoveries, of quicksilver, silver, gold and cinnaber, were almost an everyday occurrence, besides other valuable deposits of mineral wealth generally in that State.

ELECTION IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The general election took place in New Hampshire on the 13th. The returns indicate a slight Republican gain, Governor Berry's majority over Democratic candidate, Long Cate, the Democrats, by nearly 5000 votes.

THE LATE SENATOR SEWARD.

A lady correspondent of the Tribune writes: "A dinner which I attended at Senator Seward's one evening was an illustration of the style on such occasions. About twelve were sat down at his residence; found a number of the literary and fashionable people of the city assembled. Dinner was announced at half-past seven. We were shown to our present seats in the dining-room (gentlemen to have a pleasant chat back in the drawing-room, from which time, according to etiquette, you remain standing; the gong is sounded, and the dinner announced; the waiter gives menu you at the door, designates your seat, where you find a menu-card attached to the napkin ring by your plate. The host then mentions the names of his guests to each of they are grouped together. The soup is then served: the other courses in regular order, seventeen in number, each plates being changed for each course; wine-glasses, five in number, of different size, shape, and tint, indicating the different wines to be served. The meats are carved by the head cook, in a separate apartment, and, being placed in silver dishes, are handed to you by a waiter in white gloves always at your left hand.



"Upon entering the dining-room you perceive the table laid with perfect taste, containing the confectionary and conserves for the grand finale; beautiful pyramids of iced fruits, oranges, French fancies, &c., and begin to look at, but dangerous unless your digestive organs are stronger than mine.

"You are conducted back into the parlor in the same manner that you entered,—with ladies in every direction of different kinds. A short time is spent in conversation, when coffee is at one by one begin to leave.

A RECEPTION AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

"Yesterday (March 10) we drove to the White House, finding a large carriage company than we had expected there to look around, it being Miss Lane's reception-day. After handing our cards to a waiter at the door, we were ushered into the presence of the ladies in the great reception-room, from whom was Miss Lane, to whom we were presented in due form. We found her a very agreeable young lady, dressed in fine taste, with a pretty white, rather handsome—not at all stiff, and possessing the facility of making one feel at ease, which is, after all, the greatest of social accomplishments. A few moments sufficed to pass pleasantly with her, when we were ushered into the presence of the ladies in the great reception-room, from whom

THE WAR IN MOROCCO.

MOORISH LIFE—ON THE BALCONY.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

MOORISH LIFE—IN-DOORS.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

IN connection with the pending war in Morocco, which, from present appearances, promises nearly to extinguish the ancient race of Moors—once the rulers of Spain, and one of the most powerful nations on the earth—we give a couple of pictures of Moorish life, from photographs lately taken. One represents the outside of a Moorish house, with three dark-faced, unpleasant-looking gentlemen staring down into the street, with their wives beside them. The other introduces us to the sanctum sanctorum—the inner chamber of a fine Moorish lady, whom attendants, like herself, wear that expression of listless, voluptuous apathy peculiar to that climate.

The details of the movements of the hostile armies now warring in Morocco are given from week to week in this paper, in the columns devoted to news. We are sure that our readers will prefer to any account of battles and sieges the following lively extract from a recent work of travel, Mrs. Elizabeth Murray's Journey through Morocco:

"I was soon able to discover that the natives of this sunny clime have a much more ample standard of beauty than any by which the taste, the judgment, and the senses of Europeans are directed. Learn, my readers, from the shores of Northern Africa what genuine beauty is and henceforth bestow your admiration only where it is due. Beauty, then, is size, magnitude, amplitude—let me not mince matters, but say the word at once, excessive fatness. The lady whom, being now enlightened, we looked upon as the very beau ideal of Moorish beauty, was perfectly ungainly in appearance, and of the most unwieldy proportions; but these were the qualities that made her the cynosure of all eyes, the points of attraction which rendered her irresistible, and which excited tender feelings in the hearts of her admirers. The gentle lover's admiration, in Morocco, increases with the size of his mistress, and his devotion becomes unlimited along with her proportions. Benighted Europeans appear to have some anticipation of the truth when they occasionally speak of a young lady who is not quite eight-like in form as making a good embonpoint. The perfect Moorish standard of female beauty is considered to be attained when a woman it is hard for a camel. Our fellow-travelers will certainly reached that standard, for her arms hung down with fat, and her fingers, which were loaded with rings, had swollen over them, so that if not quite a load for two camels, they certainly were more than enough for one.

"The Jewesses of Barbary, especially when young, are most classically beautiful. Their features are almost invariably regular and delicate, and their black eyes, which are not piercing as in Spain, but pearly and melting, are full of repose, and their eyebrows, perhaps, on observing them, is that the pupils are unnaturally large and distended; but this appearance, which is considered to add to their beauty, is produced by art, as one can easily detect on approaching the ladies nearer, and by observing them more closely. The cobol-stained eyelid at once discovered the secret of the means by which this highly-prized mark of beauty is produced. The operation is performed by dawing a small silver instrument like a bodkin, which has been previously dipped in the appropriate liquid, over the edges of the eyelids on the inner sides. The sensation caused by this operation, which is effected with the eyelids closed, is said to be very agreeable and refreshing; and when the complexion and the eyes are dark, it undoubtedly produces an appearance of beauty, and if the reality is already there, increases and heightens its effect. The operation, however, is seldom successful when it is tried as an experiment on English ladies, their ruddy complexion, light eyes, and fair hair forming an ensemble which is not capable of the slightest improvement by such means. The application altogether, in such cases, produces a very disagreeable effect; and the countenance, instead of being rendered more beautiful and expressive, assumes a remarkably coarse and dirty appearance.

"Animal beauty, however, is all that the Jewess of Barbary possesses. Physically she is a beautiful creature, but she is nothing more. Her intellect is without cultivation; she is a stranger to refinement; no expression animates her otherwise fine countenance; and she is totally without any distinct character of her own. However beautiful and attractive she may be in appearance, one turns away without interest or emotion from a being who can hardly be said to have a soul, or whose better part, at least, in consequence of the circumstances under the influence of which she has been reared, has been lulled into something like an almost unending sleep.

"Mahometan countries are perhaps the only ones where a woman can be said to possess, in some respects at least, any advantages of liberty over men. The Christian woman is unreclaimed in her movements, and can freely enter the houses and bazaars, where she is known, when she pleases; and the Moorish woman, wrapped up in the ample folds of her garments, and so disguised as to baffle every prying eye, can roam about to seven in whatever direction she may choose, without incurring the slightest risk of being recognized. During the nine years which I resided in Tangier, I had many opportunities of visiting the Moorish women, and of closely observing their character. I found them generally to be ignorant, gossiping, and frivolous—possessing, in fact, all those small peculiarities of character that distinguish women in our own Christian country. The superintendence of their domestic affairs formed their gravest and most important occupation. Their apartments were filled with a hideous posse of black slaves, each one with her own progeny around her, the wife reigns supreme over her noisy circle, and lords it most superbly in their midst. If she wishes to bestow her attention on some more light and elegant occupation, she resorts to embroidery, a never-failing refuge for her unoccupied hands in her many idle hours during the long, hot, and sunny day. I remember one monstrous creature—a Moorish beauty—the wife of an official, who, on receiving me, felt my clothes and counted my fingers, to see if a Nazarene woman was in all points made like herself. My gloves next attracted her attention, and she proceeded to examine them, although, from some cause, she shrank from them at first with fear. She was, as is usual here, very beautiful down to the chin, and her complexion was as fair as that of an English matron. Her black languishing eyes, like those of the Jewesses, were stained with al cohol; and besides the extreme whiteness of her skin, she possessed that peculiarly marble-like quality which is only obtained by the frequent use of the bath. Her hair was flowing down in rich luxuriance over her shoulders, and the head and face altogether presented an appearance of remarkable beauty. But the extraordinary size of her body, which was quite overwhelming, I found rather difficult to recognize as any reasonable addition in the way of beauty, according to my European standard, which I do not find myself quite prepared to dispense with.

"In Morocco the Moorish maiden, on her betrothal, undergoes a regular course of fattening, which is continuously carried on till her marriage, and which is conducted on the same principle as that on which our farmers fatten fowls. While undergoing the process, she sits all day in a dimly-lighted room, and is stuffed incessantly with kuscus-soo, a preparation of flour, which is the national dish of Morocco; in addition to which she drinks copiously of water. While undergoing this regimen she is dressed lightly, and in order to prevent any exertion or exercise on her part, she wears a gigantic pair of silver anklets, of great weight, the presence of which renders rest more desirable than the slightest locomotion. This process continues for some time, and the indolence of the mind being added to that of the body, she is sure, ere long, to arrive at the orthodox amplitude.

"I was fortunate enough in having an opportunity of witnessing the process of a lady's toilet. The first thing she did was to paint her face with a white creamy mixture, then to connect the eyebrows by a thick black dash of about half an inch in width. The eyes also had an extra tint of al cohol. . . . . .

. . . . . Her head-dress was costly and magnificent beyond all description. It consisted, in the first place, of the richest jewels, the favorite emeralds and pearls predominating among them. They arose in glittering spectacle, one above another, until, in consequence of the manner in which they were arranged, they assumed the appearance of a magnificent bishop's mitre. The adornment of the head was completed by a knotted silk handkerchief, with which it was surmounted. But with all the richness of the ornaments, there was such an absence of taste in the manner in which they were disposed, that the lady's face formed altogether a grotesque and barbarous spectacle. The remainder of her dress corresponded with sparkling gems. Strings of gorgeous pearls, and antique chains of gold, were suspended from her neck. A crimson caftan, or dress, much of the same English gentleman's dressing-gown, was taken from the chest of drawers and tied on. But the slippers were a serious objection to it. The unavoidable consideration that it would require the removal of those red and blue cheeks induced the lady to discard it without hesitation, and to seek for a more suitable substitute.

"The momentous question of what she should wear, therefore, again became the subject of deliberation, and after many pros for this, and many cons against that, a decision was at length, with some difficulty, arrived at. A pale blue caftan, embroidered with silver, carried the day. Having found a way for her ample proportions into the selected garment, a somewhat shorter one, of crape-like material, which sparkled all over, was thrown over it. Her bodice, which was worn open, was richly embroidered with gold; and one of those superb striped scarfs, which are generally worn in this country, was tied round her not very slender waist. The sleeves of the dress were wide and flowing, leaving the arms, except where they were covered with the peculiar bracelets worn here, quite exposed and bare. These bracelets, which are extremely heavy and massive, consist of a solid gold band, with silver and gold projections; and they have been adopted even by some of our own fair countrywomen who have visited Morocco. Her fingers were painted with little sprigs in bright orange henna, as were also her feet, which, to match her hands, were stained with ornaments of the same bright color. The latter, considering the immense proportions of the other parts of her body, were unnaturally diminutive, perhaps appearing by contrast even more so than they really were. They must have been very much impeded, however, in the process of locomotion, by the ponderous anklets of chased silver, with the burden of which most Moorish women are oppressed. The red slippers which, with one exception, terminate our description of her attire, were made to match in richness of material and ornament the other parts of her dress, being elaborately adorned with embroidery of silver thread and slikes of varied color. All these particular portions of her toilet having been carefully adjusted, a large clear mirror was snarf was thrown over her shoulders; and as it retained all its crispness, it produced a remarkably angular effect in the appearance of her immense proportions.

"One touch of lemon to heighten the crimson bloom on the cheeks, and this most accurt lore of the toilet can do nothing more to add to the effect of her personal charms. She is now ready to take her departure for the house where the important entertainment is to be given.

She beckons to me to follow her, and with nothing left visible but one eye, which might be any body's, for she has enveloped herself, for her passage through the streets, in the ample folds of the large Moorish Haick, she proceeds to thread her way through narrow and dirty lanes."

MISS ADELINA PATTI, THE NEW PRIMA DONNA.

WE present herewith a portrait of Miss Adelina Patti, the new prima donna, whose success at the Academy of Music in this city, and elsewhere, has been the subject of so much comment. Miss Patti is almost an American; the English is the tongue she knows and likes best. The following sketch of her was written by an enthusiastic admirer:

"Miss Adelina Patti was born at Madrid, Spain, April 9, 1843. Her mother, Madame Barili Patti, was the prima donna of the Grand Theatre at Madrid, and on the evening preceding the birth of Adelina, the youngest of a large family, Madame had sung 'Norma,' in which rôle she had a high reputation. Curiously enough, after the birth of Adelina, Madame Patti lost her voice almost entirely, and has always believed that it was given to the child.

"Madame Patti left Madrid as soon as possible after Adelina's birth, and returned to Milan, the permanent residence of her family. Here the impresario Strakosch made the acquaintance of the new prima donna, then only four months old. The Patti family emigrated to this country in 1844, when Patti père joined Sanquirico, the basso, in the management of the Italian Opera, Chambers Street. There were four daughters of Madame Patti, all artists. The eldest, Clotilda Barili, married the son of Colonel Theene. Amalia, the next, is the wife of Mr. Strakosch. Carlotta resides in this city, and is an accomplished teacher of music; and the latest edition of this fair musical libretto is Adelina, the subject of this sketch.

"Adelina was what is called a precocious child. She could sing almost before she could speak. She caught up at the age of four all the gems of the operas, and sang them correctly. Her first public appearance was made at the age of nine years, when Mr. Strakosch, Ole Bull, and the infantile prima donna made a tour in the provinces, where Adelina sang all the great pieces made familiar by Jenny Lind, Sontag, Bosio, and others. The little lady created the greatest enthusiasm, and her share of the profits amounted to twenty thousand dollars, which her father invested in a country seat, the summer residence of the family.

"Although so far advanced in art, Adelina had not forgotten to be a child. She always took her doll to the theatre or concert-room, and once refused to sing unless 'Maestro' (Strakosch) would allow her to carry it on the stage. Once she had sung a very difficult cavatina in such a way as to 'bring down the house' with tremendous applause. When the calm came after the storm, Adelina having recognized on one of the front benches a child of her own age, said, in a clear, smooth voice, 'Nelly, come to my room right away; I've got such a beautiful doll to show you, and we'll have such fun!' The effect of this naïveté upon the audience may be imagined.

"At this time our prima donna received the highest compliments from Sontag, who told her that she would be one of the greatest singers in the world; and from Alboni, who said if she went to Paris she would make such a furore as is seldom seen there.

"After the concert tour with Strakosch, Miss Patti went to the West Indies with Gottschalk, the pianist. In Havana she sang, in costume, the duet in the 'Barber of Seville,' with her brother Barili. The enthusiastic Havanese made such a row in recalling her that she ran away frightened, and could not be persuaded to go upon the stage again. Throughout the Indies she divided the honors with Gottschalk, and at Porto Rico had an offer of marriage (she was then fourteen) from the richest proprietor in the place. But that diamond wedding did not come off. Adelina is still in 'maiden meditation, fancy free,' and is devenue only to art."

MISS ADELINA PATTI, THE NEW PRIMA DONNA.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

Miss Patti made her first appearance at the Academy of Music this winter. She has since sung the following parts: Lucia, in "Lucia de Lammermoor;" Amina, in "Sonnambula;" Elvira, in "Puritani;" Henriette, in "Martha;" Zerlina, in "Don Giovanni;" Rosina, in "Barbiere," etc., etc. She will shortly appear in "Don Pasquale," "Figlia del Reggimente," and "Linda." Her voice is a soprano, whose volume will probably increase by-and-by; her method is admirable. A very distinguished critic thus noticed her singing at her début:

"Her appearance was that of a very young lady, petite and interesting, with just a tinge of the school-room in her manner. She was apparently self-possessed, but not self-assured. After the first few bars of recitative she launched boldly into the cavatina—one of the most difficult pieces in the opera. This she sang perfectly, displaying a thorough Italian method and a high soprano voice, fresh, full, and even throughout. In the succeeding cabaletta, which was brilliantly executed, Miss Patti took the high note E flat above the line with the greatest ease. In the duet with the tenor (Brignoli), and that with the baritone (Forti), and the mad scene, Miss Patti sang with sympathetic tenderness—a rare gift in one so young—and increased the enthusiasm of the audience to a positive furore, which was demonstrated in the usual way—recalls, bouquets, wreaths, etc., etc."

HOW BABIES ARE PUT TO SLEEP IN INDIA.

THE accompanying sketch exhibits a scene of daily occurrence in India, in the lower range of the Himalayas between Simla and the plains. It refers to the custom which is adopted by the women to lull their children to sleep, so that, while wrapped in slumber, they may themselves be able to go forth either to labor on the road or assist in the cultivation of the small patches of ground that, by an ingenious amount of terracing, enables the hill-man to rear grain for the few inhabitants who have their tiny homes, or hovels, perched upon every accessible space suitable for the safe erection of a domicile. Springs of water are abundant, and near one of these, where it flows in a silvery stream, on a ledge or field immediately beneath it, the children, from even a month old to three or four years of age, are brought and laid down. By means of a small piece of a slit bamboo a slight flow of water is obtained from the stream, and the bamboo slip is so adjusted that the water falling from above alights on the well-shaven crown of the child and trickles off: thus the child falls asleep, and the unceasing flow of the water on its head keeps up a perpetual lullaby: and so, for hours and hours the most refractory infant is quieted and left without apprehension by the mother, who, when her work is over, returns to the spot, hoists up her child on to her hip, and sallies home. A more picturesque scene than what is occasionally exhibited by this daily performance is scarcely to be met with in the East, and forms one of the most characteristic and striking pictures that gratify the traveler in the Himalayas.

We are not prepared to recommend the example to those of our American fellow-countrywomen who have troublesome babies; but the custom is curious and interesting.

THE Uncommercial Traveler.

NO. IV.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

Is the sweet little cherub who sits smiling aloft and keeps watch on the life of Poor Jack, commissioned to take charge of Mercantile Jack, as well as Jack of the national navy? If not, who is? What is the cherub about, and what are we all about, when Poor Mercantile Jack is having his brains slowly knocked out by pony-weights, aboard the brig Beelzebub, or the bark Bowie-knife—when he looks his last at that infernal craft, with the first officer's iron boot-heel in his remaining eye, or with his dying body towel overboard in the ship's wake, while the cruel wounds in it do "the multitudinous seas incarnadine?"

HOW THEY PUT BABIES TO SLEEP IN INDIA.

If it be unreasonable, then am I the most unreasonable of men, for I believe it with all my soul.

Is it unreasonable to entertain a belief that if, aboard the trig Beelzebub or the bark Rosie-knife, the first officer did half the damage to cotton that he does to men, there would presently arrive from both sides of the Atlantic so vociferous an invocation of the swift-tide cherub who sits calculating aloft, keeping watch on the markets that pay, that such vigilant cherub would, with a winged sword, have that gallant officer's organ of destructiveness out of his head in the space of a flash of lightning?

This was my thought as I walked the dockyard at Liverpool, keeping watch on poor Mr. Mercantile Jack. Alas for me! I have long outgrown the state of sweet little cherub; but there I was, and there Mercantile Jack was, and very busy he was, and very cold he was: the snow yet lying in the frozen furrows of the land, and the northeast winds making off the tops of the little waves in the Mersey, and rolling them into halfstones to pelt him with. Mercantile Jack was hard at it, in the bitter weather, as he mostly is in all weathers, poor Jack. He was girded to ships' masts and funnels of steamers, like a forester to a great tree scraping and painting; he was lying out on yards, furling sails that tried to beat him off; he was dimly discernible up in a world of giant cordage, reefing and splicing; he was faintly audible down in holds, stowing and unshipping cargo; he was winding round and round at capstans, making that monotonous, and drunk; he was of a diabolical aspect, with coating for the Antipodes on him, and washing decks lustrously, with the breast of his red shirt open to the blast, though it was sharper than the knife in his fourteen girdle. He was hammering over bulwarks, all eyes and hair; he was standing by at the shoot of the Conard steamer, off to-morrow, as the maids in trade of several kinds, from poulterers, and fishmongers, poured down into the ice-house; he was coming aboard of other vessels, with his kit in a tarpaulin bag, attended by policeconvoys to the very last moment of his shore-going existence. As though his senses, when released from the agency of the elements, were entirely attention to be confused by other turmoil, there was a rattling of wheels, a clattering of hoofs, a clashing of iron, a pelting of cotton and hides and casks and timber, an incessant deafening disturbance, on the quays, that made the very mariners stare around. And in the midst of it, he stood swaying about, with his hair blown all manner of wild ways, rather exactly like the wave of his plunderers, and the rigging in the docks was shrill in the wind, and every little steamer coming and going across the Mersey was dancing in its blowing off, and every buoy in the river bobbed spitefully up and down, as if there were a general taunting chorus of "Come along, Mercantile Jack! Ill-lodged, ill-fed, ill-used, hocussed, entrapped, anticipated, cleaned out. Come along, poor Mercantile Jack, and be tempestfeasted till you're drowned!"

The uncommercial transaction which had brought me and Mercantile Jack into this predicament in Liverpool police-force, that I might have a look at the various unlawful traps which are every night set for Jack. As my term of service in that delightful confines was short, and my personal bias in the capacity of one of its members has ceased, no suspicion will attach to my evidence that it is an admirable force. Besides that it is composed, without favor, of the best men that can be picked, it is directed by an unusual intelligence. The organization against Fires I take to be much better than the metropolitan system, and in all respects it tempers its remarkable vigilance with a still more remarkable discretion.

Jack had been full of work in the docks some hours, and I had taken, for purposes of identification, a photograph-likeness of a thief, in the portrait-room of the head police-office (on this day he seemed rather complimented by the proceeding), and I had been on police-parade, and the small hand of the clock was moving at 9, when I took up my lantern to follow Mr. Superintendent to the traps that were set for Jack. In Mr. Superintendent I saw, as any body might in a tall, well-looking, well set-up man of soldierly bearing, with a cavalry air, a good chest, and a resolute set of the jaw by means ungentle face. He carried in his hand a pliant black walking-stick of hard wood: whenever and wherever, an hour after-time of the night, he struck it on the pavement with a ringing sound, it instantly produced a whistle out of the darkness, and a policeman, on this remarkable stick I refer an air of mystery and magic which pervaded the whole of my pyrquisition among the traps that were set for Jack.

We began by diving into the obscurest streets and lanes of the port. Suddenly pausing in a flow of cheerful discourse, before a dead wall, apparently some ten miles long, Mr. Superintendent struck upon the ground with the well opened and short-cut, with military salute of hand to temple, two policemen—not in the least surprised themselves, not in the least surprise Mr. Superintendent.

"All right, Sharpeye?"

"All right, Sir."

"All right, Trampfoot?"

"All right, Sir."

"Is Quicksaver there?"

"Here am I, Sir."

"Come with us."

"Yes, Sir."

So Sharpeye went before, and Mr. Superintendent and I went next, and Trampfoot and Quicksaver marched as rear-guard. Sharpeye, I soon had occasion to remark, had a skillful and quite professional way of opening doors—touched latches delicately, as if they were keys of musical instruments—opened every door he touched, as if he were confident that there was stolen property behind it —instantly insinuated himself, to prevent its being shut.

Sharpeye opened several doors of traps that were set for Jack, but Jack did not happen to be in any of them. They were all such miserable places that really, Jack, if I were you, I would give them a wider berth. In every trap somebody was sitting over a fire waiting for Jack. Now, it was a crouching old woman, like the picture of the Norwood Gipsy in the old stupendary dream-books; now, it was a grimy of the male sex in a checked shirt and without a coat, reading a newspaper; now, it was a man crimp and a woman crimp, who always introduced themselves as united in the matrimonial bonds, and as Jack's Delight, his (un)lovely Nan; but they were all waiting for Jack, and were all frightfully disappointed to see us.

"Who have you got up stairs here?" says Sharpeye, generally. (In the Move-on tone.)

"Nobody, sure-ly, gen-tle-men-a-ny-el!" (Irish feminines reply.)

"What do you mean by nobody? Didn't I hear a woman's step go up stairs when my hand was on the latch?"

"Ah! now this you're right, Sure, I forgot her! 'Tis on'y Betsy White, Surr. Ah! you know Betsy, Surr. Come down, Betsy darlin', and say the gintlemin."

Generally, Betsy looks over the balusters (the steep staircase is in the room) with a forcible expression in her profile that shows an intention to compensate herself for the present trial by grinding Jack finer than usual when he does come. Generally, Sharpeye looks at Mr. Superintendent, and says, as if the subjects of his remarks were wax-work:

"One of the worst, Sir, this house is. This woman has been indicted three times. This man's a regular bad one, Sir. This woman's name is Pegg. Gives himself out as Waterhouse."

"Never had stitch a name as Pegg near me back, Sir, since I were in this house, bee the good Lard!" says the woman.

When we had gone in many such houses, and had come out (always with Sharpeye first looking into waiting for Jack), we started off to a singing-house where Jack was expected to muster strong.

It was a Friday night, and Friday night was considered as a good night for Jack to be at sea. Jack did not share in every great force even though the house was one to which he much resorted, and where a good deal of money was taken. There was British Jack, a little maudlin and sleepy, lolling over his emptied glass, as if he were trying to make out the figures of a quadrille on the Loafing Jack of the Stars and Stripes, rather an unpromising customer, with his long nose, lank cheek, high cheek-bones, and tight lips, who had given him but his cabbage-leaf hat; there was Spanish Jack with curls of black hair, rings in his ears, and a knife not far from his hand, sitting down into troubles with him; there were Maltese Jack, and Jack of Sweden, and Jack the Finn, looming through the smoke of their pipes like Scandinavian Stars that looked as if they were carved out of dark wood, toward the young lady dancing the hornpipe, who found the platform so exceedingly small for it that I had a nervous expectation of seeing her, in the awkward accommodation, dancing off the counter. Still, if all hands had been got together, they would not have more than half filled the room. Reserve, however, said Mr. Superintendent, by nature, the host, that it was Friday night, and, besides, it was getting on for twelve, and Jack had gone aboard. Among and watchful of this, was Jack's own Victualer the host, with tight lips and a complete edition of Cocker's arithmetic in each eye. Attended to the hornpipe, and, when it ended, always on the spot. When he heard of talent, trusted no body's account of it, but went off by rail to see it. If true, then engaged it. Pounds a week for talent—four pound—five pound. Banjo Bones was a celebrated talent. Hear this talent to-night, and going to play—it was real talent! In truth it was very good; a kind of piano-accordion, played by a young girl of a delicate appearance, in boots, hat and dress, that made the audience look coarser. She sang to the instrument, too; first, a song about a village bell, and then, a comic song, and a song about how I went to sea; winding up with an imitation of the bagpipes, which Mercantile Jack seemed to understand the best. It was good girl, said Mr. Licensed Victualer. Kept herself select. Sat in Song, not listening to the blandishments of Jack. Jack's own child, mother. Father dead. Once a merchant well to do, but an unspeculated himself. Lived respectably on a salary paid for item of talent under consideration, Mr. Victualer's pounds dropped suddenly to shillings—shillings to halfpennies—nothing for a young person like that, you know; she only went on six times a night, and was only required to be down from six at night to twelve. What was more conclusive was, Mr. Victualer's assurance that he "never allowed any language, and never suffered any disturbance." From which statement the statement, and the order that prevailed was the best proof of it that could have been cited. So I came to the conclusion that four Mercantile Jack might do (as I am afraid he does) much worse than trust himself to Mr. Victualer, and pass his evenings here.

The night was now well on into the morning, but our miles and miles we explored in another world, where nobody ever goes to bed, but every body is eternally sitting up, waiting for Jack. This exploration was among a vast number of dismal courts and blind alleys, called Entries, kept in wonderful order by the police, and in much better order than by the corporation: the want of gaslight in the most dangerous and infamous of these places being quite unworthy of so spirited a town. I need describe but two or three of the houses in which Jack was waited for, as specimens of the rest. Many we attained by noisome passages, to profoundly dark that we felt our way with our hands. Not one of the whole number we visited was without its show of prints and ornamental crockery: the quantity of the latter set forth on little shelves and in little cases, in otherwise wretched rooms, indicating that Mercantile Jack must have an extraordinary fondness for crockery to necessitate so much of that bait in his traps.

Among such garniture, in one front parlor in the dead of the night, four women were sitting by a fire. One of them had a male child in her arms. On a stool among them was a swarthy youth with a guitar, who had evidently stopped playing when our footsteps were heard.

"Well! how do you do?" says Mr. Superintendent, looking about him.

"Pretty well, and hope you gentlemen are going to treat us ladies, now you have come to see us."

"Order there!" says Sharpeye.

"None of that!" says Quicksaver.

Trampfoot, outside, is heard to confide to himself, "Muggins's last this is. And a bad 'un!"

"Well!" says Mr. Superintendent, laying his hand on the shoulder of the swarthy youth, "and who's this?"

"Antonio, Sir."

"And what does he do here?"

"Come to give us a bit of music. No harm in that, I suppose?"

"A young foreign sailor?"

"Yes. He's a Spaniard. You're a Spaniard, ain't you, Antonio?"

"He Spaniard, sure."

"And he don't know a word you say, not he, not if you was to talk to him till doomsday." (Triumphantly, as if it redounded to the credit of the house.)

"Will he play something?"

"Oh yes, if you like. Play something, Antonio. You ain't ashamed to play something, are you?"

The cracked guitar raises the feeblest ghost of a tune, and three of the women keep time to it with their heads, as they talk with the child. If Antonio has brought any money in with him, I am afraid he will never take it out, and it even strikes me that his guitar may be in a bad way. But the look of the young man and the tinkling of the instrument so change the place in a moment to a bad one of Jack's traps, that I wonder where his mate is, should a mate be available for evil.

I am bound to acknowledge (or it tends rather to my uncommercial confusion) that I occasioned a difficulty in this establishment, by having taken the child in my arms. Under my offering to restore it to a ferocious joker, not unstimulated by rum, who claimed to be its mother, that unnatural parent put her hands behind her and declined to accept it; backing into the fire-place, and very shrilly declaring, regardless of remonstrance from her friends, that the child was to be Law that whoever took a child from its mother of his own will was bound to stick to it. The uncommercial sense of being in a false position with the child into the poor little child, beginning to be frightened, was relieved by my worthy friend and fellow-constable Trampfoot, who, having been on his article as if it were a Bottle, passed it on to the nearest woman, and left me free. It was clear that there was no such thing as a night-cap to this baby's head, and that even he never went to bed, but was always kept up—and would grow up, kept up—waiting for Jack.

Later still in the night we came (by the court "where the cats make mischief," and by the other court across the street, into which his body was dragged) to another parlor in another Entry, where seven women, sitting round a fire, in just the same way. It was a dirty and offensive place, with some ragged clothes drying in it; but there was a high shelf over the entrance door (to be out of the reach of marauding hands, possibly) with two large bells leaves on it, and a great piece of Cheshire cheese.

"Well!" said Mr. Superintendent, with a comprehensive look at the group, "how do you do?"

"Not much to boast of, Sir." From the courteering woman of the house. "This is my good man, Sir."

"You are not registered as a common Lodging House?"

"No, Sir."

Sharpeye (in the Move-on tone) puts in the pertinent inquiry, "Then who ain't you?"

"Ain't got no one here, Mr. Sharpeye," rejoins the woman and my good man together, "but our own family."

"How many are you in family?"

The woman takes time to count, under pretense of counting, and adds, as one scant of breath, "Seven, Sir."

But she has missed one; so Sharpeye, who knows all about it, says,

"Here's a young man here makes eight, who ain't of your family?"

"O No, Mr. Sharpeye, he's a weekly lodger."

"What does he do for a living?"

The young man here takes the reply upon himself, and shows workmen's, "Ain't got nothing to do."

The young man here is modestly brooding behind a damp apron pendant from a clothes-line. As I glance at him I become—but I don't know why—vaguely reminded of Woolwich, Chatham, Portsmouth, and Dover. When we get out, my respected fellow-constable Sharpeye, addressing Mr. Superintendent, observes:

"You noticed that young man, Sir, in at Darby's?"

"Yes. What is he?"

"Deserter, Sir."

Mr. Sharpeye further intimates that when we have done with his services he will step back and take that young man. Which in course of time he does: feeling at perfect ease about finding him, and knowing for a moral certainty that nobody in that region will be gone to bed.

Later still in the night we came to another parlor up a step or two from the street, which was very cleanly, neatly, even tastefully kept, and in which, set forth on a draped chest of drawers masking the staircase, was such a profusion of ornamental crockery that it would have furnished forth a handsome sale-booth at a fair. It backed up a stout old lady—HOGARTH drew her exact likeness more than once—and a boy who was carefully writing a copy in a copy-book.

"Well, ma'am, how do you do?"

Sweetly, she can assure the dear gentlemen, sweetly. Charmingly, charmingly. And overjoyed to see us.

"Why, this is a strange time for this boy to be writing his copy. In the middle of the night!"

"So it is, dear gentlemen, Heaven bless your welcome face and send you prosperity; but he has been to the Play with a young friend for his diversion, and he combinates his improvement with entertainment by doing his writing-exercise afterward, God be good to us!"

The copy admonished human nature on the subjects the boy of every fierce desire. One might have thought it recommended stirring the fire, the old lady so approved it. There she sat, ruddy beaming at the copy-book and the boy, and invoking showers of blessings on our heads, when we met her in the middle of the night, waiting for Jack.

Later still in the night we came to a nasseous room with an earth floor, into which the refuse steam of an iffy trickled. It was dreadful. Its habitation was abominable; the seeming poverty of it, disused and dire. Yet, here again, was visitor or lodger—a man sitting before the fire. He was rest of them elsewhere, and apparently not distasteful to the mistress's niece, who was also before the fire. The mistress herself had the misfortune of being in jail.

Three weird old women of transcendant ghastliness were at needle-work at a table in this room. Says Trampfoot to First Witch, "What are you making?" Says First Witch, "Money."

"What are you making?" retorts Trampfoot, a little off his balance.

"I begs to hold your money," says the witch, shaking her head and setting her teeth; "you as has got it."

She holds up a common cash-bag, and on the table is a heap of such bags. Witch Two laughs at us. Witch Three scowls at us. Witch sixes hold all, stitch, stitch. First Witch has at last put circle round each eye. I fancy it like the beginning of the development of a perverted political lake, and that when it spreads all round her head she will die in the odor of devilry.

Trampfoot decides to be informed what First Witch has got behind the table, down by the side of her, there? Witches Two and Three creak angrily, "Down with the child!"

She drags out a skinny little arm from a brown dust-heap on the ground. Adjured not to disturb the child, she lets it drop again. We find at last that there is one child in the world of Entries who goes to bed—if this be bed.

Mr. Superintendent asks how long are they going to work at those bags?

How long? First Witch repeats. Going to have supper presently. See the cups and saucers, and the plates.

Mr. Superintendent opines it is rather late for supper, surely?

"Late? Ay! But we has to 'arn our supper afore we eats it!" Both the other witches repeat this after First Witch, and take the Uncommercial measurement with their eyes, as for a chamber crooking-sheet. Some grim discourse ensues, referring to the mistress of the cave, who will be released from jail to-morrow. Witches pronounce Trampfoot "right there," when he deems it a trying distance for the old lady to walk; she shall be fetched by coach and a sprig-cart.

As I took a parting look at First Witch in turning away, the red marks round her eyes seemed to have already gotten larger, and to be hungrily and thirstily looked out beyond me into the dark doorway to see if Jack were there. For Jack came even here, and the mistress had got into jail through deluding Jack.

When I at last ended this sight of travel and got to bed, I had to keep my eyes and my comfortable thoughts of Seaman's Homes (not overdone with strictness), and improved dock regulations, giving Jack every benefit of home, and a home aboard ship, through my mind's wandering among the vermin I had seen. Afterward, the same vermin all over my sleep. Evermore, when on a breezy day I see Poor Mercantile Jack running into port with a fair wind and all sail set, I shall think of the unsleeping host of devourers who never go to bed, and are always in their set traps waiting for him.

THE STEEPLE-CHASE.

THE first time I saw half-witted Billy, said the schoolmaster, he was in the midst of a crew of children, who were, with thoughtless and horrible mirthfulness, pursuing the poor fellow up a high hill at him when he screamed and jumped up and down, and shaped his own face, and pulled his hair out. I had access at my place at the school only a few days, but I recognized some of my own scholars among those young heathens. I scattered them pretty promptly, and made such a preachment about it from my desk that the practice was at once discontinued. But Billy was thenceforth my fast friend.

Billy is the most acutely nervous little fiberthighter—flutterer, Mrs. Billy calls him—that I ever saw, and absolutely restless. He hardly sleeps three hours a day, and then as lightly as a watch-dog. But he is always dancing gayly about, and ready for a laugh, unless he is vexed. Mrs. May has a longing sort of hope that his poor lost wits may somehow come back to him out of the moon, or wherever they are bottled up. I had not the heart to undeceive her; so I have permitted him to sit in the schoolroom, and even to ramble about therein, provided only he is decorous and quiet; which he does, ever and anon scrawling on a slate, or peering quaintly into a book as wisely as a bird; and once in each few minutes he comes up to my desk after a smile or a pat on the head, which having been received, off he trots again, giggling, and whispering to himself, "Good Billy, good Billy!" I have watched him a good deal, and an odd subject he is.

I shortly discovered that one of his strongest traits was an instinctive love of ascending. Every bean-pole, fence, tree, ladder, rope, or other accessible upward road whatever, he would immediately try; and his poor mother was in a state of constant fear and tribulation about him; sometimes finding him up at the eaves of a house on the lightning rod, laughing and chattering; or squatting about in a high tree, or astraddle on a ridge-pole. Since his entry into school she had much less trouble with him, especially since he used to follow me about also at all other times like a dog; holding by my finger, gabbling to himself, looking up to giggle in my face, and to get a pat and sniff of approval.

Meeting Mr. Allyn one afternoon last winter, near the new Baptist church at the lower end of the city, I stood and talked over various interesting school matters for a long time, and at last, turning abashedly about with him, took his arm and walked toward his house, still conversing earnestly. I left him at his gate, and crossed the street to Mrs. May's, where I had been lodging for a few weeks only. Entering the little parlor, I found my pale and feeble little hostess sitting near the window. At my entrance she looked up and asked,

"Where's Billy, Mr. Delano?"

"I don't know," answered; "isn't he here?"

And as I spoke the truth flashed upon me, that he had gone down the street with me, and had lost his usual hold of my hand when I stopped to talk with Mr. Allyn. And I also reflected that he might very probably have slipped away into the new church, and have taken it into his flighty head to go scrambling up inside the unfinished spire. Although quite a boy, he was feeble and easily tired, fatigued; and I could not help feeling that if he should succeed in reaching the narrow platform at the top, there was imminent danger lest his over-excitable brain should be dizzied with the exertion and the height, and his poor half-life be brought to a terrible end by the tremendous fall. As the thought of that if this should happen it would be by my own carelessness came into my mind, I think I turned pale. For the weak-minded man, I said within, watching my features intently and seeing me change countenance after I answered her, imitation I know not what of vague feminine fright; and springing up in anguish, she cried,

"Oh, Mr. Delano, where is Billy? Is he dead?"

And she wept bitterly; so that I was fain to comfort her by seeming to remember where I had left her half-witted boy, and to promise to bring him home in a few minutes; with which assurances I immediately left the house, and hastened toward the church.

Work on the building was suspended for the winter; so that there was nobody there to interfere with the execution of Master Billy's scheme, if such he had. My doubts were speedily solved. As I drew near the church I saw that a small crowd of boys standing on the further side of the street and laughing and swearing together, as they gazed intently at the summit of the spire. Now I could discern a small figure up there; now I could distinguish the spish gesticulations and quick fantastic movements of Billy May. He could not have been there more than a very few moments, for already men and women began to gather in the street and look upward with laughter and some with sympathy and fear.

There was nothing for it but to hasten up after him; and as I could do it so safely as I, his favorite; for his spiteful, heedless passion would surely send him screaming down the flimsy scaffold at the approach of any distasteful person. Throwing off hat and coat, I hurried to the door. It was filled with a heavy-swearing hurrier of heavy trip-linch plank. The simpleton must have scrambled up an inclined joist which led to a narrow window in the side of the lower story of the tower. The door was no time to lose. I picked up a heavy block of stone and drove in the door. As I did so, I heard Mrs. May's shrill voice outside. She had followed me to the church.

"Oh-hoo," she sobbed, "Billy, Billy! Come down, come down!"

A sharp high screech from the top of the spire answered her, and indicated the whising of Billy's fatful anger. I heard it as I entered the dark and chilly interior of the great stone spire; and at the same time I heard a murmur of voices outside. This, as I afterward learned, was the smothered cry of the gathering crowd, at the insane dancing of the idiot on his airy perch; for his unnatural senseless cry had in fact the effect of enraging him; and he began at the moment to jump about and gesticulate at a most furious and inanimated and perilous rate.

The interior of the tower and spire was empty, except for the various appliances which had been used for the purposes of its erection. Glancing upward, therefore, I saw only the rough and irregular interior of a great perpendicular stone tube, in the middle of which shot up a vast centre-post of heavy timber, framed with cross-pieces running to holes in the wall for the support of planks, platforms, and pulleys; lost above my head in the dimness of the narrow and almost unlighted tower, and the congeries of workman's materials. A heavy tackle-fall hung idly down at one side; snow and ice lay here and there mixed with spattered mortar, sand, and stone-chips; and a rough and icy ladder of stats nailed insecurely across two clumsy pieces of joist, led, perpendicularly up thirty feet, to a rude landing-place.

Up I went, however, with perilous and painful climbing. A rotten slat broke in my hand; and if I had not fallen sideling against the rugged stone wall I should have broken my neck. As it was I barely saved myself. At the landing-place of which I spoke I paused a moment. To my surprise there was no further ladder. The workmen had probably withdrawn it to prevent climbing up. Without waiting to speculate upon the means which Billy might have used to ascend, I seized the heavy ropes of the tackle, which was hooked on some distance above me, and, recalling some of my boyish sleight, "shinned" up hand over hand, to the edgeless plank at which it was secured. By a desperate effort I lifted myself to the upper edge, and out of breath, with burning hands and beating heart, sat down for a moment's rest.

Bang—bang—bang!

What a dreadful pain shot through me as I heard something thus full against stone and timber, tumbling from the vast dark height above me, with those quick irregular heavy dead knocks! Had he fallen? Down it came, however, a block of frestone about a foot square, and it had, like lodged by Billy, by mere accident, only grazing my foot, crashing onward, and reaching the ground with a heavy thud!

From this point the only means of ascent, for the remainder of the passage in the interior, was a succession of pieces of joist, set insecurely at various angles, and having slips of board nailed across them to the middle with the commonest sort of nails; and even of these unsafe steps a number were already broken down, and either quite gone or sticking slantingly against the wall. Here the space in the interior was also now very contracted; and several times in the darkness I received a bad knock from some projection which I could not well see, or from a projecting stone in the wall. Slowly, however, and with difficulty, I ascended to a point which must be considerably above a hundred feet above the earth, and emerged upon a half-floor, or large hole between the timbers, which made an empty space about four feet high, with no interior means of further ascent, and lighted by a large hole between the timbers. Here, looking up, I saw the sky through the unfinished summit, and caught a glimpse of the jumping simpleton. That I could not see him was owing to the darkened for it I became for the first time aware that the wind had risen to a gale. It hummed and whistled and moaned through the tower, and the rope-fastened outside scaffolding at the top, with that tremendous power for which it finds scope in the unimpeded spaces of heights, was also making a tempest above when there is only a moderate gale below.

Fortunately Billy did not see me; and climbing outside I betook myself to the only possible road for the tremendous ascent. It consisted of a light and rocking scaffold constructed around the exterior of the spire. As I came out into the open air the wind caught me with such force as almost to sway my breath; and clinging tightly to the ropes which bound together the loose materials of the scaffold I looked about me. The first object on which I saw that the air was all gloomy with approaching evening, and with the awful coming of a vast gloud of storm from the northwest; looked of horizontally, over tree-tops and houses, with a shrill such as I conceived that one might have at a long bell bore from a bottom to the tower; looked downward, and saw the wide street, now black and swarming with a countless crowd of spectators, from whom, however, I could not hear a sound. The dizziness of the place began to affect my brain; but, resolutely shutting all the facts of the situation except that I must go onward, I laid hold again of the slats and timbers. There was not room inside of the scaffolding. The locks of the workmen had evidently made use of a series of slats nailed upon the sheer exterior of the scaffold! To the high, however, as I supposed, it was clear that instinctive desperate grip which such situations seem to necessitate, and refusing to see anything except the narrow octagonal shaft of stone that rose close beside me, and the successive steps of my fragile and slippery ladder, step by step I worked on.

I think that is the only time when I ever felt that the world can be to a man's mind and fearful stories of its power at sea; but I have no experience of it there. Here, however, I had; and indeed it seemed as if I had left the world, and were leaping savagely at me to sweep me from my shaking hold. The scaffold itself was only a loose sort of frame, set up against the wall of the tower built apart from it, and slipped down on it like a case, by its own weight, but with no solid connexion to the stone. For this reason it worked and writhed about under the terrific gusts as if it would twist itself to pieces.

My head was at last nearly even with the top of the unfinished spire, and I made sure of success. I felt a sudden and overpowering confidence, and a unearthly shriek from the insane child startled me so much that it is a wonder that I did not fall. But in spite of that I was down in the first wild preoccupation of my own mind, of the immeasurable force of that terrible wind, there surged up at the same moment a sense of darkness in the street below a great deep shout, or groan—I know not which it was—an intense and wild and fearful cry, that thrilled through my very heart; and I knew that the boy had fallen, and that the crowd had sent up that wail of horror at beholding his death.

Trembling from head to foot, with mouth parched and dry, hands and knees numb and bleeding, and heart beating frightfully, I raised myself upon the summit of the unfinished spire. The boy was dead! Instead of the sight must be, something impelled me to look over the tremendous verge further below.

As sure as I am alive he had fallen, or been blown off, and, by a chance which might almost be called a miracle, his garments had caught on the top of a scaffold pole; and there he hung dangling in the air, two hundred and thirty feet above the ground!

He was alive, however. Looking up, he spied me.

"Hold still, Billy!" I cried, preparing to descend a foot or two and catch him.

"Bad Billy! bad Billy!" he screamed; and, dangling as he was, knocked his fists against his poor, silly little head—according to his usual method of expressing penitence—after a fashion which even the inexpressible horror of the situation perhaps rendered the more ludicrous. At any rate, I could not help almost laughing.

Mustering what little strength I had remaining, and descending cautiously to a foothold below the little swinging scarecrow, I steadied myself among the poles and timbers of the scaffold, and securing a strong hold of Billy's collar, I took him violently from his perch and lifted him to my breast, whereupon he clung tightly to me, clasping both arms around my neck, and sobbing and sniveling as if his heart would break.

But the boy's life, which, with the multitude below had groaned forth at the sight of the boy's fall was a mere whisper, a breath, to the vast resounding shout that went up from them as I did so. Even where I was it swelled, and rolled, and re-echoed up, reverberating in my ears with an undulating thunder, like the endless exultation of some vast triumphant army.

They told me afterward that the suspense had been horrible down there in the street; that women had fainted and strong men turned pale, in the painful expectancy; and that, as the poor fellow was seen to be safe, loud weeping or loud laughter relieved the hearts of many, and that in their reprieve from the fear that great shout arose such as one as had never been heard there before.

Climbing back again, I sat down, totally and inexpressibly exhausted, with the chilled and shivering child cowering close to me. Some dim instinctive apprehensions of his danger had, doubtless, come upon him, for he clung quietly up to me, he repeated, softly, many times,

"Bad Billy! bad Billy!"

Strong men came up, and, with much peril and difficulty, helped us down. I could not stand when I reached the ground, but, through the crowd of citizens seeking to praise and thank me I was helped home, and lay ill for some days. Mrs. May had fainted, and, indeed, did not see the peril of her only child. But her delight in finding him yet alive was most wild and extravagant. And that, I suppose, must be the reason why Billy likes me.

COMMERCIAL GRIEF.

A LETTER, deeply bordered with black, attracted my attention among the heap that lay upon my table. It was evidently a messenger of affliction. The black seal was the deep upon a black background, that formed the device upon the seal, and read the contents. Nothing more than an intimation from a friend of the sudden death of her brother-in-law, and a request that, under the circumstances of the sudden bereavement of the widow, I would withhold certain sad commissions relative to the mourning and monument which she intrusted to my care.

After reading I set out upon my sad errand, and had no difficulty in finding the maison de deuil in question. It met me in the sad habiliments of mourning. No yellow colors glared from the shop-windows, no gilt annoyed with its festive glare. The haine of the deceased presumed to make itself seen in letters of the saddest gray on a black ground. Here and there beads of white set off the general gloom, and the crape-frost, like the crape pipings of a widow's cap. The very metal window frames and plates had gone into a decorous mourning—into black and crape—what we had, under the circumstances, would be quite indecent—brass.

On my pushing the plate-glass door it gave way with a hushed and muffled sound, and I was met by a gentleman of sad expression, who, in the most sympathetic manner, inquired the nature of my want: and, on my reply, directed me to the Inconsolable Sable Grief Department. The inside of the establishment fully corresponded with the outer appearance without. The long passage I traversed was paneled in white with black borderings, like the many mourning-cards I had opened; and I was becoming impressed with the deep solemnity of the place, when I caught sight of a neat little figure rolling up some papers, on inquiring if I had arrived at the Inconsolable Grief Department, she replied in a gentle voice, slightly shaded with gayety, that this was the ladies' mourning counter, and that I must proceed until I had passed the repository for widow's silk. Following her directions, at last reached an elegant apartment, a large room draped with black, with a hushed atmosphere about it, as though a body was invisibly lying there in state.

An attendant in sable habiliments, picked out with the smallest of white silk, and with an unexhaberish eye and manner, awaited my commands. I accordingly produced my list. Scanning it critically, he said—

"Permit me to inquire, Sir, if it is a deceased partner?"

I responded assent.

"We take the liberty of asking this distressing question," he added, "as we are sometimes called upon to keep up the character of this establishment by matching at once the exact shade of affliction. The appearance of partners in this department gives satisfaction to the deepest woe. Permit me to show you a new texture, which we term the inconsolable.' With which words a pasteboard box before me, full of mourning fabrics.

"Is this it?" I inquired, lifting a lugubrious piece of goods.

"Oh no!" he replied; "the one you have in your hand was recommended for last year's affections, and was termed 'the stunning blow shade;' it makes up well, however, with our sudden bereavement silk—a leading article—and our distraction trimmings."

"I am afraid," said I, "my commission says nothing about these novelties."

"Ladies in the country," he blandly replied, "are possibly not aware of the perfection to which the art of mourning genteelly is now brought. But I will see that your commission is attended to, to the letter." Giving another glance over my list.

"Oh! a widow's cap is mentioned, I see. I must trouble you, Sir, to proceed to the Weeds Department for that article—the first turning to the left."

Proceeding as I was directed, I came to a recess fitted up with a solid phalanx of widows' caps; I perceived, at a glance, that they exhausted the whole extent of grief, from its deepest shade to that tone which is expressive of a pleasing melancholy. The foremost row confronted me with all the severity of crapen folds, in the midst of which my mind's eye could see the set features of many a Mrs. Clennam, while those behind gradually relaxed into the most jaunty curlatory; and one or two of the outsiders even breaking out into overtly flowing and the most flaunty weepers.

Forgetting the proprieties for the moment, I inquired of the grave attendant if one of the latter would be suitable?

"Oh no, Sir," she replied, with a slight shade of severity in her voice; "you may gradually work up to it in a year or two; but my lady is only relenting to the front row of weeds," she indispensable for the first burst of grief."

Acquiescing in the propriety of this sliding-scale of sorrow, I selected some weeds expressive of the deepest dejection I could find; and having completed my commission, I inquired where I could procure for myself some lavender gloves?

"Oh, Sir, for those things," she said, in the voice of Tragedy speaking of Comedy, "you must turn to your right, and you will come to the Comfortmenter Mourning counter."

Turning to the right, accordingly, I was surprised and a little shocked to find myself once more among worldly clothes; trader lavender, I had expected, but violet, mauve, and even absolute red, stared me in the face. I was about retiring, thinking I had made a mistake, when a young lady, with a charming tinge of cheerfulness in her voice, inquired if I could any thing in her department?

"I was looking for the Complimenting Mourning counter," I replied, "for some gloves, but I fear I am wrong."

"You are quite right, Sir," she said; "this is it."

She saw my eye glance at the cheerful silks, and, with the instinctive tact of woman, guessed my thoughts in a moment.

"Mamie, Sir, is very appropriate for the lighter sorrows."

"But absolute red," I retorted, pointing to some velvet of that color.

"Is quite admissible when you mourn the departure of a distant relative; but may I show you some gloves?" and setting the action to the word, she lifted the cover from the glove-box, and displayed a graduated picture of delicious tints, indicative of a struggle between the cheerful and the sad.

"There is a pleasing melancholy in the shade of gray," she said, indenting slightly each outer knuckle with the elastic kid as she measured my hand.

"Can you find a lavender?"

"Oh yes; the sorrow-list is very slight in that, and it wears exceedingly."

Thus, by degrees growing beautifully less, the grief of the establishment died out in the tenderest of lavender, and I left profoundly impressed with the charming improvements which Parisian taste has made on the old aboriginal style of mourning.

CINGALESE BOATS.

WE give on page 188 a picture of a Cingalese boat, which will enable us to note some matters. When a stranger first sees one of these boats in the water he can not understand how it lives. As soon, however, as he comes more within view the means are apparent by which the light boat is made to sustain such heavy rigging. A cone-shaped float of solid wood is projected and sustained from the boat's side by outriggers, which are secured by ligatures to the mast and thwarts, as seen in the illustration. Whichever way the wind sets the float has the effect of counterbalancing the sail pressure on the hull. If, for instance, the wind is on the starboard quarter (supposing the float to be on the opposite side), the effect is a pressure on the boat, which is immediately resisted by its buoyancy; but if the wind is from the larboard side the float acts with the same effect, the pressure by its weight. The relative power of the sail filled, and the capacity of the float to resist the capsizing tendency, is easily calculated. In a gale, hence the float is not uncommonly seen suspended in the air. It will be observed by the reader that, although the weight and pressure of the boat is thus influenced by the peculiar appendage described, the power for propulsion is scarcely interfered with. It is this fact, in fact, which enables the Cyclon boat to attain unusual speed, and to face a breeze which an ordinary sailing-boat dare not encounter. The outrigger is fitted with temporary fastenings only, so as to admit of its being shifted from side to side to suit different conditions of wind and tide.

OLD HELP OUR MEN AT SEA!

Gon help our men at sea!
In firelit, pictured rooms, 'mid wine and flowers,
And gleesome company,
The wild wave hurls that word, in our blithest hours,
To nigh this prayer;
And, lonely, with clenched hands, at night 'tis ours,
"Lord of the waves, O spare!"

God help our men at sea!
I had a brother once. Our love na'er fall'd
In its intensity.
Smiling on our sweet mother, as he sail'd,
I saw him last.
Ah me! how that sweet mother drop'd and paled
Ere one brief year had past!

God help our men at sea!
They saw him, who sortived that dreadful night,
In his extremity—

GOD HELP OUR MEN AT SEA!

Kneeling, and looking in the stormfire's light,
To Heaven for grace.
And angels' glory was upon him, bright
As upon Stephen's face.

God help our men at sea!
Those pilgrim fathers, who leave all to teach
Their Saviour's charity.
May their prayers, like St. Paul's, in tempest reach
His ears, who said,
With an exceeding tenderness of speech—
"'Tis I. Be not afraid!"

God help our men at sea!
The workers, who at home can find no spheres
For work; whom poverty
Drives from their birthland, strong, despite those tears,
To toil, and win;
And then, pleas God, return for peaceful years
To their own land and kin.

God help our men at sea!
If lust of power or of revenge assail
England's tranquillity,
Using His gracious gifts, we shall prevail,
As oft before.
And Israel see the proud Egyptians pale
And "dead on the sea-shore."

REV. HENRY G. GUINNESS.

THE accompanying portrait will be recognized by all who have heard the eloquent young preacher, Mr. Guinness, who is now in this country.

Henry Grattan Guinness was born near Dublin, Ireland, in the year 1830. His father was brother to Mr. Guinness, the brewer of Dublin "Stout" celebrity, and was an officer in the army; and his mother the widow of Captain d'Esterre, who fell in a duel with the late Daniel O'Connell, some 25 years ago. He was brought up and well instructed, by his pious parents, in the knowledge of Divine truth. About seven years ago he determined to go to sea. He left England, and wandered over the shores of Mexico, the West Indies, Texas, through the Caribbean Sea, etc. During the voyage the ship was nearly lost on two occasions, and it was chiefly owing (the captain states) to the steadiness and presence of mind displayed by young Guinness that the ship was preserved.

On reaching home his friends urged him to turn his thoughts to agriculture. To this he was disinclined, but yielded to their wishes, and went to reside on the estate of a relative in the west of Ireland. His taste remained unchanged. He preferred the stir of seamanship to the quietness of farming. Accordingly, in the year 1854, he again set out on a voyage to the East Indies. Soon after the ship sailed they were obliged to put back, in a half-wrecked condition, and he being attacked by a most serious and alarming illness, was quite unable to proceed further, and returned to his home in Cheltenham, apparently a dying man.

It was about this time that he experienced a change of heart, and having obtained peace in believing, he at once, with the help of God, determined to spend and be spent in his Master's service. For this purpose he entered New College, London, under his friend and tutor, the late Dr. Harris. This was about January, 1856.

Pending his acceptance at New College, Mr. Guinness occupied himself among the poor of Cheltenham. He also addressed gatherings in the work-house and other places. On one of these occasions some unforeseen circumstance had prevented the inmates from assembling as he had arranged, and as he was retracing his way back, sad with disappointment, the thought struck him, "Do not many of the people I am passing in the streets need to be told of sin, and Christ, and mercy?" Filled with this thought, he took up his position in a retired part of the town, pulled out his Bible, and began to read aloud. A number of persons were soon drawn around him, and he preached an admirable discourse from Ps. xxx. 5: "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." This was his first sermon in the open air. The thing was soon "noised abroad." He persevered in this and other forms of Christian endeavor for the good of souls during several months, at the same time preparing for the college entrance examination.

Previous to leaving college, which was in June, 1857, he had, together with other preaching occupations, been for three months supplying the pulpit of the Tabernacle, Moorfields, London. His engagement at this place contributed much to determine his career.

In the month of July he was ordained as an Evangelist. The service was held in the Tabernacle, ministers of several churches taking part in it. Neither they nor Mr. Guinness himself considered that the ceremony gave him any additional grace or authority. It was only a recognition of him by the brethren as in their judgment called of God to the work, and a devout commendation of him to the favor of the Divine Lord, in whose employ he was engaged. The proceedings are said to have been deeply solemn and interesting.

And now this young preacher entered upon a range without limit or trammel, save what his own infirmity and God's providence might impose. Though a stripling, he fearlessly struck out, determined to know nothing among men save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. He traveled through England; went over the length and breadth of the principality; visited Scotland; and spent a short time in France; testifying any where and everywhere the good, old apostolic doctrine of "Repentance toward God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ." The stir produced, as he proceeded from place to place, was remarkable.

He arrived in this country a few weeks since, and has been preaching daily to crowds of people. Every right-minded person will wish him God-speed in his noble work.

REV. HENRY GRATTAN GUINNESS.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

The New Partner

IN

"CLINGHAM & CO., BANKERS."

BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW,

AUTHOR OF "THE HASHEESH EATER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER X.

WHICH GIVES THE HISTORY OF A LAST CHANCE.

THE day succeeding Nora Manton's battle and triumph over the Doubt Fiend went by, like all other days, with just so many ticks of the banking-room clock as well as clocks in general.

As we have said, there is a patent-safe side, and there is also a human-heart side to every business man, to every firm, to Clingham & Co., and to the house which their Cheswick Branch occupied. For representative of the patent-safe side, Luke Green sat all day and held his secret hate, revengeful prayers, and plannings.

He had set in ruins on foot for Ernest Beckford's whereabouts; he was quietly, cautiously hunting him down by emissaries who were trusty and silent; and he lived on the hope of coming up with him as his most concentrated nutriment and stimulus. In his soul he hated him for Nora's sake; but his ostensible reason for vengeance was to be the wallet, which he really believed, however, to have been taken in a drunken freak.

A CINGALESE BOAT IN A HIGH SEA.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

On the human-heart side of the house, the secret of Ernest Beckford, the love of him, the unshaken, unshakable faith in him, was well kept also. Bitterly were some of the moments of the day marked with tears — so strange it seemed to Nora, as she glided from room to room on her household avocations, going softly, as one who knows not what God would say or do next, and anxious to catch His least whisper—so strange it seemed that, if Ernest really loved her as she believed, he should depart thus from Cheswick — not only without expressing himself, but in a way which, with most sensitive girls, would have materially injured his cause—by stealth, and as Luke Green would say —though Nora would not, could not even think —like a defaulter, a thief. What was the meaning of this singular absence? What the meaning of any absence at all? His post in the Bank was vacant: his duties neglected with a substitute was sought, and all this without explanation, without warning, without excuse.

It was well for her perhaps, that during this day her mind was diverted in another direction, and another set of emotions brought into play than grief and pining, anxious wonder. The event which did her that service was this: John Manton having the dyspepsia, found his life consist of two main tendencies—sin and contrition —which made it resemble one of those pleasant serpentine streams that one sees in a flat country, where there are no mountains to straighten the water-courses; and which having run ten miles to the east, immediately compensates by bending on itself and running as many back to the west again. The Missouri, on the Kansas border, is such an instance; and John Manton's life was another. On Sunday the air was bracing, the sky was cloudless, the walking dry, the parson eloquent; he had a good appetite, and ate a hearty dinner, with Gloria-tibi's resounding through all the porches of his system—after which he discoursed cheerfully upon all subjects connected with the present and future condition of the race. On Monday there was a muggy atmosphere—a sky full of great, awkward, dingy clouds, looking like a young cook's mistake in dumplings; under foot was a coarse, chocolate paste, that swillowed up the shoes of the wayfarer, and John Manton felt the aftereffects of yesterday's hearty dinner; whereupon he lost all confidence in human perfectibility, and regarded himself as the chief of sinners, because he had yesterday expressed a mere whimsical vagary to the effect that we were not all going as fast as possible to the Dissgreenlies. One. So that, as I said, his life was a pretty methodical alternation of sin and contrition—fantasy and despair—impudent happiness and ridiculous abasement. On this present day he had an attack of repentance. It seized him when he first awoke in the morning, and grew worse and worse all day, until three o'clock precisely of the afternoon; at which period, in spite of the entreaties and almost indignant arguments of Nora's really indignant heart—in spite of her representing to him that he would make his manhood disrespected, and open the gate for her womanhood to be trampled upon in the same brute feet that would spurn him—in spite of his own memory, faint and diluted by dyspeptic tears of remorse as it was, that yesterday he had felt nobler and worthier in showing Mr. Green the door than in any act of his last dozen years—persisted in going to the superintendent, confessing that he had been hasty, and virtually asking to be restored, with full forgiveness, to the superintendental bosom.

As the door closed behind him on his way to Luke Green's desk the wounded heart of the young girl gave itself utterance in a sigh that told of tears too far down to come. Alone, entirely alone was she, with that loneliness which there feel who not only have no helper, but have also to help the faint-hearted. She had borne her father all that day, like a drifting mass of logged sea-weed, on the wave of her mighty womanly patience and faith; now he had slid from her, and was washed out of her reach, to be whirled in on the veering, eddying current of his own morbid self-will.

Presently, as she sat silently thinking and grieving, and in her heart turned over the leaf of that day's discouragement to begin a fresh page of effort and patience, she heard the well-known footfall of her father returning, accompanied by his voice and that of Mr. Luke Green. Evidently the difficulty was all made up between them, for an unwonted liveliness pervaded John Manton's tone, and Mr. Green's was restored to all its habitual suavity and fluency. Could he be coming to call on her? She sprang from her seat, and flew rather than ran out of the room, and up the stairs to her own little bedchamber. There she put on her flat and walking-shoes as quickly as possible, and throwing aside the apron which she had worn while showing Priscilla, her one servant, how to set the sponge for John Manton's Graham bread, she was all ready for an escape into the fields, or woods, or anywhere—any where out of the sight of her dishonored and self-respectless father and the mildly triumphant superintendent of the Cheswick Branch. She heard the two enter below, she heard her own name called at the foot of the stairs; but having no morbid notions about duty, where duty meant swelling the ovation in which her father was led captive at the heel of a man who was odious to her, she did not answer the call. So that her father inferred she was gone out—as she was in a second thereafter.

There is such a divine, quiet endurance to be learned of the heaven that Nora found herself many hours each day in contact with, than she had been in-doors.

A little picket gate let Nora out from the back of the Bank-house garden into the broad meadows through which the stream flowed. Once in the fields and she was hidden from both the Bank, or, at least, indistinguishable. To make the distance between her and it long enough, and to find a convenient hiding-place wherein, should she be so disposed, she could be concealed, was the work of but a few minutes. Then she sat down, crossed a stone wall perhaps twenty rods from the gate, leaned her head on her hand and cried briskly, but recoiled, as on the other side of the fence she saw stretched out upon the grass the figures of two young men smoking cigars. Although it was in the height of the summer season, one of them was enveloped from head to foot in a cloak-like overcoat, which was upheld by a very broad brimmed and intensely cocoa-ribbanded hat, which also concealed his face. Propped on one elbow, he was gesticulating earnestly to his comrade, a person of herculean shoulders and limbs, whose head, as much from eighteen stone in weight, who, in more perfect abandon, had thrown himself at full length upon the grass immediately before and with his great red seal-like pair of flippers extended at right angles from his body on the grass, and his cigar between his teeth, was turned toward the sky, looked not unlike some new model of monitor, with its turret in the bow, and with an outrigger arrangement—a round, blanket materially assisted by the long Regalia, which, being alternately taken from and put in his mouth, made a very respectable and energetic smoke-pipe. Altogether he looked as if he could steam from Cheswick to Cincinnati, or Noah's ark down the bay very easily. A chip hat like his companion's, and a blue linen Raglan, of a number of capes, completed the large surface to be covered and very flowing, blue cloth pantaloons, and heavy boots, were his attire. A clump of elders furnished the two an extempore booth, under which fragments of egg-shell, bread, and cheese, and the cover doing service as salt-cellar, showed that they had been taking dinner al fresco. To complete the picture, a sail-boat, of by no insignificant dimensions, was moored to a suitable trusty one—the stout man having a stout bludgeon, and his slight friend being equipped with a slender oar. As Nora stood on the upper step of the stile, where she saw them first, she paused in indecision whether to advance or retreat, her heart beating faster with the start their queer appearance had given her. The smaller of the two pirates noted her hesitation, and whispered something into the ear of the prostrate one, upon which he elevated himself all sufficiently to recognize, to further they both wandered off into the fields, away from the path which Nora seemed seeking by the stile. She paused, and then continued her way, walking as rapidly as possible, though afraid to attract the men's attention by running, should they be mischievous characters. Her suspicions were allayed, however, as she saw the smaller of the two produce a most unpiratical kind than usual of summer idlers—gentlemen from the boards of southeastern wards of the town, or such like, who journey in a row boat quietly, being now quite out of view from the Bank. Five minutes more, and she had reached the oddly pastoral new row of willows on which Ernest's window looked, sweet—oh! more than all attendant sweets to her love — because there the first bud of his love to her blossomed in her sight—there the secret freight of his heart's treasure was drawn ashore by her hand from the shoals, while he still thought that none beheld it save Him to whose ears it was consigned. From this spot to a long distance above the house where Ernest had lodged the silver willows grew close and luxuriant, branching near the ground, as is their wont, and sending their long root fibres far back into the land as well as downward into the warm-course, whose crawling bank they were planted to protect. They thus made a compact hedge, behind which Nora had sometimes stolen, thinking that it was pleasant to protract her afternoon walk under their flickering green and pearly leaves, and perhaps—for, oh thou world, it would have been so very immodest to think!—that perhaps here and there, as at the clump opposite Ernest's window, she might fittingly rest in some shadowy concealment, and now and then see, unseen, between the branches, that noble face which looked out on the West—that face so dearly intermixing with all her day life and dreams.

To-day, alas! no maidenly reserve was needed in approaching this spot. No deep and musing eye was there to glance attracted to her hiding-place by any motion of hers. There would be no fair, brave, unconscious face there to welcome her again. He was gone—gone! Oh! who but God could tell whither?

As Nora thought of this, and the sense of her utter loneliness came upon her like a faintness at the heart, she made the place that had been once her dreaming nook by the hour her oratory now; and, kneeling down by the willows opposite to Ernest's window, cried out in the bitterness of her soul,

"O God! O God! why must he be gone, and under this dreadful shadow? Let me see him again, and make as noble as he is! Or— Oh! I can not ask thee to let me see him dead, even if, being alive, he must be sullied. But no, no, no! he is not dead—he will be, aught but the glorious soul he ever was to me. Oh, my God, spare this suspense to me—spare it, and let me behold once more my adored one—my pure—my glorious—my beloved—"

A foot crushed under it a dead osier, somewhere down the willow range, evidently from the sound, not many yards off. There was a noise of breaking boughs, as if some one who had crossed the stream were penetrating the barrier of branches from the water-side. Nora sprang to her feet, back her fist, and listened, with alarm on her face, and her head erect like a startled fawn. She waited for some time, but neither seeing any thing, nor hearing any repetition of the noise, concluded her fears fanciful, and ascribed them to a falling branch or something kindred.

She had just thrown herself down upon the grass again, with the former abandonment, when the noise was heard again, and the true cause for her alarm presented itself. Steering along the edge of the willows, with a meek downcastness, came Mr. Luke Green, his arms crossed before him, his eyes fixed upon the ground, and, to all appearance, buried in deep thought. Before Nora could recover from her surprise he had reached her, and seemed going past. Then he paused, looked up, and, with the most admirable imitation of having come upon her accidentally, coughed, appeared embarrassed at his intrusion, and said, gently,

"Really—forgive me, Miss Manton! The loneliness of the land of this place has so fascinated us both, that I may be pardoned if our walks intersect—to say nothing," added Mr. Luke Green, in a somewhat more quiet even than usual, "of another loveliness which might have been drawn my man of fine taste hither, had he been aware of the means, to know it was here."

And the superintendent cast at Nora such a glance as is interchanged between the boys' and girls' galleries, during a long sermon, in a village church between boarding-schools.

"As you had no means of knowing I was here, Mr. Green, five taste must be an instinct with you," said Nora, to flatter your taste, I think. Pray use all the stock of flattery you have upon that."

And Nora, conscious that her color was mounting with the sense of contempt and displeasure, began to pass Luke Green with these words, which were spoken in the tone of womanly firmness, but without a suspicion of pique.

"I have not the honor of knowing what sweet Miss Manton by the sincere offering of a feeling I hold in common with all who know her? How unfortunate it is, then, that the result of her failure — her own childhood's friend—one who has a good deal of both deeply—yes, deeply—at all—at his heart, and he is quite cast out of favor for an over-anxiety, a slight tenderness in the expression of his affection! Will you not forgive me, as you used to if I teased you when a little child?"

And Luke Green unostentatiously, yet effectually, put himself in her way, so that she could not escape without more energy in her manner than the exigency of the case seemed to call for.

"Mr. Green," spoke Nora, her voice trembling just perceptibly with dislike and anxiety, "you will not have offended me — at any rate, I shall not remember it—if you will not talk to me in compliments any more. If you feel friendly to me, and you say you do, whenever we happen to meet I wish you would show it by making the language

"DO YOU KNOW THAT HANDWRITING?"

you address to me as plain as if you were talking to one of your customers at the Bank."

"Oh, my dear little friend, think how unjudgeful that would be! I sometimes tell them to clear out, sometimes refuse their requests flatly, and never, never speak to them as if I had known them for years, like a certain young lady."

"Yes, you have known me for years; that is very true. And I think I have a right to hope that every year you will respect me more. I am not a child, Mr. Green — not any longer, though when you came to Cheswick I was one. You seem to forget this. Please to remember it. I really must bid you good-afternoon, as it came to this place without bringing any companion by preference."

Again she tried to pass him, looking and bowing her desire to do so very clearly. But Luke Green put out his hand—not rudely, but persuasively, and in a most pleading manner.

"Please listen to me, Miss Manton. It will not harm you to give five minutes of your time to a man who has watched your growth up to womanhood with sleepless anxiety—with more than parental interest. You ask me to speak plainly. Hear me just the little time I ask, and I will speak so."

Nora folded her hands, put herself into a listening attitude, and bowed, granting his request.

Luke Green continued: "I am glad that I chanced upon you this afternoon, for the sake of this very plain speaking. There is something very sweet in the thought of being permitted to speak plainly to the young lady, in all I did to my little playmate Nora in her childhood. As I said, he watched your womanly budding and blossoming; what my poor efforts could do they have done to aid in smoothing your pathway up to womanhood, I will not say. I would—God in Heaven—that I could surround you with such a hedge of tender care that nothing hurtful or fearful should ever cross your path so long as you live. But as I look on your poor old father, oh, oh!"

Luke Green put his hand over his eyes to hide a very proper emotion to which his just dramatic taste assigned this as the best place; and then, feeling somewhat relieved, resumed:

"Grieve as as it does, he certainly can not lead long, he must be taken to his rest."

A shadow of great distress passed over Nora's face as he said this, which Luke Green observed and fell in with adroitly.

"Yes, and then, then I beheld you in this cruel world fatherless, motherless, and my heart breaks to think what you will do. What will you do? who will take care of you?"

In spite of her indignation at what she instinctively felt must be a willful lie, Nora made her unhappy, the lip of the young girl quivered, as yielding to the softer emotion, she replied, quietly,

"God takes care of my father and myself both —he can also take care of me hereafter."

"Miss Manton!"—and as Luke Green said this he drew nearer her and made an effort to take her hand, which she avoided without appearing to notice it—"Miss Manton! is there no one on earth who can be Heaven's aid in guarding you? Can you not put your hand confidingly into that of one who loves you, and let him be your protector—even interposing his own heart between you and ill—for all your life?"

Nora felt her cheeks all mantling with the rich red blood that as yet was not schooled to keep her woman secrets, for she did think of such a one, though she answered nothing.

"I will speak more plainly. I am that man! I am he that could shield you with his person, with his life, his honor, even were it called for! I have loved you from childhood. I love you now!"

"If you are a true friend to my father and me—if he dies, which God forbid! and we shall ever take his place in my esteem but you, Mr. Green."

"Miss Manton, let me be nearer than father to you, nearer than mother, brother, nay human friend! I will say directly what I mean—be my wife, and till you die you shall never know want unsatisfied! I am rich, I am daily growing richer; think what my place and my money will get for you; elegant house, carriage and horses, every luxury of city and country."

"Sir! dare you insult me because I am a girl and alone?"

"No, no! I do not mean that; I fear you misunderstand me."

"For your manhood's sake I hope I do, Mr. Green."

"Nora!—"

"Miss Manton, if you please, Sir; allow me to pass: it is best this conversation should cease."

"And will you not then be the wife of the man who holds you as dear as Heaven? Will you not—will you never love me?"

"Mr. Luke Green! after the insulting offer you have made to buy me, and which is but the last effort of a long series, is I believe, to make me the thing of purchase from a poor and sick-hearted old man whose only possession I am—after all this, do not dethe that holy name of love in my ears by your speaking it! Ask me at some future day, when you are ashamed of what you have said, if that day comes, not to loathe you, and perhaps I may do that. I only know what it is to love, and that is the daughter of a poor old man to make her an object of such money value, and other value you have to-day thrown yourself incapable of understanding. But if my father should die, I had rather also die and go to God and him than be obliged to pass for a moment's existence on the earth! I also speak plainly; you will hereafter understand and avoid me. I wish to part now!"

And Nora looked the impersonation of moral strength, as, standing upright in her consciousness of purity and honor, she made a queenly gesture with her white, womanly arm, her blue eyes filled with tears of sorrowful indignation but clear enough to shame down the cold, mechanic glance of Luke Green. How much stronger she may brute force did even he feel her to be as her small figure, which he could have crushed ere she could have cried, confronted him, in the wisdom and odor not of the unconscious right and might! And for a moment he recognized that as if made desperate at the sight of that growing beauty of the prize just as it was about to slip from his hands forever, he stepped nearer, and, in her saying, hastily, "I shall not go—not yet—till I say one word more. I am anxious—naturally so, with the feelings I have cherished toward you—to avert a great calamity from you. Mr. Manton may do something worse than die. Something that might be a great deal harder than death both for him and you, may happen." Luke Green said this with a terrible coolness which might have appalled many a man, and the young, tender woman upon whom he had fixed his eye ere she uttered these had shrunk deliberately, and without a trace of human passion, grew deathly white, and her face was blank with a strange look of puzzle.

"What do you mean?' she said, faintly; "what do you mean?"

"Do you fear that handwriting?" And he held up for her inspection a note of hand for three hundred dollars, signed by John Manton.

"Oh!" said Nora. She uttered this exclamation in a tone that expressed mingled relief and surprise, relief, because if that was all it was not as dreadful as the suspense produced by Luke Green's mysterious manner; pain, because that note was still another item of the awful obligation to the superintendent, and one she had not known till now.

"I do know the handwriting," said Nora, commanding herself; "and if I do not blush to see it, it is because the feeling that I bear to myself no longer, gives no place to shame for the loved and unfortunate father whom you have insulted."

"I insnared? I? Now, really, if it were not such a very solemn and painful subject, I should be inclined to be amused. No; I will not permit myself to speak playfully—my heart aches too much to do that—I will not be profane to my own better nature. My dear young lady, let me speak plainly to you again. I am not skilled in wooing women, and if I seemed rude to you before, I pray forgive me. Let me tell you that your dear father has not been insnared by me. Could you hear this note tell its own story it would say nothing of having been taken compulsorily from Mr. Manton. I pressed no loan on him to which it is a witness. Hark!—and Luke Green listened. "I thought I heard a splash. Oh, it was nothing!" he said, as he looked down the willows upon the brook, and saw it lonely as before. He continued:

"I never even asked it of your father as acknowledgment of an indebtedness incurred by him before. No! It is but one of ten just like it. See, here they are!" and Luke Green took a bundle of papers from his pocket, folded and filed, and drew his finger over them rapidly. On each of them he had indorsed, "Mr. Manton's note for $300," of various dates!

Nora's heart choked her so that she could not speak. She passed her hand over her brow, as if to recall herself and brush away a web that seemed settling over her eyes. And Luke Green went on:

"Shall I tell you the painful history of those papers? I hardly know whether it is best or not, loving you as I do."

"Go on, Mr. Green," said Nora, in a tone of such terrible calmness as equaled her subsequent's in his most governed moments, and now even startled him hearing it in her.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHY should any one afflicted with defective legs turn clergyman?—Because he would cease to be a layman dame nature.

A DRIVE'S THOUGHT ABOUT WOMEN.—It matters very little how ugly she may be, a woman never sees a pretty one excepting in the looking-glass.—Our own Bachelordom.

ADVICE TO GAS MONOPOLISTS.—"Gentlemen, Flare up, or you may burn your fingers!"

QUITE OUT OF THE QUESTION.
As befits a Knight companion
Of the Garter Blue and Red,
The Nigdens of his Uncle
Casts longer eyes upon his Nice.

But if this close attachment
To a tie so dear he owns,
Let him beware lest Europa
Invoke the Holy Lamas.

The Imperial Idea
All must desire to please,
But Nice is neither Roman
Nor "Prohibited degrees."

SIMPLE, BUT AGRICULTURAL.—Q. What is the best time for sowing tenter-hooks?—When the landlord goes round and collects his rents.

ADVICE TO BACHELORS.—Tell cold pudding to settle your love; but don't do any thing which will induce you to settle your money.

ADVICE.—"Friend! Imitate the example of the railway engine. He is the most indefatigable runningcan keep up for hours at the rate of forty, and even sixty miles an hour—and yet he never tires all the while, and yet he never takes any thing but water when he wants to set his whistle!"

Elderly unmarried ladies are considered by some persons the least sensible of all kinds of sensible animals.

"You seem to walk more erect than usual, my friend." "Why, I have been encouraged by circumstances."

"Can't we make your lover jealous, Miss?"—"Oh, yes, Sir, I think we can, if we get an Adonis together."

Shrewd inquiries are being made whether the cup of sorrow has a saucer.

An Irish paper advertises, "Wanted, an able-bodied man as a sewer-cleaner."

We know a poor fellow who takes the palm in all his quarrels with his wife. She slaps his face.

A lady, playfully condemning the wearing of mustaches, declared, "It is one of the fashions I set my face against."

One person abusing another in the presence of Church-ill, the poet, said, "He was extremely outraged, that if you said a good thing he could not understand it."—"Yes, Sir," said Church-ill, "he is very far gone."

"Good-morning, Patrick," said a gentleman to his Irish laborer. "Slippery this morning."—"Slippery!—why, yer honor, it's as dhry as a bone!"—Upon my word, and I did down three times without getting up once!

A Gascon officer, demanding his salary from the Minister of War, declared that he was in danger of dying with hunger. The Minister, who was disposed to be facetious and ruddy, told him that his face contradicted his statement. "Ah, my lord," said the brave, "that is true; this face is not mine, it belongs to my landlord, who has given me credit for a long time."

A new form of electro-biology has been evoked in Paris—all who choose are sent to sleep with a tobacco-pipe instead of a watch. The experimentalist of a Paris soirée is to produce an attack of Agoustinus, as it is termed, and pour down through their dimmished in their hands, and men armed with all the silver spoons they can lay hold of. The most extraordinary tales are told of the accidents brought about; and in one corner you are informed that a lady has thrown soup into the by looking at Madame V——'s diamond hair-comb; and in another, you catch the words, "Monsieur, if Baron Y——'s inquest produced by too steady contemplation of a well-polished carving-knife, and of which nothing in the world can cure him now.

TRANSPLANTED FOR LIFE.—The man who marries happily.

GREAT SOCIAL QUESTIONS.—Which is the right side of twenty? What do you mean by twenty? Is it twenty one the wrong side of? Should you call twenty-nine the wrong side of it? Is it the wrong side of thirty? Is it forty any right side at all nearer than some figure under thirty? If there is a right side of twenty is it not that which is the nearer to threescore and ten?

THE SERVANT'S SERIAL.—A lady, on hiring a servant girl, gave to country, told her, among other information, that she should have the liberty of attending church every Sunday, but that she would be expected to return home always immediately on the conclusion of service. The lady, however, found a good deal of difficulty in making this apparently reasonable arrangement. "No, ma," said the lass, "I cannot do that, for I wishes to the crack conversation o' the kirk-yard for a the service."—Dean Ramsay's Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character.

A WORD IN THE SWELL VOCABULARY.—A young gentleman in an office at Somerset House was highly delighted by reading, in the report of the coronation correspondent of the Morning Post, the statement that the Swell corps, commanding their several sections, would have to be mounted "by the labor of the fellahs of Egypt." "By Jove!" he exclaimed, "how delicious the Morning Post is a deserved cleva fellah! Know how to spell fellah. Those other fellahs should clever fellahs too—those parasitic fellahs—spell fellah some way. Shall always spell it in a proper manner. With all my heart, I have a fee to-day had to be executed by the labor of those Egyptian fellahs."

ALLITERATIONS.—The following stanza is more curious than cogent:

Weird women wily watching, wet Wednesday wanes away,
Dim darkness dispersing, down darts distinct day,
The traveling tinker to town trips along,
The tippling tailor to tipple is tempted so strong.

Things bought at "great bargains" are mostly parted with afterward at "a tremendous sacrifice."

A man in battle is not allowed to whittle to keep his courage up, and the reason is obvious—he doesn't have that tendency.

She that marries a man because he is "a good match" must not be surprised if he turns out a "Lucifer."

It is said that the Tartars invite a man to drink by gently pulling his ear. A good many of our people will "take a pull" without waiting to have their ears pulled.

A reliable swell declares that he lately danced one evening with three young ladies, the united circumference of whose dresses amounted to a hundred yards.

An old toper chanced to drink a glass of water one day for want of something stronger. Smacking his lips and turning to one of his companions, he remarked, "Why, it don't taste badly. I have no doubt 'tis whole sense for females and tender children!"

IT'S A BAD RULE THAT DOESN'T WORK BOTH WAYS.

SWELL. "I want you to measure me for a vest, please."
TAILOR. "Can you possibly yourself. We do not make here but the robes of ladies."

SWELL. "Y-a-as, I know; I know; that's what's a man to do? The women are all getting their things made by tailors, and there's no getting any thing done."

A gentleman replied to a female vagrant who accosted him that he never gave to beggars in the street. "If I knew where your home lived," quietly responded the woman, "I'd be after calling at your house, and then I shouldn't trouble you with your arrangements." An accommodating beggar that.

A SOLDIER'S JOKE.—An ex dit from the camp of Aldershott states that Colonel Dare——, who is a rigid disciplinarian, lately issued an order that the men's hair should be cut short; next morning, on parade, he pointed out four fellows whose hair had not been cut close enough, and on the following day called the same men to the front, when a titter ran through the company, which soon broke into a threefold laugh. On the men being directed to take off their caps they presented their hairs shaved, leaving their hair as close as if their heads had been shaved. The gallant colonel good-humorredly joined in the laugh, but afterward said he should not like strangers to be laughing at them, and then ordered the four men to be confined to their barracks for six weeks, when it might be supposed their hair would be grown sufficiently for them to appear in public. The men little anticipated such an end to their joking.

Major E—— had a servant whose simplicity was almost incredible. One day the Major told him to deny him to all visitors, he carried out the order to the exclusion of the Major's most intimate friends. Determined, then, by a master that he was always at home to his brother, John was told to answer the door, and on that virtue his brother next called he was immediately shown in; but after waiting till an hour alone he summoned John to know the reason of the Major's non-appearance. The literal servant told him that he had the Major under bed, gone out to dinner, but that the general order was, "Always denied to the Major." In the next occasion John received still more explicit orders, and if the Major's brother should call he was to say that he had died that Major E—— was in the general's to dinner. The Major, however, fearful of again making a mistake, rushed into the dining-room of his own office, where his master sat at table at the general's, and, in an anxious voice, exclaimed, "Major, what am I to say if your brother does not call at all?"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine

Premature Loss of the Hair,

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and it has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth.

It is unrivaled as a dressing for the hair, by single application rendering it soft and glossy for several days.

The following is conclusive of its efficacy in the cure of Dandruff.

BOSTON, Oct. 10, 1859.

Gentlemen,—I have used your Cocoaine about six weeks, and its effect is so marked and extraordinary that I feel it my duty to write to you.

My worst complaint for several years has been Dandruff, with itching and irritation of the scalp, accompanied by hair, in my cost-collar would be covered with the white scales, (dandruff,) which looked like a shower of snow. My barber tried various applications without effect. Since I got your Cocoaine, and his obstinate refusal to use it, provoked me to procure and try it. I have used less than a bottle—the dandruff, and the irritation which caused it, have entirely disappeared, and my hair was never before in so good condition.

Your obedient servant,

A. A. FULLER.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by dealers, generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

Public Speakers and Vocalists.

A NOTED CHEROKEE and public lecturer says of BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES: "In all my lecturing tours, I put Troches into my carpet bag as regularly as I do my clothes, and I find them indispensable to clear, ringy tones, and all others who exercise the voice, should never fail of using these Troches. They surpass all other preparations in clearing and strengthening the voice, removing hoarseness, and relieving all the throat, and as a cough remedy are pre-eminently the best.—Free Will.

Coleman's Eutaw House,

Baltimore.

This popular House has been thoroughly renovated, and opened by ROBERT B. COLEMAN, late of the Astor House and St. Nicholas Hotels, and offers superior accommodations to families and travelers.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

ALL ON THE NEW STYLE.

Designed for all manufacturing purposes.

Noiseless in its operation, very rapid, and capable of every kind of work, it is the best machine ever produced.

Price only $110.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway.

LABOR-SAVING ARTICLE.

P. A. Cannon's Patent Rotary Clothes Dryer and Polishing Iron.

Having a Roller, By the aid of which, a one Saint Dash is produced on all Linen, with half the Labor and half the time.

For sale by P. CANNON,
W. A. CONNELLY, Agent, 376 Broadway.

Just Published in the Boston Bee, and the

"This much is true: Dr. Halsted has had great success in his practice, and his institution is widely resorted to."—Address Round Hill Water Cure, Northampton, Mass.

Barney's Opera Perfume.

DEDICATED TO MLLE. ADELINA PATTI.

A new and elegant PERFUME, exhaling the most delightful and exquisite odors; as truly fascinating as the beautiful photographic likeness which adorns each bottle.

Wholesale by J. W. DISCOMBE & CO., 21 Fulton Street. Retailed by all Druggists and Fancy Good Dealers.

Courrier des Etats Unis,

The only Daily Newspaper exclusively devoted to the French Language in the United States, established in 1828; $8 per year. WEEKLY EDITION, $4 per year (20 pages quarto every Saturday). General News, Miscellany, and Literature, most carefully selected. No better opportunity for French merchants and scholars. Office, No. 73 Franklin Street, New York.

The Readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY

Can have purchased and forwarded to them, with dispatch, any Article this City affords, by sending their Orders addressed to WM. B. WYSE, Office HARPER'S WEEKLY.

N. B.—Orders from Ladies will receive the attention of MRS. W., if required.

Admirable in Quality.

In Price Wonderfully Cheap.

12 CENTS	THE	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	THE	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	THE SHILLING	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	SHILLING	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	SHILLING	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	HAIR TONIC, BENZINE,	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	HAIR TONIC, BENZINE,	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	HAIR TONIC, BENZINE,	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	INDELIBLE INK.	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	INDELIBLE INK.	TRY THEM
12 CENTS	INDELIBLE INK.	TRY THEM

Sold by 3000 Druggists at Retail.

Wholesale only at 159 Water Street.

Attractive NEW BOOKS.

WOMAN (La Femme). By Michelet.....$1 00
LOVE (L'Amour). By Michelet.....1 00
THE HABITS OF GOOD SOCIETY.....1 25
THE GREAT TRIBULATION. 2 vols.....2 00

 Sold by all booksellers, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers, 130 Grand Street, New York.

☞ LONDON CLUB SAUCE.—This Sauce, celebrated throughout Europe, and warmly recommended by the most talented epicures, whose lives possesses an unrivaled richness and delicacy of taste, imparts a relish unsurpassed by all other sauces; and to side-dishes. Its flavor is most agreeable; and no one accustomed to its use would care to sit at a table loaded with the richest viands without it. It is superior to the Worcestershire Sauce, and is sold at one half the price.

It is an excellent promoter of digestion, and is recommended by the most eminent medical faculty in England as dyspepsia, etc.

The "London Club Sauce" is prepared by PARKER BROS., LONDON, and sold by A. J. PARKER, No. 15 Bookman Square, (Astor House,) New York.

None genuine that is without the fac simile of "PARKER BROS., LONDON," pasted over the neck and cork of every bottle.

"Trefelio!" "Trefelio!"

The Secret of Beauty.

We are positive that a single Bottle of the elegant French Floral Extract — "Trefelio" — will convince the most skeptical of its super-excellent qualities as a Restoring and Beautifying medium. Try it.

MARSH, HILDRAM & CO., and all Druggists.

Wholesale, LAZELL, MARSH & GARDINER, 19 Gold Street.

LE BON TON is the best LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen copies, with a list of premiums, will be sent gratis.
S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 407 Broadway, N. Y.

Important Change! Interesting!

THAT REMEDY—the only one that ever yet cured CATARRH and its kindred complaints—Hunckel's Catarrh, thereby averted Consumption, is again placed upon sale at 376 Broadway, G. Q. COLTON, 37 Park Row, New York. P. O. Box 3391.

PURE WATER.

United States Carbon Filter Company.

CARBON FILTERS are the only perfect purifiers, adapted to the Hydrant in Dwelling Houses, Factories, Hotels, &c. Depot of Portable Filters, Mansion House, for Sportsmen, Travellers, Druggists, &c., &c.

164 Broadway, N. Y.

American Guano,

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

in Guano. This Guano from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale and retail at less than two thirds the price of Peruvian. For particulars address C. B. MARSHALL, Pres. American Guano Co., 66 William Street, New York.

Guano and Rheumatism.

Neuralgia, &c.

Blair's Remedy, from 229 Strand, London.

Used in England over thirty years, and has been long and well tested in this country with great success. A sure, safe, and speedy remedy, worthy the confidence of all sufferers. Sold by Druggists, 244 Broadway, 84 Cornhill, Boston, Importers and Agents. Forwarded by mail on receipt of $1 10.

COURT OF DEATH.

For One Dollar and 4 postage stamps, the subscriber will forward (post-paid) one engraving of this sublime painting. Address G. Q. COLTON, 37 Park Row, New York. P. O. Box 3391.

Second Edition of Miss Pardoe's new Work.

W. I. Pooley & Co.,
Harper's Building, Franklin Square, New York,
Just Publish,
From the Author's Advance Proof-Sheets,

A LIFE STRUGGLE.

By MISS PARDOE,
Author of "Louis XIVth" and "Adopted Heir."
One vol. 12mo. Price $1 25.

Read the following Notices:

"As an author of diction, Miss Pardoe has never done anything better than this work."—Globe.

"We place this tale in the highest rank."—John Bull.

"A tale of great power."—Times.

"Miss Pardoe has deserved favorite."—Cresset, N. O.

"Considerable skill is displayed in constructing the plot of this novel."—Delta, N. O.

"Miss Pardoe has already acquired a fair reputation as a novelist, and this new candidate for favor will add thereto."—Advertiser, Portland, Me.

"It will no doubt find many readers, as it displays considerable ingenuity and skill in the portrayal of its characters."—Boston Post.

"Miss Pardoe, it is well known, ranks high, both as a novelist and historian."—Evening Journal, Phila.

"The many admirers of this popular writer will rejoice to welcome this story."—American, Baltimore.

"Miss Pardoe's delineation of character is excellent. This is one of the best of the writer's stories."—Evening Lin, Columbia, S. C.

"A Life Struggle is an excellent story; and even in the opening pages it is easy to recognize Miss Pardoe's finished style."—Gazette, Boston.

"A new work from the talented pen of the author of 'Louis XIV' is always a treat, but next with a great deal of [Spirit of the Times, N. Y.

"If the popular demand is a test of excellence, Miss Pardoe is one of the best of modern novelists."—Dispatch, Memphis, Tenn.

For sale by all Booksellers.

☞ Sent free of postage on receipt of price.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 70 to 80 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

NUMBER CXIX.] CONTENTS. [APRIL, 1860.

ARTIST LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Highlands of New Jersey.—On the Road.—Upper Falls, Clinton.—Lower Falls, Clinton.—Hank.—Dog-Trotters.—Showering.—Dripping.—Green Pond.—The King of the Polypi.—Sunset and Starlight's Forge.—Entrances to Hibernia Mine.—Interior of the Mine.—Mouth of Adit, Sterne's Mine.—Interior of Adit.—Surface Works, Byram Mine.—Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties.—Diagram of Byram Mine.—Pushing Ore Car.—Gallery in Byram Mine.—Surface Works, Dickerson Mine.—Offsets.—Driving a Breast.—Turn-Table.

HOW WE GET GOLD IN CALIFORNIA.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Camp on the Stanislaus.—The First Gold-Washer.—Panning.—Winnowing Gold.—Cradle-Rocking.—Washing with Long Tom.—River Operations, Murderers' Bar.—How's Diggins?—Packing Earth.—Quicksilver Machine.—Tunnel Mining.—Frenzied Mill.—Helvetia Quartz Mill.—El Santee.—Long Bench Mining.—Gold Sluicing.—Tunneling.—Interior of Tunnel.—Hydraulic Mining.—A Flume.

THE FIGHT AT LEXINGTON. By THOMAS DUNN ENGLISH.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Fight at Lexington.—Battle-Ground at Concord.

CAPTAIN TOM: A RESURRECTION. By CHARLES NORDHOFF.

KATHIE MORRIS. By T. B. ALDRICH.
ILLUSTRATION.—Kathie Morris.

THE ALEXANDRIANS.

YE'S CHRISTMAS BOOK.

D——'S REMARKABLE EXPERIENCES.

THE LITTLE ART-STUDENT.

AN ICY TALE.

ON TWO CHILDREN IN BLACK. By W. M. THACKERAY.

ORIANA INN: A DISPUTED POSSESSION.

THE LOST STEAMSHIP. By FITZ-JAMES O'BRIEN.

LOVEL THE WIDOWER. By W. M. THACKERAY.
CHAPTER III.—In which I Play the Spy.
ILLUSTRATION.—The Omnibus.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

MASTER CHARLEY'S FIRST PANTALOONS.
ILLUSTRATION.—The New Garments.—Cook's Admiration.—At Night.—In the Street.—Appearance of Pockets.—Discovery of Pockets.—Vanity.—A Full.—Consequence.—Degraded to Frocks.

THE FIGHTING 7TH.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Spring Pardesus.—Home Dress.—Modelling Reviews.—Last Tailor-Sleeve.

One Number after the present will complete the Tenth Year, during which HARPER'S MAGAZINE has made its monthly visits to the American public. The success of all this period has convinced the Publishers that the periodical was established upon sound principles. While other publications, which aimed at local and ephemeral objects have had only a brief and struggling existence, HARPER'S MAGAZINE has never lost the favor which it gained at the outset. Policy and Principle both compel the Publishers to pursue the unchanged the general character of the Magazine as a national work, the organ of no party in politics or sect in religion. Contributions will, as heretofore, be welcomed from every quarter; and while the Publishers hold themselves in no way responsible for the private views of their Contributors, they will continue to exercise the same watchful care that nothing shall find place in the Magazine which shall render it an unwelcome visitor in any household.

The general favor which the Magazine has received has not induced the Publishers to remit their exertions. Each successive Volume has been prepared with more labor and at a greater expense than its predecessor. To the Press and the Public, who have so generously appreciated and so liberally rewarded their exertions, they again present their warmest acknowledgments. No Number of the Magazine has met with more general approval than that for the last month. Almost every article contained in it has been made the subject of special commendation.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year . . . . . $ 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Established in 1834.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,
Manufacturer of the Over-strung
GRAND & SQUARE PIANO-FORTES
Manufactory and Warerooms
75 to 85
East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five Years, and Prices are moderate.

At Walker's Warerooms,
Clinton Hall, near Broadway,
A Large Stock of Pianos of every description for sale and hire.

PIANO FORTE MUSIC.
$50 WORTH OF VOCAL FOR $2!
$50 WORTH of INSTRUMENTAL for $2 !!

THE ROSE CIRCLE. A collection of Marches, Waltzes, Polkas, Schottisches, Redowas, Quadrilles, Contra Dances, &c. Arranged for the Piano Forte. Price, $1 25; in cloth, $2.

THE SHOWER OF PEARLS. A collection of the most beautiful Duets, arranged for the Piano Forte. In cloth, $2.

Copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price. Published by DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $90.
HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED.
SOUTH & NORTH;
OR,
Impressions Received During a Trip to Cuba and the South.
BY
JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.
1 Vol. 12mo. 352 pages.....Price $1 00
CONTENTS.
I.—The Voyage. II.—Tropical Seas. III.—Cuba.—The Coolies. IV.—The Slave's Cabin and the Freeman's Cottage. V.—Developments. Social, Philosophical, and Political. VI.—The River, the People, the Homes. VII.—Energy of the Blacks, and Slavery of the Whites. VIII.—Insurrection: Its Means and Prevention. IX.—The Remedy for Slavery; Its Simplicity and Safety. X.—The Motive Power of Wages. XI.—The Importunate Intermeddling of the North. XII.—Southern Agression; A Northern View. XIII.—Slavery; Its Philosophy and Its Fruits. XIV.—Dissolution of the Union.

FOR SALE BY ALL BOOKSELLERS.
The Trade will find it for their interest to send their orders direct to ABBEY & ABBOTT,
No. 108 Nassau Street, New York.

HARD TIMES NO MORE—Any Lady or Gentleman in the United States possessing from $3 to $7 can enter into an easy and respectable business by which from $10 to $20 per day can be realized. For particulars, address (with stamp)
W. A. ACTON & CO.,
41 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia.

Roman Eye Balsam,
For Weak and Inflamed Eyes.

This Balsam is the most certain remedy ever yet used for inflamed eyelids. It almost instantly relieves all irritation, and usually effects a complete cure after a few applications. For sale by
A. B. & D. SANDS, 100 Fulton Street.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES cannot be produced by the use of Phalon's celebrated BEARD OIL, which will force them to grow six weeks sooner than any other preparation, it will not stain the skin. Price $1. Sent by mail, post free, to any address. R. G. GALHAM, 189 Nassau Street, New York.

TWO WORKS, VALUABLE TO THE SICK OR WELL, sent by mail, no pay expected until received. Address as above, Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

DR. SIX focuses on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female Complaints. On the mode of preserving Health to 100 years. 300 pages, 32 engravings. Price fifty cents, in stamps or Postoffice address.

DR. 24 Work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Pain, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what to prevent it; with Symptoms, Causes, Prices of 36 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, State, county, town, and postoffice.

SECRET ART OF CATCHING FISH as fast as you can pull them out, and no hooking. Sent for 25 cents. Address as above, DR. SIX.

GREAT CURIOSITY Particulars sent free. Agents wanted. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOTH SEXES, Married or Single, in health or disease.—MEDICAL ADVISER AND MARRIAGE GUIDE, 30th edition, over 400 pages, 12mo. cloth, and above 150 Electrotype Engravings. Price $1. By a celebrated Paris and London Physician and Surgeon, now of New York City. This interesting book should be in the hands of every adult person, as it imparts knowledge all have sought for in vain in any other. Sold by A. G. LAWRENCE, No. 1 Vesey Street, Astor House.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the normal habits of female life superinduce a variety of diseases which this Catholicon will counteract and cure. It can be relied upon in any case of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, Ulceration of the Womb, Fainness, Lassitude, &c. When every thing else has failed, this article is never taken without benefit. No suffering female should leave it unrelied. A pamphlet, with full symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent (gratis) by mail, or delivered by any Agent. It is sold in every town, or sent by express. Accounts for an imitation, somewhat similar in name, with no certificates attached, &c. Address BARNES & PARK, No. 13 Park Row, N. Y.; D. PAUL CHOUTEAU or Chicago; WEEKS & POTTER, Boston; or GALLENDER & CO., Philadelphia.
DR. MARCHISI, M.D., Cons. N. Y.

Harden's Express.
—DAILY—
Forwards Valuables and Merchandise to and from, and collects drafts, bills, &c., in all parts of the EAST, WEST AND SOUTH.
Will receive goods, or orders to "call," at
74 Broadway.

BEAUTIFUL BALLADS.
By the favorite composer, J. R. THOMAS.
BEAUTIFUL CLOUD.
'TIS THE LAST OF THEE NO MORE.
MERRILY ROW (Barcarole).
Published by WM. HALL & SON, N. Y.

STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS,
OF ILLINOIS,
AND
ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS,
OF GEORGIA.

For an admirable sketch of two of the most prominent men in the country, read

REV. WM. H. MILBURN'S
"The blind man eloquent."
TEN YEARS OF PREACHER LIFE.
Price $1 00.
For sale by all booksellers.
DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers, New York.

1000 Agents Wanted,
To Canvass for Subscribers for Cassell's Illustrated Family Bible
AND
Cassell's Popular Natural History
Two of the most magnificent, and, at the same time, the cheapest works ever produced. Splendid income are to be made by setting as Canvassing Agents. Send a 3 cent stamp for Terms to CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,
37 Park Row, N. Y.

Marbleized Slate Mantles.
THE CASTLETON SLATE CO., 409 Broadway, N. Y.
Mantles, Table Tops, Bureau Tops, Shelves, &c., Billiard Beds, Black Boards, Tile Slate, Sinks, Wash Tubs, &c.
Send for Card of Designs and prices.

Throat and Lung Diseases.
Of all remedies for Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Influenza, Croup, Whooping Cough, Asthma, Phthisic, Quinsy, Tickling, Irritation, or Inflammation of the Throat or Lungs, Chest, or Lungs, Incipient Consumption, &c., there is no one which, for safety and efficacy, or which affords such rapid and permanent relief, as the well-known and long-established
Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.
The only genuine is prepared by SETH W. FOWLE & CO., BOSTON, and is sold everywhere.

THE GREAT SECRET OF BEAUTY!—Send for Pamphlet, containing Receipt for rough skin, tan, and freckles. Full recipe for preparing this Invaluable Wash, sent by mail, post-paid, for 25 cts. Address ORLANDO S. HOWARD, Syracuse, N. Y.

☞ 5000 AGENTS WANTED. "TO sell 4 new inventions. Agents have made over $25,000 each with one of them. Also 3 similar agencies. Send four stamps and get 50 pages particulars, gratis.
FOLLETT, RICHARDSON & HOWER, Worcester, Mass.

Quern's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly
The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, is taken without nausea.
ALSO,
Quern's Patent Distilled Castor-Oil.—The greasy sensation of the oil is obviated, and it does not cause any constipation. It is the best Cathartic ever offered. To be had at the Inventor's Office, No. 125 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. FENTOLLO A. QUERN, 125 Fourth Avenue, New York.

COUNTY AGENTS WANTED.
$50 a month, and all expenses paid, to introduce our NEW NATIONAL DOUBLE THREAD $20 SEWING MACHINE. The cheapest and the best. For complete instructions and a permanent business, address, with stamp, J. W. HARRIS & CO., Shoe and Leather Exchange, Boston Mass.

HOW TO LIVE.
IT SAVING AND WASTING; or, DOMESTIC ECONOMY Exemplified by the Life of Two Families of Opposite Character, Habits, and Practices, in a pleasant tale of real life, full of
USEFUL LESSONS IN HOUSEKEEPING,
HOW TO LIVE. HOW TO HAVE.
HOW TO GAIN. HOW TO BE HAPPY.
Including the story of the Needlewoman who supported herself and four children on
A DIME A DAY.
No man, woman or child can read this book without being interested in its pleasant narrative and exposition of human character, and instructed in its lessons of economy in things that pertain to every-day life in every family.
Price, post-paid, 87 cents. FOWLER & WELLS,
308 Broadway, New York.

CARD.

A. & G. A. ARNOUX, so long and reputably known as Fashionable Tailors, beg to announces to the public that they have added a department for Boys' Clothing to their establishment, in which all the finest and newest styles of goods will be kept. They will enable our customers to obtain all the goods they may be in need of for themselves and the male part of their families at our house.

Of our Men's Furnishing Department it is unnecessary for us to say any thing, as it already has the name of having the best goods, and best styles of goods, to be found in the city.

521 Broadway, under St. Nicholas.

MR. McCUNE, formerly of Genin's Bazaar, will be happy to see his friends at his new location, to which not only he, but Mr. Ireleton, the Superintendent there of the Boys' work have removed.

!! SOMETHING NEW !!

A SEWING MACHINE, EMBROIDERER, BINDER, AND GUAGE COMBINED, is at present, simple, running, any width and thickness of cloth either side, applied to any Sewing Machine by any one in a few minutes. Initial price $5. LIBERAL DISCOUNT TO THE TRADE. Orders by mail supplied (with complete instructions), postage paid. Send for a circular.
UNIVERSAL HEMMER CO.,
429 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE ORANGE BLOSSOM WEDDING ENVELOPE, just issued, very beautiful (copyright secured), at EVERETT'S Wedding Card Depot, No. 302 Broadway, corner Worth Street. Also, Bridal Cards.

Winant's Excelsior Billiard Tables.
Manufactory 71 Gold Street, N. Y.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR
GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.
PENFOLD, PARKER & PALMER,
Wholesale Druggists,
15 Beekman Street, New York.

To Wholesale Dealers in Jewelry.
The undersigned begs to say that, owing to his unsurpassed position, he is able to offer to the Trade Jewelry of any description on better terms than any other house in New York.
All orders will receive the most careful and prompt attention.
W. A. HAYWARD,
389 Broadway.

Important Invention for married people. For particulars address, inclosing stamp, Dr. H. HIBSH-FIELD, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 438 Broadway, N. Y.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.
D. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

"A Great, Sound, and Solid Work."

NOW READY.
A New and Revised Edition of Curtis's History
OF THE CONSTITUTION.
2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $4 00; Sheep extra, $4 75; Law Sheep, $5 50; Half Calf, $6 00.

History of the Origin, Formation, and Adoption of the Constitution of the United States.
BY GEORGE T. CURTIS.
Embracing Sketches of WASHINGTON,
FRANKLIN, MADISON,
KING, RANDOLPH,
HAMILTON, JAY,
CHAS. COTESWORTH PINCKNEY,
GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.

This work, by an accomplished scholar, supplies a want which has long been acknowledged in letters in appearance, in the historical literature of the country. It is a constitutional history of the country from the commencement of the Revolution to the assembling of the Convention of 1787, showing the causes which rendered the calling of that body inevitable, and which gave the shape and coloring to its decisions; explaining the declarations of rights, and the national liberty and property secu then settled by the statesmen to whom the Revolution gave birth; and presenting a series of graphic sketches of the principal members of the Convention. The second volume is published last from the press since, and now in its third edition, embraces a full description of the formation of the plan of the Constitution, and also of the manner in which its Compromises were arranged. The plates of the entire work have been carefully revised by the author, and brought up to the latest official records, for the supply of all future editions. The place which the work occupies in American literature is too well known, both in America and in Europe, to render it necessary for the publishers to enlarge upon the peculiar claims to the attention of our statesmen, scholars, and publicists, no less than the great body of the American people.

Copies sec: by mail, free of postage, on receipt of the price. HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $4 00.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

Ye mightie Live Oak Giant devouring ye Citie of New Yorke and ye environnes thereof for his breakfaste.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Davis Collamore & Co.,
Have removed their Stock of
China, Glass, &c.,
To No. 479 Broadway, New York.
(between Grand and Broome Sts.).

We invite the Public to examine the quality and styles of our goods, comparing the prices, which are

Low for Cash.
One Price—No Deviation.

IRON-AMALGAM BELLS.

Churches, Schools, Academies and Fire-Alarm Bells at following prices: 800 lbs. Bell, $160; 200 lbs., $50; 300 lbs., $78; 100 lbs. down to 50 lbs. sizes, from $30 to $5, each including Yoke, Standard, Crank, or Wheel ready for use, and warranted for 12 months. Delivered to Transportation Co. upon receipt of price.

M. C. CHAPMAN & CO., 11 Spruce Street, N. Y.

White's Trusses. WHITE'S PATENT LEVER TRUSS AND SUPPORTER White's Trusses.

HERNIA AND UTERINE DISEASES CURED.

This new Truss and Supporter surpasses all other instruments of the kind ever made. The bow or hoop is not a rigid spring, causing injury to the back and spine, but is soft and pliant, and may be shaped to the size and form of the wearer. The power or pressure is obtained by a spring which yields readily to the motions of the body, and is adjusted by a screw to any desired amount of force. Its motion is a lifting, embracing one; not a dead weight, with a constant, uniform, and painful pressure. Amount of pressure is less than one-half required by any other truss, with a certainty of cure. The Female Supporter is a light, cool, and convenient instrument, constructed upon the same principle, and can be worn without trouble or pain.

It is, in fact, the only principle upon which a perfect Supporter can be constructed. The combined *upward, upon*ward, and yielding motion of this device develops a principle which has long been sought for and now first applied. They are not increased in expense, but cheap and durable. It is a Lasting Cure when properly applied and worn.

An illustrated pamphlet sent free to any one by addressing HARVEY & PARK, General Agents, Nos. 10 and 12 Park Row, New York.

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices.
Made to Measure at $15 per doz. or Six for $9.
MADE OF NEW-YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2.50 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $9 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I cannot make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts.

20 yards of New-York Mills muslin at 14½c. per yd.	$2 85
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard	3 50
Making and cutting	6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c.	1 50
Profit	3 65
Total	$18 00

Self Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

The Express charges on one dozen Shirts from New-York to New Orleans is about $1.

WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between White & Walker Streets, NEW-YORK.

Please copy my address as other houses in the city are selling inferior made shirts at my prices.

Something New.

Shuttering and Stanmering are permanently cured, by No Charge, by Dr. A. H. SMEDLEY. Office No. 649 Broadway. Hours 10 to 4.

Perry's Japanese Boot and Shoe Polish.
Splendid gloss. No rubbing. Sells nothing. Sold everywhere.
JAPANESE POLISH CO.,
No. 447 Broome Street, one door east of Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Collenden, 63 to 69 Crosby Street.

What Everybody Wants.

Everybody's Lawyer
AND
Counsellor in Business.
BY FRANK CROSBY,
OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR.

IT TELLS YOU How to draw up PARTNERSHIP PAPERS and give general forms for AGREEMENTS of all kinds, BILLS OF SALE, LEASES and PETITIONS.

IT TELLS YOU How to draw up BONDS and MORTGAGES, AFFIDAVITS, POWERS OF ATTORNEY, NOTES and BILLS OF EXCHANGE, RECEIPTS and RELEASES.

IT TELLS YOU The LAWS for the COLLECTION of DEBTS, with the STATUTES of LIMITATION, and amount and kind of property EXEMPT from EXECUTION in every State.

IT TELLS YOU How to make an ASSIGNMENT properly, with forms for COMPOSITION with CREDITORS, and the INSOLVENT LAWS of every State.

IT TELLS YOU The legal relations existing between EMPLOYER and WARD, MASTER and APPRENTICE, and LANDLORD and TENANT.

IT TELLS YOU What constitutes LIBEL AND SLANDER, and the LAW of M. MARRIAGE POWER, the WIFE'S RIGHT in PROPERTY, DIVORCE and ALIMONY.

IT TELLS YOU The LAW for MECHANICS' LIENS in every State, and the NATURALIZATION LAWS of this country, and how to comply with the same.

IT TELLS YOU The LAW Concerning PENSIONS and how to obtain one, and the PREEMPTION LAWS to PUBLIC LANDS.

IT TELLS YOU The LAW for PATENTS, with mode of procedure in obtaining one, with INTERFERENCES, ASSIGNMENTS and TABLE OF FEES.

IT TELLS YOU How to make your WILL, and how to ADMINISTER ON an ESTATE, with the law and the requirements thereof in every State.

IT TELLS YOU The meaning of LAW TERMS in general use, and explains to you the LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE and JUDICIAL POWERS of both the General and State GOVERNMENTS.

IT TELLS YOU How to KEEP OUT OF LAW, by showing how to do your BUSINESS legally, thus saving a vast amount of property, and vexatious litigation, by its timely consultation.

Single copies will be sent by mail, postage paid, to EVERY FARMER, EVERY MECHANIC, EVERY MAN OF BUSINESS, and EVERYBODY in EVERY STATE, on receipt of $1.00, or in law style of binding at $1.25.

$1000 A YEAR can be made by energetic men canvassing for the above work, or any inducements to all such are very liberal.

For single copies of the Book, or for terms to Agents, with other information, apply to or address

JOHN E. POTTER, PUBLISHER,
No. 617 SANSOM ST., Philadelphia, PA.

Sheldon & Company,
115 Nassau Street, N. Y.,
Will Publish early next Week:

A NEW BOOK.
By E. IRENÆUS PRIME, D.D.,
Author of "Power of Prayer," "Europe and the East," &c., &c.

SWITZERLAND.
Illustrated with six views of Swiss Scenery, drawn on Wood, by Herrick and Lossing.
One vol. 12mo. Price $1.

THE FLORENCE STORIES.
Vol. 2.—GHIMMIE.
By JACOB ABBOTT, Author of the "Rollo Books," &c., &c.
With illustrations by Herrick.
One vol. 18mo. Price 60 cents. Uniform with "Florence and Jolin."

"HESTER AND I;"
Or, BEWARE OF WORLDLINESS.
By MRS. MANNERS.
One vol. 16mo. Illustrated. Price 60 cents.

From the Providence Evening Press.

"The story is charmingly told. It is marked by power and pathos, efficiently mingled, and leaves upon the mind an impression not easily effaced. It will perfect the old and the young."

☞ Any of the above sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the prices annexed.

Spalding's Prepared Glue.

NEW YORK STATE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY
Awarded
Mr. C. Spaldings Co for Patented
Liquid Glue
Silver Cup
1859

For mending Toys, Crockery, &c. Manufactured by HENRY C. SPALDING & CO.,
No. 41 Chatham Street.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. IV.—No. 170.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1860. [SECOND EDITION.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

A NEW SERIAL.

WE shall commence in our next number a new serial Story, entitled

CAPTAIN BRAND,

OF THE

SCHOONER "CENTIPEDE,"

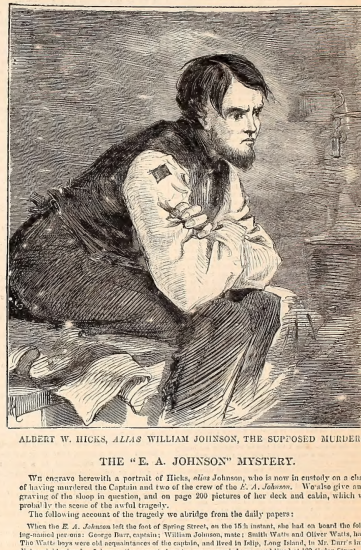
A PIRATE OF EMINENCE IN THE WEST INDIES;

His Loves and Exploits,

TOGETHER

WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF THE SINGULAR MANNER BY WHICH HE DEPARTED THIS LIFE.

By LIEUTENANT HENRY A. WISE, U.S.N.



ILLUSTRATED BY

C. PARSONS AND A. LUMLEY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is now the cheapest advertising medium in the country. Price 50 cents per line.

THE SLOOP "E. A. JOHNSON," AS FIRST DISCOVERED.

ALBERT W. HICKS, ALIAS WILLIAM JOHNSON, THE SUPPOSED MURDERER.

THE "E. A. JOHNSON" MYSTERY.

We engrave herewith a portrait of Hicks, alias Johnson, who is now in custody on a charge of having murdered the Captain and two of the crew of the E. A. Johnson. We also give an engraving of the sloop in question, and on page 200 pictures of her deck and cabin, which were probably the scene of the awful tragedy.

The following account of the tragedy we abridge from the daily papers:

When the E. A. Johnson left the foot of Spring Street, on the 15th instant, she had on board the following-named persons: George Burr, captain; William Johnson, mate; Smith Watts and Oliver Watts, hands. The Watts boys were old acquaintances of the captain, and lived in Islip, Long Island, by Mr. Burr's immediate neighborhood. Johnson, the suspected party, was a married man, and lived at 128 Cedar Street. He had never been on board the vessel before, and was employed by the Captain a few hours previous to sailing. The object of the voyage was well known to all on board, and all were aware that the Captain had quite a snug sum of money on board. From an oyster dealer at Fulton Market Captain Burr had received $300, and when he arrived at Keyport Messrs. Ferres & Simmons placed in his hands about $500 more. The voyage to Keyport passed off without any incident worth noticing. On Sunday, the 18th instant, the sloop set sail from Keyport on her trip to Deep Creek, Virginia, where she was to take in a cargo of oysters for planting, and return to Keyport with all possible dispatch. What terrible and bloody work transpired on board from that time up to Wednesday morning is best known, perhaps, to William Johnson, for he appears to be the only one of the crew who is now alive to tell the tale of "Murder most foul and unnatural."

The next thing that is positively known concerning the sloop after her departure from Keyport is her collision with the schooner John L. Mather, Captain Nickerson, about half past three o'clock on Wednesday morning. The sloop was then sailing in the direction of New York, while the schooner was going in an opposite direction, bound for the Delaware Breakwater.

THE COLLISION

occurred off the tail of the West Bank, and was no doubt the result of ignorance or fright on the part of the steersman of the sloop. When within three hundred yards of each other the course of the sloop was suddenly changed, and her head was directed full against the schooner's quarter. Every effort was made by Captain Nickerson to avoid the collision, but in vain, as unexpected was the movement on board the sloop. The schooner was cut down to within eight inches of the water's edge; but fortunately her commander was able to keep her afloat until she arrived at Quarantine, where she was taken in tow by a steamboat and conveyed to this city. In conversation with our reporter on Wednesday afternoon, Captain Nickerson stated that the sloop had only one man on deck at the time of the collision, and that he never uttered a word during the time the vessels were together. The sloop drifted to leeward, and as her stern swung around a yawl boat could be detected hanging from the davits. On his arrival in the East River, some hours after the collision, Captain Nickerson saw the E. A. Johnson lying at Fulton Market slip, and immediately identified her as the sloop that had caused such damage on board his vessel; besides, a quantity of rigging left on board of his vessel in the collision, corresponding with that missing from the sloop, reduced the identity almost to a certainty. He immediately gave information of the matter to Captain Weed, and an important link in the chain of circumstantial evidence against the accused was then secured.

THE DISCOVERY OF THE SLOOP

in her dismantled condition, after the collision, was first made by Captain Sickles, of the fishing schooner Telegraph. The E. A. Johnson was then drifting in the lower bay, about midway between Coney Island and Sandy Hook. Her sails were all down and hanging in the water, her bowsprit and cut-water carried away, and her general appearance denoting an abandoned wreck. The Telegraph immediately bore down for the wreck, and just as she was coming alongside the steamboat Cyrus Captain Dorris, came up, and the crews of both vessels boarded the sloop together. The sight that presented itself on board the E. A. Johnson was truly sickening. The entire deck on the starboard side was covered with blood, while here and there the presence of several locks of matted hair showed too plainly that their were gazing upon the theatre of some mysterious and dreadful tragedy. The condition of things around the companion-way and down in the cabin confirmed their worst fears. It was evident that the crew had been murdered, their bodies dragged to the rail, and thrown overboard. The marks of blood upon almost every article of furnitors; together with the tested condition of the clothing and bed-clothes, led to the impression that the wretched mother had immediately been preceded by the child's father. Every closet, cupboard, and place of search seemed to have been ransacked, judging from the marks of blood and tossed condition of the contents. Fully satisfied in their own minds that some horrible tragedy had taken place on board, they promptly started for New York, bearing with them the dismantled sloop.

The police were set on the trail at once, and we give the account of the arrest in the words of officer NEVINS:

THE ARREST.

Captain Smith and myself left the city on Thursday, in the twelve o'clock train of the Long Shore Railroad, for Stonington and Providence. The same afternoon we arrived at Stonington, and went on board the Providence boat Commonwealth, to make inquiries for a sailor-man, his wife, and child. The boat arrived that morning about two o'clock, and of course our only chance of getting trace of the murderer was from the officers of the boat. We had heard of several men with children, but they did not answer the description; so we waited until nine o'clock that night, when Mr. C. Howard, the baggage-master, arrived in the Boston night train. He gave us information of two or three different women who stopped on the route between Stonington and Boston. The description of one party, of a man, woman, and child, who stopped at Canton, Massachusetts, was so near, that on the arrival of the boat from New York, at two o'clock on Friday morning, we left in the train which carried forward the passengers. On arriving at Canton, however, we found that the woman was not the one we were in search of, so we immediately returned to Providence, being satisfied that the murderers could not have taken the Boston train, as in Providence we called upon Mr. George Billings, detective officer, who, with several other officers, watched the train and boats on every assistance. We drove around the city to all the sailor boarding-houses, and to all the railroad depots, questioning baggage-masters and every one likely to give us information, but could get no satisfactory clew, as we considered that they had probably crossed the Fall River route, and Captain Smith went down to the steamboat Bradford to get to make inquiry there. Mr. Billings had remembered that on the previous morning a sailor and a little sore-eyed woman and child came up with them, and asked if he knew of any good boarding-house, in a retired part of the city, where he could go for a few weeks. He told him that he did not, but would take him to a hackman, who took him off to a distant part of the city. The hackman was soon found, and at once recollected the circumstances, and where he had taken the party. It was then arranged, by general consent, to-morrow that the hackman should go into the house, and inquire of the landlady if this man was in, pretending that two of his party were quarrelsome, and that he had been apparently asleep. I woke him up, and to immediately began to make inquiry there. We had not charged him with passing counterfeit money, because I did not want his wife to know what the real charge was. We got his baggage together, and took him with us to the watch-house. I searched him, and found in his pocket-book about seven hundred dollars in counterfeits, also, his knife, pipe, and among the rest, two small screwed bags, which I knew from identified as being used by the Captain to carry his silver. In his pocket-book was $173, mostly in five and ten dollar bills of the Farmers' and Citizens' Bank of Brooklyn. There was also found in his possession. I didn't take his wife's baggage, and I felt sorry for her that I gave her $10 at the depot. For women act it was she cried bitterly, but if she had known what her husband was really charged with it would have been awful. I took the $6 from the landlady that he had paid in advance, because I didn't know but the money might be identified. When we got him to the watch-house, I told him to let me see his hands, for if he was a counterfeiter, and not a sailor, as he represented, I could tell. He turned up his palms, and said, "There are no marks on them." I said yes, and began to examine, too; and then I told him I did not want him for counterfeiting, and he replied, "I thought as much." So I up and told him what he was charged with, and he declared upon his soul that he was innocent, and knew nothing of the matter, and was never on the wharf. I don't think his wife knew any thing about it. Some time before he had been living up a yacht, and was to get $50 a-year, and when he came home as flush with money he told his wife he had got the prize money. I asked him if he would go on to New York quietly with us, or stay in jail ten or fifteen days for a requisition. He said he would go with us, and we started at 7 o'clock in the morning. He behaved so cool and indifferent that I at one time almost supposed he had mistaken our party for the New London culprit there was an immense crowd of people waiting to see the prisoner. As we went on through the crowd, they cried out, "There's the murderer; lynch him, lynch him!" I told him that I was glad about the first man who touched him. At every station after that, as we came through, there were large crowds curious to see the prisoner.

VISIT OF THE PRISONER'S WIFE.

The Herald reporter says, on Monday 26th:

The desire on the part of thousands to get a glimpse of the suspected murderer was so great that the second precinct station house, in which the prisoner was confined, was thronged all day yesterday with an excited and excited crowd. Among the visitors was Johnson's wife, who arrived in the city at an early hour, in company with her infant child, and had an interview with her husband. She was informed of the real charge preferred against the prisoner, she seemed very excited, and wondered, "I thought it would be all right." The large amount of money that the prisoner was possessed of when he started from New York had created a suspicion in her mind that all was not right, but still she had no idea that her husband would resort to such monstrous means in order to succeed. When brought down stairs to see the prisoner she seemed much affected, and wept bitterly. The prisoner, however, appeared slightly moved, and tried to smooth over matters to her satisfaction by stating that he had been very much troubled of late in the charge preferred against him; but she evidently did not believe his statement, and took her leave of him in a manner which showed that there was considerable doubt in her mind as to his innocence.

THE VISIT OF THE CORONER.

About one o'clock Coroner Schirmer paid a visit to the prisoner. Captain Weed, in order to take the prisoner's statement, introduced the officer by saying that he was the Coroner who had held an inquest upon the body of Captain Burr, who had been found murdered the day previously. The announcement that one of the bodies had been found produced but little effect upon the prisoner. He merely said "Yes," in an inquiring tone, and then relapsed into his former state of silent indifference. His imperturbable manner could not have been natural. An innocent man could not have displayed such extraordinary coolness under such trying circumstances. The Coroner was shocked at the audacity of the fellow, and went up stairs, declaring he never saw any thing like it in his life.

CAPTAIN BURR'S WIFE.

It was understood yesterday that Captain Burr's wife was so shocked at the news of the tragedy that she was rendered hopeless. She has hardly uttered a word since she received the sad tidings of the probable murder of her husband, and it is now that the physician in attendance says it is his opinion that she will sink under the blow.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1860.

THE SEIZURE OF MIRAMON'S STEAMERS.

WE give on page 201 a beautiful picture of the seizure of the steamers Miramon and Marquez by the United States sloop of war Saratoga in the harbor of Vera Cruz, Mexico. The circumstances of the seizure were very simple. These two vessels were fitted out at Havana, in Cuba, manned by the Liberal Church party in Mexico, and were dispatched by sympathizers with Miramon to assist in the assault on Vera Cruz—which assault, however, they declined to show their colors, when required to do so by the ships of war lying in the harbor, and when questioned by a commissioner sternly fired upon them After this, of course, there was nothing for it but to make them prizes of war as pirates.

A telegraphic dispatch to the Associated Press states that, when the fight began, these vessels showed Spanish colors. If this be so, it will completely manifest the perfidy of Spain. We owe regular Spanish ships of war, but may have been privateers under the Spanish flag—fitted out by Santa Anna, Miramon, and other friends of the Church in Mexico.

The general impression of people in this country is that the seizure will do no harm. The proceedings of Orvay, the British Minister in Mexico, and Gabriac, the French Minister, have been such that it is not unwise that the Mexicans should have a lesson. Besides, how this country feels with regard to the pending civil war in their country. Good may result, sooner or later, from this emphatic announcement of the sympathies of the United States with the liberal party.

It must always be remembered by Americans that the contest now raging in Mexico is merely the old story—the fight between the privileged class, which is the Church, and the people For my own part the Church party in Mexico has been acquiring dominion, power, wealth, influence, and capacity. The Church property, at the present time, is worth at least $250,000,000—which, as only 8 per cent. is reckoned as the income of $12,500,000, nearly twice as much as the whole national revenue. Besides the power which such enormous property confers, the Church party possess, over their adversaries, the incalculable advantage of a perfect and thorough organization, extending throughout the republic, from Sonora to the borders of Guatemala, and through most society from General Miramon's household to the hut of the poorest half-breed. To these may be superadded the advantage the Church adds the vast power derived from superstition. Even among an educated and enlightened people the influence of the clergy is so great that very few persons can venture to contend against it: what must that power be among a people, ignorant and degraded, and accustomed to delegate to priests the duty of thinking for them? This is the capital of the Church party in Mexico: money, organization, and superstition. These three maintain their supremacy.

On the other hand, the popular party is based, at bottom, upon the fundamental principles of democracy. We do not propose to become the apologists of the Juarez Government, or to justify every act of the so-called constitutionalists of Mexico; many of their measures seem to us very ill advised. But the radical idea which underlies their organization is simply the democratic principle, to oppose all privileges, monopolies, and oligarchies of any kind. In practice, for instance, the Constitutionalists declare the confiscation of the vast portions of the country for the use of the Church; to the main-morte system; to the exemption of Church property from seizure and taxes; to each and all the personal and real privileges and exemptions enjoyed by the Mexican clergy. Their hope of success depends on the development of intelligence among the Mexican people. Among a truly intelligent and enlightened people a theocracy is impossible. And whenever the Mexicans become enlightened and intelligent the Church party will fail; till then its chances are the best.

We have said that this was an old story. The same fight has been fought out in several States of the Union in some shape or other—for instance, in Massachusetts and South Carolina: it has been waged to an end in France, Spain, and Germany; but perhaps our neighbor, Canada, affords the best modern parallel, and a study of the Canadian problem is instructive to students of the history of Mexico.

Lower or Eastern Canada was first settled two hundred years ago by intense Catholics, nuns, friars, and priests leading the way, and a special ordinance of the French monarchy forbidding the landing of Protestants in the colony. Upper or Western Canada was settled within a century by strong Church of England men, among whom Episcopalian bishops and priests were almost as powerful as the Roman Catholic clergy were in the Eastern Province. Each set of ecclesiastics, with the sagacity which marks the priesthood of almost every Church, proceeded to anchor itself and make sure its power by acquiring land. In the Eastern Province the most fertile and promising portions of the country were reserved by the Catholic priests, and ecclesiastical corporations. Of the cities of Quebec and Montreal, and of the richest counties of Lower Canada, at least one half was, one hundred years ago, and is still, owned by the Roman Catholic Church The Church of England pursued the same policy in the Western province, reserving its lands were set apart as "Clergy Reserves" and rectory domains. Thirty years ago the power of each Church, in its separate provinces, appeared to rest on a basis of impregnable strength. It was remarked by a sagacious traveler that even Spain, at the time when Joseph Bonaparte was forced to strike down the Jesuits to save himself, was not so thoroughly in the hands of priests as the Canadas in 1830.

At the very time this remark was made the seeds of the inevitable conflict had been sown, and the germ was coming up. In Upper or Western Canada the superior wealth of the Episcopal Church was small, and its tactics careless; education became general, and the schools were independent of the Church. The consequence was the growth of a powerful body of Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, and other sects, among whom the dominant Church was regarded with deep hatred. These sects outnumbered the members of the established Church, and commenced a crusade against the Clergy Reserves and Rectories. The conflict was long and severe, but the issue could not be doubtful. The plea of "vested rights" has never proved the key of a popular reform, or protected a palpable abuse from attention. A day came when "the Church" was thoroughly beaten, and the vast tracts of land which had been set apart for the support of the established Church of Upper Canada were wrested from their owner and devoted to secular and educational purposes. The end, after a conflict of a quarter of a century, the fight between hierarchical privilege and democracy in the Western Province.

In Canada East the case was different. From the very first settlement of the Province the Papal priests had sagaciously monopolized the teaching of the people. They had spent money lavishly in the establishment and maintenance of colleges, seminaries, and boarding-schools, at which the youth of Canada be educated at a far less cost than was possible at private institutions. This judicious outlay secured generations after generations of Canadians, who would rather have died than suffered an assault upon their Mother Church, and who deemed it a sacred duty to increase the means of that Church's power and wealth. The superior management of the Roman Catholics in Lower Canada is evident from the fact that, notwithstanding the injury inflicted on the best interests of the Province by the monopoly of real property in the hands of the Church, no party of any standing has ever proposed a crusade against the Lower Canada ecclesiastical corporations. Churches, seminaries, colleges, nunneries, and bishoprics acquire property by decree, and, of course, they can not sell it, secure they go on swelling their estate and their income from year to year; but no jealously exists here against the people at their schools, that no one but a stray heretic here and there ever complains of the abuse, and to all outward appearance they are too well stronger than ever.

Mexico occupies a middle position between Canada East and Canada West. As in the former, the priesthood of Mexico have secured the best land in the country, but as in the latter, they have neglected the necessary precaution of training the people, at their own expense, to believe that the aggrandizement of the Church is the gain of the country. Hence the conflict which has not yet commenced in Lower Canada is in full vigor in Mexico, and the result must of course be what it has been in Spain, France, Germany, and Canada West. A time must come, sooner or later, when the clergy will be beaten, and must inevitably lose the Church of the land of which it originally robbed them.

In the mean time, the part which the United States should play must be a very delicate one. It will never do to try to bully the Mexicans. They will no more stand foreign bettering than ourselves. If we were to land an army to support Juarez to-morrow, every Mexican would rally round Miramon, and no right-minded person could censure the proceeding. All the talk which we hear about conquering Mexico is pure nonsense. We could not conquer Mexico if we tried, and the worst misfortune that could befall us would be to do so, and to have to deal with the country afterward. The true policy of the United States is stand by and look on quietly, waiting for Providence to fulfill His ends at the appointed season; evincing our sympathies on proper occasions, not obtrusively so as to vex Mexican pride, but discreetly so as to let our opinion have its fair weight with intelligent Mexicans. Mexico has great capacities; immense mineral wealth; great agricultural resources; fair industrial capacity: a mineral and agricultural people; a good internal system of law; a comparatively small debt. As soon as the irrepressible conflict is ended, she will take her place worthily among the nations of the world, and will become a useful, powerful, and friendly neighbor.

BRADY'S PORTRAIT OF WASHINGTON IRVING.

MANY regrets were expressed, on the death of the late Washington Irving, that he had left no portrait with which his friends were satisfied.

For many years of his life Mr. Irving had refused to sit for his portrait, and his relatives and friends said that in early life portraits had been unsatisfactory to him. Literary institutions, historical societies at home and abroad, had in vain solicited his portrait. This reverence seemed unreasonable. Recently a lady, a relative of the family, who had been absent for several years, much to the surprise of his family, said she had a small daguerreotype taken of Mr. Irving previous to the departure for Europe. It was a good likeness; and from this, after infinite labor and expense, a fine photograph has been obtained by Mr. Brady, of this city, and a portrait in oil on canvas. His friends and nearest relatives are delighted with it, and pronounce it perfect.

The many admirers of the great Washington Irving can now have an opportunity of gracing their libraries with a faithful representation. The genial smile is peculiarly his own; and the face expresses all the humor, genius, and humanity belonging to his character. The likeness is certainly indefatigable in his profession, and deserves the popularity he enjoys.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE GREAT SEA-SERPENT.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

BERRIES SPRINGS, March 14, 1860.

I OBSERVED in your Weekly, dated March 3, a drawing of the "Sea-Serpent" which I thought it might interest you to know that a fish corresponding in every particular but one was stranded on the sea beach of Turk's Island, July 4, in 1855. I am not certain of the year. Mr. George Gibbs, who is something of a naturalist, saw it, and he is still residing on Turk's Island. The only difference I can discern is, that the one I saw at Turk's Island had over the head and back of its entrance canoe on the sides of the back beautiful protuberances like silver studs—not plain studs, but of raised work. It did not remember the tail, but it was exhibited for a day or two by the colored man who found it, and then thrown back into the sea. I recollect feeling surprised that no one took the trouble to stuff it, for it was perfectly sound. Whether those protuberances were peculiar to the female, or what, I do not know; but my first afterward would lose them, is a doubt. It was very beautiful, and had a bright silvery appearance from the water to the top of the tail.

Very respectfully yours,

SUSAN ELIZA LEEDS.

THE LOUNGER.

ALL THE BLUE BONNETS OVER THE BORDER.

THE letter which the Lounger published last week, written by "The Lady in the Blue Bonnet," and addressed to "Jack Falstaff, Esq.," by "gigled and gabbled" at the rehearsal of the Philharmonic Concert, has brought upon the Lounger a flood of notes, some of which he publishes, that the merits of the case may be laid fairly before the great Public.

There is evidently a profound difference in the opinions upon this momentous topic. It is a question of manners, indeed; but there is the old root of discord like Lamoger's opinion (alas!) may perhaps give heed to Burke, "the one name, greatest of all," as Sir Thomas Lawrence said in the days of the other, at the St. Patrick's dinner, as he touched with light and more the fame of the great Irish orator. In the Hall Lounger, Adam, Addison, J., hear what Burke, C. J. from the High-Court of Social Law, gives us in evidence, and will call a recorded in his first letter on a Regicide Peace:

"Manners are what vex or soothe, corrupt or purify, exalt or debase, barbarize or refine us, by a constant, steady, uniform, insensible operation, like that of the air we breathe in."

Therefore you will pardon to a Lounger the space he allows for the discussion of the subject. Besides, it concerns the breeding of music, and all good citizens are interested that good music shall be heard. It is not rates of interest, nor the laws of supply and demand in trade, that radically control society. Society is composed of men and women, and they are influenced by ideas—what we call interest is only an idea. Society is the globe. The Hindoo philosophers are satisfied that it rests upon an elephant, who stands upon a tortoise. There are men who are perhaps wiser, and who be-believe that it rests nowhere, but is forever supported by invisible, divine forces. Selfishness is the tortoise, going upon its belly. Many people can understand that its shell may be strong enough to support an elephant; and perhaps the elephant holds the globe. But the theory is insufficient. The unseen things are the strong things in this world, as in all life.

But the Lounger must cut himself short to make room for his correspondents.

SIR,—Is this a free-country, or is it not? If I buy a ticket to a concert, have I the right to enter the hall, or have I not? To take a seat, or not? If I have, have I surrendered my liberty of speech by the purchase of my ticket? If I hire a room at a hotel, haven't I an undoubted right to bang my boots down at the door, when I go to bed, if I want to, or to sing and shout, if I choose to? In the name of justice have I not purchased the right to that room, and are my arms to be paralyzed and my lungs scratched by sour looks when I should certainly kick if I met him in the passage? If a "Lady in the Blue Bonnet," whom I know nothing about, except that she is probably a Puseyite, prevails old maid, doesn't like the Philharmonic rehearsals, let her stay at home. I like 'em, and I don't see why people should be gagged at 'em. If she doesn't want to hear people talk, let her go to the dressmaker's church, up in something street. I'll be still enough for her there, probably; and they want more money. They have a debt, poor things! and they are selling prints of the church to help pay it off. Now mark my words, Mr. Lounger, I don't believe this lady (she calls herself so) is a bit honest hes bought a single copy of a picture to help along the poor deaf-mutes. Of course not; such people never do. They complain, in the meanest, most selfish way, of being disturbed by hearing music at a nasty concert, simply because they've paid for it! They want their money's worth—that's the whole story.

For my part I'm sick of this twaddle about hearing music. By Heavens! it's enough to drive a patient man jump out of his skin to hear these people go on. There are at least sixty instruments —sixty instruments, Mr. Lounger, tuning and twanging and blurting and roaring, enough to bring the house down, and because some innocent and lovely girl sings, her unquestionable right, as being in civilized society, to speak—yes, Sir—to speak, to whisper, to express her opinion, or her emotion, or to make a suggestion, in tone more or less loud (as if she could be heard even if she bawled out in the midst of that tremendous din), why, something in the guise of humanity must thereupon complain piteously, as if the lovely and innocent girl had committed an enormity! I do not dare to trust myself to speak of such conduct as it deserves, or to characterize such a mean, miserable, contemptible, imbecile, disgusting, and, some proceeding as it richly merits. I pass it over, with this one word of exhortation to the person who wears a bonnet: Just mind your own business. I don't complain of your coming to hear the music, and I'll thank you not to come out and talking if I want to. Suppose that I choose to? Probably you have a husband* (poor fellow !), and I want to try card.

Yours, Mr. Lounger,
VESCVIUS JONES,
Middlepunch, U.S.N.

DEAR LOUNGER,—This is between us—but do you know the real history of the letter signed "The Lady in the Blue Bonnet," which you published last week? It is very good, and this it is.

You see it isn't a woman at all. Didn't you guess it? Tom Mamble and I are rivals. I am not ashamed to say it, because every body knows it, and every body knows that Clara is going to give Master Tom the mit—mitt—mitten. I've sent him one anonymously through the Post-office each ready, and made him pay heavy postage for it, like fun. Well, you see how it is. Clara likes me, Tom, and I were sitting together at the rehearsal —that is, I was sitting by her, and Tom must needs come up and plant himself into the open seat on the other side. Now, strictly between us, Tom is the most utter ass going. It is really quite surprising what an ass he is. Well, you see how it is, thing. When he found that he couldn't talk with her, he pretended to listen to the music; but I knew all the time he was trying to hear what we were saying. He was mad as fire at something Clara had said to me. I heard her say that he mustn't say such things—and I guess the row was offering himself. At any rate, he was dreadful angry, and went away without saying a word, and the whole thing was done, and the letter last week is the way in which he chose to take his revenge. There was no more a Lady in a Blue Bonnet in all than there was a bull in a china shop. It was only Master Tom Mamble, who was mad with a girl because she wouldn't have him. The fact is that a hearsal is a capital cover to talk. You may say that it's a semi-public, semi-private thing, and in a way, and the hum prevents the actual words from being heard. Clara and I always go, and have our best talks there; and I suppose I shall never bothered any more; for if Master Tom didn't get his mitten last time, he will next. I hope things are jolly with you.

Yours, old Lounger, FRANK SNIEV.

The Lounger has at least a bushel of notes, in a very variety of delicate, lucid, girl's hand, before him, and he is a Lounger,—that hugely ugly thing who calls herself a 'Lady in the Blue Bonnet' reassures us; but, poor old dotard! I only pity her," etc., etc. The wonder of "dear young ladies" who love this convicted themselves is enormous. The Lounger is sorry for them. He is sure that they will do better in future. The blue-bonneted lady was tart; but did she not say a great many true things—great many things worth remembering?

* Mr. Middlepunch of course forgets, in his ardor, a previous passage of his letter, in which he suggests the disinter condition of "The Lady in the Blue Bonnet."

If any still doubt, here is one more letter:

MY DEAR LOUNGER,—I was delighted to see the letter by a fair young lady, which you published last week, from the Lady in the Blue Bonnet. I have suffered so much from precisely the same annoyance, and every body seemed so unwilling to say any thing about it, that I was gradually settling into misanthropy, or, rather, misogyny.

You will ask me why I did not speak. Simply because I can not. I am so infernally polite that I am at every body's mercy. If a man grinds my corn with his new shoe, half a foot thick in the sole, I smile in the sweetest manner, as if he were tickling me. If I see two men knocking each other in the street, I always lift my hat and exclaim, "I beg your pardon!" as if I were concerned in the matter. If somebody asks somebody else at table to have something, I look bland and bend my head, merely because I am conscious that the occasion has arisen for blandness and head-bending. If a city friend goes out with me to my country-place, and takes an air in my boat upon the river, although he pulls directly against me, I say not a word. I would rather sink to the bottom of the stream than suggest that he is making hard work for me; and if a tug ever runs foul of my boat, come house with such swollen veins in my forehead that my doctor, who used to prescribe returning in such a condition, whipped out his lancet without a word, and bled me freely; while my city friend, unmaking for a fellow-passenger and seasons, hit the doctor upon the head with the oar, so that I had to bleed him with his own lancet to recover him. In case of any disability to ask my friend not to pull the wrong way.

So I should doubtless have been a happy married man long ere now, if I could only bring myself to inflict upon an innocent girl the surprise and confusion of an offer. I tried once—I did, indeed.

"Dear Miss Budken!" I cried; but immediate, he felt the apoplectic fraternity in my throat. She blushed—she stammered—she looked down. It was fruitful. I cursed myself for subjecting her to such embarrassment. She looked up, coyly, raised my hand to my head, as if to touch my hat, which only increased my bewilderment, and paused.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Budken, I'm sure," and never alluded to the subject again.

You may be interested—I beg your pardon, I'm sure, for I don't see why you should be—but it is interesting and humiliating to add that the name is Miss Budken no longer. She is Mrs. Nicholas Butterbury now. I see her sometimes at the Philharmonic rehearsals. She is very fond of music, occupies two seats (her husband always pays double fare for her in the cars), and who sleeps through the number. What a pulmonary organ that poor husband must be! For you see he couldn't have paid the least attention to the blushing and stammering.

Now you see the reason why I can not speak to the young ladies who talk during the music at the Philharmonic rehearsals and concerts. If I had a daughter, and she should behave with the indelicacy and impoliteness to make such a noise at the Philharmonic rehearsals and concerts, if I should speak to her about it—I suppose I couldn't do that—but I should quietly and politely take a pinch of pic acid. As it is, I only look on in perfect amazement and secret indignation. But it is entirely so.

I have been about like a May morning. If one of the girls says something particularly silly, and looks at me as if she expected me to laugh, why, I am too polite not to. So I generally contrive to refer me to disappoint her—and I grin. That only encourages her. Away she goes, and seems convinced that it is I who am the real cause of the disturbance. It is all my confounded politeness. But can you wouldn't have me an unfeeling brute, would you?

Of course the same thing prevents my rising and chastising the cad by the side of me, for his disapprobation of the dear young lady's conduct. It might pain her. No, I could not bring myself to do that.

You may imagine, then, dear Lounger, the peculiar satisfaction with which I read the letter of last week. If I were not afraid of confusing her, I should try to discover the lady in the line bonnet, and suppose I should find her on my knee in search for her, and suddenly they should slight upon her, and she should perceive that I was now writing of her. She would then see that I was not far off my seat. No, no, my dear friend, not for worlds would I betray that I suspected she could write—how much less that she could write to me! Anonymity gives me such satisfaction.

If it did not seem to me very impolite to have solicited your attention for so short a communication, I should stop here; but common politeness constrains me to suppose you may whether you think the letter of the lady in the blue bonnet will do any good? Do you suppose the dear young lady to whom it was addressed will ever receive it; and if she has, whether she will talk all the louder at the next concert? Do you think it was the young friend who wrote it who spoke for I am sure she chattered long enough and loud enough—and if she were not a dear young lady, I should certainly call her a very vulgar, impolite girl.

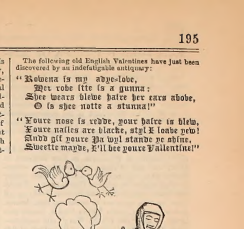
Goodby, dear Mr. Lounger. I thank you profoundly for the kind attention with which, I have no doubt, you will read this note; and I am, with a thousand apologies for the trouble I have expected, your most obedient humble, and obsequious servant,

THE SHORT GENTLEMAN IN SPECTACLES.

BEFORE the summer the first volume of Parke Godwin's History of France will be published; and the author will take the place he has won by scholarship, research, enthusiasm, and remarkable judicial, historic perception, in the famous group of our historians—Bancroft, Prescott, Irving, Hildreth, and Motley. Mr. Godwin brings to his work an early love of the subject; a faithful study, followed through many years; a matured comprehension of the relation of his theme to universal history; and a style known to all thoughtful readers as singularly nervous, racy, idiomatic, and brilliant. The opportunities of visit and interesting description of the great semi-barbaric forces of the Middle Ages will not, we may be sure, be lost by the historian. We, who are contemporary with the latest French movements in Italy, shall naturally hang with peculiar interest upon the narrative; while in France itself we shall look to the historian —prepared for the narration by essential interest and knowledge—for a clear, continuous statement, developed in historical progression, of the spirit which has culminated in the French Revolution, traced through all its ramifications in politics, religion, society, literature, science, and art; in schools of philosophy, in practical experiments of social reform, in political theories, and in scientific achievement. For the abundance necessary for all that is involved in the great argument of the development of one of the controlling nationalities of civilization, and for its picturesque and popular presentation, Mr. Godwin is especially well qualified. While Prescott, with passionless but faithful touch, shows the beginning of modern history; and Motley, with impetuous eloquence, makes the story of the Netherlands as stirring like the Nibelungen—Motley, the Tyrteus of historians—Godwin will deepen and prolong the strain with the epic of French nationality, the romantic episodes of chivalry and Provençal song.

Among the many good books which the year will bring us, we are sure that the first volume of the History of France will be of the chief in permanent value; and the laurels which its author has hitherto worn in single sprays will be twined into a crown.

FISTS.



IF two men were preparing to attack each other with hammers on some pleasant day in April, would it be necessary to tell still and do nothing but bet upon the result? Does it make any serious difference when the hammers are human fists instead of iron? Yet two men are known to be getting ready to fall upon each other with their Cyclopian fists, and to batter and bang until one is killed or maimed, or so beaten and bruised that he can not stand up. Nothing depends upon the affair but the honor on both sides of the Atlantic. Nothing is settled or proved by it. It is a piece of unmitigated brutality. It is the most disgusting exhibition of mere animal force, and doubly bestial when so used. Great muscular strength is a grand thing. Although the apotheosis of muscle is rather a heathenish than a human element; but there is nothing half so agreeable in seeing the superior strength of one man proved by wrangling another into the ground; by, as in seeing a hungry bear quietly hug a man to death, and eat him up. In either case, it is a fiendish beast using the power of a beast to satisfy his natural craving. In the former case, it is a man using the power of a beast to maim or murder another man for no possible purpose whatsoever.

The gladiatorial combat of a prisoner with a beast—he ordered to fight between two captives—the miserable, ridiculous duel even—all have some intelligible excuse, but they are all frightful in themselves, and in their consequences and results. The prize-fight is unredeemed savagery. It is the absolute negation of humanity. It is a degradation beneath brutality, for wild animals are never less than animals; while a man in the prize-ring shows no quality of humanity.

GEOFFREY CRAYON.

MR. THOMAS HICKS has just completed an exquisite sketch of the genial author so lately dead. It represents Irving seated in an easy-chair in a pleasant library—paper upon the table at his side—his pencil, dusty outland, hanging upon the wall above not behind his head, while a window seems to the floor out upon a balcony, beyond which the artist stretches placidly away, lighted by two or three sails of the sloops which are so characteristic of the dreamy, loitering recesses with which Irving has invested the river and its shores.

The head is that of the younger man—of Geoffrey Crayon, as he is known to us in Stewart Newton's portrait. The position and the accessories are perfectly harmonious. It is the genial gentleman, the accomplished scholar, the sweet dreamer, the unaffected author, the simple, affectionate man, that we see in the picture, and we can understand her how we loved him. It will unquestionably be the portrait of Irving—one of the rare and happy works that will be left to us—which those who know of the personality of the author it reverses and cherishes.

Tramps Eastern Shores Md

MESSRS JONES & CO

SIR I want a fiddle and as I am odd from every body else I want a odd fiddle.

I have one but it is a right handed fiddle I want a left handed fiddle.

The counter and bass wont sound and I can only give one reason for the counter and bass not sounding right and that is because the round post has to be on the left side of the fiddle and on the left side of the fiddle there is a strip of wood that extends from one end to the other inside of the fiddle. And this piece of wood that is inside of a right handed fiddle is on the left side of the left handed fiddle and the round post is on the right side of the fiddle. Now this piece that I mentioned above of a right handed fiddle supports the counter and bass now this piece must be on the right side of the fiddle so the round post must be on the left side of the fiddle under the treble if you succeed in getting a viol for me it will be a great favor I want one only 20 inches in length the bow 24 inches in length i want one that will cost me about a dollars I dont want it to cost me any more I dont dollars cost and carriage all must not be over 5 dollars. I suppose you know my father Jethro Jones

Yours &
Amer soon JETHRO JONES.

PS If there is no such fiddle to be had in your city please try and get one made for me

TO MESSE JONES & CO

Baltimore Md.

SIMKINS remarked that money is the great lever in the affairs of mankind. "A very great lever, indeed," replied Binkey, "I wish you could lend me one."

WHEN Jemima went to school she was asked why the noon luncheon was slaughter?—"Because," she replied, "it is so very important that they all marched."

"I AM going to write a book on popular ignorance," said a conceited young man to Brown. "I know of no one," said the latter, "more competent to produce such a work."

A medical gentleman wrote a letter in 1832 to Sir Henry Halford on cholera, in which he took to himself the credit of being "the first to discover the disease, and communicate it to the public."

WHEN his cousin Charlotte Dunne was married, Jones said, "It was Dunne before it was Dunne while it was doing, and it was not Dunne when it was done."

AN old lady once complained to her doctor that she could scarcely sleep. "Don't you count sheep, ma'am?" replied the candid physician; "nobody wants you to do it."

A quack advertises a compound that will cure every thing from a bad character to a bad temper.

"HOW tall are you, my lovel?" "I stand six feet in my shoes!" "Good feet in your shoes, indeed! no man living can stand more nor two feet in his shoes; you must be a giant, and you stand six feet in your stocks!"

IT is an old and true saying that a man should not marry unless he can support a wife; and, from some extempore list of the necessaries, we are beginning to doubt seriously whether a woman can prudently marry unless she can support a husband.

CHEERING FOR THE PURSUIT.—Give a child a bat and a ball.

A poet says: "Oh, she was fair, but sorrow came and left his traces there." What becomes of the balance of the harness he don't state.

"GOT any ice at your end of the table, Bill?" "No; but I've got the ladle." "What's that?" "A spoon."

"HOW is it," said a gentleman to Sheridan, "that your name has not of late been mentioned in the House?" "Why, because I am not absent," replied Sheridan, "for we own every body."

During the service at the Abbey Church, Scotland, recently, the vicar had just published for the second time the banns of marriage between Timothy Tosspot, a decayed stonecrop and Elizabeth Teague (a buxom widow of thirty), with the customary form for a marriage-getting, when up rose a short, thick-set, elderly female, who had been remarkably busy with her needle among the old women in the middle aisle during the former part of the service, and, in a small, reasoning voice, cried out, to the banns in this church; ay, and in all other Scotland." The minister the young couple couldn't help uttering a little, and gazing a great deal at the small female, who had accomplished the feat of rising and bracing in church, according to the rubric; and who, after all, turned out to be the mother of the would-be bridegroom.

NATURE IS ART.—Nature will always triumph over acquired genius, as the following anecdote amusingly illustrates: Ceres d'Arroll argued against Dante that nature was assisted by art; but Dante asserted the contrary, and attempted to prove the truth of his assertion by exhibiting his cat, which, by dint of long practice, had been accustomed to hold a candle in its paw until the wanted to read. Ceres, however, was not prepared for the exhibition, and, after a couple of mice, through his performance had been discovered, and Wisdom on the cat immediately dropped the candle, and fled upon the mice; so that Nature once more triumphed over art.

HON. JOHN S. PHELPS, OF MISSOURI.

JOHN SMITH PHELPS, of Missouri, is—in legislative parlance—the "senior member" of the present House of Representatives. Many of his colleagues are older in years, but his consecutive term of service dates back to the commencement of the Twenty-ninth Congress, in 1845, and it consequently devolved upon him to administer the oath of office to the Speaker elect.

Three brothers Phelps, emigrants from Old England, landed at Plymouth, in New England, in 1630, and one of them, animated by an adventurous spirit, was soon after-ard a pioneer settler in what is now the State of Connecticut. His descendants were industrious yeomen, ready at all times to take up arms in defense of their homes. One of these was Elisha Phelps, fought gallantly in the "Old French War;" and another—Noah Phelps (the grandfather of the subject of this sketch) took a good service in the Revolutionary struggle. At Ticonderoga he commanded, as sergeant, a party of scouts sent in advance to reconnoitre, and before the close of the war he had risen to the rank of captain.

Elisha Phelps, a son of this Revolutionary patriot, was a graduate of Yale College, and practiced as a successful lawyer and as a leading politician. He was repeatedly elected by his fellow-citizens to represent them in the popular branch of the State Legislature, over which he presided in 1821 and 1822; and he served several terms in the State Senate. From 1830 to 1834 he was Controller of the State, and afterward acted as one of a Board of Commissioners who revised the State statutes. He was a Representative to Congress from 1840 to 1921, participating in the debate on the admission of Missouri, and again from 1825 to 1829.

John Smith Phelps, a son of Elisha, was born at Simsbury, Hartford County, Connecticut, on the 22d of December, 1814; so that he is now but in the prime of life, although patriarchally known as the "senior member." His father destined him for the law, and after the young man had graduated at Hartford, took him into his office, where he studied until admitted to the bar. For a few months he practiced law at home, but soon decided to seek a wider field of action, and "in life's morning march, when his spirit was young," he started for what was then regarded as the Far West.

In 1837 Mr. Phelps reached Missouri, and determined to settle in the fertile region then recently vacated by the Delawares and the Kickapoos. Judge Tompkins, of the Supreme Court, before whom he was examined before receiving a license to practice, advised him to settle in a more populous region; but the young lawyer preferred identifying himself with a young community, confident that he would advance with its prosperity. That Judicial Circuit (the territory of which now embraces twenty-five counties) then contained but six counties; yet, to attend the courts held in each three times a year, Mr. Phelps was obliged to ride eighteen hundred miles! The pioneer settlers were rough, uncultivated, and often lawless men, and every man went armed, even in court. The young lawyer was thus inured to hard-ship, and taught self-reliance whenever danger threatened. It is in frontier life that many of our foremost men have imbibed the true principles of independence and of individual responsibility, and have learned to value their fellow-citizens according to their merits—not as they "are looked and sized' in crowded communities, according to the orders of society, or dwarfed by dependence and the pressure of poverty." The knowledge of human nature acquired in the long forest rides around that frontier circuit, or in the rude court-houses, has since been of much service to Mr. Phelps in harmonizing and controlling the discordant elements of the national House of Representatives.

The young man soon became popular. His manly disposition, kindness of heart, and high social qualities won for him the esteem of a host of friends, many of whom became his clients.

In 1840 his Democratic fellow-citizens elected him to represent them in the State Legislature; and it is worthy of remark that he has ever been a consistent member of the Democratic party, as founded by Jefferson and indorsed by Jackson. His first experience in legislation was somewhat trying, as his party was smarting under their defeat by General Harrison, and the Whig minority in Missouri was jubilant over their national victory. About this time Mr. Phelps was appointed Brigade Inspector of Militia, and has since borne the title of Major—a modest and somewhat rare title in these days when Generals and Colonels abound on every hand.

In 1844 Major Phelps was elected a Representative to Congress from Missouri on a general ticket —that State having resisted the Mandamus Act requiring the establishment of Congressional Districts, until the session of the Legislature of 1844-'45. In 1846 he was elected in his District, and he has since been re-elected, until he is now serving his eighth term, this being his sixteenth session. His popularity is shown by the fact that, with one exception, he has not been at home during the canvassings or at the elections. Competitors have been numerous, but his constituents are well aware of his devotion to their interests, and of the faithful manner in which he represents them.

Major Phelps served five years on the Post-office Committee of the House, and was instrumental in bringing about the first reduction of postage, to three cents on paid letters, and five cents on those unpaid. This important reform he advocated in the House, and subsequent results have proved the correctness of his arguments, based on statistical data.

Transferred to the Committee on Ways and Means, which, in fact, prepares all the legislation of a public character involving the receipt or payment of moneys for the action of the House, Major Phelps has since been a prominent member. In the Thirty-fifth Congress he was chairman of the committee, and had an arduous task, the financial difficulties rendering a curtailment of expenses inevitable. The country has become inhabited, and the restless pioneers of civilization have moved nearer toward the setting sun, making way for a more refined and educated population. But the popularity of the Representative of the District in the Congress of the United States has kept even pace with the march of improvement. Well do his constituents know that his integrity and fidelity to Democratic principles are equaled by his careful attention to the business of each one of his constituents, rich or poor, who has interests to be looked after at Washington. Others intrust such matters to clerks —he gives it his personal supervision.

During the past summer Major Phelps accepted an invitation from the territorial authorities to visit New Mexico, for the prosperity of which he has ever taken a decided stand in Congress. He was received with great enthusiasm, and his journey through the territory was a perfect ovation.

Major Phelps resides on and successfully cultivates one of the largest farms in Southwestern Missouri, about a mile and a half from Springfield. There, with his two children, he enjoys his brief vacations, and indulges in the pleasures of rural life. He is rather tall and erect, with a graceful form, a quiet but earnest look, a keen, searching eye, a finely-developed forehead, and a genial expression of countenance. He is "no orator as Brutus is," neither does he bore the House with elaborate essays or patch-work speeches, yet he never fails to command attention and respect when he takes the floor. He never provokes a contest, but never relinquishes a position; always, by plain, frank statement, narrowing down the question, until by one plain truth he secures success. His remarks, although invariably "off-hand," are replete with reliable information, and form a valuable portion of the recorded debates.

HON. JOHN S. PHELPS, OF MISSOURI.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC. ETC.

MISS HALCOMBE'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

July 5th.—The events of yesterday warned me to be ready, sooner or later, to meet the worst. To-day is not yet at an end; and the worst has come.

Judging by the closest calculation of time that Laura and I could make, we arrived at the conclusion that Anne Catherick must have appeared at the boat-house at half past two o'clock on the afternoon of yesterday. I accordingly arranged that Laura should put herself at the luncheon table, to-day, and should then slip out at the first opportunity; leaving me behind to preserve appearances, and to follow her as soon as I could safely do so. This mode of proceeding, if no obstacles occurred to thwart us, would enable her to be at the boat-house before half past two, and (when I left the table in my turn) would leave me to a safe position in the plantation before three.

The change in the weather, which last night's wind warned us to expect, came with the morning. It was raining heavily when I got up, and it continued to rain until twelve o'clock—when the clouds cleared, the blue sky was seen, and the sun shone again with the bright promise of a fine afternoon.

My anxiety to know how Sir Percival and the Count would occupy the early part of the day was by no means set at rest, so far as Sir Percival was concerned, by his leaving us immediately after breakfast and going out by himself in spite of the rain. He neither told us where he was going nor when we might expect him back. We saw him pass the breakfast-room window hastily, with his high boots and his waterproof coat on; and that was all.

The Count passed the morning quietly in-doors; some part of it in the library; some part in the drawing-room, playing odds and ends of music on the piano, and humming to himself. Judging by appearances, the sentimental side of his character was persistently inclined to betray itself still. He was silent and sensitive, and ready to sigh and languish tenderously (as only fat men can sigh and languish) on the smallest provocation.

Luncheon-time came, and Sir Percival did not return. The Count took his friend's place at the table —plaintively devoured the greater part of a fruit tart submerged under a whole jagful of cream—and explained the full merit of the achievement to us as soon as he had done. "A taste for sweets," he said, in his softest tones and his tenderest manner, "is the innocent taste of women and children. I love to share it with them—it is another bond, dear ladies, between you and me."

Laura left the table in ten minutes' time. I was sorely tempted to accompany her. But if we had both gone out together we must have excited suspicion; and worse still, if we allowed Anne Catherick to see Laura accompanied by a second person who was a stranger to her, we should in all probability forfeit her confidence from that moment, never to regain it again.

I waited, therefore, as patiently as I could, until the servant came in to clear the table. When I quitted the room there were no signs, as the house or out of it, of Sir Percival's return. I left the Count with a piece of sugar between his lips, and the vicious cockatoo scrambling up his waistcoat to get at it; while Madame Fosco, sitting opposite to her husband, watched the proceedings of her bird and himself as attentively as if she had never seen any thing of the sort before in her life. On my way to the plantation I kept carefully beyond the range of view from the luncheon-room window. Nobody saw me, and nobody followed me. It was then a quarter to three o'clock by my watch.

Once among the trees, I walked rapidly, until I had advanced more than half-way through the plantation. At that point I slackened my pace, and proceeded cautiously; but I saw no one, and heard no voices. By little and little I came within view of the back of the boat-house—stopped and listened—but even still I was close behind it, and must have heard any person who had been talking inside. Still the silence was unbroken: still, far and near, no sign of a living creature appeared any where.

After waiting a second by the side of the building, first on one side and then on the other, and making no discoveries, I ventured in front of it and fairly looked in. The place was empty.

I called "Laura!"—at first, softly—then louder and louder—no one answered, and no one appeared. For all that I could see and hear, the only human creature in the neighborhood of the lake and the plantation was myself.

My heart began to beat violently; but I kept my resolution, and search'ed, first the boat-house and then the ground in front of it, for any signs which might show me whether Laura had really reached the place or not. No mark of her presence appeared inside the building; but I found traces of her outside it, in footsteps on the sand.

I detected the footsteps of two persons—large footsteps, like a man's, and small footsteps, which, by putting my own feet into them and tasting their size in that manner, I felt certain were Laura's. The ground was confusedly marked in this way just before the boat-house. Close against one side of it, under shelter of the projecting roof, I discovered a little hole in the sand—a hole artificially made, beyond a doubt. I just noticed it, and then turned away immediately to trace the footsteps as far as I could, and to follow the direction in which they might lead me.

They led me, starting from the left-hand side of the boat-house, along the edge of the trees, a distance, I should think, of between two and three hundred yards—and then the sandy ground showed not a further trace of them. Feeling that the persons whose course I was tracking must necessarily have entered the plantation at this point, I entered it too. At first I could find no path, but I discovered one afterward just time-ly enough among the trees, and followed it. It took me, for some distance, in the direction of the village, until I stopped at a point where another footpath crossed it. The bushes grew thickly on either side of this second path. I stood, looking down it, uncertain which way to take next; and, while I looked, I saw on one thorny branch some fragments of fringe from a woman's shawl. Closer examination of the fringe—and that it had been torn from a shawl—was certain, and I instantly followed the second path. I sought me out, at last, to my great relief, at the back of the house. I say to my great relief, because I inferred that Laura must, for some unknown reason, have returned before me by this roundabout way. I went in by the court-yard and the offices. The first person whom I met in crossing the servants'-hall was Mrs. Michelson, the housekeeper.

"Do you know," I asked, "whether Lady Clyde has come in from her walk or not?"

"My lady came in a little while ago with Sir Percival," answered the housekeeper. "I am afraid, Miss Halcombe, something very distressing has happened."

My heart sank within me. "You don't mean an accident!" I said, faintly.

"No, no—thank God, no accident! But my lady ran up stairs to her own room in tears, and Sir Percival has ordered me to give Fanny warning to leave in an hour's time."

Fanny was Laura's maid; a good, affectionate girl, who had been with her for years—the only person in the house whose fidelity and devotion we could both depend upon.

"Where is Fanny?" I inquired.

"In my room, Miss Halcombe. The young woman is quite overcome, and I told her to sit down and try to recover herself."

I went to Mrs. Michelson's room, and found Fanny in a corner, with her box by her side, crying bitterly.

She could give me no explanation whatever of her sudden dismissal. Sir Percival had ordered that she should have a month's wages, in place of a month's warning, and go. No reason had been assigned; no objection had been made to her conduct. She had been forbidden to appeal to her mistress, forbidden even to see her for a moment to say good-by. She was to go without explanations or farewells—and to go at once.

After soothing the poor girl by a few friendly words, I asked where she proposed to sleep that night. She replied that she thought of going to the little inn in the village, the landlady of which was a respectable woman, known to the servants at Blackwater Park. The next morning, by leaving early, she might get back to her friends in Cumberland, without stopping in London, where she was a total stranger.

I felt directly that Fanny's departure offered us a safe means of communication with London and with Limmeridge House, of which it might be very important to avail ourselves. Accordingly, I told her that she might expect to hear from her mistress or from me in the course of the evening, and that she might depend, for our both doing all that lay in our power to help her, under the trial of leaving us for the present. Those words said, I shook hands with her and went up stairs.

The door which led to Laura's room was the door of an ante-chamber, opening on to the passage. When I tried it, it was bolted on the inside.

I knocked, and the door was opened by the same heavy, overgrown housemaid, whose lumpish insensibility had tried my patience so severely on the day when I found the wounded dog. I had, since that time, discovered that her name was Margaret Porcher, and that she was the most awkward, slatternly, and obstinate servant in the house.

On opening the door she instantly stepped out to the threshold, and stood grinning at me in stolid silence.

"Why do you stand there?" I said. "Don't you see that I want to come in?"

"Ah, but you mustn't come in," was the answer, with another and a broader grin still.

"How dare you talk to me in that way? Stand back instantly!"

She stretched out a great red hand and arm on each side of her, so as to bar the door-way, and slowly nodded her addle head at me.

"Master's orders," she said; and nodded again.

I had need all my self-control to warn me against contesting the matter further, and to remind me that the next words I had to say must be addressed to her master. I turned my back on her, and instantly went down stairs to find him. My resolution to keep my temper under all the irritations that Sir Percival could offer was, by this time, as completely forgotten —I say so to my shame—as if I had never made it. In the gentle state of mind I had suffered and suppressed in that house—it actually did me good to feel how angry I was.

The drawing-room and the breakfast-room were both empty. I went on to the library, and found Sir Percival, the Count, and Madame Fosco. They were all three standing up, close together, and Sir Percival had a little slip of paper in his hand. The instant I saw it I knew the Count say to him, "No—a thousand times over, No."

I walked straight up to them, and looked him full in the face.

"Am I to understand, Sir Percival, that your wife's maid is to go, and that your own housemaid is the jailer who keeps it?" I asked.

"Yes; that is what you are to understand," he answered. "I have only one other thing to get double duty to do—take care your room is not a prison, too."

"Take you care how you treat your wife, and how you threaten me," I broke out, in the heat of my anger. "There are laws in England to protect women from cruelty and outrage. If you hurt a hair of Laura's head, if you dare to threaten with a finger, I swear to some what came way, to those laws I will appeal."

Instead of answering me, he turned round to the Count.

"What did I tell you?" he asked. "What do you say now?"

"What I said before," replied the Count—"No."

Even in the vehemence of my anger I felt his calm, cold, gray eyes on my face. They turned away from me as soon as he had spoken, and looked significantly at his wife. Madame Fosco immediately moved close to my side, and in that position addressed Sir Percival before either of us could speak again.

"Favor me with your attention for one moment," she said, in her clear, icily-suppressed voice. "I have to thank Sir Percival, for your hospitality, and to decline taking advantage of it any longer. I remain in no house in which ladies are treated as your wife and Miss Halcombe have been treated here to-day."

Sir Percival took a step back, and stared at her in dead silence. The declaration he had just heard—a declaration which he well knew, as I well knew, Madame Fosco could not have contrived to make without her husband's permission—seemed to petrify him with surprise. The Count stood by, a picture of the coolest and the most enthusiastic admiration.

"She is sublime!" he said to himself. He approached her while he spoke, and drew her hand through his arm. "I am at your service, Madame," he went on, with a quiet dignity that I had never noticed in him before. "And at Miss Halcombe's service, if she will honor me by accepting the offer that I can offer her."

"Damn it! what do you mean?" cried Sir Percival, as the Count quietly moved away, with his wife, to the door.

"At other times I mean what I say, but at this time I mean what my wife says," replied the impenetrable Italian. "We have changed places, Percival, for once; and Madame Fosco's opinion is—mine."

Sir Percival crumpled up the paper in his hand; and, pushing past the Count, with another oath, stood between him and the door.

"Have your own way," he said, with baffled rage in his low, half-whispering tones. "Have your own way—and see what comes of it." With those words he left the room.

Madame Fosco glanced inquiringly at her husband. "He has gone away very suddenly," she said. "What does it mean?"

It means that you and I together have brought the worst-tempered man in all England to his senses," answered the Count. "It means, Miss Halcombe, that Lady Clyde is relieved from a gross indignity, and you from the repetition of an unpardonable insult. Suffer me to express my admiration of your conduct and your courage at a very trying moment."

"Sincere admiration," sobbed Madame Fosco.

"Sincere admiration," echoed the Count. I had no longer the strength of my first angry resistance to outrage and injury to support me. My heart-sick anxiety to see Laura, my sense of my own helpless ignorance of what had happened at the boat-house, pressed on me with an intolerable weight. I tried to keep my appearances by speaking to the Count and his wife in the tone which they had chosen to adopt in speaking to me. But the words failed on my lips—my breath came short and thick—my eyes looked longingly, in silence, at the door. The Count, understanding my anxiety, opened it, went out, and pulled it to after him. At the same time Sir Percival's heavy step descended the stairs. I heard them whispering together outside, while Madame Fosco was assuring me, in her calmest and most conventional manner, that she rejoiced, for all our sakes, that Sir Percival's conduct had not obliged her husband and herself to leave Blackwater Park. Before she had done speaking the whispering ceased, the door opened, and the Count looked in.

"Miss Halcombe," he said, "I am happy to inform you that Lady Clyde is mistress again in her own house. I thought it might be more agreeable to you to hear of this change for the better from me than from Sir Percival—and I have therefore purposely returned to mention it."

"Admirable delicacy!" said Madame Fosco, paying back her husband's tribute of admiration with the Count's own coin, in the Count's own manner. He smiled and bowed as if he had received a formal compliment from a polite stranger, and then went off to let me pass out first.

Sir Percival was standing in the hall. As I hurried by the stairs I heard him call impatiently to the Count to come out of the library.

"What are you waiting there for?" he said; "I want to speak to you."

"And I want to think a little by myself," replied the other. "Wait till later, Percival—wait till dinner-time."

Neither he nor his friend said any more. I gained the top of the stairs, and ran along the passage. My hand and my agitation I left the door of the ante-chamber open—but I closed the door of the bedroom the moment I was inside it.

Laura was sitting alone at the far end of the room; her work-basket, heavily on a table, and her face hidden in her hands. She started up, with a cry of delight, when she saw me.

"How is your head?" she asked. "Who gave you leave? Not Sir Percival?"

In my overpowering anxiety to hear what she had to tell me, I could not answer her—I could only put questions, on my side. Laura's eagerness to know what had passed down stairs proved, however, too strong to be resisted. She persistently repeated her inquiries.

"The Count," I said, at last. "I answered, impatiently. "Whose influence in the house—?"

She stopped me with a gesture of disgust.

"Don't speak of him," she cried. "The Count is the vilest creature breathing! The Count is a miserable Spy—!"

Before we could either of us say another word we were alarmed by a soft knocking at the door of the bedroom.

"Who is there?" I asked; and I went first to see who it was. When I opened the door, Madame Fosco confronted me with my handkerchief in her hand.

"You dropped this down stairs, Miss Halcombe," she said. "I thought I could bring it to you as I was passing by to my own room."

Her face, naturally pale, had turned to such a ghastly whiteness that I started at the sight of it. Her hands, so sure and steady at all other times, trembled violently; and her eyes looked wolfishly past me through the open door, and fixed on Laura.

She was listening before she knocked! I saw it in her white face; I saw it in her trembling hands. I saw it in her look at Laura.

After waiting an instant she turned away from me in silence, and slowly walked away.

I closed the door again. "Oh, Laura! Laura! we shall both rue the day when we spoke those words!"

"You would have spoken them yourself, Marian, if you had known what I did know. Anne Catherick was right. There was a third person watching us in the plantation yesterday; and that third person—"

"Are you sure it was the Count?"

"I am absolutely certain. He was the Percival's spy—he was Sir Percival's informer—he set Sir Percival watching and waiting, all the morning thro', for Anne Catherick and for me."

"Did you find anything found? Did you see her at the lake?"

"No. She has sealed herself by keeping away from the place. When I got to the boat-house no one was there."

"You're sure?"

"I went in and sat waiting for a few minutes. But my restlessness made me get up again to walk about a little. As I passed out I saw some marks on the sand close under the front of the boat-house. I stooped down to examine them, and discovered a word written in large letters on the sand. The word was—look."

"And you scraped away the sand and dug a hole? place in it?"

"How do you know that, Marian?"

"I saw the hollow-place myself when I followed you to the boat-house. Go on—go on!"

"Yes; I scraped away the sand on the surface—but in a little while I came to a strip of paper hidden beneath, which had escaped my art. The writing was signed with Anne Catherick's initials."

"Where is it?"

"Sir Percival has taken it from me."

"Can you remember what the writing was? Do you think you can repeat it to me."

"In substance I can, Marian. It was very short. You would have remembered it word for word."

"Try to tell me what the substance was before we go any further."

She complied. I write the lines down here exactly as she repeated them to me. They ran thus:

"I was seen with you yesterday by a tall, stout old man, and had to run to save myself. He was not quick enough on his feet to follow me, and he lost me among the trees. I dare not risk coming back here to-day at the same time. I write this and put it in all the usual, at six in the morning, to tell you so. When we speak next of your wicked husband's Secret we must speak safely, or not at all. Try to have patience. I promise you shall see me again; and that soon.—A. C."

The reference to the "tall, stout old man" (the terms of which Laura was certain that she had repeated to me correctly), left no doubt as to who the writer had been. I called to mind that I had told Sir Percival, in the Count's presence, the day before, that Laura had gone to the boat-house to look for her brooch. In all probability he had followed her there, in his officious way, to relieve her mind about the matter of the ignorance, immediately after he had mentioned the change in Sir Percival's plans to me in the drawing-room. In this case he could only have got to the neighborhood of the boat-house at the very moment when Anne Catherick discovered him. The suspiciously hurried manner in which she parted from Laura had no doubt prompted his useless attempt to follow her. Of the conversation which had previously taken place between them he could have heard nothing. The distance between the house and the lake, and the time at which he left me in the drawing-room, as compared with the time at which Laura and Anne Catherick had been speaking together, proved that fact to us, at any rate, beyond a doubt.

Having arrived at something like a conclusion so far, my next great interest was to know what discoveries Sir Percival had made after Count Fosco had given him his information.

"How came you to lose possession of the letter?" I asked. "What did you do with it when you found it in the sand?"

"After reading it once through," she replied, "I took it into the boat-house with me, to sit down, and look it over a second time. While I was reading a shadow fell across the paper. I looked up, and saw Sir Percival standing in the door-way watching me."

"Did you try to hide the letter?"

"I tried—but he stopped me. 'You needn't trouble to hide that,' he said. 'I happen to have read it.' I could only look at him helplessly—I could say nothing. 'You understand?' he went on; 'I have read it. I dug it up out of the sand two hours since, and buried it again, and swum the word above it again, and left it ready to your hands. You can't lie yourself out of the scrape now. You saw Anne Catherick in secret yesterday, and you have got her letter in your hand at this moment. I have not caught her; but I have caught you. Give me the letter." He stepped close up to me—I was alone with him, Marian—what could I do?—gave him the letter.

"I SAW ON ONE THORNY BRANCH SOME FRAGMENTS OF FRINGE FROM A WOMAN'S SHAWL."

"What did he say when you gave it to him?"

"At first he said nothing. He took me by the arm, and led me out of the house-door, and looked about him on all sides, as if he was afraid of our being seen or heard. Then he clasped his hand round my arm, and whispered to me—'What did Anne Catherick say to you yesterday? I insist on hearing every word, you first to last.'"

"Did you tell him?"

"I was afraid with him, Marian—his cruel hand was bruising my arm—what could I do?"

"Is the mark on your arm still? Let me see it!"

"Why do you want to see it?"

"I want to see it, Laura, because our endearest mutual interests and our reputations must begin, to-day. That mark is a weapon to strike him with. Let me see it now—I may have to sweat to it at once—let me see."

"Oh, Marian, don't look so! don't talk so! It doesn't hurt me now!"

"Let me see it!"

She showed me the marks. I was past grieving over them, past crying over them, just shuddering over them. They say we are either better than men, or worse. If the temptation that has fallen to some women's way, and made them worse, had fallen in mine at that moment—Thank God! my face betrayed nothing that my wife could read. The gentle, innocent, affectionate creature thought I was frightened for her and soothed me—and thought no more.

"Don't think too seriously of it, Marian," she said, simply, as she pulled her sleeve down again. "It doesn't hurt me now."

"I will try to think quietly of it, my love, for your sake. Well! well! And you told him all that Anne Catherick had said to you—all that you told me?"

"Yes, all. He insisted on it—I was alone with him—I was cowed nothing."

"Did he say any thing when you had done?"

"He looked at me, and laughed in a way that is a mocking, bitter way. 'I mean to have the rest out of you,' he said; 'do you hear?—the rest.' I said to him submissively that I had told him every thing I knew. 'Not you!' he answered; 'you know more than you choose to tell. You will tell it! You will tell it!' He went it out of you at home if I can't wring it out of you here.' He led me away by a strange path through the shrubbery—a path where there was no hope of our meeting you—and he spoke no more till we came within sight of the house. Then he stopped again, and said, 'Will you take a second chance if I give it to you?' Will you think better of it and tell me the rest?' I could only repeat the same words I had spoken before. He cursed my obstinacy, and went on, and took me with him to the house. 'You can't deceive me,' he said; 'you know more than you choose to tell. I'll have your secret out of you; and I'll have a use for that sister of yours as well. There shall be no more plotting and whispering between you. Neither you nor she shall see each other again till you have confessed the truth. I'll have you watched morning, noon, and night till you confess the truth.' He was dead to every thing I could say. He took me straight up stairs into my own room. Fanny was sitting at work doing some work for me, and he instantly ordered her out. 'I'll take good care you're not mixed up in the conspiracy,' he said. 'You shall leave this house to-day.' If your mistress wants a maid she shall have our of my choosing.' He pushed me into the room and locked the door on me—he set that senseless woman to watch me outside—Marian! he looked and spoke like a madman. You may hardly understand it—he did indeed."

"I do understand it, Laura. He is mad—mad with the horrors of a guilty conscience. Every word you have said makes me positively certain that when Anne Catherick left you yesterday you were also the eye of discovery a secret which might have been your vile husband's ruin—and he thinks you have discovered it. Nothing you say or do will quiet that guilty distrust, and convince his false nature of your truth. I don't say this, my love, to alarm you, I say it to open your eyes to your position, and to convince you of the urgent necessity of letting me act at once for your protection while the chance is our own. Count Fosco's interference has secured me access to you to-day; but he may withdraw that interference to-morrow Sir Percival has already dismissed Fanny, because she is a quick-witted girl and devotedly attached to you, and has chosen a woman to take her place who cares nothing for your interests, and whose dull intelligence lowers her to the level of the watch-dog in the yard. It is impossible to say what violent measures he may take next, now he has made the most of our opportunities while we have them."

"What can we do, Marian? Oh, if we could only leave the house, never to see it again?"

"Listen to me, my love—and try to think that you are not quite helpless so long as I am here with you."

"I will think so—I do think so. Don't altogether forget poor Fanny in thinking of me. She wants help and comfort too."

"I will not forget her. I saw her before I came up here, and I have arranged to communicate with her to-night. Letters are not safe in the post-bag at Blackwater Park—and I shall have two to write to-day, in your interests, which must pass through no hands but Fanny's."

"What letters?"

"I mean to write first, Laura, to Mr. Gilmore's partner, who has offered to help us in any fresh emergency. Little as I know of the law, I am certain that it can protect a woman from such treatment as that ruffian has inflicted on you to-day. I will go into no details about Anne Catherick, because I have no certain information to give. But the lawyer shall know of those bruises on your arm, and of the violence used to your self-control. Shall I write before I rest to-night?"

"At think of the exposure, Marian!"

"I am calculating on the exposure. Sir Percival has more to dread from it than you have. The proper course of action may bring him to terms when nothing else will."

I rose as I spoke, but Laura entreated me not to leave her.

"You will drive him to desperation," she said; "and increase our dangers ten-fold."

I felt the truth—the disheartening truth—of those words. But I could not bring myself plainly to acknowledge it to her. In our dread of positive danger, we do help and no hope for us but in risking the worst. I said so in general terms. She sighed faintly, but did not contest the matter. She only asked about the second letter that I had proposed writing. To whom was it to be addressed?

"To Mr. Fairlie," I said. "If you value your nearest male relative, and the head of the family, he ought to know of this."

Laura shook her head sorrowfully.

"Yes, yes," I went on; "your uncle is a weak, selfish, helpless man, I know. But he is not Sir Percival Glyde, and he has no such friend about him as Count Fosco. He cannot do nothing from his kindness, or his tenderness of feeling toward you, or toward me. But he will do any thing from his indolence, and from his desire to secure his own quiet. Let me only persuade him that his interference at this moment will save him inevitable trouble, and inevitable responsibility hereafter, and he will bestir himself for his own sake. I know how to deal with him, Laura—I have had some practice."

"If you could only prevail on him to let me go back to Limmeridge for a little while, and stay there quietly with you, Marian, I would be almost as happy again as I was before I was married!"

Those words set me thinking in a new direction. Would it be possible to place Sir Percival between the two strongest forces that opposed him—between the fear of exposure, and the fear of setting himself to the scandal of legal interference on his wife's behalf, or of allowing her to be quietly separated from him, at her request, under pretext of a visit to her uncle's house? And could he, in that case, be reckoned on as likely to accept the last course? I felt as doubtful—more than doubtful. And yet, hopeless as the experiment seemed, surely it was worth trying, if I resolved to try it, in sheer despair of knowing what better to do.

"I can hardly still know the wish you have just expressed," I said; "and I will ask the lawyer's advice on the subject as well. Good night, my love, and—I—I—don't forget."

Saying that, I rose again; and again Laura tried to make me resume my seat.

"Don't leave me," she said earnestly. "My desk is on that table. You can write here."

It tried me to the quick to refuse her, even in the slightest interests. She had been too long shut up alone together already. Our chance of seeing each other again might depend perhaps on our not exciting any fresh suspicions. It was full time to show myself, quietly and unconcernedly among the servants below, at the risk very moment, perhaps, thinking of us and talking of us down stairs. I explained the miserable necessity to Laura, and prevailed on her to recognize it, as I did.

"I will come back again, love, in an hour or less," I said. "The worst is over for to-day. Keep yourself quiet, and fear nothing."

"Is the key in the door, Marian? Can't I lock it on the inside?"

"Yes; here is the key. Lock the door, and open it to nobody but me or Fanny again."

I kissed her, and left her. It was a relief to me, as I walked away, to hear the key turned in the lock, and to know that the door was at her own command.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, March 19, in the Senate, a bill was passed fixing the postage on drop-letters at one cent, instead of two, and authorizing the Postmaster-General to issue stamps of the denomination of one cent. A resolution calling on the President for information in relation to the Mormon troubles in Utah, and as to the present condition of affairs, was agreed to. Mr. Douglas called up his long-pending resolution for the Admission of Kansas. The question was on the amendment proposed by a recipient of mounted volunteers on the Gila River, N. M., to Gadsden, delivered a speech on our relations with Mexico.

On Tuesday, March 20, in the Senate, a resolution was adopted directing inquiry as to the expediency of extinguishing the Indian title to land in and about Fox's Peak. A joint resolution that Congress adjourn from April 24 to May 20 was proposed, but objected to and laid aside. Several resolutions having reference to the suppression of the African slave-trade were introduced by Senator Wilson. The bill providing for the payment of the claims of Florida was discussed. An executive session was held, and a motion made to reconsider the vote whereby the Nicaragua treaty was rejected. Considerable discussion ensued, but the Senate adjourned without taking the question. In the House, the Military Academy appropriation bill, with the amendment providing for a reinstated regiment of volunteers for the defence of the frontier of Texas, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. A bill authorizing the President to call into service a regiment of volunteers for the suppression of hostilities in New Mexico was similarly referred. The investigations of the Committee on Elections, allowing Messrs. Sickles and Williamson sixty days in which to take testimony in the Indiana contest, was debated till the adjournment.

On Wednesday, March 21, in the Senate, the House bill providing for the protection of female passengers on board steamboats was passed. A resolution was offered on the President to inform the Senate if any instructions have been given to naval officers by which the United States naval forces were to take part in the civil war in Mexico, and if any of the Mexican vessels of war recently captured, was adopted. The President was also asked to communicate the correspondence that has taken place with reference to the difficulties between the Government and the Mormons. The bill to reduce the price of the public printing, and to regulate the binding thereof, was taken up. The bill was amended so as to reduce the charges for printing to 25 cents per sheet, and 50 cents for binding, and to apply to all the public printing executed during the present session of Congress. Several private bounty-land bills and the binding shall be done by binders elected by Congress. The bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary Lee Custis Lewis's claim was debated, and its further consideration postponed till the 2d April. Mr. Hunter, from the committee, had proposed calling for information relative to the capture of Walker's expedition to Nicaragua, but the motion was objected to. The resolution of the Committee on Military Affairs, directing Messrs. Sickles and Williamson time to take testimony respecting the allegations relative to the election in Indiana, was adopted.

On Thursday, March 22, in the Senate, the bill to establish mail routes in Minnesota Territory, was passed. A resolution was adopted calling for information relative to the expenses of the Utah expedition. The bill for the relief of Mrs. Lewis was debated, and its further consideration postponed till the 2d April. Mr. Douglas's resolution was then taken up, and Mr. Douglas addressed the Senate in support of it. The bill providing for the payment of the claims of Florida was discussed. An executive session was held, and a motion made to reconsider the vote whereby the Nicaragua treaty was rejected. Considerable discussion ensued, but the Senate adjourned without taking the question. In the House, the Military Academy appropriation bill, with the amendment providing for a reinstated regiment of volunteers for the defence of the frontier of Texas, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. A bill authorizing the President to call into service a regiment of volunteers for the suppression of hostilities in New Mexico was similarly referred. The investigations of the Committee on Elections, allowing Messrs. Sickles and Williamson sixty days in which to take testimony in the Indiana contest, was debated till the adjournment.

On Wednesday, March 21, in the Senate, the House bill providing for the protection of female passengers on board steamboats was passed. A resolution was offered on the President to inform the Senate if any instructions have been given to naval officers by which the United States naval forces were to take part in the civil war in Mexico, and if any of the Mexican vessels of war recently captured, was adopted. The President was also asked to communicate the correspondence that has taken place with reference to the difficulties between the Government and the Mormons. The bill to reduce the price of the public printing, and to regulate the binding thereof, was taken up. The bill was amended so as to reduce the charges for printing to 25 cents per sheet, and 50 cents for binding, and to apply to all the public printing executed during the present session of Congress. Several private bounty-land bills and the binding shall be done by binders elected by Congress. The bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary Lee Custis Lewis's claim family, also residents of this county. The attempt was made about a year ago by putting red precipitate, a cutaneous medicine, into a sealed tin case every part of which hardly, however, was not taken by the family seeing in the precise stench the noxious exudate. Hopkins was not acquitted of perpetrating the act until a few days since, when, in a state of intoxication, he disclosed the affair to some persons living here, threatening at the same time, that if they divulged the secret he would kill them. A former wife of Ashworth died a month previous to the beginning of the above, and experienced the same pious gave it as their opinion that she was poisoned. A deep malice has existed between the families for years. The prisoner will be immediately examined.

FRANCE.

A New York correspondent of the Charleston Courier says: "Mons. H. Grimsell, a leading partner for a number of years in the house of Grimsell, Minturn, & Co., will soon withdraw from the concern, and return with his family to Europe to spend certainly a year. Mr. Grimsell has sold his splendid residence at the corner of Fifth avenue and Fourteenth Street. Some say that Grimsell, Minturn, & Co. will retain its old name, as Mr. Minturn is the partner, his son, and a nephew of Mr. Grimsell, will continue to be partners in it. Henry Grimsell has married the accomplished daughter of the late Commodore Stewart, and some of his sons were ever partners in the concern. The chemists of this city, and the Academy of Medicine of the State at large, can fill spare Mons. Grimsell.

Captain Judkins, one of the Cunard captains, was reelected by a majority of 1,000 votes, over a number of Boston merchants by Louis Napoleon, who was once a passenger on the Cunard steamer.

General Garibaldi has received a present from the Americans of New York, consisting of a handsome gun, which will live thirty shots without being reloaded.

Again the Democratic journals announce that Miss Hinckley, of Albany, the American prima donna, has had a new success in Amsterdam. The Albany Argus says that in the opera of "Linda," in presence of the Queen of Holland, she was drawn out from her by the band, and called for by the great pleasure afforded by her singing. Her Majesty has several of the young artists to court since, and says that she has been dreaming of her ever since—"she sings like a fairy." Miss Hinckley has had several offers to sing in Italy and France. At Utrecht, she sang a concert, and the house was crowded to hear her with students. After the concert she was serenaded by the students, and as there is a torch-light procession, the lady was called out upon the balcony of her hotel, and saluted with cheers and five volleys of musketry. She also prepared in her house. At Rotterdam, also, her success was great.

Zadock Pratt performed the journey from San Francisco to St. Louis without stopping at a single station more than half an hour, the whole occupying 19 days, with 120 hours lost in all, and six horses or mules to the team, about half being mules. This is a wonderful feat for a man nearly seventy years of age. He was not a conductor and a driver, both armed to the teeth. In some places they had to travel 16 miles, and have 20 miles to water.

The Times, Paris, in explanation of the cause of the death of the Hon. David A. Bokee in Washington, has translated a letter in Coroner's jury:

"He very seldom complained of sickness. Meeting him accidentally at the door of the hotel two or three days yesterday, witness remarked to him that he looked unwell. His reply was, that he felt sick at his stomach. Witness advised him to take a couple of blue pills early in the morning, and a bottle of Congress water in the morning, and to continue the taking of the Congress water for a week. He stated that he would do so. Witness afterward saw him for the last time about four o'clock.

The United States steam frigate Brandon left Hampton Roads on the 19th inst. with the Hon. Robert M. Lamb, Minister to Mexico, and Colonel J. T. Pickett, Consul at Vera Cruz, on board. She will proceed to the port of Vera Cruz for the purpose of securing protection to the lives and interests of the various Ivers during the threatened attack on that place by Miramon.

A correspondent of the Advocate styles, writing from Chicago, under date of March 16, says: "I heard this morning that Mr. Douglas had withdrawn his name for the Presidency.

Margaret Dillon, an Irish domestic, was looking at the Pemberton Mill when it fell. She was so completely paralyzed by fright that moment she lost the power of speech, and though she has attended to her work regularly since, not once has she uttered a word!

Mr. Ulysses J. Faulkner, the new American Minister at Paris, has taken a suite of rooms for the winter on the Place de l'Arc de Triomphe, at the extremity of the Champs Elysées.

Barry, the artist, while on a late visit to Boston, came across the face of a white linen table-cloth, worn many years ago, by the wife of Robert Burns, and spread on the table when the poet's funeral supper was given. Enterprising man was the Edinburgh gentry deligned to honor their prodigal bard with a similar patronizing visit. Late in the evening Mr. B. produced the sacred relic, which, of course, created quite a sugar and sensation among some of the company. Then, at the suggestion of a lady present, he cut out a piece of the cloth, and, inserting it in a pocket-book, handed it to her. A Scotch gentleman present, and over the table-cloth, hallowed by the memory of Burns, the poet's wife, and Auld Lang-syne in dust and ancient age.

Miss Dorothea Dix, who died last week in Trenton, from the effects of small-tipping. She fell asleep, about the "early" hours of the morning, and was found some hours after. A post-mortem examination revealed the fact that a small blood-vessel had just, which was converted into nicotine, a deadly poison. Her lips, cheek, and breast were stained with the foul stuff during the last struggles, since in her room. Before she retired she felt a deadly sickness, which swallowed some of the stuff, but as she had used it so long, nothing was thought of her complaint until it was too late.

Governor Alexander Ramsey, of Minnesota, has sent a veto message to the census long to the Legislature, giving reasons why he can not sign an act to commute the sentence of Mrs. Sarah Bilnesky, now under sentence of death in St. Paul, to imprisonment in the State Prison during her natural life. Mrs. Bilnesky was convicted of the murder of her husband, Stanislaus Bilnesky, by poison. The Legislature did not pass the bill over the Governor's veto; consequently Mrs. Bilnesky will be hung on the 23rd inst.

Madame de Wilhurst of New York recently appeared in opera at Berlin, and met with quite a favorable impression, as the Boston Traveller says.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT—THE SAVOY QUESTION.

In the House of Commons, March 5, the report on the Customs Act was brought up, and agreed to with a few amendments.

On proceeding to the other orders of the day, Lord Palmerston moved that they be postponed until after the motion of which notice by Mr. Bright for an address to her Majesty, on the subject of the commercial treaty with France.

Mr. Lindsay observed that the terms of that motion were not sufficiently clear.

Mr. Kinglake opposed the motion of Lord Palmerston, and called upon the House not to depart from the ordinary mode of proceeding.

Mr. Bryg said it was the opinion of the House that the exact terms of his motion should be previously before it, he would postpone the motion until Thursday.

Lord Palmerston then offered to withdraw his motion. Objections were raised to the proposed day, and the discussion of this question gradually drew into its area the whole of the much larger discussions, the most prominent being the annexation of Savoy to France.

Mr. Bryg had argued this subject with great earnestness upon the House, and expressed his hope that Parliament would address a solemn protest against that act.

Mr. Bright spoke next, and was followed by Mr. Fitzgerald.

Mr. Roebuck inveighed against the Emperor of the French, whom he accused of breach of treaties.

Lord John Russell said that our irritating dissensions only roused suspicion and distrust, and were calculated to bring about a total rupture with a neighboring friendly country. He thought the present was not the time to raise the discussion of the cession of Savoy to France—it had not spoken on the subject. His opinion was, that the treaty of Vienna could not be set aside—indeed, it appeared by Parliament, to draw closer the ties of friendship between the two countries. It was for the interest in the blessings of peace, which would tend to promote the happiness of both.

After some further discussion the motion was withdrawn.

THE NEW FRENCH TREATY.

In the Commons, March 6, Mr. Bryg moved an address to the Crown, approving of the new commercial treaty with France, and praying her Majesty would be take the necessary steps to carry it into effect.

Lord A. Vane, in a maiden speech in Parliament, declaring that Parliament decisions to express any opinion on the treaty until it was ratified by the Legislature of the Emperor of the French with respect to Savoy are made "nonsense." The chemists of this city, and the Academy of Medicine of the State at large, can fill spare Mons. Grimsell.

Captain Judkins, one of the Cunard captains, was reelected by a majority of 1,000 votes, over a number of Boston merchants by Louis Napoleon, who was once a passenger on the Cunard steamer.

General Garibaldi has received a present from the Americans of New York, consisting of a handsome gun, which will live thirty shots without being reloaded.

Again the Democratic journals announce that Miss Hinckley, of Albany, the American prima donna, has had a new success in Amsterdam. The Albany Argus says that in the opera of "Linda," in presence of the Queen of Holland, she was drawn out from her by the band, and called for by the great pleasure afforded by her singing. Her Majesty has several of the young artists to court since, and says that she has been dreaming of her ever since—"she sings like a fairy." Miss Hinckley has had several offers to sing in Italy and France. At Utrecht, she sang a concert, and the house was crowded to hear her with students. After the concert she was serenaded by the students, and as there is a torch-light procession, the lady was called out upon the balcony of her hotel, and saluted with cheers and five volleys of musketry. She also prepared in her house. At Rotterdam, also, her success was great.

Zadock Pratt performed the journey from San Francisco to St. Louis without stopping at a single station more than half an hour, the whole occupying 19 days, with 120 hours lost in all, and six horses or mules to the team, about half being mules. This is a wonderful feat for a man nearly seventy years of age. He was not a conductor and a driver, both armed to the teeth. In some places they had to travel 16 miles, and have 20 miles to water.

The Times, Paris, in explanation of the cause of the death of the Hon. David A. Bokee in Washington, has translated a letter in Coroner's jury:

"He very seldom complained of sickness. Meeting him accidentally at the door of the hotel two or three days yesterday, witness remarked to him that he looked unwell. His reply was, that he felt sick at his stomach. Witness advised him to take a couple of blue pills early in the morning, and a bottle of Congress water in the morning, and to continue the taking of the Congress water for a week. He stated that he would do so. Witness afterward saw him for the last time about four o'clock.

The United States steam frigate Brandon left Hampton Roads on the 19th inst. with the Hon. Robert M. Lamb, Minister to Mexico, and Colonel J. T. Pickett, Consul at Vera Cruz, on board. She will proceed to the port of Vera Cruz for the purpose of securing protection to the lives and interests of the various Ivers during the threatened attack on that place by Miramon.

A correspondent of the Advocate styles, writing from Chicago, under date of March 16, says: "I heard this morning that Mr. Douglas had withdrawn his name for the Presidency.

Margaret Dillon, an Irish domestic, was looking at the Pemberton Mill when it fell. She was so completely paralyzed by fright that moment she lost the power of speech, and though she has attended to her work regularly since, not once has she uttered a word!

Mr. Ulysses J. Faulkner, the new American Minister at Paris, has taken a suite of rooms for the winter on the Place de l'Arc de Triomphe, at the extremity of the Champs Elysées.

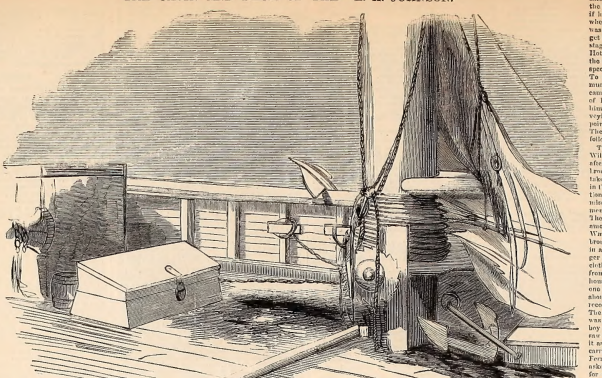
Barry, the artist, while on a late visit to Boston, came across the face of a white linen table-cloth, worn many years ago, by the wife of Robert Burns, and spread on the table when the poet's funeral supper was given. Enterprising man was the Edinburgh gentry deligned to honor their prodigal bard with a similar patronizing visit. Late in the evening Mr. B. produced the sacred relic, which, of course, created quite a sugar and sensation among some of the company. Then, at the suggestion of a lady present, he cut out a piece of the cloth, and, inserting it in a pocket-book, handed it to her. A Scotch gentleman present, and over the table-cloth, hallowed by the memory of Burns, the poet's wife, and Auld Lang-syne sung in dust and ancient age.

Miss Dorothea Dix, who died last week in Trenton, from the effects of small-tipping. She fell asleep, about the "early" hours of the morning, and was found some hours after. A post-mortem examination revealed the fact that a small blood-vessel had just, which was converted into nicotine, a deadly poison. Her lips, cheek, and breast were stained with the foul stuff during the last struggles, since in her room. Before she retired she felt a deadly sickness, which swallowed some of the stuff, but as she had used it so long, nothing was thought of her complaint until it was too late.

Governor Alexander Ramsey, of Minnesota, has sent a veto message to the census long to the Legislature, giving reasons why he can not sign an act to commute the sentence of Mrs. Sarah Bilnesky, now under sentence of death in St. Paul, to imprisonment in the State Prison during her natural life. Mrs. Bilnesky was convicted of the murder of her husband, Stanislaus Bilnesky, by poison. The Legislature did not pass the bill over the Governor's veto; consequently Mrs. Bilnesky will be hung on the 23rd inst.

Madame de Wilhurst of New York recently appeared in opera at Berlin, and met with quite a favorable impression, as the Boston Traveller says.

FOREIGN NEWS.



ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT—THE SAVOY QUESTION.

In the House of Commons, March 5, the report on the Customs Act was brought up, and agreed to with a few amendments.

On proceeding to the other orders of the day, Lord Palmerston moved that they be postponed until after the motion of which notice by Mr. Bryg

THE CABIN AND DECK OF THE "E. A. JOHNSON."

SCENE OF THE FIRST CONFLICT ON BOARD THE SLOOP "E. A. JOHNSON," WITH THE BLOOD-STAINS ON THE DECK.

We give herewith pictures of the cabin and deck of the E. A. Johnson, with the traces of the fearful struggle of which they were the scene.

The first thing that attracted the attention of Captain Downs and Lieut. on boarding the E. A. Johnson, was the presence of blood in large quantities upon the deck. In no less than three places were there extensive pools of gore and marks which evidently showed that some bloody substance had been dragged along the deck and thrown overboard. The cabin presented a still more horrible appearance than the deck, the floor and all the furniture being covered or spotted with blood.

The cabin had evidently been the scene of some sanguinary struggle. The floor, ceiling, benches, and furniture were all stained with blood. A further examination showed that the cabin had been ransacked by some persons as if in search of plunder, for upon the floor were strewed articles of clothing, papers, bedding, etc. The Coroner's deputies took notice of every thing they found in the cabin, among which were the following articles: A skate, on which were still to be found —"I now take my pen in my hand to let you know that I am well, and I hope you are the same. I left Egg Harbor—" A coffee-pot, covered with blood and human hair, was found in a corner near the stove. A broom, which had apparently been used in scooping the blood from the floor, and a hammer, also smeared with blood, were found near the companion-way. Marks of blood were found on the ladder leading to the deck, upon the lockers, upon the sides of the cabin, and upon the ceiling. There were four fresh and distinct marks, as if made with the blade of a knife or short hatchet, upon the transom and ceiling, and one of the lieutenants was stained with blood. A pair of pantaloons, in the pockets of which were found twenty-nine cents, were found wrapped up in a piece of blood-stained paper; also the handle of a carpet-bag or valise, which had recently been torn off. The cuts were, upon examination, found to be filled with blood, which had leaked down from the floor, and allowed to remain there in the clotted state in which it was discovered. All the lockers and closets were stained with blood, probably by the assassin in search of plunder, as also the stove and cooking utensils.

From the cabin the blood was traced up the companion-way to the deck, where marks as if produced by the dragging of some bloody substance were observable all along from the cabin door to the side of the vessel. The rail, too, was smeared with blood, and also the side of the sloop, showing that the assassin concluded his work by throwing the evidence of his guilt into the sea. The finger-marks of blood on the rail and the indentation of a knife-tends to the belief that the murderer was compelled to sever the hand of his victim as he clung to this frail support before he could throw him overboard.

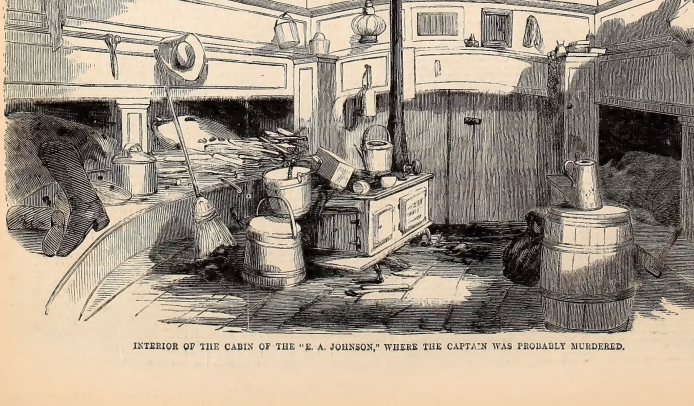
Amidships on the starboard side, near the centre-board, was found a large pool of blood, which was also traced to the side of the vessel. The second victim had probably been murdered here, dragged to the rail, and committed to the deep. Further forward, near the main hatch, was another pool of blood, connecting with a fourth pool around the foremost mid-forecastle hatchway, and occupying a space of about six feet square. In the latter pool was found a lock of brown hair, which had evidently been torn out of the murdered man's head in the struggle.

HOW THE PRISONER WAS IDENTIFIED.

On Saturday evening, soon after the arrival of the prisoner, the man John Burke, with whom he had lived in Cedar Street, was confronted with the prisoner, whom he identified at once as William Johnson, the man who, with his wife and child, had left No. 123 Cedar Street on Wednesday afternoon, and went on board the Fall River boat. Mr. Simmons also stepped forward and recognized the prisoner as one of the hands who sailed from this port with Captain Burr on board the sloop E. A. Johnson. Upon being asked if he knew Captain Burr, he said he did not, he never saw him, and never sailed in the vessel commanded by him. Other questions were put to him by Mr. Simmons, but they were all answered in the same vague manner.

Yesterday afternoon an old man named Charley La Coste, who keeps a coffee and cake stand near the East Broadway stage terminus at the South Ferry, identified Johnson as the man who, on Wednesday morning last, at about 5 o'clock, stepped opposite to his stand, apparently looking to see that he had Chevriol, when he asked him if he wanted some coffee. He afterward went into the booth and sat down, leaving what appeared to be his clothes-bag outside the railings. He had coffee and cakes, which amounted to the sum of six cents. When about to leave, he handed him a ten-dollar gold piece in payment, which he asked him if he had no less change. He said he had, and pulled from his pocket a handful of gold, silver, and some cents, and, abstracting a half dime and a cent, paid his bill. About this time some bootblacks came round and wanted to black his boots. He looked down at his feet, and said his boots were not worth the trouble. He then asked if he could get a carriage, when La Coste told him it was too early; he ought to get into an East Broadway stage and ride up to Frenche's Hotel, as he had asked for the whereabouts of a respectable place to put up at. To this suggestion he demurred, when a newsboy came up to him, took hold of his bag, and implored him for the privilege of conveying his bag to any given point of the Metropolis. The boy took the bag and followed the man.

That boy's name was William Bryan. Yesterday afternoon the prisoner was brought from his cell, and taken into the officers' room in the back part of the Station-House, where a promiscuous assemblage of men had been gathered in. The prisoner took his place among them. The boy, Wm. Dreen, was then brought into the room, and in a moment stated his finger upon the man whose clothes-bag he had carried from La Coste's stand to the house No. 129 Cedar Street, one morning last week, about 8 o'clock; he did not recollect which morning. The man thus pointed out was the prisoner. The same boy immediately afterward saw the bag, and identified it as the one which he had carried from the South Ferry to Cedar Street. He asked Johnson fifty cents for the job, but on his refusal he compromised, and took three shillings.



Alonzo Egbert was introduced in the same manner as the boy, and selected Johnson as the man who spoke to him on the bridge at the Vanderbilt landing on Staten Island, last Wednesday morning between 6 and 7 o'clock. He was not certain, but he thought he was the man.

Augustus Gilder, the boy who sold Johnson the oyster stew, the eggs, and the miserable hot gins, was also introduced in the same manner. He at once pointed out Johnson, and said, "That is the man."

Another little boy, who had acted to block Johnson's boots at the South Ferry, was introduced. He looked carefully through the crowd, repeatedly fastening his eyes upon Johnson. The boy at last stepped opposite Johnson again; the prisoner satisfied this, made a contortion, and turned away his face, when the boy said he could not see the man. The prisoner was then taken back to his cell.

The movements of the prisoner are so thoroughly linked with this shocking crime, that they form a complete chain of circumstantial evidence; and this chain, which is riveted with iron strength, can be traced, link by link, from the loading of the yacht to the arrest of Johnson.

It remains to be seen how the ends of justice will be served.

INTERIOR OF THE CABIN OF THE "E. A. JOHNSON," WHERE THE CAPTAIN WAS PROBABLY MURDERED.

THE CARSTANG-SHAW CASE AT ST. LOUIS.

We engrave herewith, from sketches made for us by M. G. G. Friedlen, of St. Louis, Missouri, a portrait of Miss Effie Carstang, the plaintiff in the famous case of Carstang vs. Shaw; and a picture of the Court-room during the trial of the case. Very few of our readers need to be reminded that this is the great breach-of-promise case which was tried a year ago, and then resulted in a verdict of $100,000 damages for the plaintiff. A new trial was ordered, which is now proceeding.

THE PLAINTIFF.

The plaintiff, Miss Effie Catharine Carstang, has lived in comparative obscurity till the commencement of the present proceedings. She went to St. Louis in the year 1851, and has resided since on Fifth Street, between Franklin Avenue and Morgan, with Mrs. Seamon, her sister. Her acquaintance with Mr. Shaw commenced during the year 1856, and the promise to marry is alleged to have been given in November, 1854. In personal appearance Miss Carstang is rather tall in figure, and withal graceful, has dark hair, brilliant eyes, blonde complexion, and a firmness of character which has marked her participation in the present suit since its inception. We should judge the lady to be on the shady side of thirty, and not unattractive in point of personal beauty. She has maintained a remarkable perseverance throughout the whole trial, and accompanied her counsel personally to New York and other places, gathering testimony in her own vindication. The attempt to compel her to give bonds for the payment of the costs was unsuccessful, the motion therefor having been denied by Judge Leber. Pending this matter, Mr. Carstang proved the ownership of property reputed to be worth about $2,000 of promissory notes secured by a mortgage on land on the southwest branch of the Pacific Railroad.

Her counsel stated that she is a native of New York or Brooklyn. Her parents both are dead. Her father was a worthy and conspicuous member of the Methodist Church, well known and respected by his neighbors in Brooklyn as a citizen, and enjoying a license to preach and exhort in the church of which he was a member, though pursuing a secular business during the days of the week. He died some ten years ago, his wife having died before him. The plaintiff is now, as she has been for several years, without any near male relative.

She is without wealth or wealthy friends, and is doubtless much perplexed to meet the severe pecuniary demands to which she has been subjected in the manner in which she has prosecuted this suit.

THE DEFENDANT.

The defendant, Henry Shaw, has been a resident of St. Louis for forty-one years. He was formerly a merchant, and acquiring great wealth, retired from business as long ago as 1841. Subsequently he went to Europe and traveled extensively on the Continent, spending several months in Italy, observing the arts and artists of that country. From early youth botany has been his favorite study, and while in Europe Mr. Shaw improved every opportunity to gather information or profit from the experience of others on this subject. In personal appearance Mr. Shaw is of medium height, hearty complexion, rather sharp in features, with blue eyes, and possessed of great quantity of hair—in fact, one of the politest men in St. Louis. His age is between fifty and sixty, and his hair is tinged with gray. His wealth is variously estimated at between $1,500,000 and $2,000,000. On the corner of Seventh and Locust streets, his city residence forms quite an ornament to that locality. It is a three-story brick building, with a wing in the shape of an L, built in rather a quaint style of architecture, and has a carriage entrance on Locust Street. About ten years ago Mr. Shaw became possessor of a tract of land, 600 acres in extent, situated in a southwesterly direction from the court-house, on the old Manchester road. At the time it was a barren prairie, but the wealth of the proprietor enabled him to transform the wilderness into a cooperative Eden.

MISS EFFIE CARSTANG.—[FROM A SKETCH BY G. G. FRIEDLEIN, ESQ.]

The first witness called was Mrs. Mary Seamon, sister of the plaintiff. We abridge her testimony.

THE SHAW COURTSHIP.

MRS. MARY SEAMON sworn, testifies: Know the plaintiff; am her sister; Mr. Shaw called to see my sister, the plaintiff, in the year 1854; can not say how long he staid at that time; was in the habit of staying half an hour or longer; continued his visits for nearly two years—until, I think, late in the fall of 1855; understood that he visited with a view to marriage; Mr. Shaw would come sometimes two or three times, sometimes once a week; generally in the morning, but also often in the afternoon and evening; never took his visits as visits to myself; he was sometimes entertained by myself, sometimes by my sister; sometimes in the parlor, and sometimes in the sitting-room; Mr. Shaw presented my sister with a set of jewelry, a piano, gloves, fruits, flowers, etc.; generally brought something at each visit; he and my sister sometimes rode out together; Mr. Shaw had visited about three or four times before I got to think that he came for purposes of marriage; at one time he brought some books; I was admiring them, and as was my sister; he asked us if we understood botany; said he wished to understand botany before he would like to make her his wife, and that was the reason he had brought the books; told my sister afterward I did not wish Mr. Shaw to come to my house, because I do not like rich men to visit us; the books were his first gift; some months after that he brought the jewelry; after that the piano; Mr. Shaw called one day to take my sister out riding, and on this occasion used the expression: "This time I will bring her back, but the next time when I take her out riding I shall not, because I want to make her my wife;" the gloves, of which there was a whole bag, were brought by the servant, while Mr. Shaw halted with his carriage at the door; this was left, as the piano was given, also before the jewelry was presented to my sister; think it was after the conversation about the books; my sister was willing and ready to marry him, and made preparations for the event; began to prepare in the summer of 1857, so far as I can remember; they were to live at Tower Grove; remember Mr. Shaw calling one day; he said it was very warm, and the country so much more pleasant than the city; then he added, "After I marry your sister I shall ask you if you will not come into the country and live with me?" Mr. Shaw, when he brought the piano, came accompanied with other men; asked me where he had better put it, as my sister was not at home, and had it put under his directions; this was in 1857; Mr. Shaw inquired afterward, at one time, whether she preferred much; the piano was called for by Mr. Shaw, late in the fall of 1857, and taken away; this was a few months previous to the bringing of the suit; I am not positive as regards the time—was not present; my sister, however, was at home at the time; think Mr. Shaw called once after she had received the piano, but she was not then at home—that was about a month or six weeks after the presentation of the piano; Mr. Shaw's deportment was very gentlemanly; his visits from the first gradually increased in frequency; some of the neighbors also noticed the circumstance; the marriage was to have taken place in the summer of 1857, to judge by the preparations; think Mr. Shaw called only once a year after that; was once in Tower Grove myself; there the flowers were brought from their cause at all seasons; and so also the fruit, consisting of pears, grapes, etc.; from the period when Mr. Shaw first visited down to the conversation about the suit, I think about two months elapsed; never asked Mr. Shaw as to what were his intentions with regard to my sister; my aunt died in August last at my house; when I told my sister of the impropriety of Mr. Shaw's visits, she said that his intentions were honorable, and, of course, I then had no more objection; my sister had some property, which she gave to me previous to her prospective marriage to Mr. Shaw; she settled the property upon me because I would not agree to live with her after her marriage; my sister wrote a letter to Mr. Shaw after he broke off his visits, which, however, was not noticed by him; Mr. Shaw and my sister were to have taken their marriage tour to Rochester, New York, where Mr. Shaw's mother resides.

THE TRIAL OF THE BREACH OF PROMISE CASE, CARSTANG vs. SHAW, AT ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI, MARCH, 1860.—[FROM A SKETCH BY G. G. FRIEDLEIN, ESQ.]

DID NOT LISTEN AT KEYHOLE.

The witness, on being cross-examined, said: Do not think I ever gave any other account to any body of the means of my knowledge of the breach of promise than the one given, but may have answered in an unsatisfactory manner questions put from mere motives of curiosity; do not recollect giving Mr. John McMullen (neighbor) a different account; do not recollect ever telling him that the only knowledge I had of the contract was derived from putting my ear to the keyhole of the parlor door, and listening to a conversation going on between Miss Ellie and Shaw, or to any body else; do not remember talking to Mr. Harris about it at all, but was present when my sister talked to him; may have put off his curiosity by giving an unsatisfactory answer; know a woman named Ellen O'Keefe—she was a servant girl in my house; never had any conversation with her about the contract; never told her what I had heard it was derived from listening through the keyhole; conversed with her once in this court-house on the subject of my testimony, but did not tell her that my lawyers told me that her testimony would kill the case; never told her any thing else calculated to affect, modify, or alter the testimony to be given by her in court.

DID EFFIE BORROW MONEY OF SHAW?

When we first came here we were out in debt to my lady, and paid out that year's rent in advance; knew my sister's handwriting; this writing (here shown) looks like plaintiff's hand; this another note similarly worded like plaintiff's hand; can't tell her writing without seeing her write it; never heard of these notes before this trial; if she gave them to Mr. Shaw, it was a secret that was not let into it; Effie has never denied the execution of these notes or bonds; don't think I ever heard my mother claim to my person; she has not said any thing to me, in particular, about them at all, didn't know of Effie borrowing money from defendant; don't know that she represented herself to Mr. Shaw as proud, and wanting to borrow fifty for the time of getting this money; don't know of any necessity that existed, requiring Effie to have the money at that time.

DID SHE VISIT SHAW AT HIS HOUSE?

Have visited Mr. Shaw's house in town between six and eight times; only visited it by night, various times; couldn't say whether it was three or a dozen times; we went to see Mr. Shaw, etc.; went to make him a farewell visit, as he was going away; never saw any white person there; have been there in the afternoon; returned home with my sister; cannot fix that time later than eight o'clock; it was winter that would make it dark; don't know that Effie Carstang was out all night of Mr. Shaw's house in town nor in the country either; don't know that she had a room at my house in town; don't think it likely that she would have had one without my knowing it; Mrs. C. might have staid out at Tower Grove one night without my knowing it; she has been absent from the house one or two nights; has staid with the family of Mrs. Bray, of Broadway; she went out to Mr. Shaw's; think she would have told me; don't know that she has been away from home more than two nights; don't think has been to St. Joseph to see her cousin; she went to Cincinnati about two months before the first trial, and returned in about two weeks; came home in the night, on the arrival of the cars; if Effie went to Mr. Shaw's and staid there all night she concealed it from me.

CONJUGAL TROUBLES OF EFFIE'S SISTER.

I stated on last trial that my husband lived with me in Brooklyn; my husband became home in New York city; was married in 1849; lived with my husband till 1856 or 1857; my husband left myself agreed to separate; the separation was effected to learn at this stage of the examination.) He could not get into any business, and could not support me; he did nothing, and could not get any thing to do. Q. Did you ever have any thing else against your husband than his drinking? A. Yes, my husband sought other society, and objectable, of both sexes. He went to the hotel more, as I was told, than was his custom; I suppose, why I left him; his failure to support me was one reason; I filed a bill for divorce in the City and County Courts, on the ground of adultery and desertion: am not sure about the desertion; it was a great while ago—1856.

Various questions were put to witness, tending to ascertain the nature of the Effie had been guilty of freedoms with young men. [Objection to the questions. Sustained. Defendant's counsel now that her husband on her had an illegitimate child. She was not aware that Effie had been in a love scrape similar to this at New Orleans.

TESTIMONY OF THE SERVANT.

The next witness was the servant, Rebecca Lemman. She said she had lived with Mrs. Seaman: lived with her more than once; the first time I staid with her three months; then went to her years ago [sic]; the 6th of April, afterward, I went to her a second time; this, I think, was the second April after I had left her; the second time I staid with her six months; was occupied as a servant; saw Mr. Shaw at Mrs. Seaman's; saw him at the door; saw Miss Ellie Carstang; that was during my first term of service; I then conducted him into the parlor; Effie came in before Miss Carstang; both lookingbody wanted to see her, without mentioning his name; Mr. Shaw did not call by name, but said to me, "Never mind—you just go up and tell Miss Carstang that somebody wants to see her;" after that now Mr. Shaw came frequently; sometimes three times a week, sometimes twice, sometimes four times; he never asked to see any body else but Miss Carstang; he would bring with him sometimes fruits, and sometimes flowers; they were for Miss Effie; don't think he ever brought any to Mrs. Seaman; knew of the picture. It was put up under the direction of Mr. Shaw; think the fair Mr. Shaw came to see Miss Effie, I reckon; saw him at the door, he asked for her, and I told him she had gone to the fair, and then he said, "I thought so;" once to the fair to-morrow she had been going once before that; he didn't seem to be mad because she was gone; I asked Miss Effie once if that gentleman (Mr. Shaw) staid in the house; she said no; she said I should stay with her as she was going to get married in two months. I asked her who she was going to marry—thought she was going to be married to Mr. Homes; she said no, but that she was going to marry a richer man than Mr. Homes was; she asked me where I thought she would rather have, one of the men of the house, or Mr. Shaw; I asked her if she was going to marry the old gentleman with a great deal of money while ago; I thought she was going to marry Mr. Homes; but she said she would rather have Mr. Shaw. I never heard Mr. Shaw say any thing himself about his going to be married to Miss Effie.

THE DEFENDANT'S CASE.

On Friday Mr. Stapley proceeded to open the case for the defendant, reciting what they intended to prove. He said that the plaintiff, instead of being introduced to Mr. Shaw, had sought his acquaintance for the purpose of entrapping him; that she applied to him for assistance in order to satisfy an inexorable landlord, and proffered Mr. Shaw security. He then reviewed the testimony relative to the promise of marriage, treating it very lightly. He also intimated very strongly that the character of the plaintiff for chastity was now about to be endeavored to be impeach a number of the witnesses. On Saturday Mr. S. concluded his address, and the testimony for the defense was commenced.

The first witness was William N. Davis, who, after making some statements damaging to the reputation of the plaintiff, being subjected to a cross-examination, his testimony dwindled down considerably. On Monday the deposition of Mrs. Chamberlain, taken at Cincinnati on the 27th of March, was read. She recollects that Mrs. Seaman knew of the alleged Judge Ivy black-mail affair. She had never heard of any thing against the character of the plaintiff for unchastity. Several other witnesses were examined, and the bulk of their testimony showed that they had heard some one express opinions that the characters of the sisters—Mrs. Seaman and Miss Carstang—were not good, but knew nothing positive themselves.

DEACON HOLBROOK.

My story opens in a New England sitting-room. There were three persons present. Let me introduce them in order. First there was Deacon Holbrook, an old man, not fat but round, seventy now, with white hair, a tall, spare form, and decided features. Next, his wife, a mother-in-law, and Mrs. Holbrook expressed in her calm benevolence on her face as to charm all who saw her. Yet, at this moment, anxiety, grief, and resentment struggled for the mastery. The third figure in our tableau was a young man, with a frank, handsome face, of good and cheerful expression, who sat by the wife, middle of the floor with downcast look, shrinking from the angry words which his father uttered.

"I tell you, Henry Holbrook," said he, "you have disgraced yourself and me—me, a Deacon of the Church. You have embittered the declining years of your parents."

"Do not be too hard with him, Deacon Holbrook," interposed his wife. "Remember it is his first fault."

"If it were any thing else," said his father, still unappeased, "but to marry a girl you can mislead become a gambler! My son, who has been so carefully trained in the way that he should go!"

"It is done once," urged the wife, with all of a mother's instincts.

"There are some crimes that can not be committed once," said the deacon, "and repentance is sin, returned the father, with unabated sternness.

All this while the young man had remained silent, though his varying color showed that he felt deeply the harshness of his father's words. At length he spoke:

"Father," said he, firmly, "you will one day repent your severity. No sooner had I sinned than I repented. I have been miserable ever since to you and my mother. Instead of encouraging me in my repentance, you load me with reproaches which in my own conscience had long anticipated, and which, Heaven knows, I did not need."

Deacon Holbrook was about to speak, but Henry rapidly continued: "To tell me I am guilty of treason you. I will remove myself and my disgrace from your presence."

As he was about to leave the room his mother asked anxiously, "Where would you go, Henry?"

"Stay him not, Hannah!" cried the Deacon sternly. "It is well that he should leave a place where he can no longer look an honest man in the face."

"Deacon Holbrook, he is our son!" said the wife, reproachfully.

"I wish I could forget it," was the unrelenting reply.

These last words reached the ears of the young man, as he left the room, and brought on an expression half of grief, half of indignation, swept over his face. He knew that he had done wrong, but he felt that he was not the only guilty person. With one farewell glance at his mother, full of unspoken gratitude and love, he left the house which had been to him so long a home.

This was the fault of which Henry Holbrook had been guilty: Having been sent to New York by his father to collect a sum of money due him, he had been allured to a gaming-house by a companion, and lost, first his own, then the money not until after much persuasion. Having lost a part of the money in his charge, he kept on playing in the hope of recovering his loss. But he never had been expected, instead of this he lost all that remained. Then thoroughly ashamed, and bitterly mortified, having forfeited the trust in his own home and confessed all. This confession was received, as we have seen, with severity by a child his confidence, and excite his indignation. And now he had gone forth from home, a wanderer, he knew not whither, with no effort on his father's part to stay him.

Let me do Deacon Holbrook the justice to say that he was not a hard-hearted man, nor a cruel his rigor. The sum, though not large—a hundred dollars—was yet of importance to him. Still he would overlook that, and not have cast his son out for crime, as he termed it, by which it was lost. There was much of the Puritan rigor in Deacon Holbrook. The Puritans were a people of stern principle, but not ourselves here and there in some of their descendants and in Deacon Holbrook we have them in a straight line from one of the pilgrims of the Mayflower.

After Henry's departure the old house became quieter than before. All the life had gone out of it. Deacon Holbrook himself was a man of few words, and his taciturnity had abated his wife's social tendency. Very long, very quiet, and very tedious were the evenings which they spent together. On one side of the fire-place sat the Deacon, gravely reading through his spectacles the agricultural paper which came weekly, and which was the only one he took, or perhaps he might be engaged upon "Pilgrim's Progress," or "Baxter's Call," his favorite works. Opposite him sat his wife, her fingers actively engaged in knitting, her mind intent upon her absent boy. All was staid, quiet, subdued. There was not even a kitten to enliven the scene. Mrs. Holbrook had once ventured to introduce one into the house, but the Deacon speedily intimated his dislike of cats, and Puss soon found herself out.

One night Deacon Holbrook brought a letter for his wife. It was such an unusual circumstance for the good woman to receive a letter that she took it eagerly, and tore it open with unwonted haste.

What was it that made her eyes sparkle with joy? The familiar hand-writing had not deceived her. She knew at once, by the peculiar flourish at the top of the H, that it was from Henry.

She read it through with grateful joy. It was from one of the mining districts of California. It appeared that Henry had worked his passage, having no money; and, leaving the vessel at San Francisco, had proceeded at once to the mines, where he was now working. He had not been there long enough to form an idea of what were his chances of success. He wished his mother to write, and promised to keep her advised of his movements. There was only one reference to his past life. "I trust," he said, "I am afraid father still retains his bitterness of feeling toward me. If this is the case, do not trouble him with any message. Tell him otherwise you may give him my dutiful regards, and say that I do not yet despair of making myself a good man once more."

Deacon Holbrook did not look at his wife while she was reading this letter, though the handwriting was unusually brief, and easy to read.

"Joshua," said his wife, timidly, using the rarely-mentioned Christian name of her husband, "this letter is from Henry."

"So I suppose," said he, coldly.

As he spoke he took from his pocket the Weekly Farmer, and, adjusting his spectacles, began to read.

This was a hint, and as Mrs. Holbrook understood it, she put away the letter, to peruse the subject further. But she could not help asking, "Would you like to hear what he says, Joshua?"

"You will oblige me by not mentioning his name again," said the Deacon, stiffly. "He has forfeited all claim to be remembered by you."

So days, months, and years passed. Deacon Holbrook had a month of five years since Henry Holbrook left his home. There was little change in the air of the grave, sober-looking mansion of Deacon Holbrook. The Deacon himself had failed more in form than in reality, as any two preaching. His form had lost its ancient efectness, and was bowed. His face had grown more wrinkled, and his hair more silvery white. Mrs. Holbrook received tidings of Henry at short intervals. He was well, and doing well, he wrote; but did not enter into particulars. Some time he should return to see his mother. Of his father he did not speak. These letters were all brought home from the village post-office by Deacon Holbrook, but he never signified any curiosity or interest to learn their contents. Whether his name had not been mentioned between the two for years; yet—and let not this surprise the reader—it would be hard to tell which loved the absent one most constantly. Behind the Deacon's taciturnity there beat a heart, and that heart was more tender to his lost son than he was willing that the world should know.

All at once his quiet life was broken in upon, and that in a most unexpected way.

One day he entered the house, his face as pallid as a sheet, his limbs tottering beneath him, his whole expression that of great and intolerable anguish.

"What's the matter, Deacon Holbrook? What's the matter, Joshua?" cried his alarmed wife.

"Hannah, we are paupers—paupers in our old age!" said her husband, bitterly.

"God grant that you be not supposed, Joshua?" asked the wife, turning pale from sympathy.

Little by little it came out that Deacon Holbrook had become responsible for a bank officer with whom he was well acquainted and in whose integrity he had entire confidence. But first-by the astounding intelligence had arrived that the officer, after a series of defalcations, had fled the country, and his securities were called upon. The amount for which the Deacon had become bound was sufficient to swallow up the house and farm—all, in fact, that he owned.

The farm was not a valuable one. It comprised fifty acres of rough soil, which, by hard labor, had been got of receiving his due. He moderate wants of a small and economical family. In the market it would not bring over three thousand dollars, and for this amount the Deacon was bound. Twenty day he had reckoned himself rich. Now he regarded himself as a beggar.

"This is indeed worse than death," thought the Deacon with stern sorrow. "The Lord has indeed smitten me sorely in my pride."

Little time was given for anticipation before the blow fell. The Holbrook farm was advertised for sale, and the auction was to take place in three weeks. Bills were printed and posted about the fences and in stores. Meanwhile Deacon Holbrook went about in a state bordering on stupefaction. All day long he would sit in the rocking-chair, with his eyes fixed on the opposite wall, saying nothing, and apparently paying little attention to what was going on about him. His wife, scarcely less sorrowful than himself, feared that his reason was undermined.

Three weeks passed by, and brought the day of the sale. Mrs. Holbrook would gladly have absented herself; but her husband, exhibiting more life than of late, insisted on being present. So, with many misgivings, she became an unwilling witness of the trying scene.

The bidding commenced at two thousand dollars. Gradually it went up to twenty-nine hundred, and was about to be knocked off at that price to Squire Clayton when the trampling of hoofs was heard—a young man, with a handsome face browned by exposure, leaped from his horse, and inquired eagerly the amount of the last bid. On being told, he at once exclaimed, "I bid three thousand dollars."

At that price it was knocked down to him.

"What name, Sir?" inquired the auctioneer.

"Deacon Joshua Holbrook," was the reply, in a loud, clear voice.

There was a burst of surprise, and the question, "Who is he?" passed from one to another.

Among the rest Deacon Holbrook looked up eagerly, and a question was on his lips.

"Father, mother, don't you know your boy?" asked the young man, with emotion.

Deacon Holbrook's eyes lighted up with joy. Silently he opened his arms. The reconciliation was complete.

Henry subsequently explained that, having been successful at the mines, he had wished to return immediately to his home, but, coming to New York, he had learned his father's misfortune. He had therefore turned his steps back he could to his native village, and fortunately arrived in time to prevent the sacrifice of the farm.

"Father," he said, "I should my vain pride and the hardness of my heart that led me to turn away from my only son," said the Deacon, solemnly. "Henceforth let our hearts be filled with the love that falleth not!"

And his wife and son reverently said, "Amen!"

A FRIENDLY VISIT.

It may be pretty safely affirmed that Miss Fanny Bloss was almost as charming a young lady as any likely to be met with in a day's search. Not that she was particularly pretty; other young ladies, her friends would say, were handsomer than their own satisfaction, at least—that she didn't possess a tolerably decent feature; nor was she very witty, or very accomplished, or remarkably clever; nevertheless, all the items being open to criticism, the sum total was decidedly satisfactory, and her personality unfathomably charming.

So thought Matthew Arrowsmith, Esq., aged sixty, her uncle and guardian, who believed in her thoroughly, who gave in to all her numerous whims and fancies, and loved and spoiled her with considerable success. Uncle Matthew was a man of mark among gentlemen in his town; ex-mayor, present magistrate, councilman, and all sorts of things, which history presided over his head, systematized over himself in a good-humored but pretty strict way, and, being reasonably looked upon as a model man, his bachelor uncleship became, as was much esteemed, both on this account and for her own intrinsic merits. Between her and her uncle, however, there was depth came this day, at some time or another, is not unlikely to interpose between most young ladies and their parents or guardians.

This "foreign body" was no other than a young architect, Charles Harcourt, who, not long shortly before this history commences, had made certain tender proposals to Miss Fanny, who accepted them herself in the absence of fact, and without him respecting them to her uncle as a matter of form. There being no reason for impeaching Charley's morals, reputation, or means, and no reason for refusing Mr. Arrowsmith's consent, save his disinclination for parting with his niece to any body, he had accordingly given it left but to conclude agreement previously effected; he did so therefore, and at some length, to fulfill very well his part.

"Uncle," said Fanny, one night, just before going to bed, "what's the matter with you?"

"The matter with me?" said Uncle Matthew, "nothing's the matter; what should be the matter with me?"

"Don't be foolish," said Fanny. "I want to talk seriously to you. Do you think I can be comfortable, or—or any thing, while you look so moped and miserable?" And then, as I said, as she what's the matter, you say 'Nothing.' I'm very angry with you—very."

"Well, I don't know as to comfort," said Uncle Matthew, rather maliciously. "I thought you were pretty comfortable when you were on the sofa there, with Charley's arm round your waist and your heads so close together."

"Oh, I'm sure Sir," said Fanny. "Besides, Charles has noticed it, too. He says you don't look like yourself."

"Oh! he noticed it too, has he?" said Mr. Arrowsmith. "I'm sure I'm much obliged to him. I'd a fance he only noticed one person at a time."

"Uncle, please look at it either. Ah, Fan! I don't know what I'm to do without you. I'm afraid I shall have to think that young man has taken from one of these days, after all. What should you say to that?"

"You're not going to do without me," returned Fanny, sitting down on his knee and putting her arm round his neck. "We're all going to live together—myself, Charley and his cat, and Cupid, bengs of things. Don't let such ideas get into your head, and put you out. You want rousing. I know what I shall send to Leather Bed Effie Harper, and we'll go all sorts of excursions and drives, and you shall be your own self again."

"Now you're ridiculous," interrupted Fanny, with a slight blush. "At any rate, if you are left to the care of Bella, I shall expect you to be very polite and attentive to her."

"Ah!" said Uncle Matthew, "I'll keep my eyes open, and take a few lessons in the mean time; I shall have plenty of opportunities. I wish I shouldn't—so, never mind; I don't mean it. I'm an old fool."

"You're an old love," said the young lady; with which amiable contradiction the dialogue concluded.

Next day, however, Fanny wrote to her old school-fellow, the before-named Bella Harper, inviting her to pay a visit to Hilton; and in due time Bella Harper's affirmative answer arrived, followed shortly by Bella Harper herself.

Well, Bella arrived; was ardently affectionate toward dearest Fanny, respectfully and timidly ditto toward Uncle Matthew, frankly and pleasantly friendly toward Charley, whose acquaintance she was not long in making after her arrival. The night of B.-lla's arrival there was a sort of state kept up in her honor; the lamp was lighted, then followed "a little music"—that is to say, Fanny played the piano, then Bella played, then Charley sang to Fanny's accompaniment, and so on—excessively pleasant, but possibly a thought dull. Bella yawned once or twice, there could be no doubt, though she did her best to conceal the fact; but then, you see, she had been traveling a great part of the day. As for Charley, when Fanny let him out of the ball-door, he didn't scruple to say that Miss Bingham might be a nice girl enough in that, in his opinion, she was a nice girl too many —that, as a matter of taste, he thought two people were better than three, and so Fred, and so on. Fanny said he was talking nonsense, and the discussion ended in the ridiculously illogical manner which, I am informed, is not uncommon in such cases.

Next evening, however, the proceedings were conducted on a very different system; no light was introduced, but the three sat there talking, till, at dark stole on, the conversation grew duller, languid, and finally died away. Fanny and Charley sat very close together, with a book of prints wrong side up before them, so long as the last gleam remained; but when Mr. Arrowsmith at length entered, calling out, "Hallo! all in the dark here—confound that chair! Why, Fanny, where are you?" it is a fact that that young lady commenced a number of volubly but rather confused sentences. It was so much pleasanter talking in the dark; wasn't it, Bella? We were just going to ring for lights," etc., etc. But Bella gave no answer to this appeal; and when the lights were brought it became evident, to Mr. Arrowsmith at least, that she had gone to the window of the other two, that she had disappeared. Away flew Fanny to Bella's bedroom, and, tapping at the door, was graciously admitted, scolded her friend, and brought her back.

For two or three evenings, therefore, Bella made a third in the drawing-room. But inasmuch as the game in which Fanny and Charles were engaged is one which can not, even with the best intentions on the part of the players, be made at all interesting to a looker-on as to themselves, it is not to be supposed that a young lady, by no means destitute of resources, would sit for any great length of time complacently and unpositably contemplating the big backs of her two friends. Accordingly, an evening arrived when, after a short sojourn in the drawing-room, and at the time when the conversation had merged from a trio into a duet, Bella arose and made her way to the door. At this movement, Fanny, suddenly recalled to a sense of the courtesies, cried out,

"Where are you going, dear?"

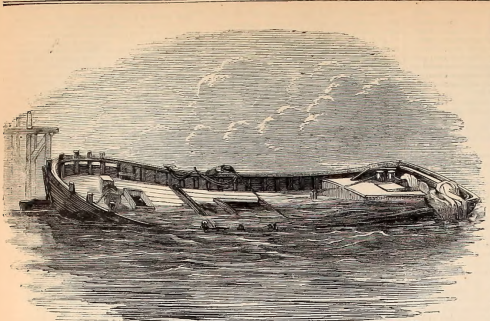
"Oh," said Bella, quietly, "I shall be back directly," which, it will be perceived, was not an answer to the question. Being a conscientious young lady, on having promised not to return again to her own room, Miss Harper, on this occasion, betook herself quietly down stairs, and opened the door of the dining-room. But it would appear as if she hadn't calculated on finding the apartment occupied, for on seeing Uncle Matthew seated without the fire she drew back, and, sighing, timidly, "Oh! I beg your pardon, Mr. Arrowsmith; I didn't know you were here;" as if it was strange, as she was perfectly aware of his custom, and had left him there not a quarter of an hour previously.

"Come in, my dear, come in!" cried Uncle Matthew, gallantly; "don't let me drive you away. I dare say you don't find the young folk up stairs the best of company; at least I know I don't; and I can't see why you and I shouldn't league together against them for once in a way."

Bella laughed a quiet, queer little laugh as she replied, still holding the door in her hand, "I don't know what Fanny would say to that, in the first place; and in the next, I know you're accustomed to sit by yourself after dinner, and don't want me to disturb you."

"Quite a mistake, my dear; at least I didn't sit by myself before that young gentleman up stairs became so regular in his attendance. Fanny used to keep me company, and read the paper to me, and pour out my wine, and warm my slippers, and I don't know what, and here comes a— Well, well, I miss her a good deal; but I beg your pardon, my dear, there's a terrible draught from that door; come in, and be charitable to an old man."

So Bella came in, and was charitable: informed Mr. Arrowsmith that she should try to act Fanny for once, though she knew she should be so clumsy; looked about for warming and pouring his wine with the whitest little fingers possible, poured out the wine, procured the slippers from their peculiar corner and put them inside the fender, read little bits of the paper, and demanded explanations from the pleased Uncle Matthew; sympathized with him on prospective events, praised Fanny, and, in a word, made herself so charming that, when at last she quietly declaring that she must go now, what would Fanny say?—she had no idea she had been so long—she absolutely begged her to stay a little bit longer.



Next night, if Mr. Arrowsmith expected to be similarly favored by Miss Harper, he was destined to be disappointed; for she remained in the drawing-room, on the principle, perhaps, of turn and turn about being fair play. But the following evening (and, it may as well be said, pretty regularly subsequently) she again ventured to invade the dining-room, and again was Uncle Matthew the object of the little delicate attentions of which he had approved so highly on their first bestowal. What with the excursions which took place by day —when Charley always managed, on some pretext, to be of the party, and when, therefore, Miss Harper and Mr. Arrowsmith were left pretty much together—and these evening meetings, there grew up quite a good understanding between that lady and gentleman.

But there must be an end to all things, however pleasant. One evening when Miss Bella made her accustomed, and, it must be confessed, eagerly expected entry into Mr. Arrowsmith's dining-room and presence, her face wore a rather curious expression of excitation and anxiety, which, however, her companion did not notice; and it was, therefore, quite unexpectedly that, after the usual progression for the evening had been gone through, rather more attentively than usual on Bella's part, Mr. Arrowsmith suddenly discovered the young lady, very decidedly and unmistakably, in the act of "having a good cry."

Quite horrified by the suddenness of this catastrophe, Uncle Matthew hastily demanded its cause.

"My dear," said he, "I'm afraid something has happened to distress you. It isn't any thing Fanny has—"

"Oh! no," replied the disconsolate one; "Fanny's only too kind, and every one else here; that's it; that's the reason why I—" Sobs followed. Mr. Arrowsmith looking considerably puzzled, as well he might, at so curious a provocative of tears, Bella explained, in continuation, that it was the very progress of being over kind, these endearments which was so dreadful to contemplate; that she now began to wish she had never tasted pleasures which she always knew she was to forfeit without probable hope of their renewal; that she was conscious this confession might lay her open to the charge of ingratitude; but she trusted her then hearer, at all events, would understand the feelings which actuated her. And she, herself, should, above all things, miss the pleasant evenings she had been lately in the habit of spending; perhaps she felt that the remembrance of such moments while she was dreadful to contemplate; that she now began to wish she had never tasted pleasures which she always knew she was to forfeit without probable hope of their renewal; that she was conscious this confession might lay her open to the charge of ingratitude; but she trusted her then hearer, at all events, would understand the feelings which actuated her. And she, herself, should, above all things, miss the pleasant evenings she had been lately in the habit of spending; perhaps she felt that the remembrance of such moments would be a source of consolation to her in the future; but

THE SLOOP "SPRAY."—[See preceding Page.]

THE CHINAMAN JACKALOW.

Now supposing such a set of circumstances as this: An aged and most reputable gentleman, in a moment of temptation, signs somebody else's name instead of his own to a check for $3000. The head officer of the Bank is his friend — discovers the old gentleman's moral mistake before any body else — makes up to the person who suffered by it the exact amount of the check, borrowing from the Bank for that purpose, rather than let his friend become a ruined man. Suppose, too, that when this friend, who has been at fault, discovers the head officer's kindness he gives him certain notes to secure him against loss, though the head officer knows all the time that they are worthless, the old gentleman being not worth a farthing. Suppose further, if I don't tire you—?"

"Go on."

"Suppose that through such kindnesses as this — together with similar ones to a certain book-keeper in the Bank, who has also committed errors to a large amount — the head officer has come to a place where he must either have all these operations discovered by his superiors, his aged friend and the book-keeper plunged in irremediable ruin, or must sacrifice most of his own private fortune to balance accounts and prevent disclosures; where almost beggary stares him in the face on one hand, and, on the other, the certain doom of one man with white hairs who is his friend, and another in the morning of life whom he feels a deep interest in, to the State Prison — what shall he do?"

"Oh, my God! my God! What does all this mean?"

And saying this Nora sank upon her knees on the willow roots, covering her face with both hands. Luke Green continued:

"The State Prison is a terrible thing. Perhaps, in the case we have just been supposing, these people whom the head officer wished to save would be sent there for life. And that would be a particularly terrible thing — a terrible thing that means a multitude of smaller terrible things; silent work at weaving dead flowers in wool, that mock the live flowers of the fresh fields, in a room that smells carpety, that looks carpety — where the air you breathe is carpety in small, floating, fibrous, strangling particles — where the whole life is one great maddening carpet, ever being woven, never done, only cut down from the loom when the short-haired, stripe-legged Number 50, or 106, or whatever number he may be, goes out in a cart to the convict's grave; or putting small squares of iron under a slow, steady, cruel steam-punch, that comes down with a crunch, just as if it were smashing the number's brains, and taking pleasure in it, instead of only making bolt-washers in the hame-shop; or being a foundery number, and playing at a little hell with melted iron, among other devils that are damned to that place for wife-slaying, for baby-strangling, for all sorts of things not to be told of in dark nights without a light in the room. So much for the work. Now for bed: a tomb just long enough to stretch one's self, under masonry a hundred feet thick, where you lie and seem to feel it all growing shut and fastening you alive, till you shriek yourself to death, footless, wateriess. For recreation: a sermon from a man, who, when he gets through, will go out of hell, and talk to husbands who can travel with their wives — go forth into the woods and fields with their children — while you, brotherless, sisterless, wifeless, childless, are locked into your grave from eleven o'clock of the sunshiny Sunday morning, through all that weary day, until dawn of Monday, to grin through a grate at a stone wall, to think your pleasant thoughts, or to sleep — deep and drear!"

Nora still sat, with her head bowed, and answered not a word. Luke Green took courage, and proceeded:

"All this would be very disagreeable to the friends of the head officer. Disagreeable to him — eminently so. Now the sacrifice of nearly all his fortune would prevent it. He would willingly make that sacrifice on one condition. He would save the venerable man; he would also save the young one — though, of course, that can be no inducement for Miss Manton — if she will become — his wife?"

Still Nora answered nothing. The superintendent was emboldened.

"Yes, that is right; take it into consideration. I am willing to consider all the past as merely a young girl's coquetry — the caprice of a woman too recently grown to know her mind. I loved you in spite of all. I will make you a tender and loving husband for all time to come. Miss Manton, now is your opportunity! Save your father; save—save me from despair! Say yes! For your sake, for his, for God's sake, say yes!"

NAVAL ACTION BETWEEN THE U. S. SLOOP "SARATOGA" AND TWO MEXICAN STEAMERS.—[See Page 199.]

And Luke Green knelt down on the sod, in front of the unconscious girl, his face all utterly melted away in the fire of his real desperation, and tried to pull away her hands from her face, that he might see what was its expression—what mute answer it gave him. Meanwhile the note of John Manton, and its nine lying copies, were almost crushed in his fist with the violence of his mental and physical tension. For it was Luke Green's last chance.

Nora could not resist his grasp. Her hands were drawn from before her face, and Luke Green saw in those eyes of silent, unbroken agony no sign of desperate submission to his will, but only a tortured woman-soul's mutter—while prayer that God would give her faith and strength to say "No!" though all hell should keep pealing "Say yes!" forever.

Above the clump of willows came a short, shrill whistle, which was answered by another from below. Luke Green started from his knees, glaring when the young girl lay a frenzied driven from his prey; and she, crowbelieved with the hopes she had been fostering, hardly knew whether to hope or fear. Those whom she heard might be his emissaries. Nothing was to be said to expect now; and if they who whistled were friendly to her, or indifferent, and she might avail herself of their coming to fly from Luke Green—still, to fly whither? To her father? Luke Green held in his hand what she believed were witnesses, false or true, capable of sending him to a felon's cell for life. To Ernest? Gone! gone! and whither? To God? Yes, to Him alone!

Quick as lightning these thoughts flashed through her mind; while Luke Green stood erect, his face full of a direful defiant and vengeance mingled, looking hither and thither to see what the sounds meant. But before either she or he could decide what course to take, two new elements entered into their consideration. As Nora looked up she saw, to her astonishment, the two horses she had been lounging by the stile when she sought to pass over. The slight man in the comfort cloak came up the bridle, the very large comrade came down; and they met and stopped close by Mr. Green.

"Yes may begin, Turkle," said the slight man.

"This is Mr. Luke Green, I believe?" said the large comrade.

"You needn't believe, Turkle; it is Green. Go ahead."

"You have lost a wallet, I hear. What next, compassion?"

"Which contained valuable papers," said the slight one, supplementarily.

"Oh yes! Which contained valuable papers," repeated the large one.

"Which did contain valuable papers," assented Luke Green. "But let me suggest, gentlemen, that this conversation be in a more appropriate place. Come to my office, for instance, and I assure you I shall feel the liveliest satisfaction in making the subject matter of discussion agreeable to you, if you can throw any light on it. It is hardly respectful to talk of business before ladies."

And Luke Green bowed toward Nora, with a most bewitching smile.

"Turkle!" said the slight man.

"Yes, Sir!" responded the large one, promptly.

"Are you afraid of ladies?"

"N, Lain't. They won't hurt nobody."

"We are both, then, as I seem to be consultation with my friend, perfectly comfortable where we are," continued the slight man, coolly; and then added, turning to Nora, who was rising to depart—the brim of her hat drawn down be its ribbons, so as to hide her gi-thwithered eyes —"And I pray you won't leave us, madam. We have no private—none at all, you know—and you are a comfort to us rather than a disturbance. Permit me to present you with one of our cards. If you ever want any thing in our line, it won't come amiss."

And the slight man winked in a most improper but good-humored way at the young lady, with the one eye which was visible over the collar of his cashet cloak.

Nora took the card mechanically, and was about to put it in her pocket without reading it, when a something in the handwriting, as she just glanced at it, seemed familiar to her. She scrutinized it, all trembling, for a moment, and then read it through with a fixed, dreamy glance, moving her head from side to side as if to catch the whole meaning rapidly as possible. It said:

"I hope I do not flatter myself in believing that Miss Manton will be glad to know that nothing ill has befallen me, and that I pray for the time when I may meet her once more.

"ERNEST."

The overburdened spirit of Nora Manton could not forbid itself one little cry of joy! She stepped forward in the innocent frankness of her great relief, and peered at the cashet cloak, as if perchance that might be somehow a disguise wherein Ernest Falkins lurked. But the cashet, as if divining her thought, shook its head, put its finger mysteriously on its lips, carried Nora to put the card in her pocket, and turned around to Mr. Green.

"Do as polite to me," said that gentleman, pleasantly; "you have given me no card."

"All in time," replied the slight man. "I carry the cards for the whole house. Here's one to the gentleman. Turkle, haven't you got a card for the gentleman? Hunt it up, Turkle, and hand it to him. I always like my I ask whether your wallet contained one note for one hundred and ten dollars, to you as obligee, from one Filkins as obligor?" And in the fact that the mention of that fact makes you less anxious to tear yourself away."

"How you seen that note? It is not of much consequence, to be sure; but if it is in your possession I will give you a receipt for it. I should hate to have it fall into hands which might use it to trouble the poor young man." And Luke Green looked at the speaker with a benevolent sweetness, as if expecting to charm it out of him.

"I am happy to be able, most excellent man, to state that this note is now in the possession of a person who would shed tears of sincere melancholy should the poor young fellow ever be troubled by it, and who now exhibits it to yourself as a memorial of departed days!" With these words the benevolent-looking man in cashet removed his chip hat, letting a great profusion of straggling yellow hair fall over his cloak-collar; and from the crown of the chip aforesaid took out a slip of paper secured there by a pin. He held it up in front of the superintendent, who made a quick little cat-like snap at it, but was avoided adroitly by the slight man. "Look at it, but don't touch it!"

"Under the circumstances, it strikes me that, by way of relieving our minds of any further anxiety, it will be best to dispose of this distressing subject as follows:" Thus saying, he folded the note neatly lengthwise through the middle, tore it across into seven little strips, and let them drift off on the wind.

Nora looked on with astonishment; and Luke Green, bringing his lower jaw up with a cruel crunch against the upper, exclaimed, "Very well, Sir! Destroyed with my own paper comrade observed this! You will not escape!"

"He hopes you observed, Turkle," said the man in cashet. "It is always proper to observe—did you?"

"I did observe," answered Turkle.

"Oblige me with your card then, Sir, that, if I should wish you as witness, I may find you," said Green, threateningly.

"Haven't you found the card yet, Turkle?" asked the man in cashet.

"Here it is at last!" spoke up Turkle, cheerfully.

"One moment, Turkle!" said the slight man, authoritatively: "before you give him your card I wish to make a little speech. I feel as if I would relieve me. First, I promise by asking what you that note given to you for, Mr. Luke Green?"

With a sneer of contempt at the speaker, the superintendent turned to the large man.

"Is your card ready? I'll take it, if you please, Mr. Turtle."

"Turkle—not Turtle. Manners before conscience. Listen to the gentleman. He's going to speak."

Man in cashet continues:

"I will tell you what that note was given for. Filkins was a respectable young fellow. I knew him well. He had as good a mother and as fine girls for sisters as ever lived. He got acquainted with one Luke Green, and learned of that old reputable to gamble: the note was to pay a little debt. Filkins grew more and more; he tried to drown his better heart out with liquor, but the more he tried to drown it the more it swam. There came also a man named Beckford—Ernest Beckford—and he saw what a plight that better heart was in; how Filkins was trying to drown it with brandy; and whenever it crawled a little way up the shore and tried to breathe, this devil, the Green devil—though Black would be a better name for him—kept pushing it back into its hell with a pack of stacked cards!"

"You lie! Who are you?" And Luke Green laid his hand on the speaker's shoulder as if he would pull him out of the garments he very evidently wore as a disguise. The slight one jerked himself away, and continued:

"Stacked—I repeat it—stacked cards. That Filkins didn't know it then, for he wouldn't have been the fool of a swindling hypocrite so long. Ernest Beckford saw all this, or knew it by magic, and he saved Filkins! He drew the letter heart out on to dry land, and it's been keeping stronger and stronger ever since, every beat saying God bless him!" And this day, it is one of Filkins's warmest thoughts that he owes to that real man his escape out of the clutches of that real devil! Turkle, you may give the gentleman your card."

The large man made one step forward and presented the document which he denominated his card to Mr. Green, with the graceful ponderosity of a fat embassador tendering his credentials. It was a sadly greasy paper; but that was hardly enough reason for the emotion which it produced on the superintendent. His face grew deadly pale, the cold sweat stood on his temples, his cruel under-jaw came shut like an animate vice: this was for an instant, and then all the former desolate spirit returned to his countenance.

"It is what I have been expecting for some time," said he. "A man who is kind to his friends"—here he glanced at Nora, who still stood at the willow-clump, not knowing whether she waked or dreamed—"will certainly be well rewarded. Ha, ha! a warrant for my arrest, my dear! Gentlemen, which he displayed the paper toward Nora, then continued in a stage aside: "Tell your father to save himself; let him fly, fly!" And then which he drew the two notes of Mr. John Manton from the pocket where he had thrust them on the arrival of the two men, and before the one to clear, then, tore them into as many pieces as the note of Mr. Filkins, and sent them to follow their widely disseminated descendment. "Thank God! thank God!" ejaculated Nora, inwardly. It was one of those cases where selfish relief is lost amid the swelling servant of a tender and loving humanity.

"That was well done, very well done," said Turkle. "I suppose as I ever had that game come on me before, when I nabbed a fellow. But hadn't we better put on the kenchels, for a man who dissolves his indictments before search may destroy himself before commitment?"

"I guess he'll come along without any thing, Turkle. I have to look as if I was triumphing over even the devil when he's down. You give him your kenchels, and I'll go ahead; he'll follow me when he knows me."

And the slight man, so saying, turned down his collar of his cashet, lifted off his chip hat and his straggling yellow hair together, and displayed to the superintendent of Chesvick Mills the handsome head of his former endeared associate, little Filkins, second bookkeeper.

Had the superintendent been arrested immediately several evidences of his guilt would have been secured—the destroyed note of John Manton and its forged copies. That was of little consequence, however, as the destruction had given an immense relief to Nora. But the superintendent would have been saved the commission of another—a crowning fault, had he been arrested immediately, as he would have been, by a person with less poetic taste and talent for distribution of circumstances than little Filkins. Those talk which caused elder Turkle had handed him the warrant for his inspection, he had an opportunity to draw unobserved a small revolver from his vest pocket, to pass his hand to his face without exciting particular notice, and to return it with the expunk gone.

As Filkins, the superintendent, and Turkle crossed the stile, and the stile, now in arm and in the relative positions in which I have just written their names, what a strange spectacle would have been presented to a solitary student with all-seeing eyes! They all went quietly, silently. Turkle, because he was a man of deeds and not words; some mechanical instrument from without to incite to articulate utterance; Filkins, because he was thinking hard of many things past, present, and future; Luke Green (so they thought), because he was sober and had determined to keep the cool front toward just adversity that he had worn to ill—mad prosperity. But the two on the outside were so ignorant of him in the middle, so close beside him in these fleshly bodies, yet so utterly unpartaking of his soul! They knew so little what a mystery they were leading unresistingly away with them—what a solemn meaning there was to him in those few minutes between the brook and Chesvick village. The grass was that intense, glad green, as the grass is in bright dreams, seeming to be seen through windows of transparent gold, made so by the flood of glory which came like a loosed sea slanting across all things from the west where the sun was within an hour of going down. In the same golden sun-glidness the tree trunks and branches became a royal arabesque cut in pure flame, the wind smelled sweet of hay and gardens, and beloved earth in labor in the spring had settled it to a summer holiday to make people happy in with coolness and odors. The deep of the sky, the broad cheering rays of earth below, and the air that was in the midst, were all blessed with a benediction of quiet. Ah! how would those two men upon that outside have looked upon that sight but it been their last time, and they had known it! It was the last time for him who walked between, and how had they shuddered had they been aware of this—two strong, life-enjoying men leading one who to all outer eyes was even as they, yet who trod in reality right over the thinning, weakening crust of death, while they walked on the solid earth! How strangely does this world seem to those few eyes who ever look on her in their yet undimmed chambers, still knowing that in a few minutes more she will be out of sight to return no more forever! There is sublimity unutterable in the man who has five grains of strychnine in him, though a sublimity which is not preferable to commonplace life.

The three had not quite reached Chesvick Main Street, and were still in the fields seeking the best path by which to enter the village unobserved, when the superintendent, who had hitherto walked quietly, his firm face bent toward the ground, gave a quick, glad whirl, released one of his elbows from little Filkins, and at the same time arched his body backward with a force so strong as to cause even the large man

"Not this time, my fine fellar!" exclaimed the efficient officer resolvent, as he pinioned Luke Green's wrists behind his back. "Not just yet; we've up to that dodge, you know. Get the bracelets out of my right pocket while I hold him, will ye, Mr. Filkins?"

The young man peered curiously into Luke Green's face, and then, growing pale as pale, his own seemed to mirror its expression.

"Good God, Turkle! what's the matter with the man?"

"He's up to the escape dodge," said Turkle, indignantly. And so he was, though not after the manner that Turkle had suspected. There was a flock of white foam on his under lip; the muscles of his mouth and cheeks were strained into wiry ridges; his cold steel-gray eyes opened and shut mechanically, like a key figure's, but were glassy with an agony which his mechanical action prevented them from expressing otherwise. He was escaping; nor could all earth but Turkle hold him. They had him down on the velvet green grass; he tore it up in handfuls and crushed its juices out in his grasp; and then reeling himself with one fierce convulsion, he lay supported by his head and feet, the semblance of a bridge. For a moment his chin relaxed, and as the two men above knelt down over him they heard, or thought they heard, him say, "Water!" So Turkle sat down and took the dying man's head upon his lap, while little Filkins ran to bring water from the nearest house. When he returned the lips that had thirsted for it were shut in the eternal silence.

"Do we carry him without help, Turkle?"

"Yes."

And this was the only word they spoke on the way into Chesvick. They brought their prisoner to his own house, and covering reverently with a napkin that terrible mystery of death which transfuses even a wicked face with at least the sacredness of fear. As they thus bid his face, little Filkins, in his soul, laid just such a covering, save that it was eternal, over the false things, the cruel, and the badly fascinating, which its eyes had ever looked or its lips ever said to him, whispering solemnly, as he left the room on tiptoe,

"Thank God that I was saved from him, so that I can forgive him!"

DEATH OF LUKE GREEN.

THE SUNSET GLEAM.

Two strangers were introduced by the crack of a rifle.

Briggs, a lawyer, rusticating in the country, was in the forest hunting partridges, one afternoon, with decidedly ill success. Finally the sun, red in the face with overmuch shining, concluded to set, and leave Briggs to take care of himself. Just then a squirrel ran nimbly up a very tall tree, and looking saucily down, challenged our hunter in the most approved squirrel dialect:

"Fire away, Mr. Briggs—I'll risk you—you're a lawyer, and no sportsman—do your prettiest, young man!"

Briggs couldn't stand that.

Raising his rifle, he touched the spring, and while the sharp crackle was dancing through the forest, down came the poor thing.

Emma was out on her palfrey taking an evening ride. That she was quite alone is no matter, for these were peaceful rural districts, and the girl was spirited. The crackle of the rifle, multiplied by the echoes, together with a sudden sight of a hunter's shirt, quite overset the equanimity of "Jenny," her sweet, Jenny danced, reared, plunged, and curveted. With a steady eye and lip compressed the lady held her rein in a firm hand; but the animal was thoroughly frightened, and Emma was thrown.

The girl opened her eyes upon a hunter's shirt, with a man in it, a gray cap with an irregular fur under it, and a Minié rifle. The man opened his eyes upon a disheveled brunette, with a bleeding temple.

If Briggs's face was not handsome his heart was, as was shown by the courtesy, gentleness, and discretion with which he cared for the young girl. And if Emma was not so comely as the average of heroines, she was quite as brave and grateful as the best.

In the door-way of her home—the farm-house over the hill—sat a white-haired old man, talking by signs with a deaf-mute by his side. It was the father of Emma, to whom Mr. Briggs resigned his charge with becoming manliness and modesty. A noble old man. Little less than seventy years of age, and evidently shaken by the earthquakes of life, there was yet the unmistakable marks of warmth, breadth of heart, and native greatness, which characterized Nature's chosen noblemen.

This was the introduction. Not particularly romantic, nor yet impressive in its effect upon either of the persons.

"A very good girl, I should think," mused Briggs, on his way to the village hotel; "rather interesting."

"Rough features," thought Emma, as she lay resting on the lounge; "but all the better for that, I dare say. A fig for handsome men!"

A week or two wrought a change in the state of affairs. Briggs found himself deeply interested in this problem: Giving, a young lady of a very quiet, unresolute exterior, to find her nature. Emma found herself wondering why the young man felt so much with her father, and so little with herself. "How his features kindle!" thought the girl. "I believe he is handsome, after all!" and the point of her cambric needle pierced the tip of her plump little finger. "Miss Roberts is positively pretty," thought Briggs, in the midst of a learned remark, addressed to the old gentleman, on the economic uses of corn-stalks.

A week or two more, and Briggs had found rich veins of ore under the rather impenetrable surface of his little friend; while Emma had learned to flush at the sound of a single familiar footfall.

A little while after Emma sought her nest one night, with a fluttering hold where her heart used to be; while in his walk to his rooms Alfred Briggs saw a richer beauty in moonlight and startwinkle than had ever crept into his soul before.

The aged father had been a man of enterprise. Many of his earlier years had been spent in commercial turmoil. His later resort to rural life was taken as a rest in declining strength, involving neither harrassing care nor burdensome labors. One great burden had followed him, however, to his country home—a weight of apprehension hanging heavily over his accumulated years. In one of those frequent accidents of property transfer, the title to a large proportion of his estate had become the subject of litigation, and there was a danger that the honest gatherings of industrious years would be wrenched from him by the technicalities of legal procedure.

The blow fell at this point of our story, breaking in upon the otherwise pleasant flow of events. The old man withstood the rush of ill-fortune with the iron tenacity of age, but came out of the overwhelming dismantled, as a ship comes up from the engulfing of a mountain wave. It was not that the venerable man was sordid, that this grasping of his gains was so keenly distressing—it was not for the loss of the property, as property; but lifelong commercial effort gives a tie between a man and his fortune analogous to the patriarch, and even the paternal. Not poets alone, but men of business as well, personify inanimate things.

Under the pressure of the wrong, the old man, finding the injustice perpetrated through keen technical pleading at the bar, became strongly prejudiced against the legal profession, and this impression soon ripened into ungovernable prejudice. Indeed upon his mind there appeared to be an approach to derangement; and yet, coupled with such grandeur of error in all other respects, it was hard to count it unsoundness.

Its earliest manifestation brought tears to the eyes of one of the best and most trusting of maidens, whose weeping had been lately tears of joy rising copious from deep springs of feeling in her richly loveable nature. Alfred became the object of the old man's most earnest dislike, and even of his evident hate. Under the spell of this prejudice the father annulled the betrothal.

Entreaties, reasonings, tears, were alike unavailing. Months, full of stolen interviews and painful uncertainties, produced no change.

Love is reckless of expedient, and Alfred, renouncing the law at a dash, entered upon the career of a journalist. But the unreasoning prejudice had fastened upon the person. There was no hope. To cap the climax of misery the old man, reverting to the forms of his early religious teachings, pronounced his paternal curse upon his child if ever she gave her hand to Alfred Briggs.

The die was now cast. The most dutiful of daughters could never lose the spell of that anathema, however unreasoning, and Alfred could never ask the violation of that command. The unhappiness would follow them to the end of life. Emma told the distressing story; one glance into the other's eyes, and each was understood from the instant.

A few months thereafter the old man was stricken with mild disease. For days death and unconsciousness hung in a tremulous balance. A long stupor lay upon him, broken only by fitful motions now and then. But one morning, as the sun streamed in at the eastern window, the old man opened his eyes with the dear old familiar light in them. Emma burst into tears. The kiss of the father moved while his fingers closed on her hand. He had lost the power of speech. In vain he struggled to articulate; not a sound escaped. This was evidently the last flash of the setting sun, and the words which were struggling for utterance were of infinite value. In vain. Suddenly a thought lit his anxious face, and resorting to the alphabet of the fingers he gave the word "Alfred." Never was scarlet sent in more breathless haste; and when the lover had reached the bedside the feeble fingers moved to the words "My son." Then the old man sank into dreams, from which, after a few intervening minutes, he woke to see "the Great White Throne, and Him that sitteth thereon."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Advertisers.

The Cheapest and Best Advertising Medium in the Country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

A Magnificently Illustrated Paper, Circulating in every Section of the Union.

Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.

5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

Colds, Influenza.

The great and sudden changes of our climate, are fruitful causes of the above and disorderly feelings. Experience having proved that simple remedies often act speedily and surely when taken in the early stage of disease, everyone should at once be had to "Brown's Bronchial Troches," as Lozenges, let the Influenza, Cough or Irritation of the Throat be ever so slight, as neglect or procrastination a more serious attack may be effectually warded off.

This only authentic portraits of HEENAN and SAYERS, taken from life, beautifully colored, mailed free, on receipt of 15 cents, by

H. DEXTER & CO., 152 Nassau Street.

Crystal Battery Magnetic Machine,

For Extracting Teeth without Pain, and for Medical Purposes.

INVENTED by DR. S. S. SMITH. PRICE $12.

This is the only instrument in the world with both the DIRECT and Pendulum Currents. The Zones never require cleaning. Expense of running it. One Cent a week. Address Dr. S. S. SMITH, 276 Canal Street, N. Y.

Harnden's Express.

—DAILY—

Forwards Valuables and Merchandize to and from, and collects drafts, bills, &c., in all parts of the

EAST, WEST AND SOUTH.

Will receive goods, or orders to "call" at

74 Broadway.

Great Success.

I have already sold 18,000 of the 100,000 copies of the Engraving of PEALE'S COURT OF DEATH. A new transfer of the plates has just been made, and the perfection of the impressions realized. It is universally admitted to be the cheapest Engraving ever issued in this country. "A most charming Picture."—Christian Advocate and Journal.

"No prized description can come up to the requirements of the imagination in its study."—N. Y. Observer.

Prices.—One copy, $1 and four letter-stamps; six copies for $5, without stamps. Send $5 and thus obtain one copy free. Your friends will thank you for the others at $1. Special terms for those desiring Agencies. Some of the Agents are now making from $6 to $8 per day in the business. References—HARPER & BROTHERS.

Write the name, town, and State plainly.

Address G. G. COLTON,

Post-Office Box No. 3,391. No. 37 Park Row, New York.

For Description, see Harper's Weekly, Feb 11th.

Cataract Washing Machine.

Clothing, Time, and Labor Saved.

No Rubbing and No Wear.

Indispensable to Housekeepers.

A hundred attends daily to show the operation of the Machine.

439 Broadway, three Howard Street, second floor.

JOHN H. DELAMATER, 104 Jones Alley, Philadelphia, is Agent for Pennsylvania.

Wringing machines at our office, 54 Beekman Street, New York. State and County right for sale and machines furnished to purchasers on liberal terms.

SULLIVAN & HYATT,

Agents for the Patentee.

ASTHMA. For the INSTANT RELIEF and PERMANENT CURE of this distressing complaint use

PISO'S

BRONCHIAL CIGARETTES.

Made by C. E. SEE WHITE & CO., 107 NASSAU ST., N. Y. Price, $1 per box; sent free by post.

CARD.

A. & G. A. ARNOUX, so long and reputably known as Fashionable Tailors, beg to announce to the public that they have added a department for Boys' Clothing to their establishment, in which all the finest and newest styles of goods will be kept. This will enable our customers to obtain all the goods they may be in need of for themselves and the male part of their families at our house.

Of our Men's Furnishing Department it is unnecessary for us to say any thing, as it already has the name of having the best goods, and best styles of goods, to be found in the city.

651 Broadway, under St. Nicholas.

Mr. McCune, formerly of Genin's Bazaar, will be happy to wait upon his friends at his new location, to which not only he, but Mr. Leeton, the Superintendent there of the Boys' work, has removed.

!! SOMETHING NEW !!

A HEMMER, TUCKER, FELLER, BINDER, AND GUAGE combined, just patented, simple, is running any width and thickness of cloth, either side, as fast as any Sewing Machine by any one in a few minutes. Retail price $8. A LIBERAL DISCOUNT TO THE TRADE. Orders by mail supplied, postage paid. Instructions accompany every machine. Call and see for a circular.

UNIVERSAL HEMMER CO.,

439 BROADWAY, N. Y.

The Readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY

Can have purchased and forwarded to them, with dispatch, any Article this City affords, by sending their Orders, addressed to WM. S. WYSE, Office HARPER'S BAZAR.

N. B.—Orders from Ladies will receive the attention of MRS. W., if required.

WOMAN'S A, B, C OF HEALTH.

LAURALISMA A, B & C,

ARE INFALLIBLE REMEDIES FOR ALL FUNCTIONAL DERANGEMENTS

INCIDENTAL TO

THE FEMALE SEX.

Price $1 per case, or 6 cases for $5, of any assortment.

☞ Each preparation is accompanied by a pamphlet, which contains full directions for the use of all agents. The pamphlet mailed, free of charge, to any part of the world by the proprietor.

Dr. H. A. BARROW, No. 124 Bleecker Street (4 doors below McDougal), New York, where he can be confidentially consulted from 11 A. M. and from 4 to 8 daily.

Gout and Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

Blair's Remedies, price 50 Strand, London.

Used in England over thirty years, and has been long and well tested in this country with great success. A sure, safe, and speedy remedy, worthy the confidence of all sufferers. Sold by Druggists. DRAY & HAYES, 24 Cornhill, Boston, Importers and Agents. Forwarded by mail on receipt of $1 cost.

Something New.

Slittering and Stammering—The cause and cure by Dr. A. H. SMEDLEY, office No. 648 Broadway. No charge until perfect satisfaction is given. Hours 10 to 5.

Ten Thousand Dozen Sold.

The Great Success of the Day.

THE SHILLING HAIR TONIC.

Retail Price 12 Cents only.

Features.

WELL PERFUMED.

LARGE BOTTLES.

BEST INGREDIENTS USED.

FIRST CLASS STYLE.

Undoubtedly destined to take the place of all other preparations for the Hair — being unapproached in cheapness and excellence.

Sold by 3000 Druggists everywhere.

Wholesale Depot,

159 Water Street,

New York.

Established in 1834.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,

Manufacturer of the Overstrung

GRAND & SQUARE PIANO-FORTES

Manufactory and Warerooms

72 to 85

East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five Years, and Prices are moderate.

At Walker's Warerooms,

Clinton Hall, Astor Place, near Broadway,

A Large Stock of Pianos of every description for sale and hire.

A Companion Volume to PRIME'S EUROPE AND THE EAST.

Switzerland.

By S. Irenæus Prime, D.D

With Six Fine Illustrations.

1 vol. 12mo, price $1.

☞ Sent by mail, pre-paid, for One Dollar.

SHELDON & COMPANY,

Publishers,

New York.

Popular New Books.

Our Bible Class and the Good that came of it. 12mo	$1 00
Wooing and Warring in the Wilderness	1 00
Beulah, Stit thousand	1 25
Tom Heads Winnie and Waifs	1 25
Ten Years of Preacher Life	1 00
Thoms' Adventures in Africa	1 25
Wild Sports in the South	1 25
Prenticeana, or Wit and Humor	1 00

Single copies by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price, by DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers, 119 Nassau Street.

J. R. STAFFORD'S OLIVE TAR.

Cures all Throat and Lung affections, as well as Catarrh, by inhalation. In cases of internal pain or soreness, a few drops taken internally affords immediate relief. In Rheumatic Affections, Neuralgia, Sores, Eruptions, Burns, and Skin Diseases, an application of this valuable article is attended with the happiest results.

J. R. Stafford's Iron and Sulphur Powders.

These valuable adjuncts to the Tar revitalize and purify the blood, invigorate the liver, strengthen the digestion, and regulate all the secretions. Send for Circular of testimonials. Sold by OLIVE TAR CO., 315 Broadway, and by all Druggists. Olive Tar, 50 cents per bottle; Powders, $1 00 per package.

ARTHUR'S

GREAT AND BEST TEMPERANCE BOOK.

The Tavern Keeper's Victims.

A SERIES OF TEMPERANCE TALES.

By T. S. ARTHUR.

1 vol. 12mo, with Ten Electrotype Illustrations—bound in embossed cloth, gilt backs.

Retail Price, One Dollar.

This work is undoubtedly one of Mr. Arthur's best productions, and is destined to exceed many in popularity and successful sale.

Agents are wanted everywhere to engage in its sale.

Price One Dollar.

Copies sent by mail on receipt of the price.

LEARY, GETZ & CO., Publishers,

Philadelphia.

The Greatest Medical Discovery of the AGE.

Dr. Kennedy, of Roxbury, Mass., has discovered a common pasture weed that cures every kind of HUMOR from the worst SCROFULA down to a common pimple.

By strict attention to the direction in the pamphlet around each bottle, and a judicious application of the Salt Rheum Ointment, Healing Ointment, and Scrofula Ointment, CHRONIC and CORRUPT ULCERS are cured in a few weeks.

For sale by every Druggist in the United States.

Quern's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly

The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, in taken without nausea.

Also,

Quern's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil.—The grand sanitation of the oil is obviated, and it does not cause any constipation after use. It is the best purgative for children. To be had at the Inventor's Office, No. 125 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. PEN-FOLD, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 15 Dookman Street.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

NEW LIST OF GIFTS FOR 1860.

G. G. EVANS & Co.,

PROPIETORS OF THE ONLY ORIGINAL AND MOST EXTENSIVE GIFT BOOK STORE IN NEW ENGLAND,

No. 5 and 6 Cornhill,

Boston, Mass.

Commence the year with a

GREATLY INCREASED STOCK OF BOOKS,

And an extensive and varied assortment of

USEFUL and ELEGANT GIFTS.

During the past six months we have been enabled, through the favors of our patrons, to add materially to the facilities we previously possessed, and we now stand prepared to fill all orders with a liberality and promptitude not exceeded by any other house in the world.

Our Catalogue of Books embraces the productions of the best authors, consisting of the publications of the

MOST EMINENT HOUSES IN THE TRADE,

and Standard Works in stock

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE.

In addition to which, we have on hand, immediately after publication, all

NEW WORKS AS FAST AS ISSUED.

Our Books are all new, and are substantially bound.

We sell at Publishers' retail prices, and make a valuable present with each Book at the time of sale.

THE GIFTS

Consist of an almost endless variety of useful and elegant articles, varying in value from

FIFTY CENTS TO ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS

EACH.

Among which will be found

GOLD AND SILVER WATCHES,

GUARD AND CHATELAINE CHAINS,

LAVA, CORAL, CAMEO, MALACHITE, GOLD STONE, ONYX, AND FLORENTINE SETS OF JEWELRY, BRACELETS, PINS,

AND EAR DROPS,

GOLD PENCILS,

LOCKETS,

STUDS,

SLEEVE BUTTONS,

RETICULES,

FORTE MONNAIES,

BUTTER KNIVES.

PEARL HANDLED POCKET KNIVES, &c.

And as we are constantly receiving

NEW STYLES OF JEWELRY,

And adding to the list many useful articles not heretofore embraced, we are confident that, for

COMPLETENESS AND VARIETY, OUR SELECTION CAN NOT BE EXCELLED.

We allow the

MOST LIBERAL COMMISSION TO AGENTS,

And invite all who are desirous of earning a little money, or who wish to obtain a

LIBRARY OF GOOD AND CHOICE BOOKS

At a

COMPARATIVELY SMALL OUTLAY OF TIME,

And

WITHOUT EXPENSE,

To set to our Agency.

We can refer to hundreds who already possess valuable collections of Books, which they have received on Commission on the Clubs sent, in addition to the presents sent with such books.

We take all risk of loss through mail, if our directions are complied with.

A full and complete classified Catalogue sent free to any address on application.

Agents supplied with Show Bills and Circulars, and every information given.

Address G. G. EVANS & Co.,

Nos. 43 and 45 Cornhill, Boston, Mass., or

G. G. EVANS, No. 439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES A will not grow upon your face, use my ongoing (dated 1859), which will force them to grow six weeks from the first application, and without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1. Sent by mail, post free, to any address. R. C. DUNHAM, 160 Nassau Street, New York.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.

B. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

GOLD DR. HEATH'S BOOK OF Travels and great discoveries of the Japanese and East India Medicines, with full directions for the certain cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Coughs, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Fevers, Heart Disease, Scrofula, Cancer, Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Gravel and Kidney Disease, Female Complaints, &c. Illustrated with hundreds of certificates of recent cures and engravings. For the purpose of rescuing as many suffering fellow beings as possible from premature death, it will be sent to any part of the country, by sending 75 cents to

DR. HEATH, 647 Broadway, New York City.

Consultations and examinations of the Lungs, &c., free.

Sold also in Brooklyn by Mrs. Hayes, 179 Fulton, Reynolds, 360 Court, and Dickinson, 192 Atlantic, and the fashionable druggists in New York, and throughout the country.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION,

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 Pages and 1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to each of whom a special District will be given. Rare inducements offered. Applicants should name the Counties they would prefer. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

From the Boston Traveller.

"Dr. Halsted's success in the treatment of disease is unequaled." See Circular and Testimonials. Address Hound Hill Water Cure, Northampton, Mass.

Scrofula, or King's Evil.

One quarter of all our people are scrofulous; their persons are invaded by this lurking infection, and their health is undermined by it. To cleanse it from the system we must renovate the blood by an alterative medicine, and invigorate it by healthy food and exercise. Such a medicine we supply is the most effectual remedy which the medical skill of our times can devise for this every-where prevailing and fatal malady. It is combined from the most active remedials that have been discovered for the expurgation of this foul disorder from the blood, and the rescue of the system from its destructive consequences. Hence it should be employed for the cure of not only scrofula, but also those other affections which arise from it, such as ERYPTIVE AND SKIN DISEASES, ST. ANTHONY'S FIRE, BOILS, or ERYSIPELAS, PIMPLES, PUSTULES, BLOTCHES, BLAINS and BOILS, TUMORS, TETTER and SALT RHEUM, SCALD HEAD, RINGWORM, RHEUMATISM, SYPHILITIC and MERCURIAL DISEASES, DROPSY, DYSPEPSIA, DEBILITY, and, indeed, ALL COMPLAINTS ARISING FROM A VITIATED OR IMPURE BLOOD. The popular belief in "impurity of the blood" is founded in truth, for scrofula is a degeneration of the blood. This great purpose and which of this SARSAPARILLA is to purify and regenerate this vital fluid, without which sound health is impossible in contaminated constitutions.

AYER'S

Compound Extract of Sarsaparilla,

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & CO.,

LOWELL, MASS.

Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

Throat and Lung Diseases.

Of all remedies for Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Influenza, Croup, Whooping Cough, Asthma, Phthisic, Quinsy, Tickling, Irritation, or Inflammation of the Throat, Chest, or Lungs, Incipient Consumption, &c., there is no one which, for safety and efficacy, or which affords such rapid and permanent relief, as the well-known and long-established

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

The only genuine is prepared by SETH W. FOWLE & CO., BOSTON, and is sold everywhere.

BEAUTIFUL BALLADS.

By the favorite composer, J. R. THOMAS.

POET OF SHAMROCKS.

VOICE OF WESTERN WINDS.

PRETTY NELLY.

Published by WM. HALL & SON, N. Y.

WORDS AND MUSIC

OF

One Hundred Comic Songs, 50 cts.

One Hundred Songs of Scotland, 50 cts.

One Hundred Songs of Ireland, 50 cts.

Copies by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

Barney's Opera Perfume.

DEDICATED TO MADE. ADELINA PATTI.

A new and elegant PERFUME, exhaling the most delightful and exquisite odors; as truly fascinating as the beautiful photograph or likeness which adorns each bottle. Wholesale by J. W. NOCCONDS & Co., 91 Fulton Street. Retained by all Druggists and Fancy Good Dealers.

PURE WATER.

United States Carbon Filter Company.

CARBON FILTERS of all sizes and descriptions, adapted to the Hydrant in Dwelling House, Factories, &c. Also, a great variety of Portable Self-acting Filters, for Sportsmen, Travellers, Druggists, &c., &c.

164 Broadway, N. Y.

LABOR-SAVING ARTICLE.

F. A. Conover's Patent Snatching Rein Holder.

Having a Roller, fly the end of which is covered on all Lissoy, with half the Labor and half the Time.

For sale by the Trade.

W. A. CORBIERE, Agent, 378 Broadway.

Winant's Excelsior Billiard Tables.

Manufactory 71 Gold Street, N. Y.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR GOUT AND RHEUMATISM. PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWER.

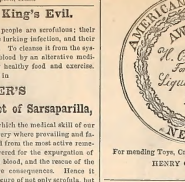
Wholesale Druggists,

15 Beekman Street, New York.

TWO WORKS, VALUABLE TO THE SICK OR WELL, sent by mail, no pay expected until received, read and approved. Address, Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

1st. Six lectures on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female Complaints, and the Science of Human Health to 108 years. 300 pages, 26 engravings. Price fifty cents, in silver or Postage Stamps.

2d. A work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; an Apoplexy, Pale, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what causes disease. 151 pages, 6 engravings. Price 50 cents. Buy which book you wish, giving name, State, county, town, and postoffice.



SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.

A few bottles will generally disperse all scrofulous tendency, while it improves the appetite and invigorates the constitution. Prepared by

A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists,

No. 141 William Street, New York.

Spalding's Prepared Glue.

For mending Toys, Crockery, &c. Manufactured by HENRY C. SPALDING & CO.,

No. 48 Cedar Street, N. Y.

STORIES OF INVENTORS AND DISCOVERERS

In Science and the Useful Arts.

A BOOK FOR OLD AND YOUNG.

By JOHN TIMBS, F.S.A.

With Illustrations.

12mo., Muslin, 75 cents.

A boy's own book—aye, and a man's own book, too, is this "Stories of Inventors and Discoverers." In a struggling age, when myriads of young folks are being daily taught the necessity of living by their wits, and in the dishonest sense—if they would live well, and succeed early in life, we can hardly imagine a work with a more captivating title than that before us, or a book that, when purchased, is of a more stimulating character. The "Stories of Inventors and Discoverers" are a number of rapid sketches, which are compiled from the best sources by the accomplished author, of the lives and triumphs of the most renowned men, who by chemical and mechanical genius have advanced the world.—London Leader.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above WORK by Mail, postage prepaid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of 75 cents.

IRON IN THE BLOOD.

DYSPEPSIA, SCROFULA, GENERAL DEBILITY.

Affections of the Skin.

Headache.

Why is Iron beneficial to human life?

Why is it efficacious in so many diseases apparently opposite in character?

Why is "PERUVIAN SYRUP" or Protected Solution of Protoxide of Iron a powerful, better and safer Tonic medicinal preparation of iron?

Since the extraordinary effects obtained through the Agency of the "PERUVIAN SYRUP" have been made public, the above questions have been widely asked throughout it. They are fully answered in a pamphlet on the "Importance of Iron in the Blood," which can be had on application. The pamphlet contains also numerous certificates of remarkable cures from the following well-known physicians, clergymen and others:

Rev. Jas. V. Ferguson, Rev. John W. Olmsted,
Rev. Warren Burton, Lewis Johnson, M.D.,
Rev. Arthur B. Fuller, Roswell Kingsley, M.D.,
Rev. Aug. R. Pope, S. H. Kendall, M.D.,
Rev. Gordon Jones, R. K. Chisholm, M.D.,
Rev. Sylvanus Cobb, Francis Dana, M.D.,
Rev. Thos. Hill, Seventh Jeremiah Dummer, M.D.,
Rev. Richard Metcalf, Jose Antonio Sanchez, M.D.,
Rev. M. P. Webster, Marcellus Amado, M.D.,
Rev. Alex. Jackson, Abraham Wendell, M.D.,
Rev. J. Boyd, Jr., E. Kinsey, M.D.,
Rev. Henry Upham, Jose d Espinar, M.D.

Pamphlets had on application to the agents, or to

S. L. CLARK & CO., Proprietors, Boston.

Sold by Druggists generally in the United States.

Sold wholesale and Retail by

HARRIS & CO., 479 BROADWAY.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.

SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $50.

HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,

No. 458 Broadway, New York.

☞ LONDON CLUB SAUCE.—This Sauce, celebrated throughout Europe, and warmly recommended by the Faculty, is prepared solely by the possessors an uncreated richness and delicacy of taste, imparting a relish unequaled by all other sauces to ready-made dishes. In flavor is most agreeable, and no one accustomed to it will ever wish to eat it at table loaded with the richest viands without it. It is superior to the Worcestershire Sauce, and is sold at one half the price.

It is an excellent promoter of digestion, and is recommended by the faculty as the best Sauce extant with dyspepsia, etc.

The "London Club Sauce" is prepared by PARKER BROS., LONDON, and sold by A. J. PARKER, No. 2 Chatham Street, and by the United States.

None genuine that is without the fac simile of "PARKER BROS., LONDON," pasted over the neck and cork of every bottle.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.

O'Connor & Collender, 63 to 67 Crosby Street.

Important Change! Interesting!

THE TRUTH!—The only one that ever yet existed CATARRH and its companion ring—Snuffles—and thereby hangs a tale—Catarrhine, is again placed upon sale.—Price $1 a bottle, at 563 Broadway, N. Y.—Printed directions given for using.

I shall also dispose of it at wholesale, to any part of the country, except the New England States and Inner British Provinces, which will be supplied through agency vest the city of N. York, where it will only be retailed by me.

In celebrity for performing what it promises—a radical cure—is such, that a single word of commendation would be superfluous.

Price at wholesale $36, a Dozen—$3. dozen. As it is sold on Commission, payment must accompany all Orders. E. GODDALL, M.D.

COURT OF DEATH.

For One Dollar and 4 postage stamps, the subscriber will forward symbolic one engraving of this sublime painting. Address D. G. COLTON, 81 Park Row, New York. P. O. Box 5281.

"Trefelio" is the True Secret of Beauty.

"TREFELIO" Cures all Eruptions.

"TREFELIO" Softens the Skin.

"TREFELIO" Beautifies the Skin.

"TREFELIO" Eradicates Humors.

"TREFELIO" 50 cents a bottle.

THE NEW NOVEL.

Walter Ashwood.

By PAUL SIDGYCK, Author of "Schuldmann." The scenes and descriptions laid chiefly at Niagara Falls, Chamouny, Winchester, and Interlaken. One vol., elegantly bound in Muslin. Price $1 00. FOND & CARLTON, Publishers, 139 Grand Street, New York.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

AN ENTIRE NEW STYLE.

Designed for all manufacturing purposes.

Noiseless in its operation, very rapid, and capable of every kind of work, it is the best machine ever produced.

Price only $116.

I. M. SINGER & CO,

No. 458 Broadway.

GREAT CURIOSITY Particulars sent free. Agents wanted. TRAY & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

Important Invention for married people. For particulars address, enclosing a stamp, DR. HIRSE-FIELD, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 423 Broadway, N. Y.

To Wholesale Dealers in Jewelry.

The undersigned, in the Second Story, rear, in his unoccupied premises, he is able to offer to the Trade Jewelry of any description on better terms than any other house in New York.

All orders will receive the most careful and prompt attention. W. A. HAYWARD.

No. 5 Broadway.

THE ANTI-RHEUMATIC BAND is the only positive remedy for Rheumatism and Neuralgia. Requires no internal medicines. Sent free by mail, with instructions, for $2 50. Address, HIRAM ALLEN & BRO., 599 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOKS FOR THE SEASON.—NEW editions of the following-named books now ready. No Farmer, farmer's wife, farmer's boy or farmer's girl should be without them. They are every where commended, and recommend for the thing that is wanted:

THE HOUSE: A Pocket Manual of Rural Architecture. It contains everything that any one will expect or desire to find in a work of the kind. Particular attention is given to houses of low cost, such as the great mass of the people must build. Adapted to all sections. Price 50 cents.

THE GARDEN: It tells how to cultivate everything belonging to the garden. The chapter on the Flower Garden is just what the ladies want. Adapted to all sections. Price 50 cents.

THE FARM: Giving in a concise, but clear and simple manner, the fundamental principles of Agricultural Science as well as practical directions for cultivating all the common Farm Crops. Price 50 cents.

DOMESTIC ANIMALS: A much needed and useful book, which no one who has the charge of animals should fail to peruse. Price 50 cents.

☞ The House—The Garden—The Farm—and Domestic Animals, bound in one large, handsome gilt Volume, sent prepaid by first mail, for $1 50.

A HAND-BOOK OF FRUIT CULTURE: With Descriptions of many of the best Varieties in the United States. Many fine engravings. Price 50 cents.

Address FOWLER & WELLS,

208 Broadway, New York.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 70 to 80 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $5 00.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

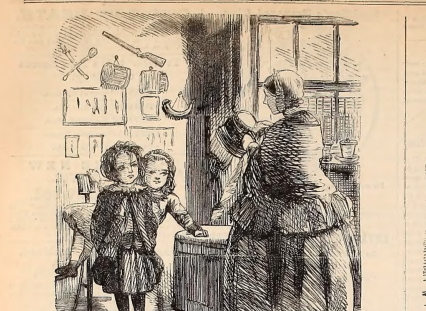
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE COPIES A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00



An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $4 00.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

A WORD TO THE WISE.

DISCERNING CHILD (who has heard some remarks made by Papa.) "Are you our new Nurse?"
NURSE. "Yes, dear!"
CHILD. "Well then, I'm one of those boys who can only be managed with Kindness—so you had better get some Sponge-cakes and Oranges at once!"

POLITENESS!

BILL. "Well, Jim! How is you to-day?"
JIM. "What odds is that to you?—You beant my Medical Attendant."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS AND IRRITATION OF THE THROAT CURED BY BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES. THESE TROCHES ARE COMPOSED OF GUM AND SYRUP, COMBINED IN MOISTENED CAKES, AND BY A PECULIAR PROCESS RELIEVED, BY BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES, OR LOZENGES.

"A simple and elegant combination for Coughs." &c.
DR. G. F. BIGELOW, Boston.

"Great service in subduing Hoarseness."
REV. DANIEL WISE.

"I recommend their use to ALL Speak in."
Rev. E. H. CHAPIN, New York.

"That trouble in my throat, (for which the 'Troches' is a speck!) having made me often a more willing hearer."
N. P. WILLIS.

"Most salutary relief in BRONCHITIS."
Rev. S. SHEPARD, Morristown, Ohio.

"Beneficial when compelled to speak, suffering from COLD."
Rev. S. S. P. ANDREWS, St. Louis.

"Often used in removing Hoarseness and Irritation of the Throat, on occasions with Speaking and Singing."
Prof. M. STACY JOHNSON, Latin Tutor,
Teacher of Music, Southern Female College.

"Great benefit when taken before and after great hoar, as they prevent Hoarseness. From their good effect, I think they will be of per-manent use to me."
Rev. E. ESHELMAN,
President Athens College, Tenn.

Sold by all Druggists at 25 cents per box.
Also, BROWN'S LAXATIVE TROCHES, or Cathartic Lozenges, for Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Constipation, Headache, Bilious Affections, &c.

SEMMONS & CO.,
OPTICAL INSTITUTE, 0(9) BROADWAY,
Under Lafarge House, New York.

SEMMONS, SEMMONS & CO., Oculists' Opticians, would respectfully call the attention of the Citizens and strangers to their immense assortment of GOLD, SILVER, STEEL, AND OTHER SPECTACLES, GOLD, STEEL, TORTOISE-SHELL, AND PLATED EYE-GLASSES, LORGNETS,
AND PROSPECTIVE GLASSES,
Inverted with their celebrated
BRAZILIAN PEBBLES,
WHICH PRESERVES AND STRENGTHEN THE SIGHT.
Also, PERISCOPIC, CONVEX AND CONVEX GLASSES of every description.
OPERA GLASSES,
RACE COURSE GLASSES,
FIELD GLASSES,
MARINE GLASSES.
We answer a Tat of prices, and can furnish you in all sort of the country to our spectacles, when a one of the first glasses in the city.
Best Oculars and frames, with improved Brazilian pebbles, $3 50.
Fine gilt frames with Brazil'n pebbles, $10 to $ 75.
Best Gold Lorgnettes, French Opticians, with Brazilian pebbles, $10 to $ 75.
Tortoise-shell gold frames, Brazilian pebble, $10, $12, $ 5 $ 8.
Best silver steel frames, Brazilian pebble, $1 to $2.
Tortoise-shell, $6 to $ 8.

METHODIST BOOK CONCERN,
200 WEST SIXTH STREET, NEW YORK.
Being in constant receipt of the publications of the Methodist Book Concern, it is the object to receive and distribute the same to the Trade and to Ministers and Members of the Church, carefully and promptly executed at the lowest rates. Orders may be addressed to the Agent at the Concern, or to the Publishers at their respective places of business, as may be most convenient to the party ordering. Orders accompanied by the CASH will receive the most prompt attention. Catalogues of books published by the Concern can be had on application.
Having been appointed Agents from their several publishing houses in the principal cities of the United States, we are desirous that the Methodist Book Concern should be placed by all our brethren, and hope to be honored ourselves in their behalf.
With best wishes, Your Brethren,

ABEL STEVENS,	THOS. CARLTON,
JAMES PORTER,	J. PERRY,
DANIEL WISE,	J. BEG. EDWARDS,
DAVID TERRY,	WM. DE GOU.

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices.

Made to Measure at $18 per doz. or Six for $9.
MADE OF NEW-YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2,50 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I cannot make a good Shirt for $15 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts.

30 yards of New-York Mills muslin at 14½c. per yd.	$4 25
Turn'd and Hem Linen, at 50c. per yard	3 00
Making and cutting	6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c.	1 50
Profit.	3 25
Total	$18 00

Self Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and as easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

The Express charges on one dozen Shirts from New-York to New Orleans is about $1.

WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between White & Walker Streets, NEW-YORK.

Please copy my address as other houses in the city are selling Inferior made shirts at my prices.

IRON-AMALGAM BELLS.

Churches, Schools, Academies and Fire-Alarm Bells at following prices: $30 lbs. Bell, $100; 5 0 lbs., $51; 200 lbs., $ 8; 100 lbs. down to 50 lbs. since, from $2 to $4, each according York, Standard, Cinck, or Wheel ready for use, and warranted 5 & 12 months. Delivered to Transportation C. ans receipt of price.
M. C. CHAPMAN & CO., 12 Spruce Street, N. Y.

WHITE'S
TRUSS
AND SUPPORTER

WHITE'S PATENT LEVER

HERNIA AND UTERINE DISEASES CURED.
An illustrated pamphlet containing all particulars may be had by any in address, BARNES & PAUR, General Agents, Nos. 13 and 15 Park Row, New York.

FOR WHITE TEETH
and
SWEET BREATH,
Use Thurston's Tooth Powder,
The Best in the World.
Prepared only by WELLS & CO., 112 FRANKLIN ST., N. Y., and sold by all Druggists in the U. S.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

Premature Loss of the Hair,

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in bunches, and it has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth.

It is unrivalled as a dressing for the hair, a single application rendering it soft and glossy for several days.

The following is conclusive of its efficacy in the cure of Dandruff.

BOSTON, Oct. 10, 1859.

Gentlemen,—I have used your Cocoaine almost six weeks, and its effect is so marked and extraordinary that I deem it my duty to state it to you.

My worst complaint for several years has been Dandruff, with itching and irritation of the scalp. After brushing my hair, my coat-collar would be covered with the white scales, (dandruff,) which looked like a shower of snow. My barber tried various applications without effect. His choice of your Cocoaine, and his emphatic referral to use it, provoked me to procure and try it. I have used less than a bottle. The dandruff, and the irritation which caused it, have entirely disappeared, and my hair was never before in so good condition.

Your obedient servant,
A. A. FULLER.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by dealers, generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

No more Hard Work.

House Cleaning Mere Play.

EDWARDS'S PAINT RESTORER
FOR SPRING CLEANING.

Price per package sufficient to clean a moderate sized house.

25 CENTS.

Sold by all Druggists, Grocers, &c.
Address
FISHER, DAY & CO.,
Proprietors,
Salem, Mass.

(Agents Wanted.)

A GREAT GOSPEL PICTURE.—THE CHRISTIAN ENGRAVING PRINT Painted by DOTTY & CO.'s Magnificent Engraving of Thorwaldsen's SACRED STATUES in the Cathedral of Copenhagen, representing CHRIST AND HIS APOSTLES, 36 inches in length and 24 inches wide.

From Rev. Dr. Prime, Editor of New York Observer.
THORWALDSEN'S STATUES.—One of the pictures borne in our mind, and we regard the work as eminently suitable for the wants of every Christian home circle.

The religious Press of the country speak in exraptured terms of the work, and recommend it to introduction into every family in the land. The proof-sheets were sold at $20 each, but with the view of affording every family an opportunity to possess the "heavenly picture," the proprietors offer it, and an elegant Bible bound in velvet, for $3 75, the 75 cents being for return postage. $1 75 will secure Agency with one copy of the Engraving. $4 50 will ensure six pictures, postage free, to one address. Address

DAYTON & CO., 37 Park Row.

Coleman's Eutaw House,
Baltimore.

This popular House has been thoroughly renovated, and opened by DURNEY B. COLEMAN, late of the Astor House and St. Nicholas Hotels, and offers superior accommodations to families and travellers.

Perry's Japanese
Boot and Shoe Polish.

Splendid gloss. No rubbing. Sells nothing. Sold everywhere.
JAP. JOHN T. DOBBY CO.,
No. 417 Broome Street, one door east of Broadway.

$100 PER MONTH made by any one with $10 Stencil Tools. Address JOLLY MILLIKEN, Lawrence, Mass.

What Everybody Wants.

Everybody's Lawyer
AND
Counsellor in Business.
BY FRANK CROSBY,
OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR.

IT TELLS YOU How to draw up Partnership Papers and gives general forms for AGREEMENTS of all kinds, BILLS of SALE, LEASES and RELEASES.

IT TELLS YOU How to draw up BONDS and MORTGAGES, AFFIDAVITS, FORMS of APPRENTICESHIP, NOTES and BILLS of EXCHANGE, RECEIPTS and RELEASES.

IT TELLS YOU The LAWS for the COLLECTION of DEBTS, with the STATUTES of LIMITATIONS, and numerous other kind of property EXEMPT from EXECUTION in every State.

IT TELLS YOU How to make an ASSIGNMENT properly, with forms for, OR ARREST with CREDITORS, and the INSOLVENT LAWS of every State.

IT TELLS YOU The legal relations existing between CREDITOR and DEBTOR, PLAINTIFF and APPRENTICE, and LANDLORD and TENANT.

IT TELLS YOU What constitutes LIBEL AND SLANDER, and the LAW in MARRIAGE DOWER the WIDOW'S RIGHTS in PROPERTY, DIVORCE and ALIMONY.

IT TELLS YOU The LAW for MECHANICS' LIENS in every State, and the NATURALIZATION LAWS of this country, and how to comply with them.

IT TELLS YOU The LAW Concerning PRINTING and LAW by which you can sue the DELINQUENT LAWS to PUBLIC LANDS.

IT TELLS YOU The LAW OF PATENTS with the proper procedure in obtaining one, with INTERFERENCES, ASSIGNMENTS and TAKE OF FEE.

IT TELLS YOU How to make your WILL, and how to ADMINISTER on AN INTESTATE, with the law and rule on quinquennial therein or in every State.

IT TELLS YOU The meaning of LAW TERMS in general use, and the relation to you the LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE and JUDICIAL DEPARTMENTS of the General and State GOVERNMENTS.

IT TELLS YOU How to save your money by showing how to do your business legally, thus saving a vast amount of property, and vexatious litigation, by its timely mentioning.

Single copies will be sent by mail, postage paid, to EVERY CITIZEN EVERY MECHANIC IN THE MAY BUSINESS, and EVERYBODY in EVERY STATE, on receipt of $1 00, or in law style of binding at $1 25.

$1000 A YEAR

can be made by engaging in the above business. Everybody uses everywhere, is selling the above work, as our inducements to all such are very liberal.

For single copies of the Book, or for terms to agents, with other information, apply to or address

JOHN E. POTTER, Publisher,
No. 617 Sansom St., Philadelphia, Pa.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the normal habits of female life experience a variety of disorders to which the Catholicon will counteract and cure. It can be relied upon in any case of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation. Profuse Uterine Hæmorrhage, Ulceration of the Womb, Chlorosis, Leucorrhœa, or Whites, every stage of Pregnancy, Falling of the Womb, and all diseases of the Uterus. As a tonic and alterative, it will build up strength, and restore the whole system. As a nervine, it will relieve Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Hysterics, Hysteria, and Spasms. As a cathartic, it will relieve Costiveness, Indigestion, Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Dizziness, Nausea, Sick Headache, &c. It is a sure preventive of Miscarriage, if taken during the first three months of pregnancy. At all periods of pregnancy it will be found to relieve the nausea and sickness usually attending that condition of the system, and will assist nature in her efforts, so that the period of gestation will be passed over with safety and comparative ease. In all cases of Confinement, it will be found to relieve the pains of labor, and assist nature in her efforts, thereby lessening the danger usually attending that critical period. In all cases of Female Weakness, Debility, Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Dizziness, Universal Lassitude of the Muscular System, Hysterics, Hysteria, Spasms, Pain in the Back, Groins, and Loins, Dragging Sensation, Bearing Down, Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, or Whites, Chlorosis, or Suppressed Menstruation, Ulceration of the Womb, Cancerous Humors, Tumors, and Dropsy of the Womb, Falling of the Womb, and all diseases of the Uterus, the Catholicon will be found a sure remedy. Explicit directions accompany each bottle, which should be strictly followed. Price $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

Sold by Druggists generally throughout the United States, Canada, and the West Indies.

Principal Depot, 152 Fulton Street, New York.

LOUISVILLE ARTESIAN WATER.

THIS NATURAL BEVERAGE AT A LOW RATE IS NOW VERY EXTENSIVELY used, is for sale by all Druggists and Grocers.
S. T. THOMPSON, Agent,
No. 152 Broadway.

"Medical Common Sense."

Send and get the Contents Table of this remarkable book, interesting to every body. Sent free by addressing DR. PIERCE, 2 Sth Broadway, N. Y.

THE ORANGE BLOSSOM WEDDING EVELOPE, just issued, very beautiful gossamer material, at CYRENIUS'S Wedding Card Depot, No. 302 Broadway, cor. Duane street. Also, French Paper.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. IV.—No. 171.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

CAPTAIN BRAND,

OF THE

SCHOONER "CENTIPEDE,"

A PIRATE OF EMINENCE IN THE WEST INDIES;

His Loves and Exploits,

TOGETHER

WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF THE SINGULAR MANNER BY WHICH HE DEPARTED THIS LIFE.

By LIEUT. HENRY A. WISE, U.S.N. (HARRY GRINGO),

AUTHOR OF "LOS GRINGOS" AND "TALES FOR THE MARINES."

ILLUSTRATED BY

C. PARSONS AND A. LUMLEY.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

PART I.

CHAPTER I.

SPREADING THE STRANDS.

IT was in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and five, and in the River Garonne, where a large, wholesome merchant brig lay placidly on the broad and shining water. The fair city of Bordeaux, with its great mass of yellow-tinted buildings, towers, and churches, rose from the river's banks, and the din and bustle of the great mart came faintly to the ear. The sails of the brig were loosed, the crew were hauling home the sheets and hoisting the topsails with the clear, hearty songs of English sailors, while the anchor was under foot and the chain rubbing with a taut strain against the vessel's bluff bows. At the gangway stood a large, handsome seaman, bronzed by the sun and winds of about half a century, dressed in a square-cut blue jacket and loose trowsers, talking to the pilot—a brown little Frenchman, in coarse serge raiment and large, clumsy sabots. The conversation between them was carried on partly by signs, for, in answer to the pilot, the other threw his stalwart arm aloft toward the folds of the spreading canvas and nodded his head.

"Fort bien! vite donc! mon Capitaine," said the pilot; "the tide is on the ebb, let us go! Up anchor!"

"Ay, pilot!" replied the Captain, pulling out his watch. "In ten minutes; the ladies, you know, must have time to say 'good-by.' Isn't it so, my pilot?"

The gallant little Frenchman smiled in acquiescence, and taking off his glazed hat with the air of a courtier, said, 'Parbleu! certainly, why not? Jean Marie would lose his pilotage rather than hurry a lady."

Going aft to the raised cabin on the quarter-deck, the Captain softly opened the weather door, and looking in, said, in a kindly tone,

"It is time to part, my friends; the pilot says we are losing the strength of the tide, so we must kiss and be off."

Two lovely women were sitting, hand clasped in hand, on the sofa of the transom. You saw they were sisters of nearly the same age, and a little boy and girl tumbling around their knees showed they were mothers; young mothers, too, for the soft, full, rounded forms of womanhood, with the flush of health and maternity pride tinged their cheeks, while praises of dark hair banded over their smooth brows and clerful eyes told the story at a glance. They rose together as the Captain spoke. "Adieu! chere Rosalie, we shall soon meet again, let us hope, never more to part." "Adieu, Nathalie! adieu, dearest sister! adieu! adieu!"

The loving arms were twined around each other in the last embrace; the tears fell like gentle rain, but with smiles of hope and trustfulness they parted.

"Ay," said the sturdy skipper, as he stood with eyes brimful of moisture regarding the sisters, "ay! trust me for bringing you together again. Well do I remember when you were little wee things when I brought you to France after the earthquake in Jamaica; just like these little rogues here"—and he laid his brawny paws on the heads of the children, who clung to each other within the folds of their mothers' dresses; "but never fear, my darlings," he went on, "you will meet happily again! Ay! that you shall, if old Jacob Blunt be above land or water."

A boat which was lying alongside the brig shoved off, the little boy who had been left on board was held high above the rail in the arms of a sturdy negro, while the mother stood beside him, waving her handkerchief to the boat as it pulled rapidly toward the shore.

"Man the windlass, lads!" cried the Captain. "Mister Binks, brace round the head yards, and up with the jib as soon as the anchor's aweigh."

The windlass clinked as the iron palls caught the strain of the cable, the anchor was wrenched from its oozy bed; the vessel's head fell off, and, gathering way, she moved quietly down the River Garonne.

CHAPTER II.

CALM.

THE great lumbering brig with yards square, mainsail hauled up, with the jib and spanker in the brails, lay listlessly rolling on the easy swell of the water, giving a gentle send forward every minute or so, when the sluggish sails would come with a thundering slap against the masts, and the loose cordage would rattle like a drum-major's rattan on a spree. The sea was one glassy mirror of undulations, shimmering out into full blaze as the rising sun just threw its rays along the crest of the ocean swell; and then dipping down into the rolling mass, the hue would change to a dark green, and coming up again under the brig's black counter would swish out into a little shower of bubbles and sparkle again joyously.

Away off in the distance lay the Island of Jamaica. The early haze about the mountain tops rising like a white lace veil from the deep vallers below, with here and there a white dot of a cluster of buildings, gleamed out from the somber land, like the flicker of a heliotrope; and at intervals, the base of the coast bursting forth in a long heavy fringe of foam, as the lazy breakers chafed idly about the rocks of some projecting headland. Nearer, too, were the dark succession of waving blue lines in parallel bars and patches of the young land wind, tipping the backs of the rollers in a flattering ripple of cat's-paws and then wandering gloriously away out to sea.

"WHEN THE WIND COMES FROM GOOD SAN ANTONIO, MY LADY-BIRD—"

Aloft stood a low, squarebuilt sailor at the wheel, his striped Guernsey cap hanging on one of the spokes, and his body leaning, half asleep, over the barrel, which gave him a sharp twitch every now and then when the sea caught the rudder on the wrong side. Near at hand, with an arm around an after topmast backstay, and head resting over the rail, was the mate, Mr. Binks, his grey-glass to his eye, through which he was peering at the distant hills of Jamaica. Presently, as he slowly was about to withdraw the glass from his eye, and as the old brig's nose, her head in-shore, something appeared to arrest his attention, for changing his position and climbing up to the break of the deck cabin he steadied himself by the shrouds, and rubbing his eye with the sleeve of his habit, he gave a long look through the glass, muttering to himself the while. At last, having apparently made up his mind, he sang out to the man at the wheel in this strain:

"Ben, my lad, look alive; catch a turn with them halliards over the lee-wheel; and just take this 'ere glass and trip up to the fore cat-head and see what ye make of that fellow, here away under the easternest headland."

Ben, without more ado, scoured the spokes of the wheel, clapped his cap on his head, hitched up his trowsers, and taking the glass from the mate rolled away up the fore rigging. Meanwhile Mr. Binks walked forward, stopping a moment at the galley-door to take a tot of grog from the cook, and then going on to the topsail-sheet bits, he carefully seated himself and leisurely began to air up his sugar in his tumbler with an iron spoon; making a little cymbal music with it on the outside while he gulped it down. He had not been many minutes occupied in this way when Ben hailed the deck from the fore yard.

"On deck there!"

"Hullo!" replied Mr. Binks.

"I see the craft," cried Ben; "she's a fore and after, sails down and sweeping along the land. She hasn't got a breath of wind, Sir."

"Very well," said Mr. Binks, squeezing into the tin pot with a sound like a sheet-iron organ, "come down."

As Ben weighed himself off the fore yard and caught hold of the futtock shrouds to swing in to the standing rigging, he suddenly paused, and putting the glass again to his eye to see out: "I say, Sir! Here is a big chap away off on the other quarter, under topsails. There! Perhaps you can see him from the deck, under a handspike clear of the sun"—pointing with the spy-glass as he spoke in the proper direction.

"All right," said the mate, as he began again the eyeing of the pot and spoon music, "Becalmed, ain't he?"

"Yes, Sir, not enough air to raise a hair on my old gentleman's wig!" muttered Ben, as he slowly trotted down the rigging.

The sun came up glowing like a ball of fire. The land looked away long before it had become far off from the island, and, saving the uneasy clatter at times of the loose sails and running gear, all remained as before. It was getting on toward eight o'clock, and the Captain came up from his cabin stairs.

Going to the latticed door of the deck cabin the jolly skipper threw it wide open, clapped his hands together thrice, and then placing them to his mouth like a speaking-trumpet he bellowed out in a deep, low roar,

"Hawse there, all hands! Heave out, lady-bird and baby! Land ho!"

Then came a joyous note from a soft, sweet voice which a screen drawn across the latticed cabin, mingled with a little cooing grunt from a child, and presently an inner door swung back, and the sweetest little tot of a boy came tumbling out into the open space, and sprang at once into the Captain's arms. The little fellow buried his brown curly head into the old skipper's whiskers, and then, kicking up his fat naked legs he laughed and chattered like a magpie.

"Aha! you young scamp, this small nose smells the oranges and cinnamon, eh? And does little Momma shuts her pretty eyes and won't look for papa, and so near home, too!"

Here Madame Rosalie's low sweet voice trilled out more as a slightly foreign accent, while the contralto tones vibrated on the ear like the note of a harp.

"Ah! but Capitaine, how could you deceive me? Still, I forgive you for telling me last night we were so far from Kingston. Was you know, to," she went on in her Creole accent, "how I love and want to see my dear husband after last four years, since you promised him away in your good big ship. But never mind, my good friend, I shall pay you off one of these days, and now send, please, for Banou to dress his little boy."

Scarcely had the worthy skipper reached a bell-rope near at hand, and given it one pull than the cabin door opened and in stepped a brawny black, whose bare wrists and ankles, white teeth and eyeballs glittered with delight. There was that about his face which indicated intelligence, energy, devotion, and withal those strange indescribable marks of expression which nature sometimes stamps in unmistakable lines on the skin, whether it be white or black. He was below the middle height, but the large head was set with a great swelling throat on the shoulders of a Titan. His loose white and red striped shirt was thrown well back over his black and broad chest; and putting out a pair of muscular arms that seemed as massive and heavy as lignum vitæ, the boy jumped from the Captain to meet them; and then striking his little soft legs down the sleek of Banou's shirt, he ran his rosy fingers in his wool, and shouted with glee.

"Oh!" said the black, as he passed his huge arms around the little fellow, and smoothed down his rustic garments as if it were the plumage of a bird, "what little Master Henri loves his Banou, eh? Good, he take bath."

Bearing his charge out upon the quarter-deck beneath the awning, he pulled a large tub from under a boat turned upside down over the deck cabin, and then while the young monkey had scrambled round to his back, and was beating a tattoo with his tiny fists on his shoulders, Banou caught up a bucket and proceeded to drawwater from over the side, which he dashed into the tub. When he had nearly filled the tub he felt around with his hand to see the water, and as he was about to seize a mosquito, and clutching the kicking legs with one hand, he pulled the little fellow a somersault over his head, and skinning off at the same time his diminutive breeches, he plunged him into the water, laughing singing the while in a laughing chant:

"Dis ir de way strong Banou catch him,
First he strip him, den he duck him,
Henri he jump and cream for his motter,
But Banou lub him more dan all de motter!"

Here the brawny nurse would souse him head over heels in the sparkling water, lift him up at every dip, with his black nose after him, making mock bites at the little legs and stomach; and finally, holding him aloft, dripping, laughing, and struggling, go on with the refrain:

"What will papa say when he sees Him,
Planning boy dat is sure to please him?
Big Banou he will scold and frown,
But little Henri he kick and pinch him!"

All this time the men seated forward on the deck, peering over the bows with mess-kids, would pause occasionally, shake their great tarry fingers at the imp, chuckle pleasantly with their mouths full of food, and think of the nurse belonged to them as individual property.

"Oh, my little master will get his black, at last, "when will papa say to-morrow when he sees his brave Henri?"

"Ah, Banou," he will be, Banou!" said the lovely mother, who had just come on deck, as she kissed the mouth of the young scamp, while the boy dried himself and dried his little naked body in a large towel.

"Ah, yes, my mistress, we all will be happy when once we to get home to master on the plantation."

"Tell me! tell me, good Capitaine," said she, turning in a pretty petulant way to the skipper, "when shall we get in port?"

It was a sight to see her, in the loose white morning gown folded about the well-swelling bosom, her slender waist clasped by a flowing blue sash, the dark tresses in bands of her hair confined by a large gold filigree pin, and half-concealed by a jaunty little French cap, with the ribbons floating down over her shoulders ears. And while her soft, dark, hazel eyes were bent eagerly toward the solid old skipper, and her round, rosy face was slightly raised a most nature-locket fastened by a massive linked gold chain around her neck, ah, she was a sight to see and love!

"Tell me, mon cher Capitaine Blunt, how many hours or minutes will it be before I shall see my husband?"

The good-natured skipper laughed pleasantly at the eagerness of the question, and instead of opening his hands wide, he gave vent to a long, low whistle, and replied,

"When the wind comes from good San Antonio, my lady-bird—when the sea-breeze makes —then the old brig will reel off the knots! But see! just now our wind is as dead as a magpie bird's wings out! There, look at that fellow!"

High up in the heavens two or three man-of-war hawks, with snowy breasts and wings, and their swallow tails out as sharp as knife-blades, were bending seaward, and every little while falling in a rapid curve plunges, as if in a swoon, and then again giving an almost imperceptible dash with their wings, they would resume the lost space and continued on in their silent flight.

"That's a sure sign, Madame Rosalie," continued the skipper, "that the trade-wind has blown itself out, and the chances are that this hot sun will drive it in from the Caribbean Sea and so in a dead calm till the moon quarters to-night. What say you, Mr. Binks, am I right?"

"Never know'd it to fail, Capt'in, Sir," said the mate, with an honest intention of voice, as he tried to stare the sun out of countenance in following the Captain's glance.

"Helm!" said the young mother, with a little sigh of sadness as she began opening one of the lace rail to the green hills and slopes of the island, standing now out boldly, with the lofty blue mountains rolling away in the distance, like a mid-heaven; "so near, too, and he is thinking and waiting for us!"

"Dear," exclaimed the skipper, hastily, "the youngster wants his breakfast!"

CHAPTER III.

HIGH NOON.

HIGH noon! Still the stanch old brig bowed and dipped her bluff bows into the long, easy swell of the tropics; the round, flat counter sent the briny bubbles sparkling away in the glare of the ecuatide sun; the sails flapped and chafed against the spars and rigging, while the crew sheltered themselves beneath the awnings and dozed on peacefully.

Not so, however, with the large sail that had been seen from the brig in the early morning. For, with a lofty spread of kites and a studding-sail or two, she at times caught a fleeting puff of air; and when the sun had passed the zenith she had approached within half a mile or less of the brig. There was no mistaking the stranger's character. Her taunt, trim masts, square yards, and clear, delicate black tracery of rigging, shadowed by a wide spread of snow-white cotton over the low, dark hull—which at times showed a row of white, shuttling ports—a row of ports with a glance of white inner bulwarks—while the brass stars of her armory reflected sparks of fire from the blazing rays of the sun, showed she was a man-of-war.

"She's one of our cruisers, I think, Sir," said the mate, as he handed the spy-glass to the Captain; "but Ben here believes contrariwise, and he ought up a bit to understand."

"Have to 'gin again, Mr. Binks; for to my mind she's an out-and-out Yankee sloop-of-war. I 'heer people make up to the gaff at her with our ensign, or else he'll be burning some powder for us."

Even while they were speaking her flag went rapidly up in a roll to the corvette's peak, when, shaking itself out in white and red, with a galaxy of white stars in a blue union, on the lee side of the spanker, while at the same instant a long, thin streak of white smoke issued from itself from the main track, and hung motionless in the calm down the mast. Her decks were full of men, who were seen under the shadow of the sails to leeward; and on the poop were three or four officers in uniform and straw hats. One of these stood for some time gazing at the brig—one hand resting on the rattines of the mizzen-shrouds and the other slowly sweeping a trumpet backward and forward. Presently an officer with a pair of gleaming epaulets on his shoulders stepped to the young leader, touched his hat, and waved his hand toward the brig. A moment after, "Brig ahoy!" came in a sharp, clear, mingly tone through the trumpet.

"Sir?"

"What brig is that?"

The Captain of the wharf, named after my dear old wife, God bless her! and myself, Jacob Blunt, Sir, and I'm a Yankee skipper, in a sotto voce chuckle to the fair passenger who stood beside him.

"Where are you from, and where bound?" came again through the trumpet.

"Bordeaux, and bound to Kingston. We have a few passengers for Robert Collet Cobbe and Admiral Villeneuve." There was a wave of the trumpet as the speaker finished hailing, and then turning to his side he officer with the gold swabs, and passing only a moment, he moved to the other side of the corvette's poop. The result of the brief colloquy, for he will be all us what his name is after all the questions he's axed."

"Don't ye know, Mr. Binks," broke in the Captain, "that the dignity of a man-of-war is such that it seems to be considered a rule never than that she has a cargo of cannon-balls and going on a cruise any where, which ye may have an idea is considerable information as we might get out of our own calabashes without asking a question."

"You are quite right, Captain Blunt, but I did not tax my mind to think when I spoke them remarks," said Binks, deferentially.

The corvette's trumpet once more communicative than the mate gave her credit for, and a moment after the officer with the trumpet came out,

"This is the United States ship Scourge, from Fort Royal, bound on a cruise! Please report us."

And again, after a few words apparently with the officer who stood by him, the trumpet was raised to his lips, and he asked, "Have you seen any vessels lately?"

The skipper was on the point of answering the hail, when his mate said, "Beg pardon, Captain Blunt, but Ben and me made out a fore and aft schooner early this morning, with every rag out, pulling in under the outermost headland there," pointing with his horny finger as he spoke.

"Nothing, Sir, but a small schooner at daylight away over the land."

"What?" came back in a clear, quick note from the corvette.

"Small craft and after, Sir, with sails down and sweeps out, close under the land."

In a moment two or three officers on the corvette's deck were heads together, several glasses were directed toward the now dim mirage-like shadow of the island, and the next instant the boat-hook of the corvette's whaler was heard, followed by a gruff call of "Away there! Aricls away!"

Immediately a cluster of sailors, in white frocks and trowsers and straw-hats, sprang over the brig's quarter into a boat; and then with a chirruping, surging pipe, a boat fell rapidly to the water. The falls were cast off, the cutter headed up to windward, and soon an oblong stepped over the side and tripped down to the boat. The white blades of the oars stood up on end in a shower, the boat pushed off, the oars fell with a single splash, and she steered for the brig. Descending down into the gentle valley of the sea, the boat was disappear for an instant, till nothing but the white hats and feather blades of the oars were visible; and again rising on the crest, the water flashed off in foam from her bows as she came dancing on.

In a few minutes the corvettes cried "Way enough," and throwing up his hand with the word "Toss," the cutter shot swiftly alongside; the boat-hooks of the bowmen bought her up with a sudden jar, and the next moment an officer with an epaulet on his right shoulder, and a sword by his side, stepped over the gangway. The skipper was there to receive him, to whom he touched his cap with his fore finger; but as his eye glanced aft he saw a lady, and he gracefully removed his cap and bowed like a gentleman to her. He was a man of about eight-and-twenty, with a fine, manly, sailor-like figure and air, and with a pair of bright determined grey eyes in his head that a coast would not care to look into twice.

"I am the First Lieutenant of the Scourge, Sir," he said, turning to the skipper, "and if you will step this way, I'll have a few words with you."

This was said in a careless tone of command, but without with frankness and civility. The Captain led him aft toward the taffrail, but in crossing the deck the little tot of a boy followed closely in his wake, and getting hold of the officer's sword, which trailed along by its belt-strap on the deck, he got outside of it and seized on to the coat skirts of the wearer. The little tug he gave caused the officer to turn around, and with a respectful smile and manner he snatched the urchin up in his arms, kissed him on both cheeks, and as he put him down again and detected the cloth for him to play with, he exclaimed:

"Why, what a glorious little reefer you'll make one of these days! Won't you?"

"Oui! oui! mon Prpre!" said the little scamp, as he looked knowingly up in the officer's face.

"Excuse my little boy, Sir," said his mother, who was in chase of him; and then turning to the child with a blush spreading over her lovely face, "It is not your papa, Henri! papa is in Kingston."

"Ah, madame! I love children. I had once a dear little fellow like this, but both he and his sweet mother are in heaven now. God bless them!"

A flush of sadness tinged his manly cheeks, and he passed his hand rapidly across his eyes, as if the dream was too sad to dwell upon; but changing his tone, while with one hand he patted the little fellow's head, he went on: "Madame lives in Jamaica?"

"Oh yes! I was born there, but my parents were deported by an arrogant people. I was quite a little child, and this good Captain here carried my sister and myself to France soon after, where Monsieur Pirou"—here she paused and blushed with pleasure—"where I married my husband, who is a planter on the island. Perhaps you may know Monsieur Jules Piron?"

"Piron?" said the navy man with warmth. "Ay, madame, Sir Jules Piron is one of our first planted sugars! Know him? Why, madame, it is only a week ago that a lot of us dined with him at his house outside of Kessaint [you hear it, madame? in the grand piazza which looks down the gorge. But he behaved very shabbily," said the officer, with a fine face lighted up gayly, "for he kept a spy-glass to his eye oftener than the wine-glass to his lips, in looking toward the island, and in taking note of madame and the little boy he had never seen."

"Oh, Monsieur! you make me so happy," said the lovely woman, as with sparkling eyes and heaving bosom she cried, "Banou! Banou! bring here the picture that I see you have in your room!"

The black, who had been standing near and guarding every movement of his little charge, with one hand on the sword-hilt of the officer, immediately approached the officer, and, falling on his knees, seized his hand and drew it toward the face.

"Ah, madame, I see that kindness meets with a return as well from a dark as a fair skin," said the officer to the lovely one, as he gently withdrew his hand from Banou's grasp.

"But," he continued, turning toward the skipper, as the clear sound of the cruiser's bell struck his ear, "I must not forget what I came for."

"You say, Captain, that you saw a schooner at daylight, eh? This way, if you please"—as he passed on to the after part of the deck and walked over to the other side of the deck—"what was she like?"

"She was reported to me by the navy man," replied Jacob Blunt.

"Please send for him. Oh, Mr.—a—"

"Binks," said that individual, touching his hat, and making an awkward scrape at a bow.

"Well, Mr. Binks, did you clearly make out the vessel you saw this morning under the land?"

"Can't say exactly, Sir," said Ben Brown there was on the fore yard, and he got a good squint at her."

"Ah! and you are the man?"

The mate straightway went forward, and, after a few pokes about the lee waist, Ben was produced, and the jolly-boat tars came rolling aft.

"You saw the schooner, eh?" said the Lieutenant, as if he was in the habit of asking sharp questions and getting quick answers.

"Yes, Sir," said the sailor, and then scratching his head, he hitched up his knife-belt and wiped his mouth with the back of his hand and took off his cap.

"Where?"

"Here away, Sir," with a wave of his hand: "just clear of that bluff foreland where the gap opens with the Monkey-rock."

"How was she rigged?"

"Bare sticks, Sir, not much of a bowsprit, and one sail spread. I see her first by the flash of her sweeps in the rising sun as she was heading about one-quarter into the land."

"Two masts, you say?"

"Ay, Sir; but I thought as 'tow there was a figure-head yard a stickin' out over her starn, though I wasn't sartin."

"So!" said the Lieutenant, in a musing tone and with rather a grave face and compressed lips; "that will do; thank you, my man." Then placing his hand on the skipper's shoulder, he drew him to one side, out of ear-shot, and said,

"Captain Blunt, are you much acquainted in these latitudes?"

"Oh yes, Sir, me and my old brig are regular traders here, from Bordeaux to Jamaica and so home to England."

"No treasure, I presume?" went on the officer, with a smile.

"Why, Lieutenant, none to speak of, p'raps; just a handful of dollars and a guinea or two in the bag for a few sacks of sugar or coffee, or a pipe of rum or silk like on my own account."

"Well, my friend, there is probably nothing to fear, but if the breeze springs up, keep as close to the convicts as you can, and I shall ask the Captain to keep a look-out for you during the night."

"By-the-way"—the officer continued in a low tone as he moved toward the gangway—"in case any thing should happen, you had better hoist a lantern at your peak or in the main rigging—we have sharp eyes for ugly customers, and one or two of them have been particularly troublesome of late hereabouts."

Turning for a moment to bid adieu to the fair lady-passenger on the quarter-deck, and receiving his sword after a playful struggle with the youngster, he buckled it around his waist, and stepping lightly over the side and into the boat, the oars fell with a single splash, and the cutter shot rapidly away toward the corvette.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1860.

FIRES IN TENEMENT-HOUSES.

ANOTHER terrible destruction of life has ensued from a fire in a tenement-house; ten human beings have been hurried unexpectedly, in the dead of night, to the presence of their Maker. As in the case of the Elm Street fire, the nature of the buildings was such that once the flames gained headway escape and rescue were impossible.

Tenement-houses are the curse of New York. They are as independent of law as lands in the prairie or the Hudson Bay Company's territory. They are the refuge of thieves, outcasts, and prostitutes; from their slimy dens these creatures issue forth nightly to disgrace our civilization, sure of a safe retreat when the crimes of the night are ended. Some tenement-houses are inhabited by neither thieves nor prostitutes; in them teeming families are crowded into small, uncleanly, ill-ventilated rooms, where pestilence is begotten and habits of vice acquired by children from their very infancy. The idea of the owner of a tenement-house is to make the most money by the least outlay. How he builds with the cheapest materials, and in the most unsubstantial way; allots the least space possible to each lodger, and devotes a whole thought to the squeezing of his rent—having secured himself against loss by fire by an ample insurance. Properly administered, such property is the very best going; we have the best authority for saying that it should yield ten per cent. at least, and, in judicious hands, is frequently made to yield twelve and fifteen.

This is clearly a case for legislative control. In more than half the cases in which the Legislature of this State meddles with private business it goes wrong, simply because it forgets that competition and the law of supply and demand suffices to regulate trade; but this is a case in which nothing but legislative interference will avail. It is the direct interest of landlords of tenement-houses to overcrowd them and to neglect precautions against fire.

In France and England the owners of such houses are under the direct and constant supervision of regularly appointed officials. In Paris, especially, the subject of fire is regulated with remarkable strictness. Had such massacres occurred in that city as we have had in Elm Street and Forsyth Street, it would have gone hard with the owners of the buildings. But no such disasters could have occurred there, because such buildings would have been disposed by the inspectors the day they were finished, and the owners would not have been permitted to take tenants. So in England. The law requires every owner of a tenement-house to grant so many feet of space to each tenant, and to provide proper means of escape in case of fire. This law is thoroughly and efficiently carried out.

A very simple law would achieve great good here. A section obliging owners of tenement-houses to provide fire-escapes, and another compelling them to furnish their tenants with so many square feet of room, and fresh air, would answer the purpose, provided honest men were appointed to set the law carried into execution. Such a law should commend itself to the Albany politicians, from the fact that it provides employment for a few more patriots.

THE ALMS-HOUSE.

THE New York Tribune published, some ten days ago, an article reflecting very severely on the official administration of the Governors of the Alms-house, charging them with loose behavior, indecent license, and gross mismanagement of the interests committed to their charge. The Governors have since held a meeting, at which the Tribune's accusations have been vehemently repelled, the purity of the Governors asserted, and a desire expressed for a committee of inquiry—said committee to be recruited from that pure, incorruptible, and unabused body, the New York State Legislature.

We have no objection to say plainly that the public is with the Tribune, and not with the Governors. Roughly speaking, we think that the Tribune was more than half right in all that it said. They do not believe—as the Governors insinuate—that the Tribune's article was written spitefully by some discharged employé of the Ten Governors; or, if it was penned by a person who had been in the Governors' employ, they rather think that he told the truth, whatever his motive may have been. And nobody expects that any good will result from a legislative committee of inquiry. The Ten Grand Law and other railroad schemes can secure majorities in both Houses, it is not likely that the Board of Governors will find it impossible to secure a whitewashing at the market price from the same bodies.

The public were horrified only a few months ago by the publication of undeniable evidence to the effect that the Ten Governors were in the habit of farming out the wards of the city to the lowest bidders, and that the most frightful outcasts thus traded off were sometimes murdered by the fiendish brutes to whose mercies they were intrusted. We repeat only because Mr. Carlock's name to recall the circumstance to our readers' memory.

We now learn that the gross carelessness of which Mr. Carlock tragedy was an accidental revelation pervades the whole administration of the Alms-house. Every department, we are assured, is crowded with worthless wretches of drunken orgies, paid for by the city, and indulged in—before the eyes of paupers and convicts—by the Governors themselves or guests in every man's mouth. We can testify personally that, as a general rule, the convicts are not allowed the worst-behaved forms of such decency.

In theory, the plan of transferring the patronage of the Alms-house from the city to the State capital is clearly wrong. But after all, naked theories are not always the best guides. And with the experience of the Metropolitan Police before us, we are bound to admit that, even at the cost of seeing a band of hungry rural politicians saddled upon us, the transfer of the Alms-house patronage to Albany would not be viewed by respectable people with much regret. If one half the charges that the Tribune has well founded, the sooner Blackwell's Island is purged of the officials who are now employed there the better: no change could be for the worse.

We shall return to the subject at an early day.

THE LOUNGER.

A MUNICIPAL QUESTION.

IN the city of New York wants to have a railroad through the streets, why should it be obliged to ask leave of the State? Is not the City Government parent—quite as much so as the licensing of omnibus lines; and it is something with which the State has no more to do than with the laying out of new streets or the cleaning of old ones.

The paramount safety of a popular form of government lies in its constant decentralization. The municipality is the germ. The State is a series of independent little communities, governing their own affairs. Centralization is despotism. There is no more reason that the city of New York should ask the leave of the State to lay down a railroad within the city limits for the city convenience, than that it should ask the same permission to substitute gas for oil in the street lamps.

So also in the matter of ferries to the neighboring shores. Why should there be the system of ferry-rights? Why should not the transportation of passengers and freight from Brooklyn and Hoboken and Jersey City and Staten Island to the city be left open to the laws and chances of all other commercial enterprises, while care for human life and safety is maintained by the general law of the State? Is there any more reason that the transportation of passengers between Staten Island and New York should be subject to the control of the city than the larger ferry from New York to Liverpool? Why should there not be as many ferries to Brooklyn as there are people willing to risk their capital in the venture—subject always to stringent laws of personal security for the passengers?

Once more, why should the city own markethouses any more than dry-goods shops? Food is the first necessity of life, and the last thing a person there will always be plenty of persons who will have it for sale. But clothes are also a necessary of life in this climate. Why does not the city set up great buildings and let rooms in them to tailors? It is indeed the business of the city to take care that bad food is not sold; but so it is its duty to guard against swindling every where.

Half of the reason that we are governed so badly is that we are governed too much. This distracting system of city interference begets the business of contracts and jobs which annihilate the public morality. It would an honest man always, about a hundred dollars to get.

Of course, no system will work well where men are corrupt. But, for all that, there is a choice in systems. Some give more chances of decent government than others. The system usually ought not to try to manage matters which are purely municipal, and the city should not complicate trade by interfering with its simple and legitimate laws.

BLOOD IN ART.

GOUPIL'S engraving shop and picture gallery, near Union Square, is one of the pleasant lounges of the city. You can see there the last French prints, good and bad—the engraving of Gerome's Duel after the Masquerade, the fine head of Ary Scheffer, his Stigmata, the single figure of Marie Antoinette, superb with scorn, from Paul Delaroche's picture—all these, and many, many more, and often a good picture.

At present, however, you can see a forcible, unpleasant picture there, by the same Gerome who painted the Duel after the Masquerade. It is the Death of Cæsar, and is apparently a part of a larger picture, of which there is an engraving in the window, and which represents the whole scene—the Senate Chamber, with the retiring crowd of conspirators. In the painting, however, you see only the prostrate body of Cæsar and the chair overthrown. It is terribly real. The clotted blood upon the floor—the smearing upon the tops of the chair-backs—the daggers in the drapery—the ghastly fingers which have sought at the knives—the wounds upon the exposed arms—the bloody tracks of the assassins upon the marble pavement, as they moved away—the utter desolation—the rigidity of horrible death—if you want these in a picture, you have it in Gerome's Dead Cæsar. A pretty thing to hang in your parlor! It is merely a murdered man painted in his gore. It might be one of the scenes from the L. A. Chasseur au Spring, except that the accessories show it to be Roman.

The significance of Cæsar's death can not be represented by wounding his blood, dead body as well that you smell blood, and fall sick, as in a direction from. It is the very morgue horror of sublimity in physical horror. A corpse is a corpse, whether it be Alexander's or Yorick's. The moment for a picture of Cæsar's death is the moment of the advance upon him with uplifted daggers. We know already that he was killed: therefore it is not necessary to show us that he is dead. Cæsar lying in his gore is a corpse; but Cæsar confronting his fate is Cæsar still. If you would paint a martyr, paint it before the flames are out: ashes left to paint, but when he stands at the stake serenely smiling through consuming fires. You need not not draw the actual forms of angels descending with palms; for in the spirit that has conquered death there is the tranquil superiority of which palms themselves are but the symbols.

To paint life, and not death, is the business of an artist—to paint life, and the higher the form of life, the higher the art? And hence religious painters who represent the life of faith are considered chief of all.

Gerome loves unmitigated horror. The Duel after the Masquerade is a striking picture—but how unrelieved! The bold glassiness! It is gregarious, fantastically horrible.

Now comes down National Academy exhibition. Oh, gentlemen painters, we critics are all sharpening our pens and our eyes! We are each of us a pure, impartial human individual, with certain fancies about what pictures ought to be. But we are all going to brandish the "we" about your backs, as if we were indeed the world, the great public, speaking!

A FEAST OF LEATHER.

THE Swamp will be merry day a week or two ago. Or, more properly speaking, it was the edge of the Swamp that saw it, for Messrs. Young, Schultz, & Co., Fraser & Brother, and Mattison and M'Coy have removed their great leather business from the narrower Ferry Street into Frankfort.

Perhaps of all measures upon the globe the Swamp is the most generous. It grows to eat of nine-tails, or lubrushes, or flags, or blue-blossomed pickerel weed—not at all; it blossoms with high brick stores, with warehouses, with piers, sidewalks, curbstones; it expands and bourgeons all over with leather.

And here was observed what silent stores leather stores are? The squeak has not set in yet. The hides lie in huge piles upon the floors. You touch none lower than the upper shoulder as you pass the door, just broad enough to allow a passage for a cart, which they are loading with leather. It is only when you examine that are fleury. The great business of South Street and the Swamp moves on quietly. Great fortunes grow out of them, as trees out of the ground, larger and larger every year, and standing at length broad and benignant, honorable landmarks to their boughs, and acorns for future trees falling from their abundance.

To celebrate the opening of their new stores a pleasant custom prevails. Leather dealers, clergymen, editors, and other religious persons," as one of the orators remarked. There were wit and festive eloquence in plenty. The road to good humor lies over a full stomach. And it was pleasant to know that in a time which, like all other times, is reprobate as the very worst time that ever was, the prospects of trade are so bright and smiling. There is no body of merchants more cordially united than the leather men. It is a body so fraternal, so democratic, so modest, that there is no assumption of dignity, and no one of them is more ambitious than another to be considered the great leather head.

ON THE WAY TO CHARLESTON.

Ten Major Jack Downing, Downingsville, Downing County, Maine; in care of Mr. Harper, which send it to you.

WASHINGTON METROPOLIS, April 2, 1860.

WAAL, Uncle Jack, here I be at last, clean tuckered out and hardly able to write to tell mi'end you enjoin' the same blessin'. This here cussing from Maine to Alexandria in a pesky pink-stern schooner ain't exactly equal tew hookin' corn with putty gals, and a-dustin' red ears all the time. No, it ain't. Our nigger's shirt-collar, on a July afternoon, when he gits tew enchode and finely, doesn't hav the starch taken out of it was than that pesky pink-stern schooner tuk the life out of me, I tell you. Why, if the plagny critter had gone right deown I wouldn't have cared, I was so miserable, and only a passenger, plase take it! see, I tew the fullur that stood tew the buck end with a lever, a sort of pryin' the thing along.

Wa'n't glad when we got tew Chesarpeak Bay! and the water was smooth, and some of the bad families of Virginny brought us sum oysters in a small kote. Then we saw Mount Vernon, where Washington was razed, and where a man of that name now rases canes for memento-morts, but is agoin' to sell cent to a grate many fowks, the Father of his Country not having any children in the male line. It's a pretty nice sort of place, and I guess a ice-cream temperance restorator there, with ardents in the back-room, whud pay. A masterly lot of folks go there, they du say, in the summer.

When the schuner was tied up in Alexandria I runs up here in a ferry-bote, bickety-splash. The place looks like a cross 'tween a way off, and sum'at that it's sort of scatter'd and uncompleted; and on goin' a'mosst there's the sprysest lot of fellers ever yew did see.

"National?" sez one.

"Yes, Sir-ree!" sez I; "National tew the core."

"Brown's?" sez another.

"No, Sir!" sez I, "nor blacks neither. I ain't ov them partys."

"United States?" sez another yet.

"Sartin!" sez I; "yew don't think I'm a foreigner?"

And by this time they was a-pullin' and a-haulin' on me tew kill. I tew'd as fast tew one of them 'Vestergotin' Committees we read about; but, sure as I liv', 'twant nuthin' but cerridge-drivurs.

"Scout" sez I, "for I'm a-goin' tew walk."

And walk I did!

There was a sidewalk all the way, with houses and stables and sum luxurious lunks, and all sorts of places; but I kept strate on, askin' every one I met for the White House. Some sort ov a'lurid, but I kept on, and at last stumpt it clean up to a new pergod boots, cost $2 87½, and jist as good as any calf-skin or shiny leather any where. But when come tew the ground plase, sumwhere I reckon sort o'swelled up, but I rung the bell jist as if the House tew min—it is main, the small peace of it, anyhow. An Irisher come tew the door.

"Is Mr. Buchanan tew hum?" sez I.

"Do you want to see the President?" sez he.

"If I didn't," sez I, "what would I be a doin' on here?"

"Well," sez he, "the President's engaged."

"Sho!" sez I. "Why, I kinder that's tew never'd a gone and done that at his time of life."

"Cum to-morrow", sez he, "from twelve till one; and if the President's at lessur he'll see you."

"Wa'al," sez I, feelin' sort of chap-fallen, "if I can't du no better, guess I'll go tew Jack's and I 'few giv' this tew Mr. Buchanan, and tell him I'll be here tew-morrow." And I gin yaw letter, Uncle Jack, a tellin' him how I was a goin' tew Charleston tew the Convention.

The Irisher hain't no more than tuk the letter than he slamm'd the door, and there I stod a lockin' at it, jist like a fool—anyhow, I felt like wun. But, sez I tew myself, sez I, Lookee here, never wun a fair trainin' day; so I legun tew whistle Yankee Doodle, and off I went, left foot furst, eye tew the front, and the little fingurs on a-hankin agin the seames of my panterloons.

After I'd gone along a peace I heard some one holler arter me, "I say!" I jist let him holler, and kept right on, head up. "I say!" he hollered agin and agin. So I kum up tew see what he had tew hand on my shoulder. "I say!" sez he—tews the President's Irisher.

"Wa'al," sez I, "what dew you say?"

"Why," sez he, "the President no sooner red yar letter than he sung out, 'Michael!' 'Sur?' 'Go yon almost like the gentleman and bring him back this, and bring him here.' And, Sur, won't yez have the kindness to go back with me?"

"Seein as it's you, Michael," sez I. "I will. But tew wa'n't over civil tew me when I was there jist now."

"Ah! Sur," sez he, terrible perlite, "I thot yez was an office-seeker."

By this time we got tew the grate house again, and in I walked. Gorry grashus! There stood the identecal Mr. Buchanan, and I know'd him in a minit, after havin' seen pictures on him in Mister Harper's paper.

"Why, Mr. Downing," sez he, "what made you leave this house without seein' me?"

I was a goin' to speak rite out, but Michael looked so sheepish like, tes I, "I thot you was busy, and didn't like tew interrupt."

"Intrude!" sez he. "The nephew of Major Jack Downing an intruder here, where Andrew Jackson's portrait looks for a long time?" Sez he.

"Wouldn't yew have felt tickled tew hev metal hint, Uncle? I guess; and I'll tell you somethew second-hand silk hat, and I hollers, "Hurrar for Jackson! and Buchanan tew!"

Mr. Buchanan, sez he, "You're a chip of the old block! Come up stairs." And he took me, jist as sosherble as you'd take our doctor up inter the hired man's room up inter his 'Sanctum.' Sez he, "and tell me all about it."

Deown I set, and told him how we was all sorted of frustrated about the mail-box and democracy up in Downin'ville, and how yew'd sent me tew the Charleston Conveyshun arter real democracy and a quill of vaxcheration.

Sez he, when I told him all, "Now you just stay here till it 's time for you to go to Charleston; and I'll introduce you to all the candidates, and show you the city, or my private secretary will."

I thought I'd take the course, and he took me inter the next chamber, where he interduced me to Mr. Buchanan, his private secretary. "His uncle and I," sez he, jintin' tew me, "were friends; now he's set the nephews cronies." Then he went out, and I've set deown and scribbled this off, tew send on tew Mr. Harper, who yew sed wud print it jist as yew'd tew have yure letters home printed.

Your lovin' nephew till death does part,

BENJAMIN DOWNING, 2D.

HON. THOMAS CORWIN, OF OHIO.

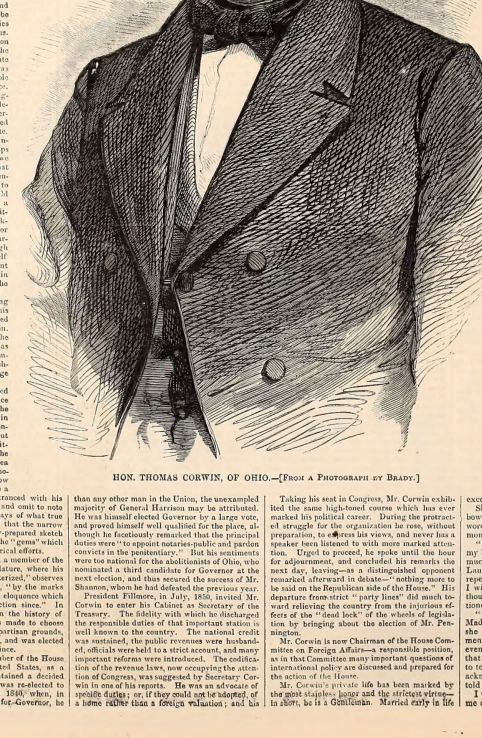
HON. THOMAS CORWIN, a Representative in Congress from the Warren District of the State of Ohio, stands at the head of the "Old Guard" of national legislators—that race of Statesmen whose voices were heard in the now deserted halls of the original Capitol; who were inspired by high-toned sentiments of patriotism; who investigated every question without either sectional or partisan prejudice; and who met every responsibility with fearless intrepidity. Among the many distinguished citizens of the United States there is scarcely one who, from his character and talents, as well as his national principles and patriotic career, has a stronger hold upon the affections of THE PEOPLE, than "the Whipper-Boy, TOM CORWIN!"

General Corwin is a parent that the Corwin family immigrated to this country from Hungary, and the people of Essex County, in Massachusetts, claim the subject of this sketch as a descendant of one of the exiliest settlers on that rock-bound coast. What is it that his father, Matthias Corwin, was a pioneer resident in Kentucky, and removed from there, in 1798, to what is now Warren County, in Ohio, where he cleared a small farm near the present town of Lebanon. After that portion of the Northwestern Territory was admitted into the Union as the State of Ohio, Mr. Corwin served for many years in the Legislature, a part of the time presiding as Speaker of the House. He was afterward one of the Associate Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, which office he held at the period of his death in 1829. He is spoken of by those who were his neighbors as a respected citizen, a faithful member of the Baptist Church, and as a public officer of unimpeachable integrity.

Thomas Corwin was born in Bourbon County, Kentucky, on the 29th day of July, 1794, and at the age of four years was taken by his father to Ohio. His early and only education was received in a log-cabin, and as he became strong enough to be serviceable on the farm, his studies were confined to the winter months. While yet a lad, the brave Harrison and his gallant army were on the Northern frontier, almost destitute of provisions, and a demand was made on the patriotism of the people to furnish the necessary sustenance. The elder Mr. Corwin loaded a wagon with supplies, which his son delivered, as was described in after-years when that son was nominated for Governor of his native State. "I remember," said General Anthony, after describing the hardships of the campaign, "that when we were dependent for food for what came through the brushwood country, where each wagoner had to make his way wherever he could find a passable place, there came a team which was managed by a little, dark-complexioned, hardy-looking lad, apparently about fifteen or sixteen years old, who was familiarly called TOM CORWIN. Through all of that service he proved himself a good 'whip' and an excellent 'reinsman;' and in the situation in which we are about to place him he will be found equally skillful."

Returning from the frontier, young Corwin resumed his labors on his father's farm, and at night pored over what books he could obtain. When qualified, he entered the Clerk's office of the County Court as an assistant, and in 1816 he commenced the study of law under Joshua Collett, Esq., afterward a Judge of the Supreme Court.

In 1817 Mr. Corwin was admitted to the bar, at which he has since held a high position, both in the skillful management of cases and in his arguments. Some of his forensic efforts have been reported; and these reports, like those of his political speeches, fail to impart to the reader any thing like a correct idea of his style of eloquence. Stenographers attempt in vain to follow him—perhaps he who seek to make a synopsis of his remarks are entranced with his genial humor and weighty wit, and omit to note the profound knowledge he displays of what true statesmanship should be. Alas! that the narrow limits prescribed for this hastily-prepared sketch forbid the introduction of some of the "gems" which have adorned Mr. Corwin's oratorical efforts.



In 1818 Mr. Corwin was elected a member of the lower branch of the Ohio Legislature, where his début into public life "was characterized," observes a writer in the American Review, "by the marks of independence, uprightness, and eloquence which have given him so much distinction since." In 1829, when, for the first time in the history of Warren County, an attempt was made to choose members of the Legislature on partisan grounds, he was again persuaded to serve, and was elected in opposition to the political nominee.

In 1830 he was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, as a Whig, although his district contained a decided majority of Jackson men. He was re-elected to each successive Congress until 1840, when, in consequence of his nomination for Governor, he resigned his seat. During this long term in the House he was a zealous advocate of what were known as Whig principles, and the strenuous adversary of executive invasions of liberty. But he participated in no intrigues, sought to control no political alliance, engaged in no traffic for office. His manliness was tempered with a moderation that, while it asserted its own convictions of right, left undisturbed the rights of others. His appearance in debate, says a biographer, was rare, but always effective. The announcement of his name was an assurance of profound stillness in the House. That stillness continued while he occupied the floor, except as it was sometimes broken by demonstrations of excitement, such as wisdom, argument, and eloquence like his must occasionally produce.

During the political campaign of 1840 Mr. Corwin became extensively known as an effective public speaker; and to his efforts, more perhaps than any other man in the Union, the unexampled majority of General Harrison may be attributed. He was himself elected Governor by a large vote, and proved himself well qualified for the place, although he facetiously remarked that the principal duties were "to appoint sheriffs and pardon convicts in the penitentiary." But his sentiments were too national for the abolitionists of Ohio, who nominated a third candidate for Governor at the next election, and thus secured the success of Mr. Shannon, whom he had defeated the previous year.

President Fillmore, in July, 1850, invited Mr. Corwin to enter his Cabinet as Secretary of the Treasury. The fidelity with which he discharged the responsible duties of that important station is well known to the country. The national credit was sustained, the public revenues were husbanded, officials were held to a strict account, and many important reforms were introduced. The codification of the revenue laws, now occupying the attention of Congress, was suggested by Secretary Corwin in one of his reports. He was an advocate of specific duties; or, if they could not be adopted, of a home rather than a foreign valuation; and his suggestions have now been adopted, to a great extent, by President Buchanan and other political opponents.

After the expiration of the Fillmore Administration, in 1853, and until the fall of 1858, Mr. Corwin attended to his professional duties in Cincinnati (where he had a law-office), maintaining his residence at Lebanon, and remaining comparatively aloof from the political questions of the day. But he could not refuse the general desire expressed that he should accept a nomination to the present Congress; and when he "took the stump" thousands of his old constituents greeted him with gladness, and listened eagerly to the manly and independent expression of his views on the topics of the day, which are directly at variance with the opinions of some of the Republican party by which he was elected. This is an instance of independence on the one hand, and of toleration and confidence on the other, worthy of commendation.

HON. THOMAS CORWIN, OF OHIO.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

Taking his seat in Congress, Mr. Corwin exhibited the same high-toned course which has ever marked his political career. During the protracted struggle for the organization he rose, without preparation, to express his views, and never has a speaker been listened to with more marked attention. Urged to proceed, he spoke until the hour for adjournment, and concluded his remarks the next day, leaving—as a distinguished opponent remarked afterward in debate—"nothing more to be said on the Republican side of the House." His departure from strict "party lines" did much toward relieving the country from the injurious effects of the "dead lock" of the wheels of legislation by bringing about the election of Mr. Pennington.

Mr. Corwin is now Chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs—a responsible position, as in that Committee many important questions of international policy are discussed and prepared for the action of the House.

Mr. Corwin's private life has been marked by the most stainless honor and the strictest virtue—in short, he is a Gentleman. Married early in life to an estimable lady of a Quaker family in Delaware, he has a son and four daughters, forming a happy family circle at his rural home in Lebanon.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

[Printed from advance proof-sheets purchased from the author exclusively for "Harper's Weekly."]

MISS HALCOMBE'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

July 5th.—I had only got as far as the top of the stairs when looking at Laura's door suggested to me the precaution of also locking my own door, and keeping the key safely about me while I was out of the room. My journal was already secured, with other papers, in the table-drawer, but my writing-materials were left out. These included a seal, bearing the common device of two doves drinking out of the same cup; and some sheets of blotting-paper, which had the impression on them of the closing lines of my writing in these pages traced during the past night. Distorted by the suspicion which had now become a part of myself, even such trifles as these looked too dangerous to be trusted without a guard—even the locked table-drawer seemed to be not sufficiently protected in my absence, until the means of access to it had been carefully secured as well.

I found no appearance of any one having entered the room while I had been talking with Laura. My writing materials (which I had given the servants instructions never to meddle with) were scattered over the table much as usual. The only circumstance in connection with them that at all struck me was, that the seal by tidily in the tray with the pencils and the wax. It was not in my careless habits (I am sorry to say) to put it there; neither did I remember putting it there. But, as I could not call to mind, on the other hand, where else I had thrown it down, and as I was also doubtful whether I might not, for once, have laid it mechanically in the right place, I abstained from adding to the perplexity with which the day's events had filled my mind, by troubling it afresh about a trifle. I locked the door, put the key in my pocket, and went down stairs.

Madame Fosco was alone in the hall looking at the weather-glass.

"Still falling," she said. "I am afraid we must expect more rain."

Her face was composed again to its customary expression and its customary color. But the hand with which she pointed to the dial of the weather-glass still trembled. Could she have told her husband already that she had overheard Laura reviling him in my company as a "Spy?" My strong suspicion that she must have told him; my irresistible dread (all the more overpowering from its very vagueness) of the consequences which might follow; my fixed conviction, derived from various little self-betrayals which had become notice in each other, that Madame Fosco, in spite of her well-assumed external civility, had not forgiven her niece for innocently standing between her and the legacy of ten thousand pounds—all rushed upon my mind together; all impelled me to speak, in the vain hope of using my own influence and my own powers of persuasion for the atonement of Laura's offense.

"May I trust to your kindness to excuse me, Madame Fosco, if I venture to speak to you on an exceedingly painful subject?"

She crossed her hands in front of her, and bowed (or so it solemnly, without uttering a word, and without taking her eyes off mine for a moment.

"When you were so good as to bring me back my handkerchief," I went on, "I am very, very much afraid you must have accidentally heard Laura say something which I am unwilling to repeat, and which I will not attempt to defend. I will only venture to hope that you have not thought it of sufficient importance to be mentioned to the Count?"

"I think it of no importance whatever," said Madame Fosco, sharply and suddenly. "But," she added, resuming her icy manner in a moment, "I have no secrets from my husband, even in trifles. When he noticed, just now, that I looked distressed, it was my painful duty to tell him why I was distressed; and I frankly acknowledge to you, Miss Halcombe, that I have told him."

I was prepared to hear it, and yet she turned me cold all over when she said those words.

"Let me earnestly entreat you, Madame Fosco —let me earnestly entreat the favor of your permission to make some allowances for the sad position in which my sister is placed. She spoke while she was smarting under the insult and injustice inflicted on her by her husband—and she was not herself when she said those rash words. May I hope that they will be considerately and generously forgiven?"

"Most assuredly," said the Count's quiet voice, behind me. He had stolen on us, with his noiseless tread, and his book in his hand, from the library.

When Lady Glyde said those hasty words, he went on, "she did me an injustice which I lament—and forgive. Let us never return to the subject, Miss Halcombe; let us all consecrately combine to forget it, from this moment."

"You are very kind," I said; "your relief me inexpressibly."

I tried to continue—but his eyes were on me, his deadly smile, that hides every thing, was set, hard and unwavering, on his broad, smooth face. My distrust of his unfathomable falseness, my sense of my own degradation in stooping to constitute his wife and himself, as disturbed and confused me that the next words failed on my lips and I stood dumb in silence.

"I beg you on my knees to say no more, Miss Halcombe—I am truly shocked that you should have thought it necessary to say so much." With that polite speech he took my hand—oh, how I despise myself! oh, how little comfort there is, even in knowing that I submitted to it for Laura's sake!—he took my hand and put it to his poisonous lips. Never did I know all my horror of him till then. That innocent familiarity turned my blood as if it had been the vilest insult that a man could offer me. Yet I hid my disgust from him—I tried to smile—I who once mercilessly despised deceit in other women, was as false as the worst of them—as false as the Judas whose lips had touched my hand.

I could not have maintained my degrading self-control—it is all that redeems me in my own estimation to know that I could not—if he had still continued to keep his eyes on my face. His wife's tigerish jealousy came to my rescue, and forced his attention away from me, the moment he possessed himself of my hand. Her cold blue eyes caught light; her dull white cheeks flushed into bright color; she looked years younger than her age in an instant.

"Count!" she said. "Your foreign forms of politeness are not understood by English women."

"Pardon me, my angel. The best and dearest English woman in the world understands them." With those words he dropped my hand and quietly raised his wife's hand to his lips in place of it.

I ran back up the stairs to take refuge in my own room. If there had been time to think my thoughts, when I was alone again, would have caused me bitter suffering. But there was no time to think. Happily for the preservation of my calmness and my courage there was time for nothing but action.

The letters to the lawyer and to Mr. Fairlie were still to be written, and I sat down at once, without a moment's hesitation, to devote myself to them. There was no multitude of resources to perplex me—there was absolutely no one to depend on, in the first instance, but myself. Sir Percival had neither friends nor relatives in the neighborhood whose intercession I could attempt to employ. He was on the coldest terms—in some cases, on the worst terms—with the families of his own rank and station who lived near him. We two women had neither father nor brother to come to the house and take our parts. There was no choice but to write those two doubtful letters—or to put Laura in the wrong and myself in the wrong, and to make all peaceable negotiation in the future impossible, by secretly escaping from Blackwater Park. Nothing but the most imminent personal peril could justify our taking that second course. The letters must be tried first; and I wrote them.

I said nothing to the lawyer about Anne Catherick; because (as I had already hinted to Laura) that topic was connected with a mystery which we could not yet explain, and which it would, therefore, be useless to write about to a professional man. I left my correspondent to attribute Sir Percival's disgraceful conduct, if he pleased, to fresh disputes about money matters; and simply reminded him on the possibility of taking legal proceedings for Laura's protection, in the event of her husband's refusal to allow her to leave Blackwater Park for a time, and return with me to Limmeridge. I referred him to Mr. Fairlie for the details of this last extravagance—I assured him that I wrote with Laura's authority—and I ended by entreating him to act in her interests to the utmost extent of his power, and with the least possible loss of time.

The letter to Mr. Fairlie occupied me next. I appealed to him on the terms which I had mentioned to Laura as the most likely to make his best interest; I enclosed a copy of my letter to the lawyer, to show him how serious the case was; and I represented our removal to Limmeridge as the only compromise which would prevent the danger and distress of Laura's present position from inevitably affecting her uncle as well as herself, at no very distant time.

When I had done, and had sealed and directed the two envelopes, I went back with the letters to Laura's room to show her that they were written.

"Can any body disturbed you?" I asked, when she opened the door to me.

"Nobody has knocked," she replied. "But I heard some one in the corridor just now."

"Was it a man or a woman?"

"A woman. I heard the rustling of her gown."

"A rustling like silk?"

"Yes; like silk."

Madame Fosco had evidently been watching outside. The mischief she might do by herself was little to fear. But what the mischief she might do, as a willing instrument in her husband's hands, was too formidable to be overlooked.

"What became of the rustling of the gown when you no longer heard it in the ante-room?" I inquired. "Did you hear it go past your wall, along the passage?"

"No. I kept still, and listened, and just heard it."

"Which way did it go?"

"Toward your room."

I considered again. The sound had not caught my ears. But then I was deeply absorbed in my letters; and I write with a firm hand and a quill pen, scraping and scratching noisily over the paper. It was more likely that Madame Fosco would hear the scraping of my pen than that I should hear the rustling of her dress. Another reason (if I had wanted one) for not trusting my letters to the post-bag in the hall.

Laura saw me thinking. "More difficulties?" she said, wearily; "more difficulties and more dangers?"

"No dangers," I replied. "Some little difficulty, perhaps, in the way of our certain mode of putting my two letters into Fanny's hands."

"You have really written them, then? Oh, Marian, ran no risks—spare your own risks!"

"No, no—no fear. Let me see—what o'clock is it now?"

It was a quarter to six. There would be time for me to get to the village inn and to come back again before dinner. It was clear that the evening I might find no second opportunity of safely leaving the house.

"Keep the door carefully locked, Laura," I said, "and don't be afraid about me. If you hear any inquiries made, call through the door, and say that I am gone out for a walk."

"When shall you be back?"

"Before dinner, without fail. Courage, my love! By this time to-morrow you will have a clear-headed, trust-worthy man acting for your good. Mr. Gilmore's partner is our next best friend to Mr. Gilmore himself.

A moment's reflection, as soon as I was alone, convinced me that I had made a great danger in my walking-dress until I had first discovered what was going on in the lower part of the house. I had not ascertained yet whether Sir Percival was in-doors or out.

The singing of the canaries in the library, and the smell of tobacco-smoke that crept through the door, which was not closed, told me at once where the Count was. I looked over my shoulder as I passed the door—yes; and saw, to my surprise, that he was exhibiting the docility of his birds, in his most gaily polite manner, to the housekeeper. He must have specially invited her to see them, for she would never have thought of going into the library of her own accord. The man's slightest actions had a purpose of some kind at the bottom of every one of them. What could be his purpose here?

It was no time then to inquire into his motives. I looked about for Madame Fosco next, and found her following her favorite circle, round and round the fish-pond. I was a little doubtful how she would meet me after the outbreak of jealousy of which I had been the cause so short a time since. But her husband had taught her in the interval how to approach me with the same civility as usual. My only object in addressing myself to her was to ascertain if she knew what had become of Sir Percival. I contrived to refer to him indirectly; and, after a little fencing on either side, she at last mentioned that he had gone out.

"Which of the horses has he taken?" I asked, carelessly.

"None of them," she replied. "He went away, two hours since, on foot. As I understood it, his object was to make fresh inquiries about the woman named Anne Catherick. He appears to be unreasonably anxious about tracing her. Do you happen to know if she is dangerously mad, Miss Halcombe?"

"I do not, Countess.

"Are you going in?"

"Yes, I think so. I suppose it will soon be time to dress for dinner."

We entered the house together. Madame Fosco decided into the library and closed the door. I went at once to fetch my hat and shawl. Every moment was of importance, if I was to get to Fanny at the inn and be back before dinner.

When I crossed the hall again no one was there; and the singing of the birds in the library had ceased. I could not stop to make any further inquiries. I could only assure myself that the way was clear, and then leave the house with the two letters safe in my pocket.

On my way to the village I prepared myself for the possibility of meeting Sir Percival. As long as I had him to deal with alone, I felt certain of not losing my presence of mind. Any woman who is sure of her own wits is a match, at any time, for a man who is not sure of his own tempper. I had no such fear of Sir Percival as I had of the Count. Instead of fluttering, it had composed me, to hear of the errand on which he had gone out. While the tracing of Anne Catherick was the great anxiety that occupied him, Laura and I might hope for some cessation of any active persecution at his hands. For our sakes now, as well as for hers, I hoped and prayed fervently that she might still escape him.

I walked on as briskly as the heat would let me, till I reached the cross-road which led to the village; looking back from time to time to make sure that I was not followed by any one. Nothing was behind me, all the way, but an empty country wagon. The noise made by the wheels reached me faintly revived in my memory the request which Sir Percival had vainly addressed to his friend, earlier in the day, to come out of the library and speak to him. The Count had deferred granting that private interview when it was first asked for in the afternoon, and had again deferred granting it when it was a second time asked for at the dinner-table. Whatever the coming subject of discussion between them might be, it was clearly an important subject in Sir Percival's estimation—and perhaps (judging from his evident reluctance to approach it) a dangerous subject as well in the estimation of the Count.

These considerations occurred to me while we were arranging in the dining-room in the drawing-room. Sir Percival's angry commentary on his friend's assertion of him had not produced the slightest effect. The Count persistently accompanied us to the tea-table—waited a minute or two in the room—then went out into the hall, and returned with the post-bag in his hands. It was then eight o'clock—the hour at which the letters were always dispatched from Blackwater Park.

"Have you any letter for the post, Miss Halcombe?" he said, sparingly provided with the bag.

I saw Madame Fosco, who was making the tea, pause, with the sugar-tongs in her hand, to listen for my answer.

"No, Count, thank you. No letters to-day."

He gave the bag to the servant, who was then in the room; and, at the moment, passed round the air of the lively Neapolitan street-song, "La mia Carolina," over me. His wife, who was usually the most deliberate of women in all her movements, made the tea as quickly as I could have done it myself—finished her own cup in two minutes—and quietly glided out of the room.

I rose to follow her example—partly because I suspected her of attempting some treachery up stairs with Laura; partly because I was resolved not to remain alone in the same room with her husband.

Before I could get to the door the Count stopped me by a request for a cup of tea. I gave him the cup of tea, and tried a second time to get away. He stopped me a second time by going back to the piano, and suddenly appealing to me on a musical question in which he declared that the honor of his country was concerned.

I vainly pleaded my own total ignorance of music, and the total want of taste in that direction. He only appealed to me again with a vehemence which set all further protest on my part at defiance. "Was Italy and the Germans (he indignantly declared) were always reviling the Italians for their inability to cultivate the higher or kinds of music. We were perpetually talking of our Oratorios, and they were perpetually talking of Italian symphonies. Did we know, and did they forget his immortal friend and countryman, Rossini? What was 'Moses in Egypt' but a symphony under another name? What was 'Moses in Egypt?' Would I listen to this, and this, and this, and say if any thing more sublimely sacred and grand had ever been composed by mortal man?"—And without waiting for a word of assent or dissent on my part, he took me hard in the face all the time, he began thundering on the piano, and singing in at with loud and furious emphasis, only interrupting himself, at intervals, to announce to me fiercely the titles of the different pieces of music. "Chorus of Israelites, in the Plague of Darkness, Miss Halcombe!"—"Recitative of Moses, with the tables of the Law."—"Hymn of Israelites, at the passage of the Red Sea. Aha! aha! Is that sacred? Is that sublime?" The piano trembled under his furious lateral hands; and the tea-cups on the table rattled as his big bass voice thundered out the notes, and his fingers fell next time on the floor.

There was something horrible, something fierce and devilish, in the outburst of his delight at his own singing and playing, and in the triumph with which he watched its effect upon me, as I shrank nearer and nearer to the door, but was released at last, not by my own efforts, but by Sir Percival's interposition. He opened the dining-room door and called out angrily to know what "that infernal noise" meant. The Count instantly got up from the piano. "Ah! if Papa calls," he said, "I must go." And away he went. Ah! aha! The end. The Muse of Music, Miss Halcombe, deserts us in dismay; and I, the old minstrel, exhale the rest of my enthusiasm in the open air!" He stalked out into the veranda, put his hands in his pockets, and resumed the "recitative of Moses," once more, in the garden.

I heard Sir Percival call after him from the dining-room window. But he took no notice; he seemed determined not to hear. That long-deferred quiet talk between them was still to be put off, was still to wait for the Count's absolute will and pleasure.

He had remained me in the drawing-room nearly half an hour from the time when his wife left us. Where had she been, and what had she been doing all that time?

I went up stairs to ascertain, but I made no discovery; and when I questioned Laura I found that she had not heard any thing. Nobody had disturbed her—no faint rustling of the silk dress had been audible, either in the anteroom or in the passage.

It was then twenty minutes to nine. After going to my room to get my journal I returned and sat with Laura; sometimes writing, sometimes stopping to talk with her. Nobody came near us, and nothing happened. We remained together till ten o'clock. I then rose, said my last cheering words, and wished her good-night. She locked her door again, after we had arranged that I should come in and see her the first thing in the morning.

I had more to do to my diary before going to bed myself; and as I went down again to the drawing-room, for the last time that weary day, I resolved merely to show myself there, to make my excuses, and then to retire an hour earlier than usual for the night.

The Count and his wife were found at his wife were sitting together. Sir Percival was yawning in an easy-chair, the Count was reading, Madame Fosco was fanning herself. Nothing new, in fact, was flushed now. She who never suffered from the heat was most undoubtedly suffering from it to-night.

"I am afraid, Countess, you are not quite so well as usual," I said.

"The very remark I was about to make to you," she replied. "You are looking pale, my dear."

My dear! It was the first time she had ever addressed me with that familiarity! There was an insolent smile, too, on her face when she said the words.

I am suffering from one of my bad headaches," I answered, coldly.

"Ah, indeed? Want of exercise, I suppose? A walk before dinner would have been just the thing for you." She turned to the "walk" with a strange emphasis. Had she seen me go out? No matter if she had. The letters were safe now in Fanny's hands.

The Count saw a smoke, Fosco," said Sir Percival, rising, with another uneasy look at his friend.

"With pleasure, Percival, when the ladies have left the room," said the Count.

"Excuse me, Countess, if I set you the example of retiring," I said. "The only remedy for such a headache as mine is quiet and rest."

I took my leave. There was the same insolent smile on the Countess's face when I shook hands with her. Sir Percival paid no attention to me. He was looking impatiently at Madame Fosco, who answered my parting salutation with me. The Count smiled to himself behind his book. There was yet another delay to that great talk with Sir Percival—and the Countess was the impediment this time.

Once safely shut into my own room I opened these pages, and prepared to go on with that part of the day's record which was still left to write.

For ten minutes or more I sat idle, with the pen in my hand, thinking over the events of the last terrible hour. What I at last addressed myself to my task I found it difficult in a proceeding with the exactness which I had always taken before. In spite of my efforts to fix my thoughts on the matter in hand they wandered away, with the strangest persistency, to the conversation of Sir Percival and the Count; and all the interest which I tried to concentrate on my journal centred, instead, on the few words that passed between them which had been put off all through the day, and which was now to take place in the silence and solitude of the night.

In this perverse state of my mind the recollection of the loud pacing to and fro overhead would not come back to me, and there was no resource but to close my journal and to get away from it for a little while.

I opened the door which led from my bedroom into my sitting-room, and having passed through quietly, for the purpose of more accident, in case of draught, with the candle left on the dressing-table. My sitting-room window was wide open, and I stood looking out, idly, for a while, at the night.

It was dark and quiet. Neither moon nor stars were visible. There was a smell like rain in the still, heavy air, and I put my hand out of window. No. The rain was only threatening; it had not come yet.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS have now in the press, and will publish at as early a day as possible, "THE MILL ON THE FLOSS," a new story by the author of "Adam Bede," which has created such a successful novel."—Adam Bede."

"Adam Bede" was a surprise to the world of novel readers. It showed such power of observation, such felicity of touch, such breadth of view, and so pure and healthy a tone, that while its readers were delighted, the most severe critics here and in England unhesitatingly pronounced sentence of approval upon the new author, and placed her book in the very front rank of our English fictions.

The new story, of which we have read a part, opens with a description of a country girl and boy in scene and character. Those who were delighted with the rustic boyhood of Adam Bede, and which occur in the closing chapter of "Adam Bede," will be pleased to know that the "Mill on the Floss" has a very similar and admirable picture for its opening characters, the setting forth of whose sayings and doings is as delightfully fresh and healthful as the best love of children can desire. Tom and Maggie, the children of the miller on the Floss, are evidently the heroes of the book.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS will publish "The Mill on the Floss" here simultaneously with its publication in London, having secured the early sheets of the work by special arrangement with the author, to whom they pay a large sum of money. They will print two editions—one cheap, in paper covers; and the other on handsome paper, and bound in muslin, at one dollar.

The same house have in press the Life of HON. STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, of Illinois, by J. W. Sheahan, Esq., editor of the Chicago Times, which will be published in a few days. It will be a volume of 500 pages 12mo, with a fine portrait, and will be sold, bound in muslin, at one dollar.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, March 26, in the Senate, the bill to facilitate communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States was called up. It was so amended as to take from the appropriation which shall be applicable under its provisions the power of interfering with the right to locate a railroad by preventing all the lands on the route of the proposed telegraph line, and by providing that no appropriation shall be made by the Land Department until the line is in operation, and that it shall cease when the contractors fail to keep it in repair. The Consular Appropriation Bill was amended so as to provide that $25,000 of the appropriation for the relief and protection of American seamen shall be used in the present fiscal year; an amendment appropriating $15,000 for a Minister to Paraguay was rejected, and the bill was passed. The bill to establish the office of public lands under its several States and Territories, and to regulate the appointment of surveyors-general of the National Armories, was passed (28 to 15). In the House, bills withdrawing the protection of the army from the Kansas squatter boiders; appropriating $75,000 for improving Indiola harbor; fixing and regulating the duty on lucerne; repealing the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850; and enabling settlers on the public lands to carry their property freely and without molestation into Kansas, were referred. The Committee on Ways and Means was instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing a bill making an appropriation for a steam-revenue cutter for the Delaware district. Resolutions requesting the President to open negotiations with the Governments of Europe with the view of declaring the slave-trade piracy were introduced and referred. The Speaker laid before the House a letter instructing the Committee on Ways and Means to report a measure for the "more effectual suppression of insurrection from the tyranny of the capitalists of that State." To which Mr. Etheridge, of North Carolina, offered a resolution, declaring "the clutching of mankind" notice simply a republican sentiment; and instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law which prohibits any person of Congress has power to legislate upon it. Amidst great confusion it was voted down.

On Tuesday, March 27, in the Senate, Senator Seward offered a resolution declaring the action of this State in favor of the Homestead bill. Ineffectual attempts were made to amend the bill so as to repeal or regulate the pre-emption law. Senator Johnson took up a large part of the session in a labored defense of the resolutions that Territories in the State which he represents, produces more horses, mules, and asses than any other State, annually; than the Hemisphere, a position which he thought Senator Clarke of the latter State would be forward to controvert.—The House did not accomplish any business of moment. It had under consideration the bill to provide for the safety of passengers in boats propelled in whole or in part by steam. Mr. Bingham, of Ohio, made a long and principled argument in support of the measure. Consideration of the subject was postponed to a fortnight, and, after a brief discussion of the Army Bill, the House adjourned.

On Wednesday, March 28, in the Senate that Committee in favor of the House Homestead Bill, and of a uniform homestead law throughout the States. The Navy Bill was so amended that explates at one hundred and fifty dollars each; appropriating $75,000 for improving Biloxi passage. I hailed, and ordered them to pause him and get on board. I expected, as I was ordered to remain with the senior officer, who I supposed was on board of their vessel. At the same moment I fired a shot about them to bring him to. As soon as they got close to him, which was but a few moments, to my extreme astonishment he opened a heavy fire of great guns and musketry upon them, and it was reported to me at the same time that the other steamer was slipping her cable. I immediately gave him a broadside, as I had not the remotest doubt of his being in complicity with and under the orders of the other steamer, and I considered it my duty to attend to her, as I was satisfied, in which case I should have been entirely justified in any vessels or in having sunk her, as I considered her a pirate and destructive; and as he had the audacity to fire upon me without any provocation whatever, I was determined to seize him if I could. He ran up the Spanish flag as soon as I fired.

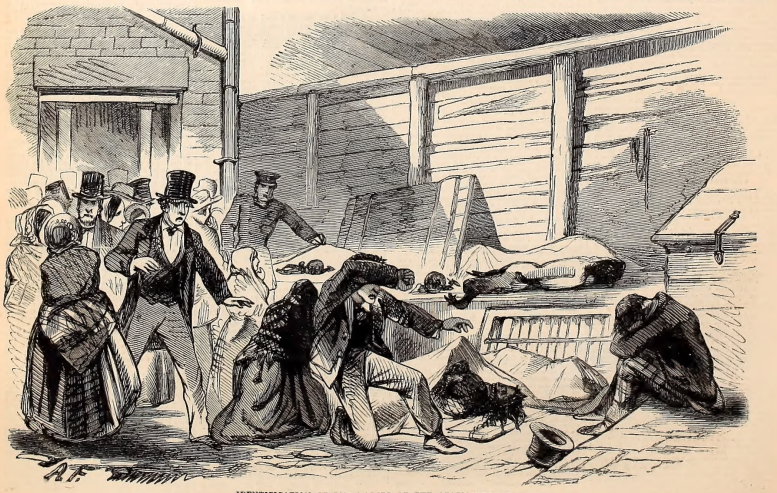
CAPTURE OF THE "MIRAMON."

In the mean time the larger steamer was hotly engaged with the forts and with my two little steamers in the sharpest fighting. Finding he could not get out of the southern passage, they soon exchanged his course, and, as I came to the northward and passed inside of one of the northern passages, I saw him just out of the way of the guns followed by my vessels, warmly engaged with him all the time. I kept company for but for a short time with those upon him; for as he shot ahead of them I got a gun to bear upon him and sent many shots into his stern. I found out that it was impossible to fire without danger to my vessels, as they were all together. The chase was continued, and in the midst of the hot fire on the other side I could not but admire the gallant, daring, the daring gallantry of their line of fire, contending with such a superior force. They always kept grappled with him, and in spite of his efforts to shake them off. Finding it impossible to escape, I thought that he would run ashore, at all events, pressed closely by them, she grounded. She I was not aware of at the time. They were about about a mile from my ship, and my anxiety was intense for their safety. I could not then see positively.

My three largest entire were on board, and before I could have assistance from my ship to them. The affair would have been ended. I was not, however, kept long in suspense, for almost immediately I heard three cheers, which was informed that they were boarding her over the bows, which shortly after were seen by our glasses.

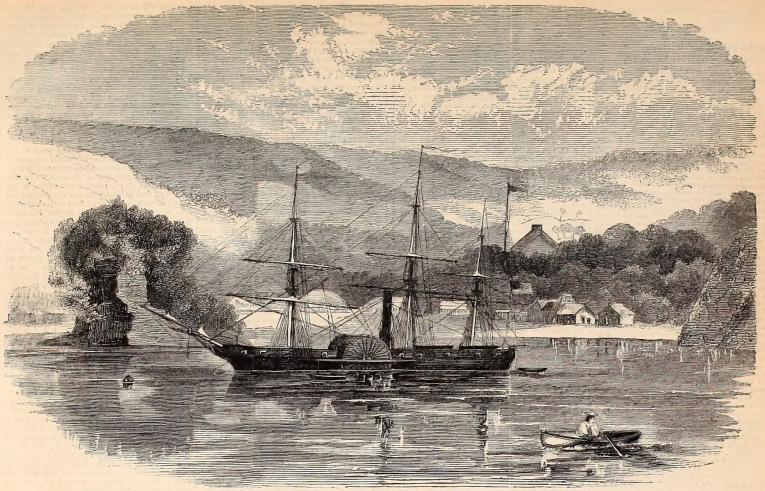
THE "MARQUEZ" TRIES TO ESCAPE, BUT IS CAUGHT.

I now return to the steamer at anchor close to me. While the engagement continued between them, they were passing this ship, the brig, and at the same time the Spanish brig, called in the First Lieutenant, who was then on board, I directed again that this steamer should be stopped. I directed again a division of guns to be got ready, which was done, and when hailed and ordered to bring her to. She did not come at once I sent Lieutenant Chapman on board and my 1st Lieutenant. He came on board and found all in a guard to bring him. He came on board and found all of me. In answer to my inquiries, that his ship was the Marquez, of Havana; that he had been employed as a transport by the Spanish commander the other ship, to transport stores and troops to Vera Cruz, and that he had on board about one hundred and fifty men. As soon as he received the order, I sent an officer to bring Captain Kellogg on board. As soon as he received the order, I sent an officer to bring Captain Kellogg on board. As soon as he received the order, I sent an officer to bring Captain Kellogg on board



TERRIBLE FIRE IN A TENEMENT-HOUSE, FORTY-FIFTH STREET, NEW YORK, MARCH 28, 1860.

ANOTHER TENEMENT-HOUSE MASSACRE.



WE publish herewith engravings of the terrible fire in a tenement-house in Forty-fifth Street, which took place on the morning of 28th ultimo. The following account is from the Herald:

Between one and two o'clock yesterday morning a fire broke out in a four-story frame dwelling at No. 90 West Forty-fifth Street, between Broadway and Sixth Avenue. The alarm brought the firemen to the premises, and every exertion was made to save the lives of the occupants. Several were taken from the second and third stories fronting the street, but the rear windows could not be reached so quickly—hence the terrible loss of human life.

It seems the Fire Marshal, among others, was quickly at the scene; he states that all access to the upper part of the house was prevented in consequence of the stairs from the first flight being on fire. In his opinion the fire originated on or under the first flight of stairs. With such rapidity did the fire ascend, that but a few minutes elapsed before the flames burst through the roof. At the fourth story window in the rear a woman was seen standing; she was told by the persons in the yard not to jump, but it was of no avail; the fire pressed on her, and rather than be burned alive, she sprang from the window and struck with full force on the ground in the yard. She was immediately picked up; her head and face were streaming with blood, and it was subsequently ascertained that her left thigh was broken. She informed the Fire Marshal that her name was Jane M'Anally, twenty-eight years of age; that she was on a visit to the family of Thomas Bennett. She further stated that Mrs. Bennett and her four children were on that story at the time she sprang out of the window. The police procured a carriage and conveyed the injured woman to the New York Hospital.

IDENTIFICATION OF THE BODIES AT THE STATION-HOUSE.

DEPARTURE OF THE JAPANESE ENVOYS—RESIDENCE OF U. S. MINISTER HARRIS AT SIMODA, JAPAN.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

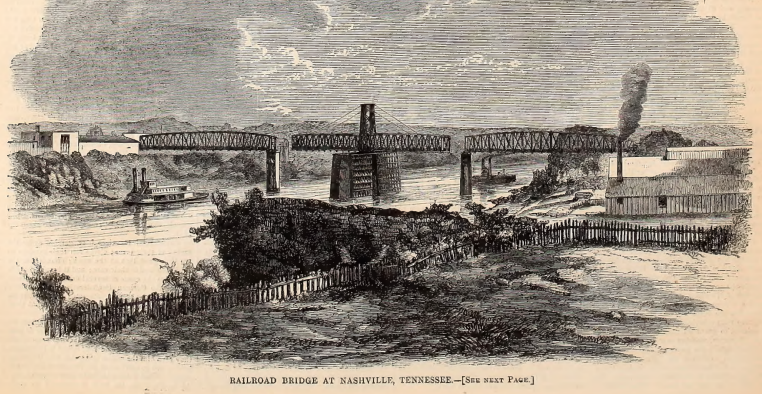
The flames raged with considerable fury, and the whole upper part of the house was soon destroyed, when the smouldering beams fell to the first floor.



Thomas Bennett, who is employed in the stage stables of the Sixth Avenue Railroad Company, occupied apartments on the fourth story, rear. His family consisted of his wife and four children. Mr. Bennett was not at home when the fire broke out. While the fire was raging Mr. Bennett was running about distracted, inquiring the whereabouts of his family, but no one could give him the least satisfaction.

Andrew Wheelan was also employed at the stables, and was not at home. He occupied apartments on the third floor, rear rooms. His family consisted of his wife and four children. He, like Mr. Bennett was also making inquiries about his family, but no one could give him any tidings about them.

In about an hour after the commencement of the fire the firemen partly subdued the flames, so as to permit access to the ruins of the burned building. Fire Marshal Baker entered the room on the first floor and discovered the first body. It was that of a young person; but the top part of the skull was burned off, and the arms and legs mostly burned away. It exhibited but a charred trunk, beyond recognition. In searching about with his lantern he found the body of a child, also terribly burned; and in the same room he found the body of an infant.

These bodies were removed carefully by the firemen, under the direction of Engineer Rush, to the Twenty-second Ward Station-house. The firemen continued the search for bodies, and the next found was the body of a grown person, hanging head downward, jammed against the stairs on the floor of the second story, resting partly on an iron bedstead. Close to this vicinity a woman and two children were found together on the remains of a bed, supposed to be a mother and her children. The remaining bodies were taken out, numbering ten in all, and conveyed to the station-house.

The first story of the house was occupied by Martin Redman and family; he kept a grocery and liquor store, and slept in the room back of the store. Mr. Redman says that his wife woke him and asked if he had put coal in the stove, as she heard a crackling noise. He replied no. He then got out of bed, opened the door leading to the hall, and then saw that the flames were burning on the stairs and along the entry. He and his family escaped in safety. Mr. Nolan and family, who occupied the second story, fronting the street, made their escape out of the window to the piazza, and the family on the third floor front escaped the same way, all egress by the stairs being cut off.

RAILROAD BRIDGE AT NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

DEPARTURE OF THE JAPANESE ENVOYS FOR THIS COUNTRY.

THE Japanese envoys who are to visit this country are already on their way, and will be landed at noon at Panama. In connection with their coming visit we give a picture of the residence of our consul, Townsend Harris, Esq., at Simoda, Japan, sketched from the United States steam frigate Minnesippi. Mr. Oliphant, in his recent admirable work on China and Japan, thus describes the scene:

"At the head of the Bay of Simoda, and about a mile distant from the town, is situated a pleasant group of trees. Its mysterious shades are dedicated, doubtless, to religious purposes, and connected in their solemn recesses some picturesque old temple, in which, for an untold number of years, shriveled priests have performed their sacrificial rites. It is a spot eminently suggestive of repose and religious retirement; and we could scarcely believe our eyes when, on bringing our telescopes to bear, we distinguished fluttering among the leaves of a sacred Ju-tree the well-known combination of red, white, and blue which forms the national flag of our transatlantic cousins. Yet so it was; the sanctuary which had stood over the premises originally occupied by some recent Incarnation of Buddh; and Mr. Harris, the American consul, had removed to the shrine of that divinity into a four-poster. We learn all this from Mr. Hawkins, Mr. Harris's secretary, who came out to visit us before we have had time to land, and who brings Lord Elgin an offer of assistance on the part of the American consul.

"I landed with Lord Elgin to pay Mr. Harris a visit. The external aspect of his abode, as seen from the ship, did not bode a luxurious interior upon a closer acquaintance. Had one visited Mr. Harris's residence from the external side of the habitable world, it would be difficult to conceive a retreat more perfectly adapted for the purpose. It was, however, entirely out of the question in the result rather of necessity than choice it is small consolation to think that you are imprisoned in a corner admirably suited to a recluse. Often, in the course of his wanderings, the traveler is struck with the charms of some silent nook in this bustling universe. His first impression is, 'What a delightful spot for a hermit!' and he thinks he should pity the poor creature. For disciples of Zimmerman, notwithstanding, or lovers in a Petrarchian strain, the choice would, perhaps, probably, than any other country in the globe, but neither Mr. Harris nor Mr. Hawkins seemed enlightened to appreciate them. A well-selected library, and a few rooms comfortably fitted up, gave no agreeable air of civilization to the whole interior, but what are considered the two years of almost entire isolation and banishment from communion with one's fellow-men? Except upon the rare occasions of Simoda being visited by some foreign vessel, Mr. Harris never had more than a single guest with whom they could exchange an idea. They had been for eighteen months without receiving a letter or a newspaper, and by some fortuitous combination—sheer being an animal unknown in Japan."

RAILROAD BRIDGE AT NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

THE great bridge over the Cumberland River, at Nashville, is one of the finest structures of the kind in all the country. It is jointly owned by the Louisville and Nashville, and the Edgefield and Kentucky railroads, though built under the immediate direction and control of the latter company.

Its extreme length is 700 feet, made up of four spans—two fixed, one on each side, and two draw spans, in the middle. Each fixed span is 200 feet in the clear between supports. Each draw span is 129 feet in the clear between piers. They are the largest railroad draws in the world, the one at Rock Island being next.

The total length of draw, from one extremity of the movable portion to the other, is 280 feet, and its entire weight, as computed at about 800 tons. It can readily be turned into position by one man in four minutes, and by two or three men in two and a half minutes.

The centre pier, on which the immense draw turns, is 30 feet in diameter at the top, 35 feet at the bottom, and 50 feet high. The eastern abutment pier is 76 feet high, and the western main pier 70 feet high. The foundations of all the piers are laid smoothly upon the solid rock, in water about twelve feet deep at mean low water. The extreme rise of water in the river at the point where the bridge stands is 57 feet.

The total quantity of material in the bridge is 6800 perches of masonry, 434,000 feet of timber, and 160,000 pounds of iron.

The entire cost of the bridge is about $200,000.

THE DEMON OF HOMBURG.

THE Landgraviat of Hesse-Homburg, with about six thousand inhabitants, is at the foot of the Taunus mountains, and not far from Frankfort. The capital is Homburg vor der Hoehe (before the Hills), so called to distinguish it from other places of the same name. Some twenty years ago this little town was scarcely known to any but its neighbors. Just then appeared Francois Blanc, who had been gamblers on 'Change in France, which they had good reason for quitting, met at Frankfort with two master gamblers and the staff of French croupiers, and conceived the idea of establishing a special gambling-place.

Homburg has mineral springs, and this led the brothers Blanc to select this little innocent town for the test of their projected gambling-hell. They had made the acquaintance of an old friend of the Landgrave of Homburg and an old rich and unprincipled baroness. By these helpers, the transactions with the Homburg Government and the Landgrave were contrived, and at last the prince was induced to grant an audience to our adventurers. A mason, working near the open window of the room where the Landgrave received them, was an unseen witness of the rather curious conversation, and through him the particulars transpired; at least, it is said in Homburg. We have only to do with the result. The prince resisted for some time the shameful proposition, but having a small income, he at last consented, and a document was signed by which the exclusive Blanc were invested with all the exclusive rights they sought.

Experience of Wiesbaden and Baden had proved that this sort of business is very profitable. There was no want, therefore, of capital; many, indeed, regretted that the company was limited to a fair, astonishingly short time there rose before the eyes of the wondering Homburgians a temple of vice, grander than any they had ever seen. This happened three-and-twenty years ago. The greater part of the inhabitants of the place, dazzled by the prospects of riches pointed out to them, lent themselves to the scheme, and sided for once with their princes. The modest houses of the simple farmers and peasants have vanished, and where they stood palaces have been erected ready to accommodate the crowds that flock hither. The swine which mingled freely with the rustics in the street have been changed into ladies and gentlemen.

How has the ascendency of Homburg been secured? Simply by advertising in the papers of Europe and America, and circulars, of which the following little clause in the advertisements: "The game at Trente et Quarante is played with the Regnet de Soliel, and the Roulette with a Single Zero, which arrangement offers to the players at Trente et Quarante considerable advantages over those vantages than any other bank, and at Roulette fifty per cent." In other words, the bank of Homburg gives to each player double chances to win than those at the other Rhenish watering-places. The ruin of the gambler, who is attracted by this promise, is, in Homburg, a more precious result than quite as certain as elsewhere. Yet the whole gambling world went almost crazy over it. Even old professional players, who had hitherto followed constant trente et quarante and roulette, predicted speedy ruin to the bankers. Princes, who had spent one hundred pounds a day, the undertakers did not become bankrupt, but paid to the shareholders a dividend of not less than fifty per cent.

An alley of orange-trees—each costing about forty pounds—adorns seven or eight acres of enchanted palace of play. Through a noble portico the victim enters the hall, where he is received by liveried functionaries, who take away his hat, stick, and overcoat. It is advisable to use their services, for a good hat or cut left any where in the saloons of Homburg never reappears. In addition to one of the numberless marquises, counts, and barons providing breakfast. In front of it, as we entered, a splendid ballroom, with a turn to the left, and then to the right, straight on: that is the way to the devil's sanctuary. We find a splendid hall leading to the left, and are almost dazzled by the glaring splendor of it. From the ceiling, adorned with rich and costly dark bronze chandeliers bearing numberless lights, multiplied again and again by the magnificent looking-glasses placed at each side, and even behind chamber. A long range of high windows, separated from each other by splendid marble columns, opens to a view of a garden of flowers. Statues, draperies, and furniture are of dark red velvet. And there is a little too much gilding, as one might expect.

In the middle of this hall are placed two oblong tables, with a space of fifteen yards between them, each covered with green cloth; one of them is the roulette, the other the trente-et-un table. Let nobody think of a gambling-table as a board surrounded by men in despair. During thirty years' acquaintance with the German gaming haunts I have not witnessed more than seven or eight cases even a shriek. What I have seen has, with a few trifling exceptions, been much more ludicrous than tragical. There are no gambling-houses in Germany, but very rarely in the gambling-house itself. The agents of the Speiljuden keep a sharp eye on all desperate people likely to become troublesome, and to injure the reputation of the bank by publicly expressing their despair.

The tables are densely crowded by people of both sexes, who have the outward appearance of fine ladies and gentlemen. It is impossible to tell who look pale and worn; but we are at a watering-place to which visitors are supposed to come chiefly for the restoration of health. Some have been on ugly, roguish look; but we know many honest gentlemen afflicted with the same. Some are excited; but the sight of excitement alone can help feeling a little excited by a mere following of the chances of the game. Most of the people, on the contrary, are quiet, or apparently so, and the handsome ladies are coquetting. The highest style of our education is, with many, to be able to conceal the passions working in us. It requires a tolerably high talent for observation to be able to read the features of the gamblers with attention, and get at the agitated minds of these unhappy fools.

In the centre of the table before the four croupiers, facing each other, are piled up small paper rolls of gold, and heaps of gold and silver. The whole table is covered with green cloth or velvet, the stakes of the punters. As many of them as have room sit at the table; these are generally the old players, and their game is best worth following. Many of these have before them little printed tickets, upon which they mark with a pin, after each coup, whether it was red or black. It is a foolish amusement, held to be important as a means of finding out the system upon which accident works in this game, in order to form certain rules for the direction of the speculator. The only sure system of winning is that followed by the bank.

There is no loud talking in this hall; people speak with each other in whispers. There is the stillness of a church, with the air of a ball-room. Only the priests of this unhallowed temple dare to speak aloud, and the ivory ball is to be heard turning in the disk, until it clicks against some metal points in it before falling into its rest. The monotonous "Faites votre jeu" (Make your game), "Rien ne va plus" (No more stakes admitted now), "Trente-deux; noir; pair et passe," is repeated from morning to night; even the money falls without noise on the green cloth when deservingly thrown to a winner by one of the croupiers.

These croupiers are all alike. They have a tired, lung-dog expression. They are paid either by the day or the year. Those who attend to the roulette receive from the house spended in Homburg, one hundred and twenty pounds a year; and at the trente-et-un, one hundred and sixty pounds. After 1868 these salaries are raised to two hundred and two hundred and fifty pounds. Most of them are ruined gamblers, or persons unable to get on in the world, who have declined to be the disgrace of their new calling. They are despised and even hated by the gamblers. Their position as regards the public is that of the lawyer's servant in old times, whose very touch was a pollution. Their countenance, as a rule, is not more cross than they can help; they watch them closely, and set over them other rogues as mine. In spite of this vigilance, however, they always manage to rob the robber. One of them was in the habit of taking a pinch of snuff after each coup from a snuff-box which he always placed on the table. At the bottom of the box was some adhesive stuff, so that as often as its owner put it down upon a single or double zero, it left a piece of gold. Another very high and stiff officer, that one can not help touching very closely in the course of the game, which naturally has something to do with the croupier's frequent jerking at his uncomfortable collars; at such jerk, however, he contrives to drop a piece of gold, now for a gold piece, which slid down into a belt worn by him over the shirt.

One of the croupiers occasioned a great deal of confusion by counterfeiting the gold rolls used at the bank. He covered a round stick of lead, and rolled it with the point. On the back of which he had taken an impression. Since that time the gold rolls are ripped open in the middle to expose the gold inside.

These croupiers form, however, only an inferior part of the staff of the bank; most of them come from Paris. The bank employs them as servants of the banker, and distrusts them. The more important servants are not recognized so easily. They are to be found not only in Homburg; we may meet them in the saloons and clubs in Paris, London, Vienna, Petersburg, and other places, where they are rich and the idle congregate. They are the pensioners of the bank, paid either by the year or by a share in the profits obtained by their means. Most of them are ruined gamblers, or other adventurers, of either sex. A genteel air is their necessary qualification for the "distinguished" public as well to distrust fine and amiable gentlemen, and all the more for their high-sounding names and titles—Baron Suttenberg. Among them are many ruined barons and dismissed military officers, well connected, and of good address. Another staff is yet more dangerous for foolish men. It includes the most respectable-looking old ladies, having their place in church, in attendance, ruling, perhaps, in embalmed carriages. It includes young bewitching widows, of course marchionesses, countesses, or at least baronesses, women beginning with Saint, probably because most of them come from the neighborhood of Notre-Dame de Lorette in Paris. Finally, we find in the gambling-hall and the promenades, their fresh toilets exciting the admiration of every one but the ladies, pretty young husbands with them at whose appearance one can not help wondering. They look as if not at home in their clothes, as if their hands are not ever clean, and a man of the world suspects at once the brilliant rings upon their vulgar fingers. They are, however, many grades above the more elegant wives, and keep carefully out of the way if these are in gay company. Many of those ladies may be seen at the gambling-table, piles of gold before them, and playing eagerly. The gold belongs to the bank, and that fellow sitting upon a high stool behind the croupiers at the middle keeps a sharp eye upon their fingers through his tortoiseshell-mounted spectacles. They are decoy-ducks, of course, and they catch many geese.

Another set of servants of the bank consists of the gentlemen of fortune. Some of these are generous enthusiasts, shabby and care-worn, who believe that there exists some law by which chance is regularly, with the lapse of time, forced to observe their winning ever after. Each of them has his system, which he holds to be infallible, but which it requires unlimited capital to carry out. There is undeniable truth in most of these systems, for almost all of them are founded on the fact that the colors red and black appear in change. If I, therefore, lose money on one of them, and double always until it appears in my favor. This is clear, and the bank knows it, of course, perfectly well. But it does not intend to lose, and for this reason the amount of the stakes is limited. That to be put on a single chances—as, for instance, red or black—must not much exceed three hundred pounds. The lowest stake at the roulette is one florin, and at rouge et noir three shillings. The importance of this maximum will be shown by an example. If I take my seat at the table, and double always when losing, my stake will have increased at the eleventh appearance of black to an amount which I am not permitted to double again. Forced to submit to the laws of the bank, I lose a hundred and thirty florins, even in the case of winning. But if black appears for the twelfth or thirteenth time, as it occurs on the average every ten days, I am a loser of more than seven thousand florins. By following such a system money may be won for several days; but the player is sure once caught can not recover his losses. Whoever adheres long to such a system will be ruined. This the bank knows, and it patronizes, therefore, such professers with the utmost tenderness, taking the cleverest of them into its service. They are sent abroad, and fitted out by the bankers with means to appear as fashionables in good society. Many, however, of these professors are the bitterest enemies of the bank, infatuated believers in their own systems. They have been ruined, made for small, middling, and large capitals, and are contented with a certain share in the gain made by any who apply to them. The client will, perhaps, win for a week or longer, and rejoice: but the day comes surely when the system fails.

Sometimes large sums are won by punters. This accident, by strengthening the faith of the credulous, only makes more custom and profit to the bank. It is, therefore, the duty of the agents of the bank to invent stories about persons who have become rich by gambling at the bank. One case was, however, not invented; it occurred in the year 1859, and in that year the shareholders got only a dividend of thirty per cent instead of forty. The fortunate man was one of the Bonaparte princes. He came to Homburg when assisting at a scientific meeting in Wiesbaden. He lost, at trente-et-un, about twenty thousand francs; when, leaving the saloon, he felt in his pocket three twenty-franc pieces, and put them at eleven to three different chances on the roulette. In an hour's time he had won the winner of thirty thousand francs, and went to breakfast with his adjutant. Before sitting down the adjutant said to the prince, "I am certain, sir, you will lose all again during evening." The prince offered a lot of one thousand francs that he would win eight thousand francs before his friend should win either. The bet was accepted. The prince returned to the trente-et-un, and put on one of the croupiers, jokingly, "Well, black will it be, red or black?" "Well, red —" "Right, you said red," replied the prince, and added eight thousand francs upon red alone. He won the stake and his let. In the evening the prince won sixty thousand francs. The next day he was ridiculously low run of good luck. The whole neighborhood was in the greatest agitation, for there never had been such a run of luck before. The prince made off a winner of two hundred thousand francs, and left when the bank thought it wise to reduce the maximum by half. Out of his winnings he presented four Frenchmen with prizes, and paid their debts; he gave twenty thousand francs to the poor in Homburg, and took with him the rest—seventy thousand pounds. General Jean was also one hundred thousand florins.

Such cases, however, are a good deal of mischief. Sometimes the bank thinks it wise to get rid of a too lucky fellow. He is, before he knows how it was done, induced to continue playing at a quarrel in the saloon, and on that account denied future admission. Or the quarrel occurs outside, with one of the leaders of the bank, and a duel is the result, or the police orders the troublesome stranger to leave Homburg to prevent a duel.

Among the most desirable visitors to Homburg there has been an old French marquis, with one of his many children born and always married to one and the other too, as often as he could spare it. In this one hand he held a leaden image of some saint, which he was constantly caressing with the other as long as the ivory ball was running, or the cards dealing, or after a good bit. There was an old Russian princess resident in the place, also playing constantly and at random, left the bank its regular advantage of the zeros in an average loss to it of half her income, that is to say, of about twenty pounds a day. There was a ruined major, who had gambled away four estates, praying piously for luck, and denying to no beggar a farthing lest the want of charity might lead to the Divine ordaining of his game. There was a very old judge, once lady of honor to the Queen of France, who, when retiring from her place, took lodgings in a neighboring house at Homburg. She kept a carriage and several servants, and was reported rich by the spies of the bank. She was compelled to part with her carriage at the end of the first year; after the second year she must part even with her chambermaid, and remove to a less expensive hotel. Her money did not pay the bank for its risk of gambling. After another half year all her resources were exhausted, and nothing left but a pension of eight pounds, which she received regularly from Paris on the first day of each month.

This poor old lady was perfectly aware of her folly, but she could neither desist from playing nor decide to leave the place. When reduced to her pension, she took a wretched room, pampering but a bed, a table, a chest of drawers, four straw-bottomed chairs, and a looking-glass, and agreed with her landlord of the house in advance for France every month for lodging, board, and a daily half-chopine of spirits. The remaining one hundred and forty francs went to the gambling-table. On the second day of the month she took her place there, and lasted about the year, playing, with cards and drinking her allowance of spirits. She associated with nobody, and never spoke about the past.

Commercial travelers here gamble away the money of their firms; clerks rob their masters to buy bright gold luck at the bank; officers lose the bands confined to their care; and it is said that the Landgrave, in consequence of several defalcations of the German Confederation in Frankfort. Farmers and peasants, attracted by the hope to gain a few florins without trouble, lose what they have earned by hard work during years.

Suicides are numerous, although the bankers do all they can either to prevent such cases, or to conceal them when occurring. Having ascertained by their spies that some poor fellow is desperate, they give him the means to pay his bill, if not too heavy, and to carry away his despair to any other place. Many unfortunates are found hanging in the park, the body is removed by their friends in the police, and the incident kept secret as much as possible. If there are witnesses, money is placed in the pockets of the suicide, in order to prove that he did not kill himself in consequence of gambling, although it may indeed look suspicious enough to find a thousand-franc note in the pocket of a man who has just pawned his watch for a few florins. Very often even the inhabitants of the little town are not able to ascertain the circumstances attending such a case, and the papers do not publish them.

A person in Homburg had not only lost his fortune and place, but also funds trusted to him. He resolved to enter the saloon of the bank with two loaded pistols in his pocket. As soon as he had lost his last florin, he intended to kill with one pistol the "chef de partie," and with the other blow out his own brains. He communicated this intention to a gentleman almost as poor as himself, who advised him to threaten the administration of the gambling bank with his intention. The young man tried the experiment, and it answered; he did not receive the four hundred florins asked for, but at least three hundred and fifty florins.

A poor young man from Berlin shot himself behind the Kurhaus. A Homburg demon, who was sitting at his wine after the play had finished for the day, heard the report, and said, "Again some one pops off without taking post-horses."

AN HONEST ARAB.

We had been on a fishing tour in the Highlands of Scotland, and, en route to town, were idling a day or two in "the gray metropolis of the north." "Scotchman, ho! Scotchman, forkerty, fewzees, penny a hunder—this day's Scotchman, Sir!" shouted a shrill-toned, ragged little imp at the tip end of a cold, wet, bitter day in October, as we stood blowing a cloud at the door of the New Royal in Prince Street.

"No, we don't want any."

"Fewzees, penny a hunder, Sir; this day's penny, Sir—bold prize, Sir—only a bawbee!" persisted the young countryman of Adam Smith, as the market shows it symptoms of decline, and threatened to close decidedly flat.

"Get along, Bird's-eye, don't want any," growled Phillips.

"They're guide fewzees, Sir, penny a hunder."

"Don't smoke," Phillips, logotur, whif, whif, whif.

"They're guide fewzees, Sir, hunder and twenty for a penny, Sir," coming round on my flank.

"No, don't want any, boy."

The keen blue face, red bare feet ingrained with dirt, and bundle of scanty rags looked piteously out at me, over a little, but still hovered round me. Now, when I put down my first subscription to the One Tun Ragged School in Westminster, I took a mental pledge from myself to encourage vagrant children in the streets no more. Somehow in this instance that pledge wouldn't stand by me, but gave way.

"Give me a penn'orth, young 'un."

"Have 'em, sweet," whif, whif.

"If the lurchers don't the son of Lucifer does," threw in Phillips.

"Ah, I haven't got a copper, little 'un, nothing less than a shilling; so, never mind, my boy, I'll buy from you to-morrow."

"Buy them the nicht, if you please. I'm very hungr-grey, Sir."

"He'll give you check for the balance, by God!"

His little cold face, which had lightened up, now fell. Down his bundle of papers, I saw his sales had been few that day.

"I'll gang for change, Sir."

"Well, little 'un, I'll try you—there is a shilling—now be a good boy, and bring me the change to-morrow morning to the hotel—ask for Mr. Turner."

"Give my friend your word of honor, as a gentleman as security for the bob."

"As sure's I live, I'll bring the change the morn," was the promise of young Lucifer before he vanished with the shilling.

"Well, Phillips, we strolled along Princes Street, "you don't expect to see your brimstone friend again, do you?"

"I do."

"Your friend will dishonor his I.O.U. as sure as——"

"Well, I won't grieve about the money; but I think I can trust you boy."

"Can?" Why, you Arce trusted him; and your deliberation savors remarkably of the wisdom of the historical statesman, who began to think about closing the door when—lost the illustration don't seem to strike you as a novelty."

"Well, we'll see."

"Yes, wonders, but not young Brimstone and your money."

Next morning we spent in "doing" the lions.

On our return to the inn, I inquired:

"Waiter, did a little boy call for me to-day?"

"Boy, Sir?—call, Sir? Boy, Sir."

"Of course, Geff, he didn't. Did you really expect to see your young Arab again?"

"Indeed I did, Harkary. I wish he had proved honest."

"Then, oh Lucifer, son of the morning, how thou art fallen!"

Later in the evening a small boy was introduced, who wished to speak with me. He was a duodecimo edition of the small ootoz of the previous day, got up with less outlay of capital—a shoeless, shirtless, shrunk, ragged, wretched, keen-witted Arab of the streets and closes of the city. He was so very small and cold and childlike—though with the same shivering feet and frame, thin, bloodcold face, down which tears had worn their weary channels—that I saw at once the child was not my friend of the previous night.

"Enter Antonio to redeem his bond!" Phillips, logotur.

He stood for a few minutes diving and rummaging into the recesses of his rags; at last little Tom Thumb said:

"Are you the gentleman that bought fewzees frae Sandy yesterday?"

"Yes, my little man."

"Well here's ninepence (counting out divers copper coins), Sandy canna come; he's no well; a cott on ony him the day, and broken his leg, and lost his bannet, and his fewzees, and your fourpence-piece, and his knife, and he's no weel. He's no weel ava, and the doctor-gentleman he's doe—ine,—in,—and—that's a' he can gie you noo." And the poor child, commencing with sobs, ended in a sore fit of crying.

I gave him food, for, though his cup of sorrow was full enough, his stomach was empty, as he looked wistfully at the food on the table before him.

"Are you Sandy's brither?"

"Ay, Sir;" and the food-gates of his heart again opened.

"Where do you live? Are your father and mother alive?"

"We bide in Blackfriars Wynd in the Cowgate. My mither's dead, and father's awa, and we bide whiles wi' our gudemither," sobbing bitterly.

"Where did this accident happen?"

"Near the college, Sir."

The thing a cab, we were speedily set down at Blackfriars Wynd. I had never penetrated the wretchedness of these ancient closes by day, and here I entered by night, and almost alone. Preceded by my little guide, I entered a dark, wide, winding stair, until, climbing many flights in the pitchy darkness, he opened a door, whence a light maintained a feeble unequal struggle with the thick, foul atmosphere of the room. My eyes age nearly gave way as the spectacle of that room burst upon me. In an apartment, certainly space not more than ten square yards, visible by the guttering candle stuck in a bottle, were an overcrowded mass of wretched beings sleeping on miserable beds spread on the floor. Upon the floor, sprawled reclining upon the cold unfurnished boards.

Stepping over a prostrate quarreller drunkard, I found my little friend in the next carpeter's shavings on the floor. He was still in his rags, and a torn and scanty counterpane had been thrown by him over the bed of sorrow. Poor lad! he was so changed. His sharp pallid face was clammy and cold—lends of the dying were standing about him. His bruised and ... only lay motionless and still, except ... moaning heard his fluttering breath. Some old woman, in mantlin drunkenness ... or banished father's second wife, and not his mother), won and then bathed his lips with whisky—which, however, he refused—but he got a bottle of spirits to drown the grief she anticipated and assumed. A doctor from Royal Infirmary had called and had ordered the patient inside the poor lad's agony (for his case was hopeless, even though he had been admitted to the infirmary in the early part of the day, and had been in the infirmary in the neighborhood), but his tipsy nurse had forgotten to administer it. I applied it, and had the satisfaction of seeing considerable bed of straw; and feeling a woman, an occupant of the room, to attend him during the night, I gave her such directions I could, left the degraded, squalid home.

Next morning I was again in Blackfriars Wynd. Its squalid inhabitants, air, and towering, antique, dilapidated mansions (the abode of the peerage in far-off times) now struck my senses. Above a door-way was written upon the wall—"Except ye Lord do build ye house, ye builders build in vain."

I said the room was spacious; it was almost noble in its proportions. The walls of paneled oak sadly needed the carpenter's and upholsterer's art; cunning carving, ruthlessly broken and disfigured, enameled tiles around the fire-place, once representing Scripture subjects, were daubed over and defaced, and the ceiling festooned with antique fruit and flower, shared in the general Vandal wreck. With the exception of a broken chair, there was hardly one none in that stifling den. Its occupants, said the surgeon, whom I found at the bedside of my little guide, were of our class, and the poor lad's stepmother—she had taken him from the ragged school that she might defraud the pitiful earnings—was at work in infirmary as my there.

For the patient medical skill was naught, for he was sinking fast. The rosy flush from his face to the blue eyes was slowly oiling out, his pallid cheeks were sunk and thin, but consciousness returned, and his young face flushed with pleasure at my arrival. As I took his feeble hand, a flicker of recognition seemed to gleam across his face.

"I got your message, and am come."

"My poor boy, you were very honest. Have you any money, young, poor child, I can do for you? I promise to—"

"Really, I'm sure I'm deein,' wha will take care o' you noo?"

Little Reuben was instantly in a fit of crying, and threw himself prostrate on the bed. "Oh, Sandy! Sandy! Sandy! Sandy! Sandy! Sandy!"

"I will see to your little brother."

"Thank you, Sir! Dinna—dinna leave me, Ren—dinna—dinna—Sandy—mither—mither—"

"Whist! whist!" cried little Reub, looking up, and turning pallid again, and silence in the room. That moment the calm faded smile, that seemed to have alighted as a momentary visitant upon his face, slowly passed away, the eyes became blank and glazed, and his little life imperceptibly rippled out.

The honest boy lies in the Canongate churchyard, not far from the grave-stone put up by Burns to the memory of Ferguson, his brother poet, and I have little Reuben at Dr. Guthrie's ragged school, and receive excellent accounts of him, and from him.

"What of your young Arab, Turner?" said Phillips, the following afternoon. "Was he honest, and is he really ill?"

"Yes, Phillips, he was an honest Arab; but now he is 'where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.'"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Fame is like an eel—rather hard to catch and a good deal harder to hold.

Unquestionably if a man means well, the more he means the better.

Some author tells us that "much is said about the tongue." True, the thing is in every body's mouth.

It is certainly a paradox that we are naturally desirous of long life, and yet afraid of living to be old.

"Do you understand figures, boy?"—"Oh, yes, I am always cutting a fine one."

A skeptic thinks it very extraordinary that an ass once talked like a man. But it is still more extraordinary that thousands of men are continually talking like asses.

There is a man in Tetuan so witty that his wife manufactures all the butter that the family uses from the cream of his jokes.

It is a general remark that all classes of persons are ever ready to give advice. Women. We think the lawyer must be excepted: they sell theirs.

Mr. Merryman Lathrop says, when he went on the Sunday excursion, he didn't expect to return in the hotel-way, the beef in the bullocks near the steerage; and when they ran out of eggs, the ship fog on.

"When am a sweet apple and a sour apple alike?—When they are pared.

Why is Berlin the most dissipated city in Europe?—Because it is always full of Balls.

Take away my first letter, take away my second letter, take away all my letters, and I am still the same.—The postman.

A marquis said to a financier, "I would have you to know that I am a man of quality." "And I," replied the financier, "am a man of quantity."

"Fine complexion Mrs. H. has got," said Brown to his friend Beatties, the artist. "I know it," replied Beatties, "and I lay on the colors at the same shop."

"Give me a hint, dear girl." "I can't," she replied: "I don't mind tending you one, but I must have it returned to-morrow."

Why are jokes like nuts?—Because the drier they are the better they crack.

A Question for Music Masters.—Can a mile be said to play the piano in "Sunday" manner?

Every man can and should do something for the public, if it be only to kick a piece of orange peel into the road from the pavement.

A Mr. Lyon declined fighting a duel, and was called a dog for it. "Ah, you may call me dog, but a live dog is better than a dead lion."

"Waylock's the Cubed best in Endeyer."—"You say that because you have lumber, and berrings, and lasdocks, and many other things—but all I know is, that I have got the best cart in the country, for the last dozen years, and it hasn't had the smallest effect in curing that."

Misprints will present themselves in other columns besides those of newspapers. The author of a temperance work entitled "Drunkenness is Folly," was horrified to read, "Drunkenness is Jolly."

The celebrated suit, which crowed so naturally that it was not known whether the cock or the hen finished, has at present a picture of the moon that's painted with such wonderful fidelity to nature that it can't be seen in the day-time.

A gentleman remonstrating with Mr. Kenney against his bringing out a piece called "Matchmaking," said, "Allow me to make a few animadversions upon it."—"Animadversions, Sir," replied Kenney, "I do not wish for any sad versions of my comedy."

The following occurred in a school near London.

Teacher. "Now, boys, what speech is the word say?" Boy (hesitatingly). "Noun, Sir."

Teacher. "What is its gender?"

Boy (perplexed). "Can't tell, Sir."

Teacher. "Is it masculine, feminine, or neuter?"

Boy (looking sharp). "Can't say, Sir, till it's hatched."

A young lady reprimanded her shoemaker for not following the pattern she had given a pair of shoes she had ordered; and, among others, insisted that they were not square. Crispin replied that she had given him no pattern, in order to oblige her, well knowing the modesty of her disposition, that she was not fond of fellows.

Dr. Carrie (not by name and but by nature), when asked by a particularly inquisitive woman to tell her the precise meaning of the word "idea," about which she had been reading in some metaphysical work, but could not understand it, replied very excitedly, "Madam, madam, is the feminine of idiot, and means a she-fool."

Frederick the Great was always very fond of disputation; but he never entertained his discussions by collaring his antagonist and kicking his shins, few of his hasty courtiers could boast of the stress against his shins. One day he was more than usually disposed for an argument, and asked one of his suite what he thought was to give his opinion on some particular question. "It is impossible, Sire," was the reply, "to express before a sovereign who has such strong convictions, and who wears such thick boots."—Punch.

To explain the fatalities of travel which mark the age, a tourist said that during the present year he had cats-ra-combs, and that the Prince had presented him in Egypt, drank the health of Queen Victoria as the vergot of the coast of Navarre, and hence rather sharply scolded by his wife on the summit of Mont Blanc!

Orfila, the celebrated French chemist, being examined as to poisons in a trial, was asked by the Vice-President whether he could tell what quantity of arsenic was sufficient to kill a man. "Before replying," Corbisart, M. le President! but I must know beforehand the age of the by, the sex, the temperament, the condition and habits of body, whether married or single, widow or maidel, whether or not addicted to wine, and many other points, to can answer your question."

During the absence from circuit of Mr. Campbell (now Lord Campbell) on his matrimonial trip with the celebrated Miss Scarlett, Justice Abbott observed, when a cause was called on,

"My Lord, Mr. Brougham, that Mr. Campbell was in this cause?"

"Yes, my lord," replied Mr. Brougham, with that sarcastic look peculiarly his own; "he was, my lord, but I understand he is not now."

"I am sorry to hear that, Mr. Brougham," said the Judge, shaking sadly.

"My lord," replied Brougham, "it is whispered here that the cause of my learned friend's absence is the Scotch fever."

What goes most against a farmer's grain?—His reaping-machine.

A splendid car but a very poor one, as the organ-grinder said of the donkey.

Why is a dun like a woodcock?—Because he hores with his bill.

Our Bread and the Blue Jacket.—A young damsel who is engaged, and will shortly be united to a gallant son of Neptune, lately visited the Mariners' Church. During the sermon the parson discoursed eloquently and with much earnestness of the dangers and temptations of the sailor. He concluded by asking the following question:—"Is there one who thinks any thing of him who wears a tarpaulin hat and blue jacket, or a pair of trowsers made of duck? In short, is there one who cares aught for the poor sailor?" A little girl, a niece of the damsel, replied, "Aunt Mary does, and her sister, said, in a loud loud enough for every one to hear, "I do, Uncle Jack, I do, indeed!"

An Incident at Madame Tabeaud's.—Whenever I see a poor fellow going to get spliced it always puts me in mind of a country lass at Madame Tabeaud's, who came in London to see the guillotine there in the room of horrors, and a young man who was with her tenderly; and after looking at the knife and then looking up at the knife and down on the block, what does he do but kneel down and put his head on the hole to try how it fitted, when he caught a glimpse, as he turned round, of the bright edge of the cleaver that was hanging right over him, suspended only by a string, and just ready to do the job for him. Well, he was afraid to move for fear of slipping the string and letting the cleaver fall on his neck. The way he got from it no matter; it was the naturallest thing in the world, and he was the way he settled for lady. There was a crowd round him in no time; you never see such a stir as it made, for he got away in a stupid gloss-like, with people going about as silent as if they were among the dead. In the midst of every body a-talking of it, and They thought it was part of the show, and that he acted his part beautiful, just as a body really would if he was going to be beheaded in airnest. So nobody thought of helping him, but let him go from screech on, as if he paid for it, till at last one of the attendants came runnin' up, and seeing the knife, got him out, and was beginnin' to pitch into him, when the feller saved him the trouble by handin'.

Dodge More Host.—Two persons of respectable appearance entered a public-house not many miles from the village of Red Hill, and requested to have dinner served them. Mine host complied with their request by placing before them a sumptuous repast, and with exemplar justice it is they called for some ale. After enjoying themselves for a short season, one of 'em presented to the other to rise a piece of 50 pounds, the loser to pay for the dinner, etc. Accordingly the piece of paper had been measured the ground, and during the gentlemen, Observing that they were beyond the aforementioned, and supposing that they were doing so in ignorance, he went out and told them of the mistake, and then what they were out of sight, and did not return. The landlord, therefore, had the gratification of thinking he had been dodged, for they ran off without paying for their dinner.—Hertford Mercury.

Coercing.—Pitts is a fast man, a sharp man, a man of business fact, and always gets at the lowest cash prices and best ways. Well, Pitts had heard of it I don't find any thing that suits me better, I'll call and take that. So Pitts is parted to the store, and quite lately Potts said to himself, "I am getting into years, and may as well get married." Pitts's matrimonial qualities wouldn't let him wait, so off he starts, and calling upon a friend, opened the conversation by remarking that he should like to know what else thought about matrimony. Pitts said:

"Oh, Mr. Potts, that is an affair in which I am not as very good authority to speak, and I prefer to leave that yourself."

"But," says Pitts, "you are interested; my dear girl, will you marry me?"

The young lady blushed very red, hesitated, and finally, as Pitts was very well to do in the world, and of good standing in the city, she accepted him, and Pitts escaped the matter-of-fact Pitts responded.

"Well, I'll be darned, if I don't find any body that suits me better than you, I'll come back."

A Fatal Mouth.—The month of April has been remarkable for the mortality to celebrated women:

Christina of Sweden	died April	19
Duke of Parma	"	18
Elizabeth of England	"	3
Gabrielle d'Estrees	"	10
Jeanne de Navarre	"	9
Judith, Queen of Poland	"	19
Madame de Pompadour	"	15
Madame de Sevigne	"	14
Mademoiselle de Montpensier	"	5
Petronilla	"	4

And also to celebrated men:

Baron (Lord)	died April	16
Bedford	"	14, 1788
Byron (Lord)	"	19, 1824
Collins (the Poet)	"	12, 1759
Chatham	"	11, 1778
Dunstanville	"	8, 1840
Dukes of Marlborough	"	16, 1722
Fielding	"	8, 1754
Fuze (of the Book of Martyrs)	"	18, 1787
Franklin	"	4, 1776
Goldsmith	"	13, 1760
Handel	"	14, 1759
Hastings (Lord) beheaded	"	13, 1483
Hutter (Ralph)	"	3, 1826
Jones (Sir Wm)	"	27, 1794
Kimbens	"	2, 1791
Rolleile	"	8, 1731
Rowse (the Author)	"	20, 1813
Shakspeare	"	23, 1616
Somers (Lord)	"	26, 1716
Wilkie (Sir D.)	"	1, 1841

Bishop Thomas, in his dignity somewhat taken down when he took possession of the episcopal palace at Norwich, found in the hall several wood upon logs, and exclaimed, "Bless us, these rat! what a multitude of people—" "Why, my lord," said the steward, "you're nothing to the crowd last Friday to see a man hanged!"

The Curate's Cow.—Solomon Grisdale, curate of Stonegrave, had a favorite cow, and had a mourner family, lost his only cow. Mr. Surtees determined to make a present to the sacrifice cow, and wrote to the Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry (the late Earl Cornwallis), who was then Dean of Durham, on the great thirst of Herrington, to ask what he would give. "Give?" said his steward, "give him now, to be sure. Go, Mr. Surtees, to Wooddy, my steward, and tell him to give you the money out of my purse." The steward went to Mr. Surtees, who had not expected above a five-pound note at most, and said, "My lord, I could not ride to heaven upon the back of that cow?" A white afterward the Bishop of Durham, meeting the Lord Chancellor with, "Surtees, what is this absurd speech that I hear you have been making to the Dean?" "Nothing absurd in it," was the reply. "When the Dean rides to heaven on the back of that cow, many of you Prelates-rics will be glad to lay hold of her tail."

A gentleman, just married, told Foote that he had married and unfortunate woman, and asked his advice. "Sir," said the wit, "I'll tell you what to do—sell her."

Don't judge of moral character by the face. The frog is more innocent than many an animal that has a much handsomer physiognomy.

The very last curiosity spoken of in the papers is a wheat that came off a dog's tail when it was docked. The man who discovered it has retired from public life.

A gentleman who has for two years refused to contribute any thing toward the support of the Methodist preaching of the Gospel, recently surprised his friends by contributing to the purchase of a bell for a new church edifice. On being asked the reason for this exercise of liberality, he replied that he must let his money where he could not keep it long.

THE Uncommercial Traveller.

NO. V.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

In the late high winds I was blown to a great many places—and indeed, wind or no wind, I generally have extensive transactions on hand in the article of Air—but I have not been blown to any English place lately, and I very seldom have been blown to any English place in my life, where I could get any thing good to eat and drink in five minutes, or where, if I sought it, I was received with a welcome.

I travel by railroad. I start from home at seven or eight in the morning after breakfasting hurriedly. I fly with skimming over the wide landscape, what with mining in the damp bowels of the earth, what with banging, booming, and shrieking the scores of miles away, I am hungry when I arrive at the "Refreshment" station where I am expected. Please to observe—expected. I have said I am hungry; perhaps I might say, with greater point and force, that I am to some extent exhausted, and that I need—in the expressive French sense of the word—to be restored. What is provided for my restoration? The apartment that is to restore me is a wind-trap, cunningly set to invegle all the draughts in that corner-side, and to communicate a especial intensity and velocity to them as they rotate in two hurricanes: one about my wretched head: one, about my wretched legs. The training of the young ladies behind the counter who are to restore me has not been from my infancy directed to the assumption of 'a defiant dramatic show that I am not expected. It is in vain for me to represent to them, by my humble and conciliatory manners, that I wish to be liberal. It is in vain for me to represent to myself, for encouragement of my sinking soul, that the young ladies have a pecuniary interest in my arrival. Neither my reason nor my feelings can make head against the cold glazed glare of eye with which I am assured that I am not expected and not wanted. The solitary man among the bottles would sometimes take pity on me, if he dared, but he is powerless against the rights and mights of Woman. (Of the page I have no account, for he is a boy, and therefore the natural enemy of Creation.) Chilling fast, in the deadly torandoo to which my upper and lower extremities are exposed, and subdued by the moral dread vantage at which I stand, I turn my dismounted eye on the refreshment that are to restore me. I find that I must either scald my throat by insanely ladling into it, against time and for no vegetable, hot water stiffened with flour, or I must make myself flaky and sick with Banbury cake; or I must stuff into me delicate organization a sausage-pin-cushion with which I know will swell into immeasurable dimensions when it has got there; or I must extort from an iron-bound pantry, with a fee, as if I were farming on its table-ts, in every phase of its profoundly unsatisfactory character, the like the banquet at the nearest and shabbiest of evening parties, that I begin to think I must have "brought down" to supper, the old lady unknown, blew with cold, who is retiring her teeth on edge with a cool orange, at my elbow—that the pastry-cook, who has compounded for the evening on the lowest terms per head, is a fraudulent bankrupt, redeeming his contract with the stale stock from his window—that, for some unexplained reason, the family giving the party have become my mortal foes, and have given it on purpose to attempt me. Or I fancy that I am "looking up" again, at the evening conversazione at school, charged two-and-sixpence in the half-year's bill; or that I am down again at that celebrated evening party given at Mrs. Bogles's boarding-house when I was a boarder there, on which occasion Mrs. Bogle was taken in execution by a branch of the legal profession who got in as the harp, and was removed (with the keys and substretched out) by a pair of durance, half an hour prior to the commencement of the festivities.

Take another case.

Mr. Grasinglands, of the Midland Counties came to London by railroad one morning last week, accompanied by the amiable and fascinating Mrs. Grasinglands. Mr. G. is a gentleman of a comfortable property, and had a little business to transact at the Bank of England, which required the concurrence and signature of Mrs. G.

Now Jolting's being a hotel for families and gentlemen, and high repute among the Midland Counties, Mr. Grasinglands plucked up a great spirit when he told Mrs. Grasinglands she should have a chop there. That lady likewise felt that she was going to see Life. Arriving on that gay and festive scene, they found the station-yard in a flabby undress, cleaning the windows of the empty coffee-room, and the first waiter, denuded of his white, looking up his crumb-cloth in the Post-office Directory. The latter (who took them in hand) was greatly put out by their patronage, and showed that he had to be troubled by a sense of the pressing necessity of instantly smuggling Mrs. Grasinglands into the pubescent corner of the building. This slighted lady (who is the pride of her division of the county) was immediately conveyed, by a back and dark passage, and up and down several steps, into a penitential apartment at the back of the house, where five invalided old platewarmers leaned up against one another under a discarded old melancholy sideboard, and where the wintry leaves of all the dining-tables in the house lay thick. Also, a sofa, of incomprehensible form regarded from any sofane point of view, murmured "Bed;" while an air of mingled fluffiness and heelstaps added, "Second Waiter's." Secreted in this dismal hold, objects of a mysterious distrust and suspicion, Mr. Grasinglands and his charming partner waited twenty minutes for the smoke (for it never came to a fire), twenty-five minutes for the sherry, half an hour for the table-cloth, forty minutes for the knives and forks, three quarters of an hour for the chops, and an hour for the potatoes. On settling the little bill—which was not much more than the dev's pay of a Lieutenant in the navy—Mr. Grasinglands took heart to remonstrate against the general quality and cost of his reception. To whom the waiter replied, substantially, that Jairing's made it a rule to have accepted him on any terms; "for," added the waiter (unmistakably coughing at Mrs. Grasinglands, the pride of her division of the county), "when individuals is not staying in the 'Ouse, their favors is not as a rule looked upon as welcome to Jairing's. Jairing's while; nor is it, indeed, a style of business Mr. Jairing wishes." Finally, Mr. and Mrs. Grasinglands joined out of Jairing's, and fled, penniless, landlemen in a state of the greatest depression, scorned by the bar, and did not recover their self-respect for several days.

Or take another case. Take your own case.

You are going off by railway from any Terminus. You have twenty minutes for dinner before you go. You want your dinner, and, like Doctor Johnson, Sir, you like to dine. You present to your mind a picture of the refreshment-table at that Terminus. The conventional shabby evening dress supper—accessible to the public for all terminis and all refreshment stations, because it is the last repast known to this state of existence of which the human creature wearies, and which in the last or earliest extremity—sickens your contemplation, and your words are these: "I will not dine at this stale hash-house that turn to and to the mouth. I can not dine on shining brown patties, composed of the sweepings-up-together of the counter. I can not view the device of an indigestible star-fish in leaden pie-crust without. I can not dine on a cheesecloth that has been lapped round a sandwich exhausted receiver. I can not dine on barley-sugar. I can not dine on Toffee." You repair to the refreshment-room. You repair to the coffee-room.

It is a most astonishing fact that the waiter is very cold to you. Account for it how you may, snouth it over how you will, you can not deny that he is cold to you. You are not to him as you, he does not want you, he would much rather you hadn't come. He opposes to your flushed condition an immovable composure. He is, in fact, not enough, another waiter, born, as it would seem, expressly to look at you in this passage of your life, stands at a little distance from the Terminus under his arm and his hands folded, looking at you with all his might. You impress on your waiter that you have no minutes to throw away, and propose that you shall begin with a bit of fish which will be ready in twenty. That proposal declined, he suggests—a neat original idea—a fowl or mutton cutlet. You close with either cutlet, and your waiter, being "full" of resources, retires in a manner and calls down some unseen shaft. A wretchliquid dialogue ensues, tending finally to the effect that veal cutlet is procurable in the course of a moment. You anxiously call out, "I veal then!" Your waiter, having settled that point, returns to you over your table-cloth with his powerful hand cocked-hat wise (slowly, for something out of window engages his eye), a white wine-glass, a green wine-glass, a tea fingerbowl, a tumbler, and a powerful bold lotatory of fourteen coasters with mottoes. You are to mistake the latter for a new mode for your purpose—with nothing in them that will come out. All this time the other waiter looks at you—with an air of severe disapprobation and curiosity, now, as if it had occurred to him that you are rather like his brother. Half your time goes, and you see nothing come but the fish and the bread, you implore your waiter to "see after that cutlet, waiter; pray do?" He can not go at once, for he is carrying in seventeen pounds of American cheese for you to finish with, and a small Leaded Light of celery and watercress. The elder waiter changes his leg, and takes a new view of you—doubtfully, now, as if he had rejected the resemblance to his brother, and began to think you more like his aunt or his grandmother. Again you beseech your waiter, with pathetic indignation, to "see after that cutlet!" He does not go to see after it, and by-and-by, when you are going away without it, comes back with it. Even then he will not take the dish-cover away until you have a purse of a flourish, and a look at the musty cutlet as if he were surprised to see it—which can not possibly be the case, he must have seen it once before. A sort of fur has been produced upon its surface by the coals of fire, and it is as tough as gutta percha, staggering on two feet instead of three, is a cutaneous kind of sauce, of brown pimples and pickled cucumber. You order the bill, and, when your waiter has bring your bill yet, because he is bringing, instead, three flinty-hearted potatoes and two grim beans. You see occasional glimpses of waiters in area railings, badly boiled. You know that you will never come to this pass, any more than to the illness and utter, and you will never be wholly deserted your bill; but it takes time to get, even when gone for, because your waiter has to communicate with a lady who lives behind a mash-tub in a corner, and who appears to have to refer to several Ledgers before she can make it out, and to have it been staying there a year. You become distracted to gut away, and the other waiter, once more changing his leg, still looks at you—but suspiciously, now, as if you had begun to remind him of the party who took the great-coats last winter. Your bill at last brought and paid, and the case of absence a mouthful, your waiter reproachfully resains you that the attendance is not charged for a single meal," and you have to search in all your pockets for sixpence more. He has a worse opinion of you than ever when you have given it to him, and lets you out into the street with the air of one saying to himself, as you can not doubt he is, "I hope we shall never see you here again!"

Or, take any other of the numerous traveling instances in which, with more time at your disposal, you are, have been, or may be, equally ill served. Take the old-established Bull's Head, with its old-established knife-boxes on its old-established sideboards, its old-established flue under its old-established four-post bedsteads in its old-established airless rooms, its old-established flourishes up stairs and down stairs, its old-established cookery, and its old-established principles of plunder. Count up your injuries, in its sidedishes of shining sweetbreads in white positions, of mushrooms' powders in rice for entry, of pale stewed bits of calf ineffectually relying for an adventitious interest on a decorative bulb. You have had experience of the old-established Bull's Head's stringy fowls, with lower extremities like wooden legs, sticking out of them; of its unchangeable boiled mutton, gushing horribly among its capers when carved; of its little dishes of pastry—roofs too permanently established over half an apple or four gooseberries. Well for you if you have not forgotten the old-established Bull's Head's Fruity port; whose reputation was gained solely by the old-established price the Bull's Head put upon it, and for its old-established air with which the Bull's Head set the glasses and D'Oyleys on, and held that Liquid Gout to the three-and-sixpenny wax-candle, as if the old-established color hadn't come from the dyer's.

Or lastly, take, to finish with, two cases that will all know.

We all know the new hotel near the station, where it is always gusty, going up the lane which leads to nowhere, where we are sure to arrive at night, and where we make the gas start awfully with us upon the front door. We all know the flaring of the new paint, the mistrust that is to new, and the walls that are too new, and the house that is haunted by the scent of mortar. We all know the doors that have cracked, and the cracked shutters through which we get a glimpse of the uncomfortable house. We all know the new people who have come to keep the new hotel, and who wish they had never come, and who (inevitably in a month or two) leave come. We all know how much too scant and smooth and bright the knives are in texture, and how it has never settled down, and can not fit itself into right places, and will get into wrong places. We all know how the forks, being lighted, show maps of Dutch canals in walls. We all know how the ghost of mortar pops into our sandwich, stirs our negus, pervades with his presence our tea, makes our bedroom and prevents the smoke from following. We know how a leg of our chair comes off, and what is the nearest way to the depots: I waiter attributes the accident to a general greenness pervading the establishment, and informs us, in reply to local inquiries, that it is thankful to say he is an entire stranger in that part of the country, and is going back to his own connection on Saturday.

We all know the hotel, the great hotel, the station hotel belonging to the company of proprietors, that has been completed, and is up in the back skirts of any place we like to name, and where we look out of our palatial windows at little back yards and pigstyes, kitchen-masses, fowl-houses, and pigeon-traps, and pigeties. We all know this hotel, in which we can get any thing we want, after it is lost, or can get any thing we have notely'd glad to see us, or sorry to see us, or minds (our bill paid) whether we come, or go, or how, or when, or why, or wherefore. We all know this hotel, where we have no individuality, but put ourselves into the general page, as into the public room, and are disposed of according to our division. We all know that we can get on very well indeed at such a place, but will not particularly go to it, and this may be because the place is largely wholesale, and there is a lingering personal retail interest within us that refuses to be satisfied.

To sum up. My uncommercial traveling has not yet brought me to the conclusion that we are much the better for railways, steamers, and pace. I do not believe that the end of the world will ever be near at hand so long as any of the very tiresome and arrogant people who are constantly predict that catastrophe are left in it, so I shall have small faith in the Hotel Millennium while any of the uncomfortable superstitions I have glanced at remain in existence.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

The New Partner

"CLINGHAM & CO., BANKERS."

BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW,

AUTHOR OF "THE HASHEESH EATER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XI.

IN WHICH A DEAD MAN HOLDS BALOON.

The news of the sudden death of the superintendent had hardly fallen upon the startled ear of Cheswick, ere his partner had the undertaker called to discharge that duty, and the coroner, whose office had long been an unintresting matter, through the obstinate persistency of Cheswick people in such commonplace behavior as dying in their beds, had only just been summoned to the enjoyment of his unused privilege, when the sway of this earlier astonishment was disputed by still another bit of startling news. A telegraph dispatch from New York to take charge of the Cheswick Branch of Clingham & Co. And this time there could be no doubt of it—a real partner.

Had Mr. Tollogar seen him? No, he could not say that exactly; but John Potts, of the Eagle Tavern, assured him that a very dignified-looking man, with a hawk's eye and nose, an unexpugnable reserve of manner, and at least a pound of watch-seals, had entered his bar-room that morning and drank a bottle of Byass's stout, for which he pulled out a double-eagle in payment. His whole bearing was that of a man who is worth a number of hundred thousand dollars; and there could be no question but he was the partner.

Nor had Mrs. Dilks seen the partner. But she knew that poor dear Mr. Green was dead, and (as nothing in regard to him had yet come out) she supposed that Clingham & Co. could not in decency do less than one and all of them to be present at the funeral; for he was a perfect gentleman, and of a sweetness of behavior—excellent soul!—which made her feel quite as if he were her own father. And as Clingham & Co. would probably do what Clingham & Co. ought to do, the partners no doubt were all in Cheswick; wherefore, reasoning from the general to the particular, the partner was necessarily there. On which supposition Mrs. Dilks straightway founded the unhesitating report that he arrived in Cheswick by the most probable train of the night before. The steward, the chambermaid of Cashier Todds confirmed her in her certainty, lasting, as it did, not only through the night which was not unusual—but until long after breakfast of the next day—which was unusual—that gentleman having a singular habit of taking breakfast, however much inebriated he might have been the night before.

When the other officers of the Bank lodged and boarded the same phenomenon of their protracted absence was noted, and every where it was ascribed to the same cause. They were paying their respects to that great mystery—into whose sanctum, whether subterranean, in ocean-caverns, or aerial only fancy could suggest, they alone of all Cheswickians were fortunate enough to be invited. Curiosity was a terrible sin, but thoroughly believed-in real privilege.

Was he at the Bank? No. At first some of the more curious-minded had endeavored (as ought that possible; and although the shutters were down, and on the heavy iron-plated outer door of entries was a notice to the effect that there would be no business done there that day on account of the death of Mr. Green, they still rang at the famous pull-straps, and, finding that Cashier Todds and Nora invariably excused themselves from being seen, assiduously pumped the handmaiden Priscilla, departing with a sore sense of being supposed upon because she could not be induced to say that she had concealed the partner somewhere about the premises. By-and-by so many came to gratify their inquisitiveness in this way that the information whatever was paid from within to the hell, or rather the bell-handle, since the former had been put out of the power of attracting notice by a judicious bandage of cotton-batting around its tongue.

Finally, was he at the house where the dead man lay? No, until the Coroner came. Luke Green had kept his silent lodging there alone. For an old servant, and a middle-aged, prosy, maid of all work in his unpretentious establishment, with the superstition peculiar to her race, and liked sympathy with the dead, and fear of his being brought in, locking the door behind her, and asserting that she would not remain for a thousand dollars in the house with a dead man who walked through the dark quietly as a cat, and sat down at the foot of her bed, smiling at her and fled upstairs to the garret. Only when this, where the whole story came out, there were those who added that he was in the ambilty two words to her in a low, quiet tone that stopped her blood and nearly craced her brain. They were,

"Least chance!" Last chance! Though I have never had this from her own lips, and it may be only one of those fallicious after-thoughts which people, in adding the facts together, suppuply what is necessary to round them out to the poetic ideal.

Then the Coroner came he found it necessary to break the lock, and immediately there swarmed in on the front door, up the stairs into the French-chamber—where there was every thing except opportunity for seeing, hearing, and hear—including whatever was to be seen, heard, hearing vulgar—and into all the other halls, passages, and chambers of the house, where the only opportunities were to see, hear, hearing, shouting and listening to exaggerated telegraphs from the more fortunate, such a motley crowd of witnesses as to set Inquest on its ear in a very few seconds, that no partner was there, unless he had an eccentric predilection, to say nothing of dimensions, for secreting himself away between the floor of the upper and the ceiling of the lower rooms. Mrs. Dilks Filkins and Priscilla were to help them to better knowledge; both these having dispeared immediately after their deposit of the body in the bed, the only one left to the eminent officer who was conducting the investigation learned any thing as to those who had borne the dead to his home, was the hiring of the undertaker to make preparations for the funeral; sent, as he stated, by two persons of whom he knew not the names, who had left him a forehand all the burial expenses, given orders to have the remains laid in the place on the next but one succeeding, and expressed an intention to be present at that time, though probably not before. Whereupon several constables were dispatched with commands not to sleep until the two were found and made some use of for the public regulement, either to be hanged, or, if any vexatious obstacles were in the way to that end, to be sworn, to have to, to have to next best thing done to them by being made witnesses. Which latter the People ex. Pauvre Diable always contrives to make only a few shades less disagreeable than the former.

Having now settled, in the most summary way, where the partner was not, and having also truly stated the existence of a very generally obtaining opinion that, in this exigency, he was and ought to be somewhere, we will leave, for a few moments, the consideration where he was, while we state two or three things about our elder acquaintances.

And, in the first place, it is not known, neither is it conceived to be of any consequence, precisely where the large man and his slight friend went immediately after the escape of their prisoner. Thus much is certain, that it was near enough whither were the eye of justice, or so much of that ubiquitous organ as blinked through Coroner Doldrum's spectacles, was unable to fix its keen and burning glance upon them.

Secondly, at the very moment that the Coroner's inquisition was going on, the young gentlemen of the Bank, from Todds, cashier, down to the runners, were in close confinement, each by himself, in one of the houses of the town; having been brought thither by virtue of due process before any one of them had learned the news of Mr. Green's death.

In the third place, the most strange, and, to one heart at least, terrible uncertainty hung over Ernest Beckford's whereabouts. His absence, so unexpectedly and unexplainably occurring, as we now noticed for the first time, just before Mr. Green's death, with the Bank affairs in such a distracted condition, and such blame for carelessness or something far worse attaching to the employes—this was talked about every where. Besides, there were vague rumors of his connection with wallet snatching, which grew into surmises of his practice of habitual larceny, which culminated in authoritative reports of his connection with the worst class of villains. These had their first rise from him, such as even the most cautious may inadvertently let drop in great vexation, on the part of Todds and Maugles, or even others, as to Ernest's behavior on the night of the punch party. John Manton looked out timidly into the street, heard the people speaking excitedly of these reports, and coming in again repeated them casually to Nora, who treasured them up as so many new, increasing agonies. Oh! in that day of fear and utter uncertainty to the human soul that dies, how did the immortal and divine soul within her live, just hanging by that hand of faith which clasps God's arm! And what an scene to all her troubles did there come, when a sheriff's officer called at the house during the afternoon, and asked to search for one Beckford, whom he had been unable to find, but who was down on the list of those who, during the last year, had been connected with the Bank, and was to be arrested with all the others on the charge of large defalcations.

At length the young girl's agony grew to intense that she could not bear any longer to see an unconcerned person near her. At the same time she wished to learn something of the state of facts in the terrible case of Luke Green's death, hoping that light might be shed upon her uncertainty, and that her suspense might in some way be decided by the results of that investigation. She accordingly implored her father, with a pertinacity that astonished one accustomed, like him, to see her utterly self-denying in all that pertained to curiosity or any ordinary gratification, to go out for a walk and leave her alone. "Go," said Nora, "and learn what all this about Luke Green's sudden death really means. You ought to go, believing as you do that he was your friend, and see too, if, as I hear said, one of the partners has really come."

Stupefied by the quick succession of excitements which had fallen during the last day or two upon his brain, and unable to realize whether Luke Green was alive or dead—and if dead, whether he himself and his quarrel with him had not in some sort been the fatal cause—John Manton was very hardly persuaded to exchange his silent fireside, nightmarish as it now seemed to him, for the distraction of the crowd outside. The bare thought of the locks he should encounter as the dead man's particular acquaintance, the hypotheses he should hear to account for every thing logically in fifty different ways, and each unquestionably the only possible one, the noise, the jostle, and the possibility of trembling before Coroner Doldrum as a witness, made him shudder. But Nora's entreaty at last prevailed, and the old man peevishly took his hat and stick and went forth, as if he were about to plunge into a bath at zero. He directed his steps toward the house where the inquest was holding. The witness whom the Coroner was now examining was a very important one—his testimony bearing directly upon, if not quite deciding, the important point, whether a cuticular abrasion over the nasal cartilage would be sufficient to cause traumatic tetanus, by sympathy with the os scaphoides of the left carpus. As Coroner Doldrum had been a doctor himself before his elevation to the present dignity, and his witness was a rival practitioner in somewhat better, and owing to his having studied medicine more than politics and frequented the bedside rather than the ward meeting, the examination was peculiarly piquant, and from its so directly aiming at the best interests of justice, peculiarly fascinating also to the audience. It had reached the following pleasing crisis:

Coroner. "I understood you to say, Sir, that the daphnoides flabelliformis was only a continuation of the main clavicle of the phalanges—"

Witness. "The deficiency in the Court's understanding I can not remedy; but I hope no such d—d nonsense will go down as mine in the reports of the case. I beg—"

Coroner. "That is contempt, Sir, contempt! I've a great mind—"

Witness. "Indeed? Report much underrates your Honor then."

Just at this juncture—happily for the welfare of both judge and witness, and that the name of law might not be dishonored—the door which it had been—the unsuppressed ribald merriment which elicited the popular gratification at this disrespect of dead men's bones—was now hushed for a moment, and a murmur ran through the house that the old friend of the dead man stood below in the hall. Whereat the dense pack of killers who had listened and watched, many, managed, by considerable benevolence and squeezing their persons, to open an avenue, perhaps six inches wide, through which John Manton, in his unconscious bewilderness and terror, was pushed up to the Coroner's table, the mob closing behind him as he passed, very much as a rat is driven into the corner of a bag by pulling it through the hand.

Every body in the house, that knew him by sight, the Coroner among the rest, though neither he nor more than one or two of the audience had ever obtained a nearer acquaintance with him. But every body now nodded to him as having been a friend of the dead man, and he was seconded a big fellow who, in the excitement of the moment, as well as a stool by the side of his Honor.

With a stolid look, as one who is frightened too deeply for his face to express it, did John Manton sit gazing on the painfully-agony-distorted countenance of the dead. He also knew who is delivered from a great terror, but as yet can not understand that he is now once a great to die, and is therefore perpetually looking to see it step forth again. As one who from the dead man had always stood in a great awfulness, and now that it was gone was weak, being left devoid of any.

As John Manton was on the stand, and every one in all the house was silent, and could never hear good or ill word more was stretched to catch his faintest answer, all was serene in Bleecker's Court. Every body, as has been observed, received no tides, no ripples even, from the outer world of Chewsick life. It would have been the place to summon the most impatinal panel from, had the sheriff thought of it, in all the county of Chewsick. For Chewsick wheltzer in Blinker's Court it was known that Luke Green was dead. Such is the narrowness of our most important news. We are prone to think, if we were are, let us think that, were we dead to-morrow, there is a Blinker's Court which would not know it.

But, strangely enough, one of the inmates of Blinker's court was just this very time trudging homeward from a rent-raid on some poor tenants, and came by the house where the inquest was holding. It was a small boy, as has been observed, received no tides, no ripples even, from the outer world of Chewsick life. It would have been the place to summon the most impatinal panel from, had the sheriff thought of it, in all the county of Chewsick. For Chewsick wheltzer in Blinker's Court it was known that Luke Green was dead. Such is the narrowness of our most important news. We are prone to think, if we were are, let us think that, were we dead to-morrow, there is a Blinker's Court which would not know it.

But, strangely enough, one of the inmates of Blinker's court was just this very time trudging homeward from a rent-raid on some poor tenants, and came by the house where the inquest was holding. It was a small boy, as has been observed, but still very energetic and masculine-looking woman, in a scant blue bed-gown and a cap with tremendous bows, and a parasol, or umbrella washed whitey brown by the showers of a decade, and dislocated in its joints by fights with the winds of as long a period, and trembling with a strange earnestness which brought her receded eye out of its bed of wrinkles like a quick-leaping insect, she asked a pleasant lad who sat on the steps and fired peas among those who were able to get in, "Sonny! what are the folks a doin' in there?"

"None o' your sonny, old girl! There's a dead man in there that hain't quite dead enough, and so they're a talkin' him deader, that's what's the row—"

"Who's the man? Who is he? Who—"

"Once who's enough," answered the boy, critically; "the feller had something to do with the Bank, and his name was Green."

The old umbrella spun from the hand of the woman like the lightest plaything. She was very old, but she leaped the distance between her and the door three steps at a time.

There were two catch-polls at the door who sought to bar her way with their staves. She flew at their faces with a wild-beast fierceness. They were accustomed to encounter with all sorts of mad men and women, as was natural in their walk of life; but there was a something in her look which daunted them, and they let her get by.

"Open the way, men, open the way!" she said, hoarsely, to the crowd. "Some one said he is dead, and I'm his mother."

Ready passage did these words make both for curiosity's sake and humanity's. The stairs were so crowded that the balusters were in danger of giving way; but each man once more, as for John Manton, squeezed himself into counter compression, and the old woman rushed upward through the gap with the lithe muscles of a child.

"Make way for Luke Green's mother!" rang from the men below, and the crowd in the upper hall, as well as in the dead chamber, parted at that name in an instant. And thus utterly unconscious that every eye peered at her—no thing on face of expression but the mad knowledge that Luke Green was dead, and she was his mother—she came to the board on which the dead man lay.

"Lu—key!" She screamed this word in her shrill old woman's voice, making a long cadence upon the first syllable, as one who calls another at a distance. "Lukey! wake up, boy! Don't you be shamming now to scare the old woman. Come of your tricks, my rogue!" Thou she leaned down and whispered in his cold ear: "I know you're afraid to let 'em think you're alive, because if you did they'd be mean to you, and send you to prison, perhaps; but there's a child in the chest under the bed, real gold, sonny, and will make it all right with them, and get you off! Come to! Lukey, come to!" All but these last words was said so low that none but those nearest the body could hear them; and the last were uttered peevishly, as one who thinks it time for a trick to be played out, while she caressed the shoulder of the dead man. Coroner Doldrum stopped his examination of John Manton, and, with the motley audience, gazed in blank astonishment at this old woman, whom many of them had seen before, but none had ever suspected of relationship to Luke Green. Who is it? Is that Green's mother? The same question that went from mouth to mouth in underbreath, as the woman bent over the rude death-couch of the apprehensionless. Then his shoulder she passed her hand to his face, and then, as if feeling had come to corroborate the test of sight to which before she had trusted belief, she started back, sliding her trembling hand along the icy forehead, and then, with a piercing shriek, fell upon the body of her son. There she lay, with his head clasped in her arms, rocking herself up and down, moaning:

"Dead—dead—Lukey, you're dead—oh—oh—dead, dead!"

"Do you know that woman, witness?" asked the Coroner.

"I do not, Sir," answered John Manton.

The old woman raised her head quickly, and her eyes snapped fire. "Whose voice was that? Who said I didn't know her?" She sought all the faces in the direction of the answer, and her eye lit upon the witness.

As John Manton met it, she cried, "is it you that utters that lie? God wither your tongue, you wretch!"

"Before God I do not know you," said the old man, faintly, trembling in every limb.

Nothing but the dend body of her son intervening prevented the woman springing upon John Manton like a tiger. She leaned over toward him as far as she could, and with her skinny hands knotted and menacing him, cried out, "I'll tell ye who I am, John Manton. I'll tell ye who I am, the mother of this dead man—and you killed him! Yes, you may tremble; it was you that killed him! I know it. Do ye remember that day, years and years ago, that pleasant spring day, when I met you at the Vin Tassel House, and you gave me a son for a daughter?"

There were those who gave a low shuckle among the mob at this suggestion of a pleasant piece of preternatural; but the frowns of the intent listeners checked the mirthful tendency, and the old woman went on.

"Villain! Earl you don't know me? I know you; and I tell ye, as I tell the world here, that you are a fool, a hypocrite, and baby changer! And it's you and yours that have been the death of my Luke—I knew you'd kill him. Ah, ah, ah, I told him so. It's true, Lukey, isn't it?—the old woman's right. John Manton, you wouldn't let your heiress have him, would ye? Baby changer! May God bring me up to you!" She reached forward as if she would strike him over her son; but her passionate rage had exhausted itself before there was any danger to John Manton, and she sank into the arms that were stretched to prevent her, trembling, and livid in the face with madness.

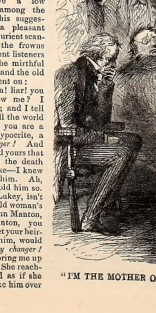
"What does all this mean?" said Coroner Doldrum, savagely, looking at John Manton with an eye that he meant to have look like pictures he had seen of Justice. John Manton, pale as death, sat on the witness's stool, covering his eyes with his hands, and only shook his head in answer to the stern preserver of law. This conduct—humble, not presuming in the same impudence of visage as his Honor—was an infallible proof of guilt, and afforded the magistrate an opportunity of showing how much humbler officer he was to the country by committing somebody. As he had been afraid until now that no such delicious chance would offer itself, he seized it with avidity.

"Very suspicious behavior, very suspicious!" said Coroner Doldrum. "For the last time, I ask you again if you know what this old lady means? She says you are a baby changer, and that you killed her son! Now what have you got to say?"

John Manton rose, supporting his tremulous knees by the back of a neighboring reporter's chair, and faltered out these words:

"May it please the Court, what she means about killing her son I can not say. As to her remarks upon the subject of an exchange of children I understand her better, but have no right to make any public disclosures upon the matter, as it is a confidential secret."

"You know her, then?" said Coroner Doldrum, fiercely.



"Yes, Sir."

"And just now, on your oath, you asserted that you did not know her! That is rank perjury, Sir, and contempt of Court into the bargain. How do you get rid of that, Sir? And you decline to satisfy the Court upon the subject of the baby changing, do you, Sir? Very well; things begin to be a little clearer as to this death. Very suspicious; very. I shall commit you, Mr. Manton, and adjourn this Court until nine o'clock to-morrow morning. Constable, take Mr. Manton into custody."

Hardly knowing whither he went, the poor old man was hustled along by one of those catch-polls who feel a peculiar enthusiasm in taking a respectable man to the lock-up—a sort of oblation to the tug-rag of society from whom they themselves spring. The fascination of the inquest was now dispelled, and the corrége that followed to see the pleasant sight of John Manton's imprisonment cleared the house of all but Coroner Doldrum, two or three other tip-staves, the dead man, and his mother. Justice, as embodied in the person of a judicial Doldrum, was at a loss to know what equitable disposition to make of the latter. At length, after musing for a moment, a bright thought beamed upon him. There were three tip-staves—I said two or three, it will be remembered—one of them was to stay and take care of the body; another lived next door to himself, and would make him nice company home; while the third might just as well take the old woman out of the way and put her in jail—if he only considered her as a witness. He would, therefore, consider her as a witness.

"Highjinks," said he, to one of the catch-polls, "I consider this woman as a witness—take her to the lock-up." Which was accordingly done straightway, though not without both oral and mechanical objection on said witness's part. Thus was every body disposed of. After which, Coroner Doldrum went home to tea, highly gratified by his bright idea and its success.

The greatest joke of all is, that it is not only a high legal proceeding and legal idea upon the Statute Books of the State of New York, in the nineteenth century.

"I'M THE MOTHER OF THIS DEAD MAN—AND YOU KILLED HIM!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

Premature Loss of the Hair,

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and it has never failed to arrest its decay, and to produce a healthy and vigorous growth.

It is unrivaled as a dressing for the hair, a single application rendering it soft and glossy for several days.

The following testimonial is conclusive of its efficacy in the case of Baldness.

Boston, November 24, 1859.

Gentlemen: When I first used your Cocoaine, I had been bald seven years. In the mean time I had tried a dozen different preparations, especially recommended for baldness, (and all claiming to be infallible), without any beneficial effect.

The ladies of my household urged me to try your Cocoaine, which I did, to please them, not having, myself, any faith in the power of man to restore my hair. I have used the contents of one bottle, and my bald spot is covered all over with young hair, about three-eighths of an inch long, which appears strong and healthy, and determined to grow.

In a word, your Cocoaine is excellent—the best preparation for the hair I have ever known, and the only one which accomplishes more than it promises.

Very truly your obliged and obd't servant,

D. T. MERWIN.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by dealers, generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

The Readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY

Can have purchased and forwarded to them, with dispatch, any Article this City affords, by sending their Orders, addressed to WM. S. WYSE, Office HARPER'S WEEKLY.

N. B.—Orders from Ladies will receive the attention of MRS. W., if required.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,

For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the normal habits of female life superinduce a variety of diseases which this Catholicon will counteract and cure. It can be relied upon in any case of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, Ulceration of the Womb, Fulsomness, Lassitude, &c. When every thing else has failed, this article is never taken without benefit. No suffering female should leave it untried. A pamphlet, with full symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent (gratis) by mail, or delivered by any Agent. It is sold in every town, or sent by express. Be cautious of an imitation, somewhat similar in name, with my certificate altered, &c. Address BARNES & PARK, No. 13 PARK ROW, N. Y.; J. B. PARK, Cincinnati or Chicago; WEEKS & POTTER, Boston; or CALLENDER & CO., Tallahassee. J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Utica, N. Y.

Coleman's Eutaw House,

Baltimore.

This popular House has been thoroughly renovated, and opened by ROBERT B. COLEMAN, late of the Astor House and St. Nicholas Hotels, and offers superior accommodations to families and travellers.

To Advertisers.

The Cheapest and Best Advertising Medium in the Country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

A Magnificently Illustrated Paper,

Circulating in every Section of the Union,

Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.

5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

NEW and RARE TREES and PLANTS.

PARSONS & CO.

Have just received from Europe a large number of new plants selected by one of their firm, and not before introduced. They also offer, in quantities to suit either Amateurs or the Trade, all the new CONIFERÆ, to which they have given especial attention. PICEA NORDMANNIANA, from seed two to three feet; PICEA GRANDIS, AMABILIS, and NOBILIS, will be found worthy of particular notice.

RHODODENDRONS, and all other plants fitted to make pleasure grounds fresh and green during the long winter months, can be furnished in large quantities, either seedlings or grafted.

For SCREENS they can furnish NORWAY SPRUCE, one to ten feet high, by the thousand.

For HEDGES, the AMERICAN and SIBERIAN ARBOR-VITÆ, for either screens, or for large masses, where quick growth is desired, they can recommend the PINES, including STROBUS, EXCELSA, AUSTRIACA, and the new dwarf CEMBRA. UNDERGROWTH and low Shrubbery will be enlivened by the different varieties of JUNIPER, LEW, PODOCARPUS, RETINOSPORA, etc.

All EVERGREENS for WINTER GARDENS, are cultivated by them in quantities sufficient either for Amateurs or the Trade. Many new and beautiful DECIDUOUS TREES and SHRUBS are introduced, in addition to the well-known varieties for the GARDEN, the LAWN, the GLENS, or the PARK.

ROSES are cultivated on their own roots, and budded forms never sold unless Standards are ordered.

Their stock of

FRUIT TREES

has attained a reputation, from the fact that the soil and climate of Long Island produce fruit, well-ripened wood. It is thus that the trees uniformly succeed when they receive the order, and why all plants are united. Among the fruits will be found:

APPLES, three to five years old.
STANDARD PEARS, for the GARDEN and MARKET.
DWARF PEARS, for the GARDEN and AMATEUR.
CHERRY, DWARF and STANDARD.
PLUMS, APRICOTS, and NECTARINES.
PEACHES, one and two years.

Of the above, Dwarf Maiden Trees can be furnished, suitable for ORCHARD HOUSES. Among the smaller fruits are

CURRANTS, VERSAILLES CHERRY, and other sorts.

MULBERRY, FIG, WALNUT, and FILBERT.
GOOSEBERRY, HOUGHTON and ENGLISH sorts.
BLACKBERRY, NEW ROCHELLE, by the thousand.
GRAPE-VINES, of all the foreign sorts, strong and well grown, in large pots, including the MUSCAT HAMBURG, GOLDEN CHAMPION, and other new kinds.
NATIVE GRAPES, including DELAWARE, DIANA, ANNA, CONCORD, LOGAN, HARTFORD PROLIFIC, ISABELLA, and CATAWBA.
RASPBERRY, STRAWBERRY, and RHUBARD.
LINNÆUS HERBARIUM will be sold very low by the thousand, or by the sets.

The Exotic Department,

Contained in nine houses, is always open to the inspection of visitors and buyers. It is especially rich in ORCHIDS, in plants remarkable for their FOLIAGE, and in all the choice ORNAMENTAL and GREENHOUSE PLANTS.

The catalogues of the different departments, and of the small plants, which they grow for the Trade, or for those who wish to plant in masses, can be obtained by mail, or of J. B. PARSONS, No. 3 Nassau Street, New York.

Orders will be filled with promptness and care, and packed for distant transportation. Goods delivered free of freight or cartage upon Fulton Ferry Market, New York. If desired, their Agent on the Wharf will forward them to any other point. Orders, or applications for Catalogues, should be addressed to

PARSONS & CO.,
FLUSHING, Long Island, New York.

Established in 1834.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,
Manufacturer of the Over-strung
GRAND & SQUARE PIANO-FORTES
Manufactory and Warerooms,
75 to 85
East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five Years, and Prices are moderate.

At Walker's Warerooms,
Clinton Hall, Astor Place, near Broadway.
A Large Stock of Pianos of every description for sale and hire.

"Trefelio" is the True Secret of Beauty.

"TREFELIO" Cures all Eruptions.
"TREFELIO" Softens the Skin.
"TREFELIO" Beautifies the Skin.
"TREFELIO" Eradicates Humors.
"TREFELIO" 50 cents a bottle.

!!SOMETHING NEW!!

A HEMMER, TUCKER, FELLER, BINDER, AND GUAGE combined, just patented, simple, hemming any width and thickness of cloth either side, applied to any Sewing Machine in any one in a few minutes. Retail price $5. LIBERAL DISCOUNT TO THE TRADE. Orders by mail inclosing, postage paid. Instructions accompany every hemmer. Send for a circular.

UNIVERSAL HEMMER CO.,
429 BROADWAY, N. Y.

To Public Speakers.

In a letter from Rev. J. H. Derr, Allentown, Pa., speaking of "Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Cough Lozenges, he says: "Whether a humbug or not, they seem to have done me good. I am inclined to hearsay testimony from public speaking, or an over-exertion of the vocal organs, and I have found them very serviceable as a palliative, calculated to allay irritation, thus avoiding inflammation. My brethren in the ministry to whom I have recommended them seem to have derived more or less benefit."

Quart Bottles.

ONLY FIFTY CENTS.

DENSLOW'S

Fluid Extract of

SARSAPARILLA,

A perfectly Reliable and Scientific Compound entitled to the UTMOST CONFIDENCE.

This Article, having been in preparation nearly a year, is now ready for Introduction. The proprietor desires to establish Agencies in every town of any size, and has organized a new and effective mode of introducing it to public attention, which will be detailed, together with the terms of Agency, to Dealers upon application by letter. One Agent in a town only will be appointed.

Address

Denslow's Sarsaparilla Depot,
159 Water Street, New York.

Harnden's Express.

—DAILY—

Forwards Valuables and Merchandise to and from, and collects drafts, bills, &c., in all parts of the

EAST, WEST AND SOUTH.

Will receive goods, or orders to "call," at

74 Broadway.

1823. T. H. Chambers' 1860.

PIANOS, Established in 1823. Formerly Dubois & Stodart, and Dubois, Bacon & Chambers. Ber-lin-House, corner of 8th St. and 4th Avenue, opposite the Peter Cooper Institute, New York.

Improved Over-strung, Iron-frame Pianos,
Steamboat Pianos from $75 to $75.
Pianos hired. Allowance on hire if purchased.

CARD.

A. & G. A. ARNOUX, so long and reputably known as Fashionable Tailors, beg to announce to the public that they have added a department for Boys' Clothing to their establishment, to which all the finest and newest styles of goods will be kept. This will enable our customers to obtain all the goods they may be in need of for themselves all made part of their families at our house.

Of our Man's Furnishing Department it is unnecessary for us to say any thing, as it already has the name of having the best goods, and best styles of goods, to be found in the city.

551 Broadway, under St. Nicholas.

Mr. McCune, formerly of Genin's Bazaar, will be happy to see his friends at his new location, to which not only he, but Mr. Judice, the Superintendent there of the Boys' work have removed.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 FAMILY MACHINE, $90.
HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

Spalding's Prepared Glue.

For mending Toys, Crockery, &c. Manufactured by HENRY C. SPALDING & CO.,
No. 48 Cedar Street, N. Y.

THE ORANGE BLOSSOM WEDDING ENVELOPE, just issued, very beautiful copyright secured, at LUDDEN'S Wedding Card Depot, No. 302 Broadway, cor. Duane Street. Also, French Paper.

What Everybody Wants.

Everybody's Lawyer

AND

Counsellor in Business.

BY FRANK CROSBY,
OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR.

IT TELLS YOU How to draw up Partnership Papers and give general forms for Agreements of all kinds, Bills of Sale, Leases and Petitions.

IT TELLS YOU How to draw up Bonds and Mortgages, Affidavits, Powers of Attorney, Notes and Bills of Exchange, Receipts and Releases.

IT TELLS YOU The Laws for the Collection of Debts, with the Statutes of Limitation, and Interest and Law of property Exempt from Execution in every State.

IT TELLS YOU How to make an Assignment properly, with forms for Composition with Creditors, and the Insolvent Laws of every State.

IT TELLS YOU The legal relations existing between Guardian and Ward, Master and Apprentice, and Landlord and Tenant.

IT TELLS YOU What constitutes Libel and Slander, and the Law of Marriage, Divorce, the Wife's Right in Property, Divorces and Alimony.

IT TELLS YOU The Law for Mechanics' Liens in every State, and the Naturalization Laws of this country, and how to comply with the same.

IT TELLS YOU The Law Concerning Pensions and how to obtain one, and the Patent Laws to Public Lands.

IT TELLS YOU The Law of Patents, with rule of procedure in obtaining one, with Specifications, Assignments and Table of Fees.

IT TELLS YOU How to make your Will, and how to Administer on an Estate, with the law and the requirements thereof in every State.

IT TELLS YOU The meaning of Law Terms in general use, and explains to you the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Powers of both the General and State Governments.

IT TELLS YOU How to keep out of Law, by showing how to do your business right and thus saving a vast amount of property, and needless litigation, and timely consultation.

Single copies will be sent by mail, postage paid, to EVERY FARMER, EVERY MECHANIC, EVERY MAN OF BUSINESS, and EVERY LYCEUM in the State, on receipt of $1 00, or in law style of binding at $1 25.

$1000 A YEAR

can be made by engaging in the sale of the following new and valuable works, which are universally admired. For single copies of the Book, or for terms to agents, with other information, apply to or address

JOHN E. POTTER, Publisher,
No. 617 Sansom Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY BIBLE.

Extract of a Letter from an Agent in Indiana.

"Satisfied I am that no works hitherto published so readily commend subscribers as your splendidly illustrated publications. Send me a further supply by return by the Adams Express—400 Cassell's Illustrated Bible, and 300 Part I. of your Natural History."

No works are like them in Cincinnati or Canada, send 3 cents for terms.

The whole Press of America pronounces CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY BIBLE as the cheapest and most magnificent work of the kind ever published in this or any other country.

PART I. to III. forwarded free by mail on receipt of 45 cents. CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,
No. 37 Park Row, New York.

LE BON TON

is the best LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen copies, with two patterns, will be sent for 25 cents.
S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 407 Broadway, N. Y.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Collender, 63 to 69 Crosby Street.

5000 AGENTS WANTED—To sell a new inventions. Agents have made over $75,000 on one,—better than all other similar agencies. Send four stamps and get 32 page particulars, gratis.
EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

Wilder's Patent Salamander Safe.
B. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

Important Invention for married people. For particulars address, inclosing stamp, Dr. H. HERSFIELD, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 438 Broadway, N. Y.

To Wholesale Dealers in Jewelry.
The undersigned begs to say that, owing to his unsurpassed facilities, he is able to offer to the Trade Jewelry of any description on better terms than any other house in New York.
All orders will receive the most careful and prompt attention.
W. A. HAYWARD,
201 Broadway.

Life and Services
of
STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS.
By J. W. Sheahan,
Editor of the Chicago Times.

FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES.

With Portrait. One Vol., 300 pages, 12mo, $1 00.
WILL BE SHORTLY ISSUED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square.

Early orders solicited.

J. J. ADAMS & CO.'S
Brushes.
New York, 105 and 108 Fulton Street.
Boston, 69 Washington Street.
A full assortment of all kinds of Brushes, in both Cities, as above.

Watches Given Away!!

A GIFT valued from two dollars to one hundred dollars given with every Book sold at retail prices.

At least one Watch is guaranteed to every twelve Books!

These inducements are offered by the

Suffolk Exchange Co.,

116 Washington Street, Boston.

The most extensive and the most liberal Gift concern in existence. Send for a Catalogue. Those who have purchased other Gift Houses are particularly requested to acquaint themselves with our terms. Our inducements are unrivalled, and all others in the shade.

The following are some of the Gifts to purchasers of books.

English Lever Gold Watches, hunting cases.
Patent Lever " " open face.
Detached Lever Silver Watches, hunting cases.
Lepine Silver Watches, open face.
Gold Lockets, various sizes.
Ladies' and Gents' Gold Chains, various styles.
Ladies' and Gents' Gold Sleeve Buttons and Studs, all patterns.
Gents' Breast Pins, new and rich styles.
Gold Pencils and Pens.
Ladies' and Gents' Gold Rings.
Gold Watch Keys and Bell Keys.
A great variety of Ladies' Jewelry, Pins and Ear drops, comprising all the styles now worn, such as Cameo, Mosaic, Gold Stone, Lava, Florentine, Coral.
Gold Bracelets, all styles.

The List of Books comprises a great assortment of standard works in every department of literature, interesting to the young and old. Do not fail to send for a catalogue. Catalogues mailed free to any address. Apply to

SUFFOLK EXCHANGE COMPANY,
116 Washington Street, Boston.
C. W. ALDRICH, Secretary.

(From the Republican Farmer, Bridgeport, Ct.)

"That Dr. Halsted's skill is peculiar and seldom equalled cannot be doubted." See Circular sent gratis. Address Round Hill Water Cure, Northampton, Mass.

NOW READY.

A New Edition of Sylvan Holt's Daughter.

By Holme Lee,

Author of "Kathie Brande," &c.

12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (or any volume in the United States under 2000 miles), on receipt of One Dollar.

LONDON and PARIS WORLD of FASHION.—Monthly—Price $1 a year.—Single copies 20 cents—arrives here about the Twelfth of each month. Best and most reliable for Fashions ever already worn. Contains four Colored Fashion Plates, and one plate Millinery, and a full and complete guide out ready for use.

WILLMER & ROGERS, 42 Nassau Street, N. Y.

LADIES and CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.—E. HARRIS'S ESTABLISHMENT, the oldest and best in the United States, has always an ample supply of LADIES and CHILDREN'S CLOTHING. The only establishment where Ladies and Merchants can at all times procure the newest and best styles. E. CHAMBERS has secured the best talent, both native and foreign, with a supply for each Summer of the newest Fashions.

Ladies and Merchants supplied at the lowest prices, wholesale and retail, by E. CHAMBERS, No. 503 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel.

GOOD BOOK AGENTS WANTED, to Sell exclusively by Subscription,

Young's American Statesman,

A Complete

Political History of the United States,

From the Formation of our Government

TO THE PRESENT TIME.

One large Octavo, 1056 pages; price, $3 50. Recommended by Statesmen, Politicians, and Editors, of every party as impartial and invaluable.

This being the "Presidential year," the work will be in great demand. Agents wanted in all the States except Ohio, Massachusetts and Oregon, which States are already engaged.

For further particulars, address

DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers, N. Y.

RHEUMATISM, GOUT, AND NEURALGIA.—The Anti-Rheumatic Belt is a positive remedy. Thousands have tested its merits. Have never known it to fail. Sent by mail, with directions, for $3. Wholesale and Retail by L. G. ARNOTT, 509 Broadway, N. Y.

LADIES desiring UNDER-LINEN READY MADE will find at the Store 907 Broadway, near 20th St. elevated exclusively to Hosiery, an assortment, especially for "EVERY-DAY WEAR," of entirely novel and trustworthy make.

NEW MUSIC BOOK for SCHOOLS.

THE GRAMMAR SCHOOL VOCALIST. A new Collection of Favorite Choruses, Glees, Duets, and Part Songs, Progressively Arranged for Young Voices, and Arranged with an Accompaniment for the Pianoforte, expressly for Schools, by Geo. H. Curtis and F. H. Nash. Price 75 cents. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

READ AND SEND ON.

I want the address of 100 persons immediately. You can make over $5 00 per week. Application addressing A. D. HITZ, Box 118, Williamsburg, N. Y.

GREAT CURIOSITY. Particulars sent free. Agents wanted. SHAW & CRANE, Biddeford, Me.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOTH SEXES.—U.S. Married or Single, in health or disease.—MEDICAL ADVISER AND MARRIAGE GUIDE, 300 edition, over 400 pages, 12mo. cloth, and above 100 fine Antique Engravings. Price $1. Sent by return mail. Lewd and Lovelel Pictures and Surgeon, now of New York City. This interesting book should be in the hands of every adult person, as it imparts knowledge all have sought for in vain in any other. Sold by H. G. LAWRENCE, No. 1 Very Street. Astor House.

The Greatest Medical Discovery of THE AGE.

Dr. Kennedy, of Roxbury, Mass., has discovered a common pasture weed that cures every kind of HUMOR from the worst SCROFULA down to a common pimple.

By strict attention to the direction in the pamphlet around each bottle, and a judicious application of the Salt Rheum Ointment, Healing Ointment, and Scrofula Ointment, CHRONIC and CORRUPT ULCERS are cured in a few weeks.

For sale by every Druggist in the United States.

FOREIGN NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS.—Subscriptions received for all the leading Newspapers and Periodicals, English, Scotch, Irish, French, &c. Particular attention to arrival of Steamers, or sent by mail to all parts of the U. S. Priced lists of Our Discounts of different publications now ready.

WILLMER & ROGERS, 43 Nassau Street, N. Y.

FOWLER AND WELLS'S

American and Foreign Patent Agency,

308 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

All kinds of business pertaining to the Patent Office done in the most prompt and satisfactory manner on reasonable terms.

A GREAT GOSPEL PICTURE.—THE CHEAPEST ENGRAVING EVER PUBLISHED.—DAY-TO-DAY, Subscription Engraving. Thorwaldsen's BACCHUS STATUETTES in the Cathedral of Copenhagen, representing LIFE AND HIS ATTENDANTS, 22 inches in length and 34 inches in width.

From Rev. Dr. Prime, Editor of New York Observer.

THORWALDSEN'S STATUARY. — One of the pictures hangs in our study, and we regard it among its eminents by suitable for the wants of every Christian household.

The religious Press of the country speaks in unqualified terms of the work, and recommends its introduction into every family in the land. The publication price sold at $35 each; but with the view of affording every family an opportunity to possess this "instructive picture," the proprietors afford it, and an elegant Bible bound in velvet, for $25, the 25 cents to cover the return postage. $1 12 will secure a letter of Agency with one copy of the Engraving. $4 50 will secure six prospectuses, postage free, to one address. Address

DAYTON & CO., 37 Park Row.

ARTHUR'S

GREAT AND BEST TEMPERANCE BOOK.

The Tavern Keeper's Victims.

A SERIES OF TEMPERANCE TALES.

By T. S. ARTHUR.

1 vol. 12mo, with Ten Electrotype Illustrations—bound in embossed cloth, gilt backs.

Retail Price, $1 00 Per Dollar.

This work is undoubtedly one of Mr. Arthur's best productions, and is destined to exceed many in popularity and usefulness.

Agents are wanted everywhere to engage in its sale.

Price One Dollar.

Copies sent to any address on receipt of price.

LEARY, GETZ & CO., Publishers,
Philadelphia.

Quern's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly

The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, is taken without nausea.

ALSO,

Quern's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil.—The greasy sensation of the oil is obviated, and it does not cause any constipation after use. It is the best purge for children. To be had at the Inventor's Depot, No. 119 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 30 John Street.

Barney's Opera Perfume.

DEDICATED TO MADE. ADELINA PATTI.

A new and elegant PERFUME, exhaling the most delightful and exquisite odour; we defy competition as the beautiful photographic Likeness which adorns each bottle. Wholesale by L. NOSTRAND, 181 Fulton Street. Retailed by all Druggists and Fancy Good Dealers.

PURE WATER.

United States Carbon Filter Company.

CARBON FILTERS of all the newest descriptions, adapted to the Hydrant in Dwelling Houses, Factories, &c. Also, a great variety of Portable Self-Acting Filters, for Sportsmen, Travellers, Druggists, &c., &c.

186 Broadway, N. Y.

LABOR-SAVING ARTICLE.

F. A. Cannon's Patent Smoothing and Polishing Iron.

Having a Rubber Face, by which, A few Satin finish is produced on all Linens, with half the Labor and half the time.

For sale by the Trade.

W. A. CORBERIE, Agent, 378 Broadway.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of

1500 Pages and
1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be published EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to each of whom a special District will be given. Only Experienced Canvassers need make application. Address the Country they would prefer. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Winant's Excelsior Billiard Tables.

Manufactory 71 Gold Street, N. Y.

PIANOS AND MELODEONS. — Hallet & Cumston's Patent Grand and Square Pianos, full iron frame and all modern improvements. Fully guaranteed. Don't forget the place. S. H. & H. W. Smith's Melodeons, of every style, for Parlor, Church, or School use. New and Second Hand Pianos and Melodeons. A. M. RANOUSE, 425 Broadway.

Attractive NEW BOOKS.

WOMAN (La Femme). By Michelet.....$1 00
LOVE (L'Amour). By Michelet.....1 00
THE HABITS OF GOOD SOCIETY.....1 25
THE GREAT TREMENDOUS. 2 vols.....2 00

Sold by all booksellers, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by EWER & CARLETON, Publishers, 130 Grand Street, New York.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR
GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.
PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWER,
Wholesale Druggists,
125 Beekman Street, New York.

"HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET PAID FOR IT."—AGENTS.—Young men—and women also—Teachers, Preachers, and others, who may wish to engage in a kind of business agency for our Books, Journals, etc., may here fill particulars by return mail, by addressing the publishers as follows: FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

Wheeler & Wilson's
SEWING MACHINE.
WHO WRITES FOR IT?

Send for a Circular and see!

Office, 335 Broadway, New York.

CHASE, NICHOLS & HILL,
Publishers,
Booksellers and Stationers,
No. 43 WASHINGTON STREET,
Between Cornhill and Court Street,
LEUTES A. CHASE, } BOSTON.
ARTHUR N. NICHOLS, }
WILLIAM H. HILL, Jr. }

A New Edition of

ADAM BEDE. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Scenes of Clerical Life." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square.

CHILTON ON THE CHOTON, OR RIVER WATER.

The Diaphragm Filter, manufactured by MCKENZIE O'HARA, is the only self-person Filter to which I attach my recent report to the Croton Board. I consider the artificial sandstone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is simple in construction and only requires to be reversed occasionally to insure its action.

JAMES CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.

Manufactured and sold by MCKENZIE & O'HARA, 504 4th Street, Corner of Lexington Avenue.

☞ LONDON CLUB SAUCE.—This Sauce, celebrated throughout Europe, and warmly recommended by the celebrated French chemist, Soyer, possesses an unrivaled richness and delicacy of taste, imparting a relish unsurpassed by all other sauces to ready made dishes. In these in most agreeable; and no one accustomed to it will ever be able to sit at a table loaded with the richest viands without it. It is superior to the Worcestershire, and is sold at half the price of that.

It is an excellent promoter of digestion, and is recommended by the faculty to those afflicted with dyspepsia, etc.

The "London Club Sauce" is prepared by PARKER BROS., LONDON, and sold by A. J. PARKER, No. 25 Beekman Street, sole Agent for the United States.

None genuine that is without the fac simile of "PARKER BROS., LONDON," pasted over the neck and cork of every bottle.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA

Is peculiarly beneficial for purifying the blood, expelling obstructions, stimulating sluggish secretions humors, pimples, and all disfiguring eruptions upon the surface of the skin.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

AN ENTIRE NEW STYLE,

Designed for all manufacturing purposes.

Noiseless in its operation, very rapid, and capable of every kind of work, it is the best machine ever produced.

Price only $110.

I. M. SINGER & CO,
No. 458 Broadway.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES won't grow upon your face, use my eugenol cestablished 1845. Will force them to grow in weeks from the first application, and without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1 per bottle; by mail, post free, to any address. G. GRAHAM, 169 Nassau Street, New York.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

In Guano, This Guano from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale and retail, in lots of not less than one ton, by the Proprietors. For particulars address C. S. MARSHALL, Prest. American Guano Co., 76 William Street, New York.

WOMAN'S A, B, C OF HEALTH.

ZARTALISMA A, B & C,
ARE INFALLIBLE REMEDIES FOR ALL FUNCTIONAL DERANGEMENTS
INCIDENTAL TO
THE FEMALE SEX.

Price $1 per one, or 6 cases for $5, of any assortment.

☞ For sale wherever it is not supported by a pamphlet, which contains valuable advice for females of all ages. The pamphlet sent, free of charge, to any part of the world by the proprietor.

DR. H. A. RANROW, No. 194 Bleecker Street (4 doors below McDougal Street), where he can be confidentially consulted from 11 to 2 and from 4 to 8 daily.

TWO WORKS, VALUABLE TO THE SICK.—1st. Dr. HALL, sent by mail, no pay expected until received, read and approved. Address, Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

1st. Six lectures on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung Threat, and Skin diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to 100 years. 300 pages, 70 engravings. Price fifty cents, in silver or Post-office stamps.

2d. A work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Fits, and Dyspepsia; why we prematurely and what causes disease. 144 pages, 6 engravings. Price 25 cents. For which both will be sent, giving name, State, county, town, and postoffice.

Eclectic Embellishments!!

Emperor Alexander of Russia.

and

Peter the Great of Russia.

Imperial Portraits of these personages embellish the March number of "THE ECLECTIC," which is published. A rich Table of Contents will be found in the number.

Queen Victoria and the

Duke of Wellington.

Splendid portraits of these personages embellish the February number. A splendid Print of the EMPRESS EUGENIE, and the Ladies of her Court, and a beautiful print of the Royal Family of England, embellish the January number.

LORD MACAULAY

and

PROFESSOR LONGFELLOW.

Portraits of these personages embellish the April No.

From the N. Y. Tribune, Jan. 11th, 1860.

"The assiduous editor of this valuable periodical has gained a just perception of the tastes of the American public, and is eminently successful in adapting his monthly numbers to their intellectual wants. The work is especially valuable to professional men and cultivated persons, who have seldom time nor money to devote to the promiscuous reading of Reviews and Magazines, but who wish, with little trouble, to keep themselves informed on the current condition of English literature. Each number here is composed by one or more engravings of historical value.

TERMS:

The Eclectic is issued on the first of every month. Each number contains 144 imperial octavo pages, on fine paper, neatly stitched, in green covers, with one or more beautiful Steel Engravings by Sartain. The twelve numbers comprise three volumes of 669 pages each, with titles, indexes, and embellishments. Price, $3 per annum. The postage is only three cents a number, prepaid at the office of delivery.

W. H. HIDDEMAN,
No. 5 Beekman Street, New York.

Important Change! Interesting!

THAT REMEDY—the only one that ever yet cured CATARRH and its injurious sequelæ—Ozena, Deafness, &c., thereby averted Consumption, is again placed upon sale at 673 Broadway, N. Y., and 263 Fulton St., Brooklyn. Directions given for using.

I have also agents, if it at wholesale, to any part of the country, except the New England States and lower British Provinces, which will be supplied from my agency —and the city of N. York, where it will only be retailed by me.

In celebrity for performing what it promises—a radical cure—it stands, that a single word of commendation would be superfluous.

Price, at wholesale $96, a Gross—$8, dozen. As it is not sold on Commission, payment must accompany all Orders.

C. BOSWELL, M.D.

Gout and Rheumatism,

Neuralgia, &c.

Blair's Remedy, from 229 Strand, London.

Used in England over thirty years, and has been long a well known and highly esteemed remedy. Certain, safe, and speedy remedy, worthy the confidence of all sufferers. Sold by THOMAS BLAIR, 229 Strand, 34 Cornhill, Boston, Importers and Agents. Forwarded by mail on receipt of $1 cents.

Throat and Lung Diseases.

Of all remedies for Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Influenza, Croup, Whooping Cough, Asthma, Difficult Breathing, Pleurisy, Pain in the Side, or Inflammation of the Throat, Chest, or Lungs, Incipient Consumption, &c., there is no one which, for safety and efficacy, or which affords such rapid and permanent relief, as the well-known and long-established

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

The only genuine is prepared by SETH W. FOWLE & CO., BOSTON, and is sold everywhere.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 50 to 80 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) $2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER,

ADAPTED TO THE HOME AND FIRESIDE

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year.....$1 00
One Copy for One Year.....2 00
One Copy for Two Years.....4 00
Five Copies for One Year.....9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year.....20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year.....40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $4 00.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

SCENE IN UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK, ON A MARCH DAY.

POLICEMAN. "Lost anything, Sir?"
EXASPERATED OLD PARTY. "Don't you see that I've lost my hat?"
POLICEMAN. "Describe it."

Ye mightie LIVE OAK GIANT indulgeth in a little legislative Broil with ye assistance of ye verie table gridiron.

Great Success.

I have already sold 18,000 of the 100,000 copies of the Engraving of PEALE'S COURT OF DEATH. A new transfer of the plates has just been made, and the perfection of the impressions realized. It is universally admitted to be the cheapest Engraving ever issued in this country. "A most charming Picture."—Christian Advocate and Journal.

"No printed description can come up to the requirements of the imagination in its study."—N. Y. Observer.

PRICE.—One copy, $1 and four letter-stamps; six copies for $5, without stamps. Send $5 and thus obtain one copy free. Your friends will thank you for the others at $1. Special terms for those desiring Agencies. Some of the Agents are now making from $6 to $8 per day in the business. Reference—HARPER & BROTHERS.

Write the name, town, and State plainly.

Address G. Q. COLTON,

Post-Office Box No. 3,991. No. 37 PARK ROW, New York City.

The beautiful colored Engravings of ROSA BONHEUR'S celebrated Painting of the "HORSE FAIR," will be furnished at $1 50 each, post-paid, being at the lowest price of the publishers, and to Agents at the same per cent. discount as the Court of Death.

COURT OF DEATH.

For One Dollar and 4 postage stamps, the subscriber will forward (post-paid) one engraving of this sublime painting. Address G. Q. COLTON, 37 PARK ROW, New York. P. O. Box 3891.

Ten Thousand Dozen Sold.

The Great Success of the Day.

THE SHILLING HAIR TONIC.

Retail Price 12 Cents only.

Features.

WELL PERFUMED.
LARGE BOTTLES.
BEST INGREDIENTS USED.
FIRST CLASS STYLE.

Undoubtedly destined to take the place of all other preparations for the Hair—being unapproached in cheapness and excellence.

Sold by 5000 Druggists everywhere.

Wholesale Depot,

159 Water Street,
New York.

Here's Health for the Million!!
Dr. Clarke's Vegetable Sherry Wine BITTERS!
Palatable and Healthy!
COMPOUND OF ROOTS AND HERBS.

For Mechanics, Farmers, Clergymen, and Public Men in General. No medicine can be better adapted for their purpose.

TRY THEM!

All ye lovers of good Bitters and good health, and you will find them a sharp, effectual, and pleasant remedy. 5,000,000 bottles sold last year.

Prepared by DR. E. R. CLARKE, Sharon, Mass. Sold by all Druggists.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

SWITZERLAND.

By S. IRENÆUS Prime, D.D.,
Author of "Europe and the East," "Power of Prayer," "Bible in the Levant," &c., &c.

Illustrated with six choice views of Swiss scenery.

1 vol. 12mo.....Price $1

Illustrations:
INTERLAKEN AND THE JUNGFRAU.
THE MONUMENT AT LUCERNE.
THE DEVIL'S BRIDGE.
HOSPICE OF ST. BERNARD.
CHAMONI AND MT. BLANC.
UNDER THE GIESBACH FALLS.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

"As we have enjoyed his 'Pictures in the East;' his musings among the sacred scenes of the Holy Land; his visits to ruined temples and cities; and his sail along the Nile; we have been prepared to join him now among the Alps, and glaciers of Switzerland; as he climbs the Jungfrau Alp, pausing to listen to the shepherd's horn, or to the distant war of the Steinbach, or the falling of the avalanche from the Jungfrau; as he picks his way among the glaciers, alpenstock in hand, or descends into the valleys of Grindelwald and Meyringen."

From the Boston Post.

"Dr. Prime never knew how to write a dull sentence, and prompted by such natural beauty as abounds in the path of the Swiss tourist, he has here presented an account of his journeyings worthy of himself and his theme."

SHELDON & COMPANY,
Publishers,
No. 115 Nassau Street, N.Y.

☞ Sent by mail pre-paid for one dollar.

Something New.

Stuttering and Stammering.—The cause and cure by Dr. J. H. DIELLY. Office No. 680 Broadway. No charge until perfect satisfaction is given. Hours 10 to 5.

SENT BY EXPRESS EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices.

Made to Measure at $18 per doz. or Six for $9.

MADE OF NEW-YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2,50 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $3 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I cannot make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts.

9 yards of New-York Mills muslin at 14½c. per yd.	$1 35
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard	3 50
Making and cutting	6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c.	1 50
Profit	2 65
Total	$18 00

Self Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

The Express charges on one dozen Shirts from New-York to New Orleans is about $1.

WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between White & Walker Streets, NEW-YORK.

Please copy my address as other houses in the city are selling inferior made shirts at my prices.

BROWN'S LAXATIVE TROCHES

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.
A mild, efficacious and palatable remedy

FOR CONSTIPATION OF THE BOWELS, HABITUAL COSTIVENESS, BILIOUS AND NERVOUS SICK HEADACHE.

Brown's Laxative Troches,
FOR VARIOUS FORMS OF DYSPEPSIA, INDIGESTION, HEARTBURN, DISTRESS OF FOOD AFTER EATING.

Brown's Laxative Troches,
FOR PILES, FLATULENCY, INACTIVITY OF THE LIVER, BILIOUS AFFECTIONS.

For many unpleasant symptoms caused by irregularity and neglect of nature.
For all purposes of a FAMILY MEDICINE.
For any slight Disorder of the Stomach.
For Children they are admirably adapted, being simple and safe.

They do not irritate or weaken, or cause pain in the stomach, like most pills and cathartic liquids, but assist nature by strengthening the process of digestion.

Sold by all Druggists at 25 cents per box.

Perry's Japanese Boot and Shoe Polish.
Splendid gloss. No rubbing. Soils nothing. Sold everywhere.
JAPANESE POLISH CO.,
No. 417 Broome Street, one door east of Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

EDWARD G. KELLEY, No. 116 John Street, N. Y., PRACTICAL CHEMIST, Professor of Chemistry, Geology, Mineralogy, Importer and Manufacturer of all kinds of Chemical and Philosophical apparatus, and pure Chemicals. Colleges and High Schools furnished. Catalogues furnished free.

$100 PER MONTH made by any one with $10 Stencil Tools. Address JOHN MILLIKEN, Lawrence, Mass.

LOUISVILLE ARTESIAN WATER.
This NATURAL MINERAL WATER, now very extensively used, is for sale by all Druggists.
S. T. THOMPSON, Agent,
No. 653 Broadway.

THE EMPIRE RANGE, (FOR COAL OR WOOD.)
TEN GOOD REASONS FOR BUYING IT!

1st. You can Roast Meat and Poultry before an open fire, instead of baking it in the oven.
2d. You can Broil Steak, Ham, &c., instead of frying them.
3d. You can Bake Bread, Biscuit, &c., in both ovens, and have them done brown.
4th. You can Boil in eight different vessels all at the same time.
5th. You can Toast Bread without burning your face and hands.
6th. You can have as much Hot Water as you want.
7th. You can disconnect the Water Back without the aid of a plumber.
8th. You can use it as a common Stove without setting in masonry.
9th. It has very Large Ovens and a Small Fire-box.
10th. It has very thick plates and seldom needs repairing.

EMPIRE HEATER WORKS,
M. P. LOW, Proprietor, 450 Broadway, New York,
(After May 1st at 412 Broadway.)

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IV.—No. 172.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

To Advertisers.

The Cheapest and Best Advertising Medium in the Country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

A Magnificently Illustrated Paper,

Circulating in every Section of the Union,

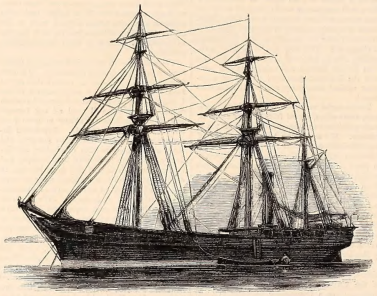
Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.



5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

THE STEAMER "MARQUIS DE LA HABANA."—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY J. H. CLARK, ESQ., OF NEW ORLEANS.]

THE CAPTURED MEXICAN STEAMERS.

WE give herewith pictures of the captured Mexican steamers Miramon and Marquis de la Habana. The former is represented as she lies off Algiers, Louisiana, from a sketch kindly furnished by Mr. W. Graham, of New Orleans; the latter, which only came up the river a week afterward, was, like her consort, kindly photographed for us by J. H. Clark, of New Orleans. The vessel lying beyond the Miramon, in the large picture, is the United States sloop Preble, and further in the distance is a revenue cutter. The following description of the Miramon is from the New Orleans papers:

"She was Commodore Marin's flag-ship, and consequently fitted up with more of an eye to comfort and elegance than her consort, the Marquis de la Habana. Her cabin, in particular, is very neatly and tastefully arranged.

"Outside the Miramon's cabin, however, things look very different. The gun-deck, upper works, rigging, and all, give evidence of the hot engagement she has been in. The marks of cannon-balls, Minié balls, muset bulk, and shell explosions, are every where to be seen. Among the most noticeable is the mark of a cannon-ball on a large mahogany dining-place in the centre of the room. It is particularly curious in this, that the iron has the appearance of being melted rather than indented. The smoke stack also, curious enough, has a clean cannon-shot through it. The wheel and wheel-house, compass, ventilator, etc., are completely smashed up, while the sides of the steamer are riddled in every direction, and the rigging very badly cut up.

THE CAPTURED MEXICAN STEAMER "MIRAMON," WITH THE U. S. SLOOP "PREBLE," LYING OFF ALGIERS, LA.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY J. H. CLARK, ESQ., OF NEW ORLEANS, AND A SKETCH BY W. GRAHAM, ESQ.]

"The Miramon received three broadsides from the Saratoga, besides an innumerable number of rifle-shots from the Indianola during the engagement, and it is surprising that there was not more life, in any case great, was given greater. Every thing bears witness to the bravery and determined resistance of her commander. He lived at, however, very little to enjoy his ocean fortune. Retiring at once to his cabin, he divested himself of every portion of his uniform except a richly tassoled cocked-hat, sword, and attired himself in a pair but elegant suit of black, which he wore ever after.

"The Miramon, like the Habana, has not yet broken cargo. Her magnificent, indeed, is sealed up precisely as it was when it left the Havana, and lies by to the wharf still hangs where it was found in the cabin. Nor has the purchasing agent of Juarez, as far as I can ascertain, been unrolled. It is certain, however, that the steamer has a large quantity of powder on board, and probably shot, shell, and other munitions of war in abundance.

"Also were found in the Miramon's cabin a list of her officers, her flag, pass-book, etc., containing a complete record from the date of her departure from Havana to the hour of her capture, signed in each case by the officer of the day; also, a large quantity of hat bands bearing the name of General Miramon.

"The Habana, which is a handsome modeled steamer of about 600 tons burden. She was built at Greenock, Scotland, as indicated by her figures, and is probably five or six years old. Her history before she came into the possession of the Cuban Government in a mail boat is not known. Nor indeed is any thing positively known of her recent transfer to the agent of Miramon's Government. We have heard in a rumor that her purchase money was somewhere between $50,000 and $60,000, and that it was transmitted to Havana through the French Consulate at Vera Cruz."

The New Orleans Delta, in speaking of the Marcos de Habana, captured in Vera Cruz, says: "There was found on the single mark of the blockade of the Saratoga noticeable on the Marques—a thirty-two pound ball had entered her bulwarks about midships, in the starboard quarter, passed through the larboard side, making a round, clear hole, as if it had been cut with a circular saw. In its passage this ball carried off both legs of an unfortunate American, who, in an evil hour, doubtless under the pressure of some desperate stress of fortune, had enlisted in Miramon's enterprise. It is remarkable that he was the only person on the Marques who was killed, and he was the only American in her crew. The name of this unfortunate man was not known to any on board."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1860.

ARRAIGNING THE PRESIDENT.

THE recent protest of the President of the United States against Mr. Covode's Investigating Committee has been thoroughly discussed by the journals throughout the country. Not a few among the number censure Mr. Buchanan, directly or indirectly, for the reiterated allusions to his age and services. But, with a few exceptions, all seem to admit that the want of common respect shown him by the House of Representatives in appointing a Committee to inquire whether or no he had been guilty of corruption justified an emphatic protest.

It is not worth while to inquire whether Mr. Buchanan's especial remarks upon his public career and his advanced years are strictly in accordance with good taste. 'Tis a trifling matter at best, and if the President's political rivals have a spirit of complaint but this his record will stand well in history. His career is one of which he may well be proud, and his approaching retirement from public life imposes an authority to his counsels on which he may well be pardoned for dwelling with some emphasis.

The true point to which good men should direct their attention is simply this: is it right, is it decent, is it in good taste that the Executive of the nation should be arraigned before a Committee of the House of Representatives in a charge of corruption, and that calumnies, coined by disappointed politicians, should be published to the world in the form of a public document, and at the national expense?

The charge in this case is, in plain words, that the political patronage of the Government has been distributed among its supporters, and to not among its opponents. That charge is well founded and true. Ever since the time of Jackson it has always been so. That the system is wrong in principle, and that it would be a great thing for the country to alter it altogether, we freely admit. But it was established twenty years before Mr. Buchanan was inaugurated, and he has but carried it out after the example of his predecessors. He has displaced and appointed postmasters, collectors of customs, United States marshals, and other Government officials in accordance with the well understood principles which have ruled the Government for nearly a quarter of a century, which principles may be briefly summed up in the axiom that, where a friend and an enemy are competitors for an office or a contract, the preference, all other things being equal, should be given to the friend. We repeat that we do not like the system. It would be far better for the Government to chose its servants on the ground of fitness alone, regardless of their political services or their party claims. But the present method has long been in use for over twenty years, and having been rigorously carried out by seven Presidents before Mr. Buchanan, it is monstrous to impute it to him as a crime that he followed their example.

Independently of this, however, there is an impropriety in the investigation which is now being conducted by Mr. Covode and his friends which can not fail to strike every person with ordinary notions of decency. If we are a civilized nation, we owe some sort of respect to the man we have raised to the office—Chief Magistrate. Insults leveled against him are outrages upon the whole people. Until he commits offenses which justify his impeachment in the manner provided by the Constitution, he is entitled to some respect, to some immunity from the coarse vituperation and brutal calumnies which are the fit food for demagogues alone. What weight can we expect his remonstrances and his representations to carry with foreign powers, if we set the example of showing him up as a corrupt and venal man—a corruptionist? What will the foreign world think of us, if the man whom we have chosen as our Chief Magistrate is arraigned instead of charged, and constructively tried for the offense by a Committee of Congress? Will they not be justified in regarding him as a type of the nation? What is most forcibly illustrated by aristocracy's hate over the indecent spectacle? What an argument against democracy and popular Government!

There ought surely to be something, some man, some office, sacred from the low abuse of party politicians and the assaults of vulgar placehunters. We are in the habit of boasting of our superiority to the poor half-breed races of the Southern part of the Continent, and adducing, in proof of it, our patient submission to the verdict of the majority, and our disposition to be to the minority. But if that submission be simply entered by our abstaining from barricades and civil war, we are not sure that prevent us from doing our best to bring that majority's verdict into contempt, and to degrade the chosen head of the nation by low devices and vulgar tricks, the basis on which our boasts rest is pretty slender.

Where is the Covode system to end? Next March, perhaps, a Republican may be President of the United States, and in 1863 or 1864 there may be a Democratic majority in Congress. Does any one suppose it would be difficult for the majority to get up scandalous tales about the distribution of the public patronage, and to make it appear that the President had tried to corrupt people? There are always disappointed seekers of offices and contracts who are ready to invent calumnies against the official who has disappointed them. If we inaugurate the principle of appointing Committees into the distribution of the Presidential patronage, it is quite certain that every President from this time forth will be proclaimed to the country and to the world as a knave and a rogue before his four years end. What will the country gain by that?

One of the natural evils of a democratic form of government is a tendency to degrade the highest magistrates of the State. In monarchies, the monarch and his principal advisers are generally so far removed from the people that an innate feeling of respect protects them from the virulence of party spite. In republics, the supreme authority is transient; the agent of the people is one of them, and per se no higher than his constituents. Hence citizens of a republic are disposed to take much greater liberties with their chief and their subjects of a supremacy with them. But the ease of good government requires that there should be some limit to this license. If the President is habitually treated by co-ordinate branches of the Government as a rascal who deserves punishment for disgraceful misdemeanors, it can hardly be expected that his administration will receive that aid and that support from without which it must be inefficient. Nor can it be hoped that foreign powers will pay to our Chief Magistrate a respect which is denied him by the most authoritative body in his own country. On the contrary, investigating committees like Mr. Covode's must inevitably tend to bring the national Executive into contempt abroad and at home, and to weaken the hands of Government for all useful purposes.

The Republican majority in Congress are not acting judiciously. They have passed through a rattle bill which no one ever expects to pass, and an appropriation scheme which is a mere political trick. They have passed a nondescriptable statute about polygamy in Utah. They have brought forward no practical measure to soothe the bitterness of the existing troubles, or to prevent the civil evils of the present crisis. Their insulting arraignment of the President is a fitting climax to their other errors.

By the time these lines are read Mr. John Hickman's report from the Judiciary Committee, justifying Mr. Covode's investigation, will probably be before the public. It is well understood that it will be a powerful partisan document. Such weapons are dangerous; to-morrow, perhaps, it will be the other party's or that will be gored.

COTTON AND BREADSTUFFS.

The cotton crop of 1859, up to the beginning of the present month, yielded 4,000,000 of bales; if the receipts hold out, on the ratio of former crops, the total yield will be fully 4,600,000 bales, over twenty per cent. more than the greatest crop previously made. We presume we are within the mark when we say that the amount of money received by the Southern country for this great staple will not be far short of two hundred and fifty millions of dollars—the quarter of which will come from abroad.

The wheat and corn crops of 1859 were good on the whole. In parts of Ohio and New York, in Northern Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota, the crops were short; but the rest of the country made up for the deficiency. We presume that we are within the mark when we say that 250,000,000 bushels of these staples were produced in 1859. Of this large amount, however, a very small proportion—probably not a quarter—has gone or will go abroad. The shipments of Indian meal for Europe since the harvest of 1859 have been merely nominal. We have fed our own people at moderate cost; we have supplied the West Indies and other adjacent countries which depend upon us for cereal food; but we have had no such surplus as justified shipments to other grain-growing countries.

These facts are of use as indicating the future tendencies of foreign commerce. We have frequently had occasion to remark that cereal food had ceased to be a staple export of the United States. Future experience will confirm the statement. It will need all our farmers and all our people's ability to grow food enough for our own people. Population increases so rapidly in this happy country, and there are so many articles of production and industry which can be raised here cheaper and better than abroad, that this must become, in ordinary years, the best market for our farmers. The steps which lead to the exports of manufactured articles is momentous. We are now shipping from this port alone over $200,000 a week of dry goods of our own manufacture to foreign countries. Add to this infinite amount of other manufactures, machinery, hardware, leatherware, etc., etc. By-and-by, when the West fills up, Illinois will become a great focus of manufacturing industry. When labor becomes cheap in that State, with the natural advantages it possesses, it will undersell Europe in all even New England in dry goods and hardware. Immigration is sluggish at present, owing to the excessive rush of immigrants three and four years ago, but the check is but temporary. Illinois will become a great focus of thoroughly aware of the facts, and who has no capital but his own hands, will stay at home if he can come here. In the course of a few years the tidal wave will again assume enormous proportions—the demand for food will again tax the utmost capacity of our farmers—and the surplus of labor will cause a vast development of industrial activity.

☞ THE "HORSE FAIR"—a print from Rosa Bonheur's celebrated picture, by Messrs. Sarony, Major, & Knapp, is one of the most beautiful specimens of lithographic color printing we have seen. It has been issued to subscribers, we believe, by Messrs. J. M. Emerson & Co., of this city.

THE LOUNGER.

JULLIEN.

STATE STREET is gone, and so are the summer evenings at Castle Garden. The places, indeed, remain. The same fountain and a carriage-way around the Battery, and the old, round, squat fort, upon the most conspicuous point of the city site—like a huge wen upon a man's nose—still remains. But the uses and associations which made the places poetic are gone forever. Yet, when the great city has exorcised and until it has covered all the island, and even pushed on and absorbed Yonkers, it will never be surprising that State Street was a myth and Castle Garden a delightful a resort. For there the bay will still be—the gleaming calms, the sparkling waves, the sails of ships going and coming to and from the whole world—the swelling heights of Staten Island—the lofty spires of Brooklyn—wind, sunshine, and moonlight—and the same sympathetic people, many a New Yorker, as yet unborn, will half regret the days he never knew, and the pleasures he will only hear in history.

But among the traditions or Castle Garden to which he will listen delighted, none will charm him more than two-and-a-half which aim that here Jenny Lind sang first and last in America, and that other which describes the great concerts of Jullien.

For they were great concerts, in every sense. The variety and combination of the whole orchestra, and the ability of the individual musicians, were unrivaled; and the musical discipline, the shading of time and tone in the performance, were masterly. Jullien may have been what is called a charlatan—but he gave us such Beethoven and Mendelssohn nights as we have never had—no, not even from the Philharmonic Society, whose name shall never be spoken by the Lounger without thanks and praise. The Director's charlatanism was superficial—his love of music and reverence for the masters was genuine and profound. And who was not glad to have Beethoven made the hero of a musical gala—to see him, as it were, arrayed in festal garments, the grave master, the most magnificent of the adorning of the princes and Mozart and Mendelssohn nights were a kind of apotheosis—a jubilee—a triumph. They were the popular recognition and homage of the composers. And when, after leading out the exquisite andante of the Fourth Symphony—say, to the exquisite end—the Conductor sank back in his gilded chair, his white-gloved hands hanging languidly upon the arms, the black ringlets hanging, a little matted, upon his forehead, and the half-impressive white waistcoat palpitating with exhaustion and emotion; and the lacs ends of the enormous cravat—that flattering lie in pastel—fluttering—he presented a visible image of the fatigue inevitably resulting from a proper rendering of so grand a musical work.

Yet the performance itself was as effortless as a breath. The extravagant figure (not unlike Mr. M'Lenan's) which satirically represented the Count Fosco, in the "Woman in White") that stood upon a pedestal apparently playing with a baton, seemed also to control every single instrument magnetically. Now he waved, now he smiled, now he raised a finger, now he stopped it; now, with both hands, he seemed to be lifting a nestful of music; and now, with dreaming, wandering eyes, he gazed abstractedly fanned far away upon some sweet suggestion of the theme—but in all, and through all, he was the centre, the fount, the joyous heart of the whole performance.

The music that is peculiarly associated with his name was full of tread, gay, skillful effects. In this kind it was the music that sounds on the outside of the houses in Italy. It is not very beautiful painting, but it is all smiling, and festive, and agreeable. It has no particular tenderness except to increase the pleasure of the passenger by patches of bright color. So with the Jullien music. It had no sadness, no pathos or aspiration, but it was a striking, unexpected, amusing combination of harmonious effects.

He was popular in his musical sympathy—and that is, perhaps, the rarest praise of a musician. The works of Mr. Fry and Mr. Bristow had the most advanced and illustrious of the orchestra. What he could do was done for the fame of American music.

—Where be thy white gloves now? Where thy cravat-ties? Cheery, jovial, genial Director, full of talent and love of applause, prompt to please and to be pleased, adieu shall be the word kindly remembered in lands far from thy native country, by hearts that owe thee so many and many an hour of enjoyment. Sickness forbade—amiability build a monument during life which names after death to commemorate the builder.

NORTHING.

DR. HAYES is resolved to sail the Polar Sea—if there be a Polar Sea. The other evening, at the Historical Society's rooms, he stated with great clearness and simplicity what his plan was. It is briefly this:

The Arctic Ocean has a mean diameter of about 2500 English miles. The lands about it form the southern and outer margin of a great continuous belt encircling the pole, which must be crossed to reach the sea. Dr. Kane was of opinion, and Dr. Hayes coincides, that the best route to this ice belt is through Smith's Strait, at the head of Baffin's Bay, because, although the belt is somewhat broader at this point, yet the polar current sets to the northward through the strait, and loosens the ice. Observations convince Dr. Hayes that on the eastern side of the strait he will find smooth ice. The first summer will bring him up to latitude 80°. There he will winter. In the early spring he will throw out advance parties, which will establish provision depots on the land. These parties will be followed by the main expedition carrying a boat mounted upon runners—when, if such fortune awaits us, we will launch our little vessel upon the unknown waters, and, sailing God speed, will push off directly for the pole."

DR. HAYES has no doubt of meeting the open water at about 82°.

He speaks of the difficulties in such a cool, sensible way; and indeed the frequent voyages of late years have rendered the whole matter of arctic travel so familiar to the public, that the enterprise presents itself almost entirely as a scientific voyage. To this we must add our own personal pride in being the first to reach the pole, and to complete the lines of arctic discovery. The funds for the expedition are nearly collected. They will be immediately circulated for the signatures of all who wish to subscribe. The necessary sum can not be very large, in justice to the memory of Kane, we hope that, before many months, the question will be decided, and we shall know whether the North Pole does actually float on an icebergs sea.

MACAULAY UPON JEFFERSON.

MACAULAY was a profound student of English history, a rhetorical and picturesque writer, a scholar of unusual erudition and retentive and available memory. In no sense was he a great man, but in many ways admirably accomplished. He was not a thinker nor an actor. He was not a scholar like Milton; nor a historian like Thucydides. Jeffrey once says that Macaulay "is good" is good to eat. That is to say, he takes the low, obvious, material view of all questions.

He had a good style, and we followed himself but in complete armor. At the dinner-table he made Sydney Smith jealous. In Parliament, the orators who could surpass him in mere speaking felt the masterly power of his preparation and method. In writing reviews, which were really monographs, he skimmed along the average popular sentiment, putting the thoughts of commonplace minds into neat and declamatory phrases that they looked new. But it was only the familiar old copper lightly plated.

In writing the history of England he reached the same result of success and approbation by appealing to the spirit of partisanship, and by describing the latter policies are always picturesque when they are distant. He had the good sense, which is known as British sense, and "no humbug." He held that politics are simply matters of expediency; and does not seem to have admitted that there are certain fundamental principles which are to be worked out in human affairs, by the means of various expedients, certainly, but with ulterior purposes, entirely independent of them. He was of that class of men that it is right to take the ship, now this way and now that; who understand precisely how to do it, what to handle, and when to do it. But they know nothing of the course. But this is not. The progressive voyage is the thing, and the ship bears away to the right and to the left in order that it may reach a point directly ahead. Thus his history reads like the memoir of a party, not like a philosophical and poetic picture and analysis of human development and the progress of society under certain conditions. There is something more pitiful than a visionary; and this is, a man who has no vision.

These things appear plainly enough in his letter upon Lecturing to Mr. Henry S. Randall, the biographer of Jefferson. It is certainly amusing to read it, and it is no less instructive. There can be no doubt of the acquaint humor of Macaulay's warning of Jefferson: "I readily admit that his intentions were good, and his abilities considerable. And I believe him to be an honest man. He does not perceive the secret of Macaulay's political philosophy, when he says of France in the year 1857, under Louis Napoleon, "Liberty is gone; but civilization has been saved."

Macaulay's general theory of our system is that "your Constitution is all sail and no anchor." That is, he believes that so long as the popular breath blows fair, all is well; but when it is foul, there is nothing to prevent its driving the ship upon the breakers. To intrust the Government to the majority, he says, is to abandon it to the poorest and most ignorant part of society. Consequently when, having spread over the continent, this country is as thickly peopled as the old countries, there will be the same fluctuations of trade—"the mass will have only half a breakfast, and, being the Government, it will divide all the riches among all the people, taking up the next corn, and the next year the nation will die of famine or lapse into barbarism.

That is his horoscope for America. Institutions purely democratic, he thinks, must sooner or later destroy liberty or civilization, or both.

The fault of all this statement and argument is that they assume men to be always the same; whereas the very Jeffersonian problem is just this: Since what is true has been invariably true of men under the various systems of despotism that have prevailed in historical times and countries, can we not devise a result by bringing the whole moral nature of man to co-operate with the material? In other words, since the system of absolute selfishness—that is, in which the many have been sacrificed to the few—has failed to perpetuate nations hitherto, does not the hope of the race lie in the system which declares and practises justice and humanity, and thereby tends to prevent the very conflict you anticipate?

Macaulay's whole statement is based upon European and ancient history, and yet the sources of the atrocities of the French Revolution are to be sought in the palaces of the Bourbon Kings, not in the National Assembly. Louis Fourteenth was the seed of Robespierre. It is not fluctuations of trade—it is the tyranny which grows out of a want of humanity which destroys liberty and civilization. Your government is, in the educated class, of a class which is, and knows itself to be, deeply interested in the security of property and the maintenance of order," is probably overpowered by the mass whenever they have had a week or a month of half breakfasts—and that mass, instead of being enlightened and capable of sensible reasoning, is a dull brute force, and made so by the very system you applaud.

The government of a single man would be the best government possible, if the man were perfect. Undoubtedly a theocracy is the ideal system, and the government of the few best men might be a good government. But who are they? How are you to find them? And when you have found them, how are you to prevent their brains being turned by the power which scarcely any human being has ever been found steady enough to administer justly?

The letter of Macaulay's is published in the Southern Literary Messenger, and is well worth attention.

UNDER CHLOROFORM.

UNTIL the last three or four hundred years amputation of a limb was a very rarely performed except when, from injury or disease, its extremity had begun to mortify; and then the surgeon ventured to make incision in the sound portion, but limited themselves to an operation through the tissues which had already lost their vitality. This timidity was due to the fact that they were unacquainted with any effectual means of stopping the bleeding from the larger arteries divided by the knife. Certain and easy as is the control of such bleeding now, by the simple process of tying a piece of thread or silk round the extremity of the bleeding vessel (as we shall hereafter see), it was unknown, at all events as applicable to amputation, to any surgical writer from Hippocrates, 400 B.C., or from Celsus, who flourished in the first Christian century, to the fifteenth. Consequently the numerous instances of injury and disease in which life is now saved by a timely resort to amputation were then always fatal. Hence, also, arose the various expedients which the more adventurous operators of the time resorted to in order to stop fatal bleeding, with the effect only of increasing the patient's torture, and with the attainment of no good result. Thus the incisions were performed with a red-hot knife, that the divided vessels, torn and charred by the heavy instrument, might contract or become plugged, and so be prevented from bleeding (Albucasis, eleventh century). Effective for the instant, the force of the circulation quickly overpowered the slender obstruction, and fatal hemorrhage sooner or later took place. This plan continued more or less in vogue down to the discovery of the ligature in the sixteenth century, and was practised even later in Germany by the celebrated Hildanus (1641), although he subsequently adopted the new method. According to another plan, the surgeon, after making the ordinary division of the flesh down to the bone, with studied endeavor not to divide the arteries until the last moment, twisted the bone with a hot iron, or, more of some styptic fluid, usually a powerful acid or astringent, to arrest the bleeding. If these were not successful, the limb was lopped off at once by hand, ready prepared, into which the bleeding stump was plunged. Between Scylla and Charybdis, the patient escaped between the two, either he died from loss of blood in a few hours or less, or, if the dreadful remedies succeeded, he survived a day or two to die of fever or exhaustion. After an earlier method, that of Guido di Caulice (1363), a bandage of plaster was made to encircle the member so rigidly that mortification attacked all the parts below, which then, after the lapse of months, dropped off, a horribly loathsome and offensive stump. A modification of this was Ambroise Paré's machine to sever the limb in an instant by a single stroke; and it was not uncommon at the period to effect the same purpose by the hatchet or by a powerful mallet and chisel.

It is to Ambroise Paré, the great French surgeon, who flourished in the sixteenth century, that we owe the application of the ligature (used long before in ordinary wounds) to the bleeding arteries of amputation. He described the method in the red-hot cautery, and of all the frightful adjuncts already described; and accordingly, instead of simply carrying the thread round the vessel by means of a needle passed through the soft parts adjacent—a method of adjustment which, from its simplicity, is now employed only in exceptional instances. Richard Wiseman, sometimes styled the father of English surgery, who practised in the latter half of the seventeenth century, is believed to have been the first to employ the ligature in England, and to relinquish the application of heated irons. At this era also, the circulation of the blood was discovered by the renowned Harvey, and the distinction between arteries and veins, which, although it was long unrecognized, the value of the ligature was rendered more than ever obvious.

But enough of this: let us soothe our ruffled nerves by seeing how the thing is done to-day. We will take a quiet post of observation in the room of the operation of one of our great metropolitan hospitals in this year of our Lord 1860. Notice is posted that amputation of the thigh will be performed at 1 P.M., and we occupy our seat ten minutes before the hour.

The area itself is small, of a horse-shoe form, and surrounded by benches rising one above another, in one above another, to the number of eight or nine tiers. From 100 to 150 students occupy these, and are pretty closely, especially on the lower rows, whence the best view is obtained. For an assemblage of youths between eighteen and twenty-five years, who flock together from all parts of the city, they are tolerably well-behaved and quiet. There or four practical jokers, however, it is evident, are distributed among the crowd, and time passes all the quicker for the rest. The clock has not long struck two when the folding-doors open, and in walk two of the surgeons and attendants of the hospital, followed by a staff of dressers and a few professional lookers-on—the latter being confined to seats reserved for them at the back and lowest most tier. A small table, covered with instruments, occupies a place on one side of the area; water, sponges, towels, and a chair stand on the opposite. The surgeon who is about to operate rapidly glances over the table, and sees that his instruments are all there and in readiness. He requests a colleague to take charge of the tourniquet, and with a word deputes an assistant to "take the time" by his watch, and to call out the lapse of the most minutes. A small table, covered with instruments, occupies a place on one side of the area; water, sponges, towels, and a chair stand on the opposite. The surgeon who is about to operate rapidly glances over the table, and sees that his instruments are all there and in readiness. He requests a colleague to take charge of the tourniquet, and with a word deputes an assistant to "take the time" by his watch, and to call out the lapse of the most important minutes. The patient, who, covered with a red-hot knife, that the divided vessels, torn and charred by the heavy instrument, might contract or become plugged, and so be prevented from bleeding (Albucasis, eleventh century). Effective for the instant, the force of his circulation quickly overpowered the slender obstruction, and fatal hemorrhage sooner or later took place. This plan continued more or less in vogue down to the discovery of the ligature in the sixteenth century, and was practised even later in Germany by the celebrated Hildanus (1641), although he subsequently adopted the new method. According to another plan, the surgeon, after making the ordinary division of the flesh down to the bone, with studied endeavor not to divide the arteries until the last moment, twisted the bone with a hot iron, or, more of some styptic fluid, usually a powerful acid or astringent, to arrest the bleeding. If these were not successful, the limb was lopped off at once by hand, ready prepared, into which the bleeding stump was plunged. Between Scylla and Charybdis, the patient escaped between the two, either he died from loss of blood in a few hours or less, or, if the dreadful remedies succeeded, he survived a day or two to die of fever or exhaustion. After an earlier method, that of Guido di Caulice (1363), a bandage of plaster was made to encircle the member so rigidly that mortification attacked all the parts below, which then, after the lapse of months, dropped off, a horribly loathsome and offensive stump. A modification of this was Ambroise Paré's machine to sever the limb in an instant by a single stroke; and it was not uncommon at the period to effect the same purpose by the hatchet or by a powerful mallet and chisel.

It is to Ambroise Paré, the great French surgeon, who flourished in the sixteenth century, that we owe the application of the ligature (used long before in ordinary wounds) to the bleeding arteries of amputation. He described the method in the red-hot cautery, and of all the frightful adjuncts already described; and accordingly, instead of simply carrying the thread round the vessel by means of a needle passed through the soft parts adjacent—a method of adjustment which, from its simplicity, is now employed only in exceptional instances. Richard Wiseman, sometimes styled the father of English surgery, who practised in the latter half of the seventeenth century, is believed to have been the first to employ the ligature in England, and to relinquish the application of heated irons. At this era also, the circulation of the blood was discovered by the renowned Harvey, and the distinction between arteries and veins, which, although it was long unrecognized, the value of the ligature was rendered more than ever obvious.

But enough of this: let us soothe our ruffled nerves by seeing how the thing is done to-day. We will take a quiet post of observation in the room of the operation of one of our great metropolitan hospitals in this year of our Lord 1860. Notice is posted that amputation of the thigh will be performed at 1 P.M., and we occupy our seat ten minutes before the hour.

The area itself is small, of a horse-shoe form, and surrounded by benches rising one above another, in one above another, to the number of eight or nine tiers. From 100 to 150 students occupy these, and are pretty closely, especially on the lower rows, whence the best view is obtained. For an assemblage of youths between eighteen and twenty-five years, who flock together from all parts of the city, they are tolerably well-behaved and quiet. There or four practical jokers, however, it is evident, are distributed among the crowd, and time passes all the quicker for the rest. The clock has not long struck two when the folding-doors open, and in walk two of the surgeons and attendants of the hospital, followed by a staff of dressers and a few professional lookers-on—the latter being confined to seats reserved for them at the back and lowest most tier. A small table, covered with instruments, occupies a place on one side of the area; water, sponges, towels, and a chair stand on the opposite. The surgeon who is about to operate rapidly glances over the table, and sees that his instruments are all there and in readiness. He requests a colleague to take charge of the tourniquet, and with a word deputes an assistant to "take the time" by his watch, and to call out the lapse of the most important minutes. The patient, who, covered with a red-hot knife, that the divided vessels, torn and charred by the heavy instrument, might contract or become plugged, and so be prevented from bleeding (Albucasis, eleventh century). Effective for the instant, the force of his circulation quickly overpowered the slender obstruction, and fatal hemorrhage sooner or later took place. This plan continued more or less in vogue down to the discovery of the ligature in the sixteenth century, and was practised even later in Germany by the celebrated Hildanus (1641), although he subsequently adopted the new method. According to another plan, the surgeon, after making the ordinary division of the flesh down to the bone, with studied endeavor not to divide the arteries until the last moment, twisted the bone with a hot iron, or, more of some styptic fluid, usually a powerful acid or astringent, to arrest the bleeding. If these were not successful, the limb was lopped off at once by hand, ready prepared, into which the bleeding stump was plunged. Between Scylla and Charybdis, the patient escaped between the two, either he died from loss of blood in a few hours or less, or, if the dreadful remedies succeeded, he survived a day or two to die of fever or exhaustion. After an earlier method, that of Guido di Caulice (1363), a bandage of plaster was made to encircle the member so rigidly that mortification attacked all the parts below, which then, after the lapse of months, dropped off, a horribly loathsome and offensive stump. A modification of this was Ambroise Paré's machine to sever the limb in an instant by a single stroke; and it was not uncommon at the period to effect the same purpose by the hatchet or by a powerful mallet and chisel.

It is to Ambroise Paré, the great French surgeon, who flourished in the sixteenth century, that we owe the application of the ligature (used long before in ordinary wounds) to the bleeding arteries of amputation. He described the method in the red-hot cautery, and of all the frightful adjuncts already described; and accordingly, instead of simply carrying the thread round the vessel by means of a needle passed through the soft parts adjacent—a method of adjustment which, from its simplicity, is now employed only in exceptional instances. Richard Wiseman, sometimes styled the father of English surgery, who practised in the latter half of the seventeenth century, is believed to have been the first to employ the ligature in England, and to relinquish the application of heated irons. At this era also, the circulation of the blood was discovered by the renowned Harvey, and the distinction between arteries and veins, which, although it was long unrecognized, the value of the ligature was rendered more than ever obvious.

But enough of this: let us soothe our ruffled nerves by seeing how the thing is done to-day. We will take a quiet post of observation in the room of the operation of one of our great metropolitan hospitals in this year of our Lord 1860. Notice is posted that amputation of the thigh will be performed at 1 P.M., and we occupy our seat ten minutes before the hour.

The area itself is small, of a horse-shoe form, and surrounded by benches rising one above another, in one above another, to the number of eight or nine tiers. From 100 to 150 students occupy these, and are pretty closely, especially on the lower rows, whence the best view is obtained. For an assemblage of youths between eighteen and twenty-five years, who flock together from all parts of the city, they are tolerably well-behaved and quiet. There or four practical jokers, however, it is evident, are distributed among the crowd, and time passes all the quicker for the rest. The clock has not long struck two when the folding-doors open, and in walk two of the surgeons and attendants of the hospital, followed by a staff of dressers and a few professional lookers-on—the latter being confined to seats reserved for them at the back and lowest most tier. A small table, covered with instruments, occupies a place on one side of the area; water, sponges, towels, and a chair stand on the opposite. The surgeon who is about to operate rapidly glances over the table, and sees that his instruments are all there and in readiness. He requests a colleague to take charge of the tourniquet, and with a word deputes an assistant to "take the time" by his watch, and to call out the lapse of the most important minutes. The patient, who, covered with

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Personal Advertisements.

[On the model of Mr. Dickens's Second Card.]

THE OFFICER OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT with manly mustaches who upset the lobster salad over a lady, thinking her an acquaintance, in Stewart's, and, before like an officer and a gentleman, she will hear of something to her advantage. When you have bought the dress, show this advertisement to the young man, and he will do the rest. You need not trouble yourself further.

TO MISS EMMA.—Excuse my not coming back to dance, as agreed, but I should have lost my supper, which you know is indigestible. I had had nothing to eat for more than an hour. Send us your address, and another shall be sent you up such a jolly pie. Hope you got home safe. W. P.

TO SHINY BRAIDS (Diamond cross, pink ribbons).—The Have Hall, but I was detained by business, and my heart is breaking (spiel. Please send a line, only one, to Stephen, Fifth Avenue Hotel, Room 27, and oblige your address, and desirous to marry. ——— Please write. A. B.

IF THE LADY who took by mistake the mosaic brooch in Broadway will return it she will kindly return the same, she shall have her own diamond one, with many thanks. Apply at the office.

LOST, early in the Ball, the fondest and truest heart that ever beat in the bosom of a gallant fireman. The lady who picked it up, supposing it was watch-set by him all the night, and is implored to communicate her address, so that the poor heart be had. Address to Young Goshen care of Harper's Weekly.

SILVER THISTLE (Highlander).—If you really meant what you said, you will have no difficulty of reporting it in writing. Our names are in the Directory. Initial same as your own. Please address Box 2,000. We go out of town in July, but return afterward for the season. ELLISON.

WILL THE GENTLEMAN, WHO MUST REMEMber her ne, because to have my dress in the polka, be so very kind as to send me my pocket-handkerchief? He may keep the fleece. LAURA.

P.S.—I don't care about it, only Julia, that you wouldn't dance with, goes on so, and says she will tell Ma.

ALBERT. I can not read your horrid handwriting, but Aw walk in Madison Square every fine afternoon. Pretend not to know me; but don't ask me, for Hobbs, and then be reminded you saw us at the ball. Take most to her, mind. MARGARET.

A GENTLEMAN TOOK BY MISTAKE a cloak with a red lining, which was a blanket, which he took before he discovered that it was not for him. Having thereby attracted the attention of the police, he thought fit to announce to inform Miss Letitia * * * * that her falsehood is known, and that she need not expect to hear again although he hopes she will be happy from (the once playfully called) TROTTIEBEE.

FEMALE FORTIFICATION.—Every woman's crinoline is her castle.

A STRIPPING INQUIRY.—Is it likely that ghosts talk in the dead language?

Swift defined a "mess" as a "man of nasty ideas." Louis Napoleon has taught us to define a "nasty policy" as a "policy of live ideas."

COUSINS' TALK.

"No, Amy, you're quite wrong. I never was refused in all my life."

"Yes, my dear, how can you say so? Why, there was Louis Simpson——"

"I say again, you're wrong—completely wrong. It's true I was" declined with thanks' once, that's never to be retracted."

ALCOHOLIC TEST.—A red nose.

A FINE ILLUSTRATION OF THE ASSOCIATION OF IDEAS.—Sunny suggests cabbage.

"MY JONES, why do you wear that bad hat?" "Because, my dear Sir, Mrs. Jones vows she will not go out of the house until I get a new one."

A merchant in Burlington, having sunk his shop floor a couple of feet, announces that, in consequence of recent improvements, goods will be sold considerably lower than formerly.

A letter from China says that the Chinese have succeeded, by the skill of their cultivation, in producing a red and delicious variety of tea. We suppose they have accomplished this by crossing their teas.

A drummer is the fastest man in the world, because time leads all men, but he drums beats time.

The Chinese picture of ambition is "a Mandarin trying to catch a comet by putting salt on his tail."

An old sailor said that he supposed dancing girls were fashionable partners at half-mast as a mark of respect to departed modesty.

The young lady who burst into tears has been put together with such a view to wearing hoops to prevent the recurrence of the accident.

The winds are responsible for many an unlucky blow.

What is the best to prevent old maids from des-pair-ing?—Pairing.

"A retainer at the bar," as the boy said when caught by a dog just as he was about to climb on the orchard fence.

"A bad wife," says an old author, "is confusion, weakness, discomfiture, despair"—bad enough, is it not, good man?

"Warm day, Jones, warm day!" said Smith, as they met lately. "Yes, it is," said Jones; "it is some warm last summer."

Mrs. Partington having heard her son say that there were a great many anecdotes in the new almanac, begged to look at them, and, as she turned over the leaves, my body was poisoned nothing was necessary but to give him an anecdote and a dose of arsenic.

"I shall be indebted to you for life," as the man said to his creditors when he ran away to Australia.

The fellow who got intoxicated with delight has been turned out of the concert-room entirely.

The boy who was caught looking into the future has been arrested for trying to see the show without paying.

What a world of gossip would be prevented if it was only remembered that a person who tells one of the faults of others intends to tell others of your faults!

A gentleman praising the generosity of his friend observed, "Oh! he would take his money last cent." "Then, of course, he liquid-ate his debts," rejoined a wag.

The latest Irish bull we read of is the case of an Irish landlord who was about to raise the rent because he could have himself from pecuniary embarrassments, got his tenants to extend for a large amount out their insolvency.

An apothecary in the country sent a lady three draughts, and on being asked what effect they were intended to produce, said, "Three, ma'am, is to warm you, the second to cool you, and the third is to prevent the excessive effect of either."

A colored cook expected company of her own kind, and was at a loss how to entertain her friends. Her mistress said: "Chloe, you must make an apology." "La, missus, I couldn't! I got no flour, no butter, no eggs, no butter, no saltin to make it wid."

A rapid and emphatic recital of the following is said to be a delightful cure for hiccups: "Hobbs meets Snobbs and Nobbs; Hobbs bobs to Snobbs and Nobbs; Hobbs robs Snobbs and Nobbs, and robs Nobbs of his cobbs, says Nobbs, the worst for Hobbs's jobs and Snobbs's sobs."

A strict temperance man, whose wife had fallen down in a fit, and was dying, in utter amazement hurried off, if on his conscience as a Christian physician, it would be right to administer to her a little brandy and milk, to put a little brandy to her lips. "The deuce take your brandy, Sir," said the doctor, in a rage, "in a case like this, one scruple of brandy is worth twenty scruples of conscience!"

"Well, I saw nothing about men's hair," said old Mrs. Grimcloist to an acquaintance of the scandal tribe; "but I remember Mrs. Dennis, who died, was once just twenty-nine years old for the last fifteen years, to my knowledge." The last sentence modified the whole matter, at which misfortune her grief was so intense that her own hair stood on end, and she could not shed a tear for years after the occurrence of that sad event. Singular, wasn't it, how Mrs. Grimcloist shed the other—"false hair" in a hairdresser's shop at the corner of the street?

A good lady, who had two children sick with the measles, went to the doctor's shop for medicine. The friend had just received a note from another lady inquiring the way to make pickles for the sick children, and who inquired about the pickles received the remedy for the measles. On her return another of the sick children read with horror the following: "Scald them three or four times in vinegar, and cover with double them with salt, and in a few days they will be cured."

A CAPITAL RECORD.—Charles XII., King of Sweden, was once riding near Leipsic, when a peasant came and knelt before him to request justice from a grenadier who had carried away his family's dinner. The king ordered the soldier to appear. "Is it true," said he, with a stern countenance, "that you have robbed this man?" "—Sire," said the soldier, "I have not done him so much injustice as your majesty has done his master; you have taken from him a kingdom, and I have taken only a trifling dinner." "Fellow," said the king, "you are promoted to a captain's place." "Sire, I humbly beg to be excused." "Why so?" "Because, if I have deprived you of a kingdom, I have kept nothing for myself."

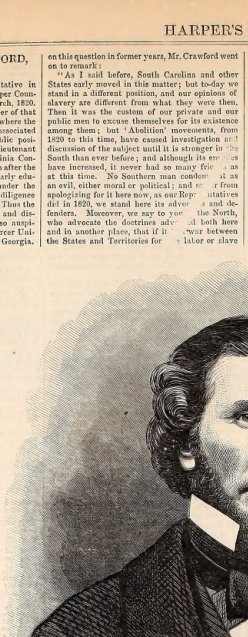
HON. MARTIN J. CRAWFORD, OF GEORGIA.

MARTIN J. CRAWFORD, a Representative in Congress from Georgia, was born in Jasper County, in that State, on the 17th day of March, 1820. He is a son of Hardy Crawford—a member of that family so old and honorable in Georgia, where the name of Crawford has repeatedly been associated with responsible and distinguished public positions. His mother was a daughter of Lieutenant William Jenkins, an officer of the Virginia Continental Line, who settled in Georgia soon after the close of the Revolutionary War. The early education of Mr. Crawford was received under the watchful care of his father, who exacted diligence and obedience under all circumstances. Thus the boy was timely prepared for usefulness and distinction in manhood. His education, so sedulously commenced, was completed at Mercer University, a flourishing institute in Central Georgia.

Shortly after leaving the University Mr. Crawford commenced the study of the law under the advice and counsel of Hon. Thomas F. Foster, a lawyer of distinction, and for several years a conspicuous member of the House of Representatives of the United States. The schoolmate of his father, and always his intimate friend, Mr. Foster at once took a great interest in his student, whose progress was such that he was admitted to the bar just before he was twenty-one years of age. Although Mr. Crawford entered upon his profession with solid acquirements, as the result of diligent reading, and with every prospect of great success, the death of his father about that time, by which he came to the possession of a handsome fortune, disinclined him to engage actively and entirely in the law. He contented himself, therefore, with so much practice, and no more, for some years, as would secure to him at home and on the circuit the genial society and generous intercourse for which the bench and bar of Georgia are famous.

While yet a young man, Mr. Crawford was elected a member of the lower branch of the Legislature of Georgia, and he served in the session of 1842–43 with marked success, taking a position among the most active and useful members.

With a determination to quit politics and devote his attention to the practice of the law, Mr. Crawford removed in 1848 to Columbus, where he has since resided. He was true to his purpose until 1850, when the excitement growing out of the slavery question was scarcely any—if at all—less in the South than at the present time. A disciple of the extreme Southern State Rights' School, Mr. Crawford shared in the general excitement which pervaded his section, and consented to be chosen a delegate to the celebrated Nashville Convention. He maintained in that body and before the people the duty and necessity of resistance to the Compromise Measures of 1850. Georgia, however, determined to accept the adjustment, and he acquiesced.



The election of Hon. Alfred Iverson to the Senate of the United States in 1853 created a vacancy on the bench for the circuit in which he resides, to which Mr. Crawford was chosen. He rose rapidly in his new field of duty. His courteous manners, united with a fine intellect, an excellent knowledge of and a firm and impartial administration of the law, eminently fitted him for the judicial office. So satisfactorily did he demean himself, that, upon his retiring from the bench, resolutions were adopted by the bar, for the first time in the history of the circuit, declaring their high appreciation of him as a man, and their full approval of his career as a judge.

In 1855 Mr. Crawford was nominated for Congress (running against his own wishes) by a Democratic Convention. The District is composed of twenty-four counties, and the canvass, which was conducted with ability on both sides, was one of great labor and excitement. Mr. Crawford was elected over his competitor—who was regarded as one of the most sagacious leaders of the American party—by a majority of some 600 votes, and took his seat as a member of the Thirty-fourth Congress in December, 1855. He was again elected, in 1857, to the Thirty-fifth Congress, by a majority of 1600 votes, and to the seat he now holds, as a member of the Thirty-sixth Congress, in 1859, by a still larger majority: thus proving that his constituents consider him a "good and faithful servant."

In Congress Mr. Crawford ranks among the ablest men in the House, and although strong in his own opinions, and sometimes heated in their advocacy, he preserves decorum in debate, and is always courteous and respectful in intercourse. His speeches on the general politics of the day, of which he has made several since he came to Congress, are among the best on the ultra-Southern side, and candidly express his views. His position on the revival of the slave-trade may be gathered from the following paragraph from his remarks in an incidental debate on that subject in the House. After stating the position of several Southern States on this question in former years, Mr. Crawford went on to remark:

"As I said before, South Carolina and other States early moved in this matter; but to-day we stand in a different position, and our opinions of slavery are different from what they were then. Then it was the custom of our private and our public men to excuse themselves for its existence among them; but 'Abolition' movements, from 1820 to this time, have caused investigation and discussion of the subject until it is stronger in the South than ever before; and although its enemies have increased, it never had so many friends at this time. No Southern man confesses it as an evil, either moral or political; and refrains from apologizing for it here as we and Representatives did in 1820, we stand here its advocates and defenders. Moreover, we say to you—the North, who advocate the doctrines of both here and in another place, that if the war between the States and Territories for labor or slave labor—'that all must be free or all must be slave'—you but hasten the day when, upon the plains of Arizona, and the territory south of us, even to Central America, you will find the South equal to the necessity which you have imposed upon her, and a perpetuation of slavery, which time itself can scarcely compute. The question, therefore, rests with the North. Let us alone, and we are content; if we are driven to the necessity of African laborers it will be your fault, not ours."

Mr. Crawford speaks with great fluency, and is concise and forcible rather than ornate, fortifying his positions with facts and authorities, and making no attempt at display. He is of middle size, well made, with Celtic features and complexion, and keen, piercing eyes. Graceful in his gestures, and possessing a pleasant yet commanding voice, he is invariably listened to whenever he rises, and generally retains, while on the floor, the earnest attention of the House. This is, probably, because he "never speaks without having something to say;" and seldom, except to the immediate question under consideration. He was in last Congress and is still a member of the Committee of Ways and Means.

HON. MARTIN J. CRAWFORD, OF GEORGIA.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

(Printed from advance proof-sheets purchased from the author exclusively for "Harper's Weekly.")

MISS HALCOMBE'S NARRATIVE (CONTINUED).

July 5th.—I remained leaning on the window-sill for nearly a quarter of an hour, looking out absently into the black darkness, and hearing nothing except, now and then, the voices of the servants, or the distant sound of a closing door, in the lower part of the house.

Just as I was turning away wearily from the window to go back to the bedroom, and make a second attempt to complete the unfinished entry in my journal, I smelled the odor of tobacco-smoke stealing toward me on the heavy night air. The next moment I saw a tiny red spark advancing from the farther end of the house in the pitch darkness. I heard no footsteps, and I could see nothing but the spark. It traveled along in the night, passed the window at which I was standing, and stopped opposite my bedroom, inside which I had left the light burning on the dressing-table.

The spark remained stationary for a moment, then moved back again in the direction from which it had advanced. As I followed its progress I saw a second red spark, larger than the first, approaching from the distance. The two met together in the darkness. Remembering who smoked cigarettes and who smoked cigars, I inferred immediately that the Count had come out first to look and listen under my window, and that Sir Percival had afterward joined him. They must both have been walking on the lawn—or I should certainly have heard Sir Percival's heavy footfall, though the Count's soft step might have escaped me, even on the gravel walk.

I waited quietly at the window, certain that they could neither of them see me in the darkness of the room.

"What's the matter?" I heard Sir Percival say, in a low voice. "Why don't you come in and sit down?"

"I want to see the light out of that window," replied the Count, softly.

"What harm does the light do?"

"It shows she is not in bed yet. She is sharp enough to suspect something if we hold enough to come down stairs and listen, if she can get the chance. Patience, Percival—patience!"

"Humbug! You're always talking of patience."

"I shall talk of something else presently. My good friend, you are on the edge of your domestic precipice; and if I let you give the women one other chance, on my sacred word of honor they will push you over!"

"What the devil do you mean?"

"We will come to our explanations, Percival, when the light is out of that window, and when I have had one little look at the rooms on each side of the library, and a peep at the staircase as well."

They slowly moved away; and the rest of the conversation between them (which had been conducted throughout in the same low tones) ceased to be audible. It was no matter. I had heard enough to determine me on justifying the Count's opinion of my sharpness and my courage. Before the red sparks were out of sight in the darkness I had made up my mind that there should be a listener when those two came sat down to their talk, and that the listener, in spite of all the Count's precautions to the contrary, should be myself. I wanted but one motive to sanction the act to my own conscience, and to give me courage enough for performing it; and that motive I had. Laura's honor, Laura's happiness, Laura's life itself, might depend on my quick ears and my faithful memory to-night.

I had heard the Count say that he meant to examine the rooms on each side of the library, and the staircase as well, before he entered on any explanations with Sir Percival. This expression of his intentions was necessarily sufficient to inform me that the library was the room in which he proposed that the conversation should take place. The one moment of time which was long enough to bring me to that conclusion, was also the moment which showed me a means of baffling his precautions—or, in other words, of hearing what he and Sir Percival said to each other, without the risk of descending at all into the lower regions of the house.

In speaking of the rooms on the ground-floor I have mentioned incidentally the veranda outside them, on which they all opened by means of French windows, extending from the cornice to the floor. The top of this veranda was flat, the rain-water being carried off from it by pipes into tanks which helped to supply the house. On the narrow leaden roof, which ran along past the bedrooms, and which was rather less, I should think, than three feet below the sills of the windows, a row of flower-pots was ranged, with wide intervals between each pot; the whole being protected from falling, in high winds, by an ornamental iron railing along the edge of the roof.

The plan which had now occurred to me was to get out, at my sitting-room window, on to this roof, to creep along noiselessly, till I reached that part of it which was immediately over the library window, and to crouch down between the flower-pots, with my ear against the outer railing. If Sir Percival and the Count sat and smoked to-night, as I had seen them sitting and smoking many nights before, with their chairs close at the open window, and their feet stretched on the zinc garden-seats which were placed under the windows, and with their chairs close to each other, I should hear every word they said, and every inference I drew from it would be certain to be the right one. On the other hand, they chose to-night to sit far back inside the room, then the chances were that I should lose all or nearly all they said, and that I must run the far more serious risk of trying to outwit them down stairs.

Strongly as I was fortified in my resolution by the desperate nature of our situation, I hoped most fervently that I might escape this last emergency. My courage was only a woman's courage after all; and it was very near to failing me when I thought of trusting myself on the ground-floor, at the dead of night, within reach of Sir Percival and the Count.

I went softly back to my bedroom, to try the safer experiment of the veranda roof first.

A complete change in my dress was imperatively necessary, for many reasons. I took off my silk gown, to begin with, because the slightest noise from it, on that still night, might have betrayed me. I next removed the white and cumbersome parts of my underclothing, and replaced them by a petticoat of dark flannel. Over this I put my black traveling cloak, and pulled the hood on to my head. In my ordinary evening costume I took up the room of three men at least. In my present dress, when it was held close about me, no man could have passed through the narrowest spaces more easily than I. With a little breadth left on the roof of the veranda, between the flower-pots on one side and the wall and windows of the house on the other, made this a serious consideration. If I knocked any thing down, if I made the least noise, who could say what the consequences might be?

I only waited to put the matches near the candle before I extinguished it, and groped my way back into the sitting-room. I locked that door, as I had locked my bedroom-door—then quietly put off my shoes and shawl, and cautiously set my feet on the leaden roof of the veranda. My two rooms were at the inner extremity of the new wing of the house, in which we all lived, and I had five windows to pass before I could reach the position it was necessary to take up immediately over the library. The first window belonged to a spare room, which was empty. The second and third windows belonged to Laura's room. The fourth window belonged to Sir Percival's room. The fifth belonged to the Countess's room. The others, by which it was not necessary for me to pass, were the windows of the Count's dressing-room, of the bath-room, and of the second empty spare room.

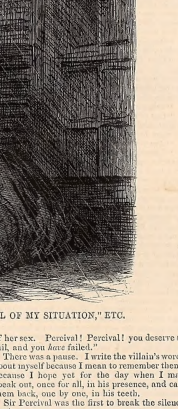
No sound reached my ears—the black, blinding darkness of the night was all round me when I first stood on the veranda, except at that part of it which Madame Fosco's window overlooked. There, at the very place above the library to which my course was directed—there I saw a gleam of light! The Countess was not yet in bed.

It was too late to draw back; it was no time to wait. I determined to go on at all hazards, and trust for security to my own caution and to the darkness of the night. "For Laura's sake!" I thought to myself, as I took the first step forward on the roof, with one hand holding my cloak close round me, and the other gripping against the wall of the house. It was better to brush close by the wall than to risk striking my feet against the flower-pots within a few inches of me on the other side.

I passed the dark window of the spare room, trying the leaden roof at each step with my foot, before I risked resting my weight on it. I passed the dark window of Laura's room ("God bless her and keep her to-night!"). I passed the dark window of Sir Percival's room. Then I stood a moment, knelt down, with my hands to support me, and so crept to my position, under the protection of the low wall between the bottom of the lighted window and the veranda roof.

When I ventured to look up at the window itself I found that the top of it only was open, and that the blind inside was drawn down. While I was looking I saw the shadow of Madame Fosco pass across the white field of the blind, then pass slowly back again. Thus far she could not have heard me, or the shadow would surely have stopped at the blind, even if she had wanted courage enough to open the window and look out.

I placed myself sideways against the railing of the veranda, first ascertaining, by touching them, the position of the flower-pots on either side of me. There was room enough for me to sit between them, and no more. The sweet-scented leaves of the flower on my left hand just touched my cheek as I lightly rested my head against the railing.



The first sounds that reached me from below were caused by the opening or closing (most probably the latter) of three doors in succession—the doors, no doubt, leading into the hall, and into the rooms on each side of the library, which the Count had pledged himself to examine. The first object that I saw was the red spark again flying out into the night, from under the veranda, moving away toward my window, wailing a moment, and then returning to the place from which it had set out.

"The devil take your restlessness! When do you mean to sit down?" growled Sir Percival's voice beneath me.

"Oui! how hot it is!" said the Count, sighing and yielding wearily.

His exclamation was followed by the scraping of the garden chairs on the tiled pavement under the veranda—the welcome sound which told me they were going to sit close at the window, as usual. So far the chance was mine. The clock in the hall struck the quarter to twelve as they settled themselves in their chairs. I heard Madame Fosco through the open window yawning, and saw her shadow pass once more across the white field of the blind.

Meanwhile Sir Percival and the Count began talking together below, now and then dropping their voices a little lower than usual, but never sinking them to a whisper. The strangeness and peril of my situation—the dread, which I could not master, of Madame Fosco's lighted window, made it difficult, almost impossible for me at first to keep my presence of mind, and to fix my attention solely on the conversation beneath. For some minutes I could only succeed in gathering the general substances of it. I understood the Count to say that the one window slight was his wife's; that the ground-floor of the house was quite clear; and that they might now speak to each other without fear of accidents. Sir Percival merely answered by upbraiding his friend with having unpardonably slighted his wishes and neglected his interests all through the day. The Count thereupon defended himself by declaring that he had been beset by certain troubles and anxieties which had absorbed all his attention, and that the only safe time to come to an explanation was a time when they could feel quite certain of being neither interrupted nor overheard. "We are at a serious crisis in our affairs, Percival," he said; "and if we are to decide on the future at all we must decide secretly to-night."

"THE STRANGENESS AND PERIL OF MY SITUATION," ETC.

That sentence of the Count's was the first which my attention was ready enough to master exactly as it was spoken. From this point, with certain breaks and interruptions, my whole interest fixed breathlessly on the conversation, and I followed it word for word.

"Crisis?" repeated Sir Percival. "It's a worse crisis than you think for, I can tell you!"

"So I should suppose, from your behavior for the last day or two," returned the other, coolly. "But wait a little. Before we advance to what I do know. Let us first see if I am right about the time that is past, before I make my proposal to you for the time that is to come."

"Stop till I get the brandy and water. Have some yourself."

"Thank you, Percival. The cold water with pleasure, a spoon, and the basin of sugar. Eau sucrée, my friend—nothing more."

"Sugar and water for a man of your age!—There! mix your sticky mess. You foreigners are all alike."

"Now, listen, Percival. I will put our position plainly before you, as I understand it; and you shall say if I am right or wrong. You and I both came back to this house from the Continent, with our affairs very seriously embarrassed—"

"Cut it short! I wanted some thousands, and you some hundreds—and without the money we were both in a fair way to go to the dogs together. There's the situation. Make what you can of it. Go on."

"Well, Percival, in your own solid English words you wanted some thousands and I wanted some hundreds, and the only way of getting them was for you to raise the money for your own necessities (with a small margin beyond for my poor little hundreds) by the help of your wife. What did I tell you about your wife on our way to England? and what did I tell you again, when we all came here, and when I had seen for myself the sort of woman Miss Halcombe was?"

"How should I know? You talked nineteen to the dozen, I suppose, just as usual."

"I said this: Human ingenuity, my friend, has hitherto only discovered two ways in which a man can manage a woman. One way is to knock her down—a method largely adopted by the brutal lower orders of the people, but utterly abhorrent to the refined and educated classes above them. The other way (much longer, much more difficult, but in the end not less certain) is never to accept a provocation at a woman's hands; to watch with animals, it holds with children, and it holds with women, who are nothing but children grown up. Quiet resolution is the one quality that animals, children, and the women all fail in. If they can once shake this superior quality in their master, they get the better of him. If they never succeed in disturbing it, he gets the better of them. I said to you, Remember that plain truth when you want your wife to help you to the money. I said, Remember it doubly and trebly in the presence of your wife's sister, Miss Halcombe. Have you remembered it? Not once, in all the complications that have twisted themselves about us in this house. Every provocation that your wife and her sister could offer to you you instantly accepted from them. Your mad temper lost the signature to the deed, lost the ready money, set Miss Halcombe writing to the lawyer, for the first time—"

"First time! what do you mean?"

"This. Miss Halcombe has written to the lawyer for the second time to-day."

A chair fell on the pavement of the veranda —fell with a crash, as if it had been struck or kicked down. It was well for me that the Count's exclamation roused Sir Percival's anger as it did. On hearing that I had been again discovered my self-control failed me at the critical moment, and I started so that the railing against which I leaned cracked again. How, in the name of Heaven, had he found me out? The letter had never left my own possession till I myself placed them in Fanny's hands at the inn.

"Thank your lucky star," I heard the Count say next, "that you have me in the house to undo the harm as fast as you do it. Thank your lucky star that I said No when you were mad enough to talk of turning the key to-day on Miss Halcombe, as you turned it, in your mischievous folly, on your wife. Where are your eyes? Can you look at Miss Halcombe and not see that she has the foresight and the resolution of a man? With that woman for my friend, I would snap these fingers of mine at the world. With that woman for my enemy, I, with all my brains and experience—I, Fosco, cunning as the devil himself, as you have told me a hundred times—I walk, in your English phrase, upon eggshells! And this grand creature—I drink her health in my sugar and water—this grand creature, who stands in the strength of her love and her courage, firm as a rock between us two and that poor flimsy pretty blonde wife of yours —this magnificent woman, whom I admire with all my soul, though I oppose her in your interests and in mine, you drive to extremities, as if she was no sharper and no bolder than the rest of her sex. Percival! Percival! you deserve to fail, and you have failed."

There was a pause. I write the villain's words about myself because I mean to remember them, because I hope yet for the day when I may speak out, once for all, in his presence, and cast them back, one by one, in his teeth.

Sir Percival was the first to break the silence again.

"Yes, yes; bully and bluster as much as you like," he said, sullkily; "the difficulty about the money is not the only difficulty. You would be for talking strong measures with the woman yourself, if you knew as much as I do."

"We will come to that second difficulty all in good time," rejoined the Count. "You may confuse yourself, Percival, as much as you please, but you shall not confuse me. Let the question of the money be settled first. Have I convinced your obstinate head, or shown you that your temper will not let you help yourself? —or must I go back and (as you put it in your dear straightforward English) bully and bluster a little more?"

"Pooh! It's easy enough to grumble at me. Say what is to be done—that's a little harder."

"Is it? Bah! This is what is to be done: You give up all direction in the business from to-night; and you leave it, for the future, in my hands only. I am talking to a Practical British Husband—ha? Well, Percival, will that do for you?"

"What do you propose if I leave it all to you?"

"Answer me first. Is it to be in my hands or not?"

"Give it is in your hands—what then?"

"A few questions, Percival, to begin with. I must wait a little yet to let circumstances guide me in the right direction. I may, in every possible way, what those circumstances are likely to be. There is no time to lose. I have told you already that Miss Halcombe has written to the lawyer to-day for the second time."

"How did you find it out? What did she say?"

"If I told you, Percival, we should only come back at the end to where we are now. Enough that I have found out—and the finding has caused that trouble and anxiety which made me so inscrutable to you all through to-day. Now to refresh my memory about your affairs—it is some time since I talked them over with you. The income of your wife was raised, in the shape of your wife's signature, by means of bills at three months—raised at a cost that makes my poverty-stricken flesh creep to think of it! When the bills are due, is there really and truly no earthly way of paying them but by the help of your wife?"

"None."

"What! You have no money at the bankers'?"

"A few hundreds, when I want as many thousands."

"Have you no other security to borrow upon?"

"Not a shred."

"What have you actually got with your wife at the present moment?"

"Nothing but the interest of her twenty thousand pounds—barely enough to pay our daily expenses."

"What do you expect from your wife?"

"Three thousand a year, when her uncle dies."

"A fine fortune, Percival. What sort of a man is this uncle? Old?"

"No—neither old nor young."

"Good-tempered—like my dear man? Married? No, I think my wife told me not married."

"Of course not. If he was married, and had a son, Lady Glyde would not be next heir to the property. I'll tell you what he is. He's a maudlin, twaddling, selfish fool, and bores every body who comes near him about the state of his health."

"Men of that sort, Percival, live long and marry malevolently when you least expect it. I don't give you much, my friend, for your chance of the three and a year. Is there nothing more that comes to you from your wife?"

"Nothing."

"Absolutely nothing?"

"Absolutely nothing—except in case of her death."

"Aha! in the case of her death."

There was another pause. The Count moved from the window on the gravel walk outside. I knew that he had moved by his voice. "The rain has come at last," I heard him say. It had come. The state of my cloak shewed that it had been falling thickly for some little time.

The Count went back under the veranda—I heard the chair creak beneath his weight as he sat down in it again.

"Well, Percival," he said, "and in the case of Lady Glyde's death, what do you get then?"

"If she leaves no children—"

"Which she is likely to do?"

"Which she is not in the least likely to do—"

"Yes?"

"Why, then I get her twenty thousand pounds."

"Paid down?"

"Paid down."

They were silent once more. As their voices ceased Madame Fosco's shadow darkened the blind again. Instead of passing this time it remained for a moment quite still. I saw her fingers steal round the corner of the blind and draw it on one side. The dim white outline of her face, looking out straight over me appeared behind the window. I kept quite still, shrouded from head to foot in my black cloak. The rain, which was the one thing to be dreaded over the glass, blurred it, and prevented her from seeing any thing. "More rain!" I heard her say to herself. She dropped the blind, and I breathed again freely.

The talk went on below me, the Count resuming it this time.

"Percival! do you care about your wife?"

"Fosco! that's rather a downright question."

"I am a downright man, and I expect it."

"Why the devil do you look at me in that way?"

"You won't answer me? Well, then, let us say your wife dies before the summer is out—"

"Drop it, Fosco!"

"Let us say your wife dies—"

"Drop it, I tell you!"

"In this case you would have the twenty thousand pounds, and you would lose—"

"I should lose the chance of three thousand a year."

"The remote chance, Percival—the remote chance only. And you want money at once. In your position the gain is certain, the loss doubtful."

"Speak for yourself as well as for me. Some of the money I want has been borrowed for you. And if you come to gain my wife's death would be ten thousand pounds in your wife's pocket. Sharp as you are you seem to have entirely and forgotten Madame Fosco a legacy. Don't look at me in that way! I won't have it! What with your books and your questions, upon my soul you make my flesh creep!"

"Your flesh? Does flesh mean conscience in English? I speak of your wife's death as I speak of a possibility. Why not? The respectable lawyers who scribble scrabble your deeds and your wills look the deaths of living people in the face. Do lawyers make your flesh creep? Why should I? It is my business to-night to pass my pen over every possibility of mistake—and I have now done it. Here is your position: If your wife lives, you pay those bills with her signature to the parchment. If your wife dies, you pay them with her death."

As he spoke the light in Madame Fosco's room was extinguished, and the whole second floor of the house was now sunk in darkness.

"Talk! talk!" grumbled Sir Percival. "One would think, to hear you, that my wife's signature to the deed was got already."

"You have left the matter in my hands," retorted the Count; "and I have more than two months to spare in turn and in way by no more about it, if you please, for the present. When the bills are due You will see for yourself if my 'talk' talk' is worth something, or if it is not. And now, Percival, having done with the money matters for to-night, I can pleas my attention at your disposal if you wish to consult me on that second difficulty, which has mixed itself up with our little embarrassments, and which has annoyed you far the worse that I hardly know you again. Speak, my friend—and pardon me if I shock your fiery national tastes by proving myself a second gloss of negrand-water."

"It's very well to say speak," replied Sir Percival, in a far less quiet and more polite tone than he had yet adopted; "but it's not so easy to know how to begin."

"Shall I help you?" suggested the Count. "Shall I give this private difficulty of yours a name? What will it call it—Anne Catherick?"

"Look here, Fosco, you and I have known each other for a long time; and, if you have helped me out of one or two scrapes before this, I have done as much for you. I could to help you in turn as far as money would go. We have made as many friendly sacrifices, on both sides, as men could be expected to make out secrets from each other, of course—haven't we?"

"You have hit the secret from me, Percival. There is a skeleton in your cupboard here at Blackwater Park that has peeped out, in these last few days, at other people besides yourself."

"Well, suppose it has. If it doesn't concern you you needn't be curious about it, need you?"

"Do I look curious about it?"

"Yes, you do."

"So! so! my face speaks the truth then? Which of the two fundamental rules of good tone must be in the nature of a man who arrives at my age, and whose face has not yet lost the habit of speaking the truth! Come, Glyde, let us be candid one with the other. This secret of yours has sought me: I have not sought it. Let us set a man—suppose—to ask me, as your old friend, to respect your secret, and to leave it, once for all, in your own keeping?"

"Yes—that's just what I do ask."

"Then my curiosity is at an end. It dies in me from this moment."

"Do you believe me that?"

"What makes you doubt me?"

"I have some experience, Fosco, of your roundabout ways. I am not so sure that you won't worm it out of me after all."

The chair below suddenly creaked again—I felt the thrill—while under my hands shake from top to bottom. The Count had started to his feet and struck it with his hand in indignation.

"Percival!" he cried, "you insult me!—you do know me no better than that? Has all your experience shown you nothing of my character yet? I am a man of the antique type! I am capable of the most exalted acts of virtue —when I have the chance of performing them. It has been my misfortune in my life that I have had few chances. My conception of friendship is sublime! It is my fault that your skeleton has peeped out? Wrong! Do you dare to confess my curiosity? You poor superficial Englishman, it is to magnify my own self-control. I could draw your secret out of you, if I liked, as I draw this finger out of the palm of my hand—you know I could! But you have appealed to my friendship; and the duties of friendship are sacred to me. See! I trample my base curiosity under my feet! I stifle my sentiments lit my breast above it. Recognize them, Percival! imitate them, Percival! Shake hands—I forgive you."

His voice rose over the last words—I listened, as if he was actually shedding tears!

Sir Percival confusedly attempted to excuse himself. But the Count was too magnanimous to listen to him.

"No!" he said. "When my friend has wounded me, he abandon him without apologies. Tell me, in plain words, do you want my help?"

"Yes, badly enough."

"And you can ask for it without compromising yourself?"

"I can try, at any rate."

"Try, then."

"Well, this is how it stands: I told you today that I had gone my best to find Anne Catherick and failed."

"Yes, you did."

"Fosco! she is lost man if I don't find her."

"Ha! Is it so serious as that?"

A little stream of light traveled out under the curtain and fell over the gravel-walk. The Count had taken the lamp from the inner part of the room to see his friend clearly by the light of it.

"Yes!" he said. "Your face speaks the truth this time. Serious, indeed—as serious as the money matters themselves."

"More serious. As true as I sit here more serious!"

The light disappeared again, and the talk went on.

"I showed you the letter to my wife that Anne Catherick hid in the sand," Sir Percival continued. "There's no boasting in that letter, Fosco—she does know the Secret."

"Say as little as possible, Percival, in my presence, of the Secret. Does she know it from you?"

"No; from her mother."

"Two women in possession of your private affairs—bad, bad, very bad! I can say no more here before we go any farther. The motive of your shutting up the daughter in the asylum is now plain enough to me; but the manner of her escape is not quite so clear. Do you suspect the people in charge of her of closing their eyes purposely at the instance of some enemy of yours, who could afford to make it worth their while?"

"No; she was the best-behaved patient they had—and, like fools, they trusted her. She's just mad enough to be shut up, and just sane enough to get out. Do you see now why I understand that?"

"I do understand it. Now, Percival, come at once to the point, and then I shall know what to do. Where is the danger of your position at the present moment?"

"Anne Catherick is in this neighborhood, and in communication with Lady Glyde—there's the danger plain enough. She wrote another letter she hid in the sand and not see that my wife is in possession of the secret, deny it as we may?"

"One moment, Percival. If Lady Glyde does know the secret, she must know also that it is a compromising secret for you. As your wife, surely is it her interest to keep it?"

"Is it? I'm coming to that. It might be her interest if she was independent of me. But when I happen to be an encumbrance in the way of another man. She was in love with him before she married me—and he's living in the house—an infernal vagabond of a drawing-master, named Hartright."

"My dear friend! what is there extraordinary in that? They are all in love with some other man. Who gets the first of a woman's love? The last? Sometimes the husband they met with the man who was Number One. Number Two, sometimes. Number Three, Four, Five, Six, etcetera. He knows the secret, and he knows the secret. Once let them both get together again, and it's her interest and his interest to turn their information against me."

"Gently, Percival—gently! Are you insensible to the virtue of Lady Glyde?"

"That for the virtue of Lady Glyde! I believe in nothing about her but her money. Don't you see how the case stands? She might be hideous enough in herself; but if she and that vagabond Hartright—"

"Yes, yes, I see. Where is Mr. Hartright?"

"Out of the neighborhood. If he means to keep a whole skin on his bones I recommend him not to come back in a hurry."

"Are you sure he is not of the country?"

"Certain. I had him watched from the time he left Cumberland to the time he sailed. Oh, I've been cunning enough, I can tell you. Anne Catherick lived with some people at a farm-house near Limmeridge. I went there myself, after she was gone, to find out all about her and what they knew nothing. I gave her mother a form of letter to write to Miss Halcombe, exonerating me from any knowledge in putting her under restraint. I've spent, I'm afraid to say how much, in trying to trace her. And, in spite of it all, she has managed to escape me—as in my own property. How do I know who else may see her, who may speak to her? That young scoundrel, Hartright, may come back without my knowing it, and may make use of her to my ruin."

"Not he, Percival! While I am on the spot, and while that woman is in the neighborhood, I am answerable to myself for keeping her before Mr. Hartright—even if he does come back. I see! yes, yes, I see! The finding of Anne Catherick is to be the compromise for your mind easy about the rest. Your wife is here, under your thumb; Miss Halcombe is inexpressible from her aid. Therefore, under your thumb also; and Mr. Hartright is out of the country. This invisible Anne of yours is all we have to think of for the present. You have made your inquiries?"

"Yes. I have been to her mother; I have ransacked the neighborhood for the purpose."

"Is her mother to be depended on?"

"Yes."

"She has told your secret once."

"She won't tell it again."

"Why not? Are her own interests concerned in keeping it as well as yours?"

"Yes—deeply concerned."

"I am glad to hear it, Percival, for your sake. Don't be impatient, my friend. Your money matters, as I told you, leave me plenty of time to turn round in; and I may search for Anne Catherick to-morrow to better purpose than you. One last question before we go to bed."

"What is it?"

"It is this. When I went to the boat-house to tell Lady Glyde that the little difficulty of her signature to the deed of trust could be settled there in time to see a strange woman parting in a very suspicious manner from your wife. But accident did not bring me near enough to see this same woman's face plainly. I must know how to recognize our invisible Anne. What is she like?"

"Like? Come! I'll tell you in two words. She is a sickly likeness of my wife."

The chair creaked, and the pillar shook once more. The Count was on his feet again—this time in astonishment.

"What!!!" he exclaimed eagerly,

"Fancy my wife, after a bad illness, with a touch of consumption, and you have Anne Catherick. And there is Anne Catherick for you," answered Sir Percival.

"Are they related to each other?"

"Not a bit of it."

"And yet so like?"

"Yes, so like. What are you laughing about?"

There was no answer—and no sound of any kind, like the Count we's laughing in his smooth, silent, internal way.

"What are you laughing about?" reiterated Sir Percival.

"Perhaps at my own fancies, my good friend. Allow me to say Italian humor—so I must quote of the illustrious nation which invented the exclamation of Punch" Well, well, well, I shall know Anne Catherick when I see her—and so enough for to-night. Make your mind easy, Percival. Sleep, my son, the sleep of the just; and see when I will for you, my sharp daylight comes to help us both. I have my projects and my plans here in my big head. You shall pay those bills and find Anne Catherick—I am a word of honor on it, but you shall! Am I a friend to be treasured in the best corner of your heart, or am I not? Yes! I am worth those loans of money which you so delicately reminded me of a little while since? Whatever you do, never wound me in my sensitive honor more. Recognize them, Percival! imitate them, Percival! I forgive you again; I shake hands again. Good-night!"

Not another word was spoken. I heard the Count close the window. I heard Sir Percival barring up the window-shutters. It had been raining, raining all the time. I was cramped by my position, and I ached to the bones. When I first tried to move the effort was so painful to me that I was obliged to desist. I tried a second time, and succeeded in rising to my knees on the wet roof.

As I crept to the wall and raised myself against it, the rain poured down, and saw the window of the Count's dressing-room gleam into light. My sinking courage flickered up in me again and kept me from fainting. I got to window as I stole my way, step by step, back along the wall of the house.

The clock struck the quarter-past one when I laid my hands on the window-sill of my own room. I had been nothing and heard nothing which could be of use to suppose that my retreat had been discovered.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, April 2, in the Senate, the Territorial resolutions of Senator Davis, of Mississippi, were taken up and speeches were made by Senators Sebastian, of Arkansas, Ten Eyck, of New Jersey, Brown, of Mississippi, and Wigfall, of Texas, against the bill. The bill prohibiting polygamy in Utah was taken up, and Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, addressed the Senate in favor of the passage of the prohibitory bill, on moral grounds. Mr. Pryor maintained the same views, taking care to draw the distinction between Slavery and Polygamy, as subjects of such legislation as was involved in the right of Congress to legislate for the Territories. The opposite opinions were advocated by Mr. Simmons, of Louisiana, who set nothing but a useless and mischievous precedent in the bill. In the course of the debate Messrs. Etheridge and Bingham, of North Carolina, made personal explanation for the measure; but deprecated precipitate action in a matter involving so many considerations. The House adjourned.

On Tuesday, April 3, in the Senate, there were reported bills organizing the Territories of Arizona and Colorado. Senator Green, of Missouri, introduced resolutions suggesting charges against William Medill, Controller of the Treasury. Senator Hunter addressed a long speech on the distinction between Slavery and Polygamy, as subjects of such legislation as was involved in the right of Congress to legislate for the Territories. The opposite opinions were advocated by Mr. Simmons, of Louisiana, who set nothing but a useless and mischievous precedent in the bill. In the course of the debate Messrs. Etheridge and Bingham, of North Carolina, made personal explanation for the measure; but deprecated precipitate action in a matter involving so many considerations. The House adjourned.

On Tuesday, April 3, in the Senate, there were reported bills organizing the Territories of Arizona and Colorado. Senator Green, of Missouri, introduced resolutions suggesting charges against William Medill, Controller of the Treasury. Senator Hunter addressed a long speech on the distinctions between Slavery and Polygamy, as subjects of such legislation as was involved in the right of Congress to legislate for the Territories. The opposite opinions were advocated by Mr. Simmons, of Louisiana, who set nothing but a useless and mischievous precedent in the bill. In the course of the debate Messrs. Etheridge and Bingham, of North Carolina, made personal explanation for the measure; but deprecated precipitate action in a matter involving so many considerations. The House adjourned.

On Saturday, April 3, in the Senate, there were reported bills organizing the Territories of Arizona and Colorado. Senator Green, of Missouri, introduced resolutions suggesting charges against William Medill, Controller of the Treasury. Senator Hunter addressed a long speech on the distinctions between Slavery and Polygamy, as subjects of such legislation as was involved in the right of Congress to legislate for the Territories. The opposite opinions were advocated by Mr. Simmons, of Louisiana, who set nothing but a useless and mischievous precedent in the bill. In the course of the debate Messrs. Etheridge and Bingham, of North Carolina, made personal explanation for the measure; but deprecated precipitate action in a matter involving so many considerations. The House adjourned.

On Monday, April 2, in the Senate, the Territorial resolutions of Senator Davis, of Mississippi, were taken up and speeches were made by Senators Sebastian, of Arkansas, Ten Eyck, of New Jersey, Brown, of Mississippi, and Wigfall, of Texas, against the bill. The bill prohibiting polygamy in Utah was taken up, and Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, addressed the Senate in favor of the passage of the prohibitory bill, on moral grounds. Mr. Pryor maintained the same views, taking care to draw was requested to ask the question, and did so simply to ascertain if the President had used any improper influences in the matter.

"Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You had no right to propound an impertinent question to me to gratify the malignancy of cowardly slanderers. If you had ventured such a story in the senate I should have resented the insult on the spot; and I do not intend to permit any member of this Committee to shield himself behind his official position to escape a just personal responsibility."

"Mr. COX inquired of the Committee, 'I do not agree with you, sir, that you have any right to hold any member personally responsible for the discharge of his official duties; and, so far as I am concerned, I do not intend to be intimidated by any threats.'

"Mr. BUTTERWORTH. 'I make no threats. I state a fact; and we will leave the matter to the action of the Committee. My action will be determined by yours.'

"Mr. CORWIN. 'I take the liberty to say to the witness of the question, and answer also; but you had better let the Committee alone. You have committed a crime before here, and this can be left out of the printed report.'"

To this Mr. BUTTERWORTH responded, and the affair was thus amicably adjusted."

RELATIONS OF CONNECTICUT AND RHODE ISLAND.

State elections took place in Connecticut on 2d, and Rhode Island on 4th inst. In the former State, the Republicans elect Governor by about 500 votes, thus losing a Democratic gain of nearly 1000. In Rhode Island the Democratic candidate, we are also supposed by the "Conservative Republicans," was elected by about 1500 majority. Much excitement prevailed throughout Rhode Island on the occasion.

ANOTHER CONGRESSIONAL ROW.

The Herald of Saturday morning correspondent gives the following account of a difficulty, which occurred on Saturday between Messrs. Hindman, of New York and Lindsman of Arkansas:

"There was almost a street collision this forenoon, about 10 o'clock, between two Congressmen, Mr. Van Wyck of New York, and Mr. Hindman, of Arkansas, in front of the National Hotel. There are various interpretations of the affair, but the following I obtained from an eye-witness: 'Mr. Van Wyck was standing upon the front steps of the hotel, with Mr. Stuart of New York, and Mr. Lovejoy of Illinois. Mr. Hindman sighted them a curious look, and muttered some of the fierce expressions named above to enter the hotel, when Mr. Van Wyck remarked him with the words, 'I'll be d—d if you don't, Mr. Hindman.' The latter resented the salutation with a movement of his hand toward Mr. Van Wyck's face. Stuart interposed as an intended blow, but Mr. Hindman did not reach Mr. Van Wyck. Mr. Stuart stepped between and mildly remonstrated with Mr. Hindman, and he desisted and entered the house.' Mr. Stuart then left, and had made a speech in the House of Representatives in sailing to enter the house of Representatives, and he (Mr. Hindman) could not permit Mr. Van Wyck to speak to him. Mr. Van Wyck, on seeing Hindman struck, made an advance to Mr. Hindman. Mr. Van Wyck was standing on the front steps of the hotel, with Mr. Stuart of New York, and Mr. Lovejoy of Illinois. Mr. Hindman sighted from a curious look, muttered some of the fierce expressions named above to enter the hotel, when Mr. Van Wyck remarked him with the words, 'I'll be d—d if you don't, Mr. Hindman.' The latter resented the salutation with a movement of his hand toward Mr. Van Wyck's face. Mr. Stuart interposed as an intended blow, but Mr. Hindman did not reach Mr. Van Wyck. Mr. Stuart stepped between and mildly remonstrated with Mr. Hindman, and he desisted and entered the house. Mr. Stuart then left, and had made a speech in the House of Representatives in sailing to enter the house of Representatives, and he (Mr. Hindman) could not permit Mr. Van Wyck to speak to him. Mr. Van Wyck, on seeing Hindman struck, made an advance to Mr. Hindman. Mr. Van Wyck was standing among the Democratic members, growing out of the affair, they separated. Out of these facts have grown all sorts of rumors, the most reasonable of which charges a blows and exhibition of deadly weapons, nothing of which happened."

THE CONCORD REBELLION.

We give elsewhere illustrations of the Sanborn arrest and rescue.

It is said that, since the agitation following the John Brown invasion, there have not been expected more trouble. The feeling seems to have been very strong against the Sanborn arrest, and on account of the manner in which he made the arrest. The Boston Journal says:

"Nothing but the assurance that a writ would soon be obtained and the fear that a mob would in a legal way prevented the exasperated citizens from pounding the officer and rescuing the prisoner. Every attempt was made to attack the officials. One man raised his arm to strike, but was seized by bystanders who at once observed his movements. Another was on the point of hurling a stone at the officers, but was arrested in the attempt. The citizens generally, without distinction of party, united in sympathizing with Mr. Sanborn. But three men were found who had formed the centre of the mêlée—one of them was the Postmaster, and another an officer of the Custom-house."

MEETING OF THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE.

The Democratic National Committee met at Washington on 5th. Twenty-three States were represented. George A. Cobb, of North Carolina, was chosen Chairman pro tempore, in the absence of Judge Smalley, and C. L. Vallandigham, of Ohio, was unanimously received that it is inexpedient, under existing circumstances, to change the time for holding the Democratic Convention from Charleston to any other place. The Committee adjourned in order to attend the Jackson Day Ball, at ten o'clock in the Grand Lodge of the Masonic Hall, which has been tendered and accepted by the Hon. John Cochrane.

Previous to action on the resolution, Mr. Vallandigham stated the reasons for the course which grew out mainly of the complaints about impositions in Charleston concerning accommodations for visitors. He had received numerous letters on this subject. Gentlemen of Baltimore, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Louisville had presented inducements for changing the place of meeting to those cities. He was satisfied that the Democracy of Charleston would, as far as they could, extend their hospitalities to delegates.

Mr. Ashmore (S. C.) stated to the Committee that he had appeared before them as the Secretary, but did not regard himself a member. He had met the Executive Committee of South Carolina at the solicitation of the Hon. B. H. Wilson, the member of said Committee from South Carolina, in his district, for the sole and only object to appoint the time when the Convention will meet in Charleston. The Convention regarded himself as limited to the single act of fixing the time, which had been done, and, in the absence of an alternative contract, should decline voting or participating further than to say, as a matter of personal fact, that he had received many letters from distinguished gentlemen in Charleston, of their own Democracy, who assured him that the hospitalities of that party would be extended to the fullest extent of their means to the numerous visitors and delegates. He was frank to say, in his opinion nothing need be expected from the Legislature of South Carolina. As to change, he hoped no effort would be made to effect one. He did not think the Convention had the power to make any, and if it were so, it would have a very deleterious and injurious effect upon the friends of the Convention in South Carolina, who, he thought, were unanimous in opposing the removal of the Convention. He had been informed by letters that many of the hotels would charge only three dollars per day for accommodations, and received private letters, saying that certain houses had been fitted up for the reception of five and six dollars per diem, including lodging and bedding. The landlords of the city were of opinion that the price of provisions no excuse for the charges. He should not discuss this question, however, but he should decline voting on any of the propositions before the Committee, would withdraw.

PROTEST FROM MARIN.

Commodore Marin has published a protest against the seizure of his vessel, the Sarah L. Watts. After relating the circumstances, and stating that he did not fire until two shots had been fired at him, he concludes as follows:

"For all which, and in view of the claim for redress which the Government may have against me, or any person, on account of the outrage committed by Captain Turner, of the Saratoga, without the least color of right, pretence, or excuse, upon vessels and men belonging to the Mexican Republic, in the waters of Mexico, and within its cannon-shot from the coast, the undersigned hereby publicly, and in the most solemn manner, protests:

"1. Against his having been approached stealthily, and in the dark, while at anchor in one of the ports of the Republic to which he belongs, by the Saratoga, a man-of-war of the United States, commanded by Captain Turner of the United States Navy, in consort with the steamer Rare, a vessel in the service of the Vera Cruz Government, and with the Indianola, a merchant steamer, known to be in the interest of, and under agreement from the same Government, to capture, destroy, and against his having, while Mexico is at peace with the United States, been fired at in flagrant violation of the laws of nations.

"2. The undersigned protests against his having been reduced to captivity with his officers and crew, and brought to this port of New Orleans, the undersigned being kept during the whole passage in strict confinement.

"3. The undersigned protests against the detention of the steamer under his orders, and against their transportation to this port.

"4. The undersigned protests against the slaughter of seven of his men by the fire of the boats sent to board the Mexican steamer, and where resistance was no longer attempted by them.

"5. The undersigned protests against the outrageous manner in which he and his men have been treated by the in this city as common felons, without cause or warrant, and without being informed of the cause of their arrest, though no complaint as yet has been made against them, or evidence, offered by any of their accusers or delinquency whatsoever."

[Journal of the Mexican Navy.

"NEW ORLEANS, March 27, 1860."

MINING EXCITEMENT IN CALIFORNIA.

The overland mail, which left San Francisco March 11, brings telegraphic dispatches to the 10th inst. Utah. The mining intelligence is of a still more glowing and exciting character. The wealth of Washoe had not yet been attested by responsible investigators, who had visited the Eldorado region, but the reports from the mines itself had been omitted, and had yielded at the rate of $100 a ton. Those of Gold Mountain, Esmeralda, etc., were also promising returns exceeding the most imaginative expectations. Gold Mountain, Esmeralda, etc., ores are brought of the astonishing richness of the quartz of gold in their crevices, and new mines are continually there hastening. The neighborhood of Yreka, California, was also exciting attention by the values of recent gold discoveries.

THE END OF THE CASTNER-GRAHAM CASE.

The Times and Transcript of Saturday last, from St. Louis:

"The infinite relief of a long-suffering and much-bored community, the Castnar case is at last decided. Ever since, last Monday morning, the first of the past weeks' trial of the most exciting case which has ever occurred in this city, the court-room has been thronged, engaged in pens and disorder. The defendant has obtained the verdict which he has so persistently and so boldly promised to usurp the plaintiff, his counsel was obliged to plead with unusual zeal, and the jury deliberate with the most unenviable position. A millionaire, trembling on the verge of bankruptcy, a lovely wife, a fond mother, a distinguished landscape gardener, whose labor at Tower Grove Park will live as a monument to his memory, and who has unselfishly endowed the city of St. Louis with grounds which will be the pride of her citizens for ages to come, a Jardin des Parcies of Paris, if the vice and liberal plan of its device could be carried out, and a lady of fashion, active in this trial as a libertine of seventy, and, like Madame Pompadour, ruling the court, and each one of the current incidents of this arouse reveal more meanness than they do capacity, more villainy than virtue, more guilt than verdict, and, indeed, the only verdict that could have been rendered, and the evidence in the case was so overwhelming against the community that some adequate punishment could be meted out to the guilty defendant. The only witness who swore to the contract of marriage was the sister of the plaintiff, and her testimony was contradicted and disproved by the most disinterested witnesses and her character and that of her sister were shown to be decidedly bad. The contract of marriage was proved to be that Miss Edie had been proved a public prostitute: but on the plea, advanced by her counsel, that she was insane, money, she is, and has been for the last twenty years, an inmate of a house of ill-fame in this city, of the highest type. Possessing a fine form, pleasing appearance, fascinating manners, address, and talents, she has combined with and energy, Ellie Castaing's career has been very successful, and she has accumulated a large sum by the sale of her liberal favors.

A PROTEST AGAINST CASSIUS M. CLAY.

Hon. Cassius M. Clay published, on April 3, an appeal to the people of Madison County against the Revolutionary Committee of Safety appointed by a self-styled denouement by a small majority last Tuesday, and has come to consider his cause again entitled to. He says he advised Hanson and his associates to leave; that he had no connection with them, and that the Bowie Knives and Colts he advised they will defend themselves. His address concludes with a denunciation of Frank Blair and George Hoadley, in which they say the troubles did not originate with the Republicans, because Mr. Hoadley, a man who is not a citizen of Kentucky, was instructed, and his daughter insulted by a Republican. The address concludes as follows: "You may be strong enough to overpower me, but you cannot deprive me of my rights as a free citizen, to my friends, and to my country. If I fall, I shall not fall in vain. I shall fall in the defence of the principles and associations, if perchance my blood shall atone for the sins of others, and the Union be saved. So should you then be."

Private advices intimate apprehensions of further trouble.

A POLITICIAN IN LUCK.

The Tribune says: "Mr. Surveyor Hart has fallen heir to an estate under the following romantic circumstances. Some years ago, Mr. Hart, then a youth, became enamored of him, but he did not return the passion. He left the country, and the lady, who was made the object of her tender recollections, which were shown by a wedding ring, which she wore, and which was found in a secret faith, valuable presents—sweet mementos which during the absence of her lover, she regarded almost as up. Every feast of the Passover, as well as every other day, she would visit the cemetery, and, as a mark of respect to this city, sentimental objects of art and verie; and when the intelligence of his death reached her, her grief-stricken heart could bear no more. As she was faithful in life, so she was faithful in death, and bequeathed the other day that the poor lady had gone to the better land. Mr. Hart, hearing of the death of his early love, it was legally necessary for him to go abroad to look after the property, he sailed on Saturday for Hamburg, where the estate lies."

PERSONAL.

Hon. JAMES K. PAULDING, Secretary of the Navy under President Tyler, died at his residence at Hyde Park on the 6th inst., aged 81.

In the Report of the Jury Expedition the hope is expressed that "the Government will take some action to reward Captain Lent" may be an instrument, in the event of this return, to bring about a more friendly state of our relations with that empire, of aiding in the interests of peace, and in the true interests of both countries."

Among the sojourners in Havana on the 25th ult. were Mrs. Hayden, Mrs. Lowison, Miss Havemeyer, Mrs. Dr. Masters, and Mrs. Butler, all of New York; Miss Conway and Mr. Parkman, of Boston; Dr. Tucker; Mr. Hayden, of Cincinnati, and Dr. Gee, of Key West.

Mr. Augusta, Georgia, Miss Otis, Miss Parkman, Mrs. and Miss Hayden, of New York, and Mr. Mansion.

Tom Sayers, the English Champion, has been engaged to give instructions in pugilistic science to the pupils of an institution in the principal cities in the United States, commencing after the fight with Heenan. The engagement has been definitely settled, and we are assured will not be broken, whatever the result of the approaching contest may be.

Madame Colson has been engaged to sing for five weeks at the French Opera at New Orleans. For this period she has $2500 salary, but a full benefit without deduction for expenses, and $250 for traveling expenses.

The Hon. Cassius M. Clay, minister to the Hon. Josiah Quincy, Sen., are the largest tax-payers in Quincy, Massachusetts, the former paying $1,200 and the latter $1,000. As trustee, Mr. Adams pays $750 additional to the above-named sum.

It is asserted, "on high Democratic authority," that Senator Douglas has declined Mr. Buchanan's invitation to visit the White House.

Joseph Hoegst, of Cincinnati, has filed a petition asking for a change of name. He alleged that George was a German name, which, being translated, means "stout-hearted." That it was generally understood and recognized among those of his fellow-citizens with whom he associated, and in business and social intercourse. As the reason he asked to use his mother's maiden name, Joseph Hoegst, which is pronounced Hogg, Lydia Ewald. Judge Mallon was of the opinion that there was no necessity for the change, the petitioner should be allowed, and adjudged that the name should be changed accordingly.

A man named Joseph Gan left his home in Newark, New Jersey, on Saturday morning, since which time nothing has been heard of him. His mind is somewhat deranged, and he was a patient in the Essex County Lunatic Asylum at Trenton, in which direction it is supposed he has wandered. He is a native of Belgium, about fifty-five years of age.

The mulatto slayer of Edgar A. Poe, the poet, Mrs. Maria Clemm, is in Accomack, Virginia, over seventy years of age, and in a very distressing poverty.

The Tribune says: "Conjugal affection does not rule high in Lebanon, Ohio. The case of Mrs. Lee Ann Morrison, sale as to the regard and the society of his young fellow-citizen Mr. Hammond, which is an earlier love, the latter bestowed on her friends, to the exclusion of the husband. Morrison indignantly left the language in the jaw, and brought an action against the lover and his friends, claiming damages since such an improper visit was brought to pass. Two trials were had; in the first, the indefatigable husband got a verdict for the sum of $1000. A new trial was ordered, new evidence put in, and the second jury gave damages for $500. What the mitigating circumstances were, whether the love of the wife was worth only half as much as the first, or was shown that the husband had not appeared to value it as a thing worth having, we have not stated. The matrimonial yet sees fair stand: an Ohio jury have settled the question that a wife is worth $500 to her husband."

General Jefferson Davis is again suffering from inflammation of the eyes. The surgical operation performed on one eye, has left the other somewhat clouded by the loss of both.

Lord Byron received a six days' speech in his celebrated case before the Court of Claims last week. Nothing, during the long proceedings, has been so interesting to the last, as well on account of facts connected with the history of the case, as that the merits of the claim at issue.

Mr. Isaac Townsend, a wealthy merchant of this city, died on Sunday 1st, at his residence in West Twenty-fifth Street, in the fifty-fifth year of his age. Mr. Townsend was the last surviving son of the late Gen. Townsend, being Vice-President of the Bank of the State of New York, and also of the Merchants Exchange Company. He was also a member of the Alms-house Board, and served one year in the Common Council.

Rosa Bonheur has not only received, as already stated, the first medal of honor for her picture of the Horse Fair, and paint a picture of a herd of wild bullaloes, but has received, as stated, the cross of the Legion of Honor. Whether the latter is accepted as well as the former is not yet known.

Mr. William Foster of Charleston, S. C., who died recently, left a property valued at $5,000,000. He leaves all the income of his estate, real and personal, to his widow, during her widowhood, however, with the payment of certain bequests and annuities to relatives after the decease of the widow. And also appropriates the legacy of the several charges mentioned, the whole estate is given in trust to the Governor of Carolina, for the establishment and support of a retreat for aged indigence, under certain regulations, of which is the building of cottages for the use of the poor, free of expense.

Hawthorne intends to visit Rome this year. He has been absent nearly eight years, during which time he has visited various countries of Europe.

FOREIGN NEWS

ENGLAND.

THE PRINCE OF WALES COMING TO AMERICA.

It is announced by the Secretary to the Prince of Wales to Canada, on his forthcoming visit, will form part of the screw steamer Hero, 91 guns; the Ariadne, 22 guns; the Styx, 51 guns; the Racer, 6 guns, and the royal paddle yacht Osborne. The Prince will take his passage and will arrive in Canada in July, where the vessels of war class in the navy. The yacht Osborne will be left in the river for the use of the Royal family.

The London Times, in an editorial on the subject, expresses a loyal desire that the Prince, on his return, will make a tour through the United States, where he may be sure of a generous reception. It should visit the President at Washington, the Times feels sure the courtesy will be extended to the Queen's son, and would tend closer the bonds which unite the two countries.

THE FRENCH FLEET IN THE CHINA SEAS.

The Herald correspondent writes: "In my last letter I mentioned some of the evidences of the interest felt in England in the success of the new 'international fight' between Heenan and Sayers. The interest has manifested itself in other ways than betting. A gentleman actually lodged Heenan to quit his comfortable quarters at Saddler's—Tom's old house—and go into Mansion House as a residence—and to retire to some more quiet and less public place. Heenan has accordingly left the train from all the country about, and even from London, eighty miles distant, and is now living, I hear to-day, in Surrey, whenever he started out for a walk, followed him often by a dozen boys, and he so far kept retired from the sight and the actual territory of Sayer to another Power.

The Queen has given her consent to appear in a particular manner any annexation of the neutralized provinces of Lombardy, Venetia, and the Papal States to France, as in contradiction to the stipulations of the Treaties of Vienna and the Declaration of Paris, and the interest of Swiss neutrality, as if they were an integral part of the Sardinian States, and declared that they are to enjoy the neutrality of Switzerland in the same manner as the Swiss Cantons."

"In the mean time, and with reference to the Scandinavian which I had the honor to explain to you in the audience which you were good enough to grant me on the 13th of March, I have received orders to call the duty of protesting formally, in the name of the Swiss Confederation, against every measure which may have for object to annex these provinces to France, till such time as the question of the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein has been definitively settled."

KEAN."

"I avail myself of this occasion, etc.,

CANADA.

HOW THE PRINCE OF WALES WILL FARE IN CANADA.

The Toronto Daily Globe says, concerning the visit of the Prince of Wales:

"The Ministry announced last night that the Prince of Wales would leave Quebec for Montreal on the 19th of July—certainly not earlier. This is not so good a time for seeing the country as June or August. We perceive that a fine job is being cut out in Quebec in connection with the visit. It is proposed to hire the palace of the Catholic Archbishop of Quebec. Mother Church will drive a hard bargain, we are afraid. The Nova Scotia Legislature have resolved to invite the Prince of Wales to visit that Province. The same motion was made in the New Brunswick House of Assembly, but it was a member of the House of Assembly, but it was only the legislatures discovered their error and the vote was carpaged, but only by a division of 23 to 18."

PREACHING TO THIEVES AND HARLOTS.

We give herewith a picture of the Sunday-evening service in the Methodist Episcopal Church in Greene Street, New York, by Rev. W. P. Corbit, on 1st April, inst. It had been previously announced that the sermon would be especially addressed to "Thieves and Harlots;" and these classes had been notified by the detectives that, for that occasion, the church would be a sanctuary. The experiment was watched with great interest, as the similar attempts which are now being made by Mr. Baptist Noel and others in London, England, are said to promise quite handsomely. We abridge from the Herald the following account of the service and congregation:

"A better location for preaching a sermon to such persons could hardly have been selected. The Rev. Mr. Corbit's church is in Greene Street, not far distant from the most notorious portion of the notorious Mercer Street, and in the immediate vicinity of the up-town settlements of small thieves.

"Although our reporter reached the church long before the hour announced for the commencement of the services, he found the house crowded in every part. The aisles were filled with 'standees,' and the rail around the altar was, like a perch, decorated by a number of young men. Inside the altar were several persons; and four more occupied the pulpit, to the evident discomfort and inconvenience of the pastor. It is a well-known fact, that congregations, like dreams, generally go by contraries. An announcement that a lecture will be delivered to young men always attracts all the young ladies of the place; and so, an invitation to thieves and harlots crowded the church with probably the most respectable audience ever collected within its walls. The congregation comprised many respectable men and women, such as we see every day upon 'Change, in business, or in society. Several theatrical and other celebrities were present. About half the congregation were ladies, and many of these were aged. Our reporter, occupying a position from which he could see the entire audience, and assisted by an experienced detective, was able to 'spot' only four well-known harlots, and if any thieves were present they kept themselves very 'dark,' and were not observed.

"The services began with the hymn commencing:

'Lord, we are vile, conceived in sin,
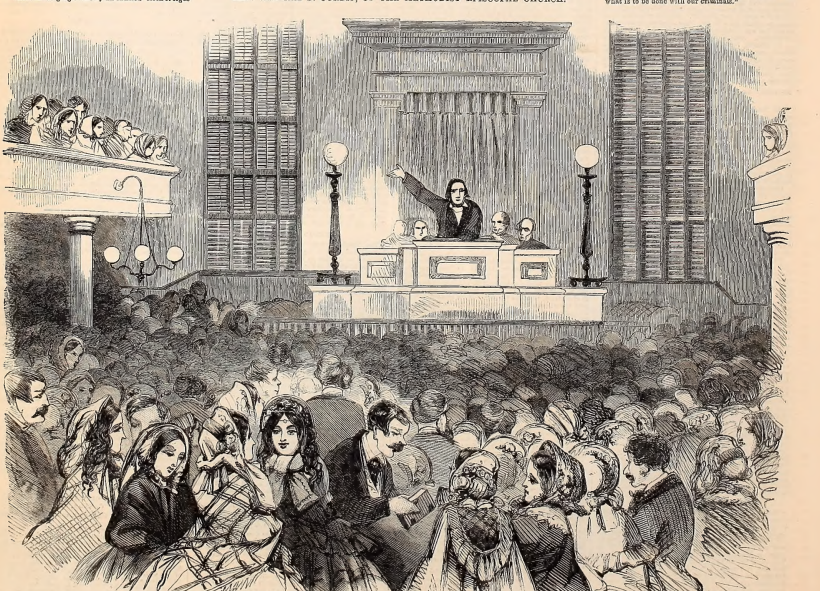
And born unholy and unclean,' which was sung with great fervor, the congregation rising. A prayer followed, in which the pastor reminded the brethren that they were once as vile in heart as any present, but had been redeemed by grace. The prayer, as well as the sermon which it preceded, were greeted by many loud 'Amens,' after the singing of the hymn entitled 'The Sinner's Resolve,' Mr. Corbit gave notice, while the collections were being made, that he would preach his farewell sermon next Sunday evening, and then took for his text the following passages of Scripture: Proverbs, 13th chap., 15th verse, 'The way of the transgressor is hard;' Luke, 23d chap., 42d verse, 'And the thief said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom;' and Matthew, 21st chap. and 31st verse, 'Verily, I say unto you that the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you.'

"After the singing of the hymn entitled 'Rock of Ages' the congregation quietly dispersed. To a disinterested observer it was amusing to notice the care which the gentlemen took of their pockets while the audience was passing out, each suspecting his neighbor, in the jam, to be one of the 'thieves;' and also the spirit with which the ladies, for obvious reasons, resented a too-prolonged stare."



We hope the experiment may be repeated. The first attempt proves nothing, and further trials may develop much good.

Mr. Corbit is one of the most eminent preachers of the Methodist faith, and is a man of undoubted sincerity, energy, and zeal. He was born in New Jersey, in or about 1820, and became in early boyhood a wagoner in Pennsylvania. Rising in his trade, he undertook the business of carting brick into Philadelphia from the adjacent kilns, and at one time had as many as one hundred men in his employ. His energy was remarked by all who knew him; it is said that, in order to be the first at work in the morning, he used to sleep all night on a chair. Some years ago he was touched by the preaching of the late Rev. Dr. Charles Pitman, of New Jersey, in his lifetime one of the ablest ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church; under his guidance Mr. Corbit joined the church and studied for the ministry. His career as a preacher has been very successful. Few preachers in this city can command a larger audience. His famous sermon to the firemen of New York will be remembered by many of our readers; it attracted no little attention at the time.

Probably no one is better qualified to give an opinion as to the probable effect of Mr. Corbit's preaching than Mr. Matsell the ex-Chief of Police. He says:

"Mr. Corbit, by his sermon last Sunday evening, has given a practical turn to Christian effort, which for many years has been too much in theory. To successfully combat vice and crime, it must be brought to light and boldly grappled with. Leaving the evils of society to work their own cure, is just as suicidal as it is for a patient, in a dangerous but not incurable condition, to refuse the medicines which his physician may prescribe.

"This sermon of the reverend gentleman may be regarded more in the light of an introductory lecture on crime and criminals than as a complete essay on this all important subject. He suggested no new means whereby thieves or prostitutes could be reformed, but merely pointed out, in touching and eloquent language, the dangers to which the thief was exposed, his fears, his continual dread of the law's officials, and of a trip or a State prison ever staring him in the face. In striking contrast, he showed the peaceful life the true Christian led, who, awake or asleep, felt the fear of none in the world. In concluding his discourse the reverend gentleman gave a parting word of advice to his brethren, which was well timed. If a sister who had fallen from her high estate should reform and become a member of the church it was their duty to encourage her, and what she had been should be blotted out from their memories. The object of the sermon may have been in some respects a failure, but it will certainly accomplish one grand end, in arousing the minds of the people to the important question of what is to be done with our criminals."

REV. WILLIAM P. CORBIT, OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

REV. WILLIAM P. CORBIT PREACHING TO "THIEVES AND HARLOTS" IN THE GREENE STREET METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, ON APRIL 1, 1860.

Captain Brand,

OF THE

SCHOONER "CENTIPEDE,"

A PIRATE OF EMINENCE IN THE WEST INDIES;

His Loves and Exploits,

TOGETHER WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF THE SINGULAR MANNER BY WHICH HE DEPARTED THIS LIFE.

BY

LIEUT. H. A. WISE, U.S.N.

(HARRY GRINGO),

AUTHOR OF "LOS GRINGOS" AND "TALES FOR THE MARINES."

ILLUSTRATED BY

C. PARSONS AND A. LUMLEY.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

CHAPTER IV.

SUNSET.

Not a breath from the lungs of Æolus. The sun went down like a globe of fire; but just as it touched the horizon it flattened out into an oval disk, and, sinking behind a dead, slate-colored cloud, shot up half a dozen broad rose and purple bands, expanding as they mounted heavenward, and then fading away in pearly-tinted hues in the softening twilight until it mingled in the light of the half-moon nearly at the zenith. Presently, along the eastern horizon, the banks of clouds, which had been long dead and motionless all the sultry day, seemed to be imbued with life, and separating in their fleecy masses, rose above the sea, and soon spread out, like a lady's fan, in all directions.

"Ho! ho!" shouted Captain Blunt, clapping his hands, "what said I, Madame Rosalie, when we saw the sun setting up his Ice backstays a while ago? A breeze, eh? Come, Mr. Binks, be wide awake! We shall be bowling off the knots before the watch is out."

The mate caught the enthusiasm of the skipper, and, jumping up on the break of the deck cabin, he sung out:

"Bye hear there, lads! give us a good pull of the topsail halliards, and round in them starboard braces a bit! That's your sort! Well, the head yards! That'll do with the main! Up with the flying jib, and trim aft them starboard jib and staysail sheets! There! Belay all."

Now came the rippling breeze all at once over the sea, fluttering furtively for a minute or two, so as to make the topsails of the brig swell out and then fall back in a tremendous shiver; but again bulging forward in a full-bosomed curve, the vessel felt the tug and began to dash the spray from her bluff bows till it fell away beyond the lee cathead in flying masses of foam. The studding-sail booms rolled out, the sailors busied themselves aloft in making the additional sail, and by-and-by the old brig floundered along, the bubbles gurgling out ahead in the ruffled water, tipping over astern as the crests broke on her quarter; at times plunging her bows into the rolling swell, but coming up sturdily again, and so on as before.

Meanwhile, the corvette had edged away in a parallel course with the brig, running past her at first as if she were at anchor, when she let her topgallant-sails slide down to the caps and, with the weather clew of her mainsail triced up, she held way with the brig a mile or more to windward.

"Now, Madame Rosalie," said the kind old skipper, "it is nearly midnight; take your last snooze in the old barky, and wake up bright and happy for Port Royal and—you know who, in the morning."

The charming woman had been watching, with soul-rapt gaze, the lofty hills of Jamaica from the last blaze of the setting sun and until the moon too had vanished and left only a dim blue haze over the island. She started as the Captain spoke, gave a deep sigh, kissed her hand to the good old skipper, said, "Bon soir mon ami," and with a smile she entered her cabin.

The black was seated within the partition of the apartment near a small swinging cot, urging it gently to and fro, and watching over his little charge.

"Good-night, Banco," she said, in patois French, "you may go to bed, and I will take care of my little boy."

THE PIRATES BOARDING THE BRIG.

The black grinned so as to show his double row of white teeth beneath the rays of the cabin lamp, and without a word he moved silently away. The lady stood for a few moments gazing lovingly at the sleeping child, and then drawing the miniature from her bosom, she detached it with the chain from her neck, and after pressing it to her lips, she leaned softly over the cot and fastened it around the little sleeper. As light and zephyr-like as was the effort it caused the little fellow to stir, and reaching out his tiny arms, and while a baby smile played around the dimples of his cheeks, he clasped his mother's neck.

Ah! fond and devoted mother! That was the last sweet infantile caress your child was ever destined to give you! Treasure it up in joy and sorrow, in sunshine and gloom, for long, long years will pass before you press him to your heart again!

CHAPTER V.

DARKNESS.

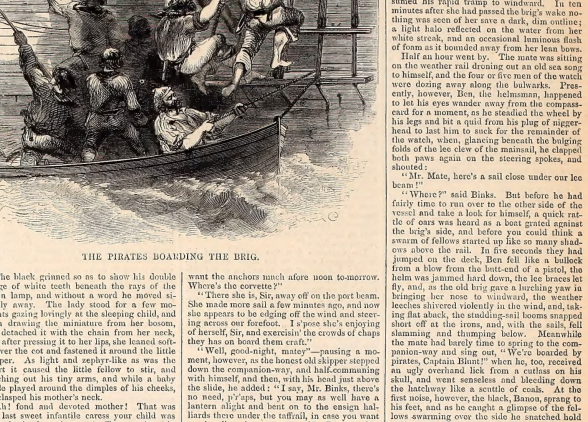
On went the Martha Blunt with no fears of danger near. The bell struck eight, the watch had been called, and the Captain, taking a satisfactory look all around the horizon, glanced at the compass, and, with a slight yawn, said:

"Well, Mr. Binks, I believe I'll turn in for a few hours; keep the brig on her course, and at daylight call me. It will be time enough then to bend the cables, for I don't think we shall want the anchors much afore noon to-morrow. Where's the corvette?"

"There she is, Sir, away off on the port beam. She made more sail a few minutes ago, and now she appears to be edging off the wind and steering across our forefoot. I s'pose she's enjoying of herself, Sir, and exercisin' the crowds of chaps they has on board them craft."

"Well, good-night, matey"—pausing a moment, however, as the honest old skipper stepped down the companion-way, and half-communing with himself, and then, with his head just above the slide, he added: "I say, Mr. Binks, there's no need, p'r'aps, but you may as well have a lantern alight and bent on to the ensign halliards there under the taffrail, in case you want to signalize the corvette. Ah, Banco! that you, old nigger? Good-night!"

So Captain Blunt went slowly down below, and at the same time the black went off, coiled himself down on the deck, and made a pillow of the brig's ensign.



"Here comes the corvette, Sir!" soon after said Ben to the mate, as he stood on tip-toe holding on to the spokes of the wheel, and taking his eyes off the binnacle a moment to get a clear view over the rail. "Here she comes, with her starboard tacks aboard, athwart our bow, and moving like an albatross!"

The man-of-war had for an hour or more crept well to windward, and then, wearing round, she came down close upon the wind under royals, and her three jibs and spanker as flat as boards. As she whirled on across the brig's bow, a few cables' length ahead, the sharp ring of the whistles was again heard, and the moment after the head sails fluttered and shook in the wind, the sheets and blocks rattled, and with a clear order of "Mainsail haul!" the after yards swung round like magic, the sails filled, and without losing head-way the head yards were swung, and she gathered way on the other tack. On she came, with the spray flying up into the weather leech of her foresail, the dark mazes of her rigging marked out in clear lines against her white canvas, and the watch noiselessly coiling up the ropes on her decks. As she pushed her sharp snout through the water, and grazed along the brig's lee quarter, an officer on the poop gave a rapid and searching glance around, peered sharply along the brig's deck, waved his trumpet to the mate, and resumed his rapid tramp to windward. In ten minutes after she had passed the brig's wake nothing was seen of her save a dark, dim outline, a light halo reflected on the water from her white streak, and an occasional luminous flash of foam as it bounded away from her lean bows.

Half an hour went by. The mate was sitting on the weather rail droning out an old sea song to himself, and the four or five men of the watch were dozing away along the bulwarks. Presently, however, Ben, the helmsman, happened to let his eyes wander away from the compass-card for a moment, as he steadied the wheel by his legs and bit a quid from his plug of nigger-head to last him to suck for the remainder of the watch, when, glancing beneath the bulging folds of the lee clew of the mainsail, he clapped both paws again on the steering spokes, and shouted:

"Mr. Mate, here's a sail close under our lee beam!"

"Where?" said Binks. But before he had fairly time to run over to the other side of the vessel and take a look for himself, a quick rattle of oars was heard as a boat grated against the brig's side, and before you could think a swarm of fellows started up like so many shadows above the rail. In five seconds they had jumped on the deck, Ben fell like a bullock from a blow from the butt-end of a pistol, the helm was jammed hard down, the lee braces let fly, and, as the old brig gave a lurching yaw in bringing her nose to windward, the corvette leeches shivered violently in the wind, and, taking flat aback, the studding-sail booms snapped short off at the irons, and, with the sails, fell slamming and thumping below. Meanwhile the mate had barely time to spring to the companion-way and sing out, "We're boarded by pirates, Captain Blunt!" when he, too, received an ugly overhand lick from a cutlass on his skull, and went senseless and bleeding down the hatchway like a scuttle of coals. At the first noise, however, the black had sprung to his feet, and as he caught a glimpse of the fellows swarming over the side he snatched hold of the ensign halliards where the signal lantern had been bent on, and in an instant it was dancing away up to the gaff, shrouded from view to leeward of the vessel by the spread of the spanker. In another moment the black leaped to the deck cabin and darted through the door. But less time than it has taken to tell it the Martha Blunt had changed hands. There on the quarter-deck stood, in groups, some sixteen barefooted villains, in coarse striped gingham shirts, loose trowsers, and skull-caps, and all with glittering, naked knives or cutlasses, and pistols in their belts and hands. In the midst of this cluster of swarthy wretches, near the companion-way, stood a burly, square-built ruffian, with a pistol in each hand, and his dexter paw pushing up a brown straw-hat as he ran his fingers across his dripping forehead

"YOU WOS NOT BORN TO BE SHOT; BUT WE'LL SEE WHAT SALT-WATER WILL DO FOR YE BY-AND-BY."

and a tangled mass of carroty, unshorn locks. There was a snip of a red silk kerchief tied in a single knot around his bare bull neck; for a shirt was thrown back, and exposed a tawny, hairy chest, as a ray of light dashed up from the binnacle. He looked—as indeed he was—the lowest type of an English sailor scoundrel. His companions were of lighter build, and their dress, complexion, and manner—to say nothing of their black hair and rings in their ears—indicated a birth and breeding in other and hotter climes.

"Well, my lads," said the big fellow, who seemed to be in command, "the barkey is ours, and we'll sink that infernal cruiser handsomely. Go forward, Pedro, and gag them lubbers, and then tell the boys to trim aft them jib sheets—and, mind in them after braces, mates of you, so we can keep way with the schooner and take things easy."

Here he laughed in a husky, spiritless, low chuckle, and then went on: "This will make up for lost time, amigos! Christo! there may be some ounces on board. But who's left in the boat, Miguel?" This was addressed to a bow-legged, beetle-browed individual, with a hare-lip, which kept his face in a perpetual and skeleton-like grin, who hissed out from between his decayed front tusks:

"El Jefe—Americano, con tres de nosotros."

"Bueno! all right; three of the chaps will do to look out for her, but tell the Doctor to put the boat astern, and I veer him a rope from the gangway. There! that's well with the braces! Keep her off a point; so that's it."

As the orders were promptly obeyed, and the crew of the brig gagged, and the vessel surged slowly on her course, the same speaker turned to his men and said,

"Now, my hearties, let's have an overhaul of the skipper's traps; give him up here, will ye? I never mind," he added, "I'll just step down and have a growl with him myself."

As the man-o'-war's-boat foremost down the companion ladder, two of the pirates jumped after him, and, dealing him another cruel stab with a knife deep into the back, they speared him into the lower cabin. There was a brief struggle, the sound of voices mingled with curses and threats, and then all quiet again.

In pursuance of his expressed purpose, the stout ruffian slewed himself round, took a sweep about the cabin, and then sticking his pistol in his belt, he slowly descended the ladder, gave the wounded and dying mate a kick, and with a hoarse laugh entered the cabin.

There on a small sofa abaft, between the two stern sir-ports, sat Captain Blunt. Blood was trickling down a heavy drover from a recent bruise on his forehead, but notwithstanding the swelling and pain of the wound, his features were calm, and his face honest. On either side of him sat as villainous a brace of mongrel Portuguese or Spaniards as ever infested the high seas; and his arms were pinioned by a stout cord to the bolt above the transom.

"My service to you, Sir!" said the leader of the gang, with a devilish smile of derision, as he stuck his arms akimbo and squirted some tobacco-juice from his filthy mouth across the cabin table at the pinioned prisoner.

"I 'spose you know by this time that you're a lawful prize, captured by an Independencia Constable off the West Indies, notwithstandin' ye had sich safe escort and convoy all the afternoon."

Here he chuckled, squirted more juice over the table, then dropped down on a sea-chest elected to the duty, took off his hat and scratched his yellow-red hair. The poor Captain said not a word but shook a great clot of blood from his brow.

"Well! now my old hearty, the first thing for you to do is to poke out your manifest and any other letters of value ye may have stowed away; and be dam quick, mind ye, for you haven't much time to sail in this 'ere craft, Howsoever, I'll be as quick as you."

"You'll find the Manifest and the ship's papers there inside that instrument-box; and all the money we had used is in that locker; and I trust in Heaven it may burn your hands to cinders, you bloody devils!"

"Hot! mates, brains! keep a stopper on your jaw, blast ye! or I'll squeeze your dead carcass through that 'ere stern port."

The fellow as he spoke, and, stepping up to the narrow state-cabin near by, he jerked open the upper drawer of a small bureau affair, and pulling out a canvas bag, sealed at the mouth, tossed it on to the cabin table. The coin fell with the heavy dead sound peculiar to gold, and the ruffian, after taking it up again and weighing it tenderly, grovel out, "This chink will do for a rapper of any sprite! So now he's have a peep at what the cargo consists on."

Then stepping a second time to the berth, he gave a kick to the instrument-box, the lid flew off, and diving in his fist he drew out a bundle of papers. Once more seating himself at the table beneath the swinging lamp, he clumsily undid the papers and spread them before him.

"What a blessed thing is education," muttered he to himself, "and what a power o' knowledge reading 'itin' does for a man!" Putting his fat stumpy finger on each line of the manuscript as he read, he began to spell out the contents, he began, "Man-i-fest of Brig Martha Blunt—Ja-ckob Blunt mas-ter:" here he paused, and, squirting more tobacco-juice over at the skipper, as if to attract his attention, he suddenly ejaculated, "Hank ye! Master Blunt, what was the name of that man-o'-war vessel as was 'r'in' by you this morning?"

"The Scourge," replied the skipper, faintly, as he shook the great drop of blood from his brow.

"The what? The Scourge! That dam Yankee snake! Smash my brains! D'ye know that that ship has been a hangin' about the north side of Cuba for ever so long, interruptin' our trade? And you an Englishman to go and ax him to protect ye! Blast your eyes, take that!"

Here he snatched a pistol from his sash, and taking aim full at the skipper's breast, he pulled the trigger. Fortunately the weapon snapped and did not explode. The ruffian laid it in merriment in his hand, and then letting it rest upon the table, he said, with a horrible imprecation,

"Ye see your luck's down to the bed; but we'll see what salt-water will do for ye by-and-by."

Taking out his knife at the conclusion of this speech, he picked the flint of his pistol, opened the pan, shook the priming, and then shoved the weapon back into his belt. The mention of the Scourge, however, had evidently caused him some trepidation, for when he resumed the perusal of the papers, it was in a more subdued, agitated sort of way, and not at all at his ease.

Smoothing the papers again before him, he went on, with many stumblings, commencing to read: "Eighty-six canes of silks—light, and easily stowed away; twenty-nine tons bar iron; extra-fine cambrics—bale-mark, 1-3-5; will help to sink the brig; forty pipes of Bordeaux; two hundred baskets Champagne; three hundred and fifty pieces of claret—quite enough, I warrant you; two casks Cognac brandy—but I say, you Blunt," said the fellow, looking up, "where's your own private stock? I'll be bound you've spelt in' out all this 'ritin', and my mouth's as dry as a land crab's claws. Howsoever," he continued, as he caught with satisfaction the bottle which came over the swarthy faces of his companions beside the Captain, "wait a bit, and we'll punch a hole in it in no time!" and he chuckled.

Having run through the Manifest, he opened another paper and exclaimed, "Hello! what have we here? A list of passengers—Ma-dame Rosalie Picon and—ho! that's a French piece, I knows by the name. Where is she, Blunt? Hasn't she come aboard, has she? D'ye hear, there, ye infernal Blunt?"

The Captain's face was troubled, and his head dropped once on his breast without replying; but one of the scoundrels at his side struck him a brutal blow in the face, and his pale-blue eyes flashed with anger, and, jerking up his head, with an effort, "Yes, we have a female passenger on board, with a child and nurse. Mam'selle Picon is the name, to leave the innocent woman in peace. You've robbed and ruined me and my poor old widowed mother, but don't harm the ladies, down or hang me, but don't harm the poor lady!"

The tears blinded him as he spoke, and mingled with the bloody stream which trickled down his cheeks. The ruffian's ugly face and bloodshot eyes lighted with a fiendish gleam of his satisfaction as the skipper began his appeal, but before he had well finished speaking he broke in:

"Avast your jaw! will ye? You'll have enough to look out for your own gullet, my lad, without meddling with that of others. I'm not to say your prayers afore eight bells is struck, because there's sharks off Jamaky."

Then shaking his head cavalierly myrmidons he exclaimed, "Look out sharp for that old chap, my lads, while I goes to sarch for the woman spoke of."

"Si, Señor," replied the man with a nod and a grin, and he resumed his seat again; and no sooner had the ruffian left the cabin than a bottle and glasses were placed upon the table, and they fell to with a will, complimenting the brand and vintage—which, by the bye, was the last drops from their tumblers into his face.

MISS NIGHTINGALE ON NURSING.

NURSING is a faculty, not a science. It is a gift, not an acquirement. There are some worthy female beings, most estimable in every way, on never make decent nurses. You love them; you are charmed with them in society; you wish them all imaginable prosperity, but would as soon think of introducing a French hen and a dancing bear round about your sick-bed as of surrendering your self to their instructions.

First of these is the pool-natured, unscientific nurse, whose slipshod feeding, and whose kindhearted nothings do well where there is not cheerful conversation and a busy kitchen. Such a nurse I have known to make a delightful sick-room by quietly taking a rich, thick, chrome-colored custard, as the best restorative for the disorganized system. Another, more scientific, would have put up the blinds, and throw wide the windows when a German band is playing underneath, to relieve the tedium of a convalescent's monotonous life over congestion of the brain; such a nurse has, before now, pressed wine and brandy on a patient in the agonies of cholera-spasms, because she had engaged him in a lively chat as the finest remedy for a nervous headache. This is the nurse who despises doctors and puts her trust in the apothecary and the butcher; who shudders at gray-powder and prefers beef-tea; who always thinks you are being brought to bed, even when you are only in a fever. This nurse is the dearest creature in the world for the drawing-room days of life. Round, bright-eyed, cheery, talkative, she is the delight of the light of the house, and the jolliest companion in the world: but I pray that none but my cr ities or my enemies may ever have her. The one is under the belief that she is nursing to perfection. She is herself blessed with a large volume of life and a strong nervous organization, with big lungs, a big heart, and a big, but coarsely-textured brain. She is a treasure to the healthy world: I can not repeat this too often. But when she is sick, such a fine noble domestic elephant as it is! But bright eyed treasure, stay down in the drawing-room, or rampage about the boy-field, and, when I am ill, never put so much as the tip of that beloved blunt nose inside the kind of my door!

And take your sister with you: your sister is a Mull, and Muffs are as objectionable as elephants, when the knocker is tied up. Muff, too, is a precious creature for the healthy hours; a tender, clinging, loving soul, full of sensibility and kindness—a universal favorite, who, every one declares, must make one of the best of nurses. Try her, my friend; try her for one week; and surely at the end of that time you will be ready to pass on Muff's theory of nursing is comprised (she being, of course, your wife) in incessant personal attention, and incessant tender caresses. When you are fainting for air Muff will hang over you, between you and the window, stifling you with her soft weight upon your chest, and her warm hands upon your forehead. Muff is always praising your patience, your firmness, your gentleness; exaggerating your kindness to your fare, and making a far mightier fuss about every little occurance than even you think, with all your sick selfishness, is warranted by the circumstances. If would take a strong man to live through a month of Muff's bedside practice. She is rarely still, but always fidgeting as far as a very gentle one can fidget, and does every thing in whispers. She softly tells you that your head is too low when it is twelve inches, and she drags you in another pillow, which she pushes and pats under you in the most irritating manner; or just as you have found out a comfortable position for your head, which you have pulled shockingly awry and feebly manipulated into symmetry with your person, Muff tenderly informs you that your shoulders require lowering, softly, drags up your head, and pushes back the bolster to its mathematical precision of place. She tells you to turn over till she arranges you, and pats you till you would beat her, if she were any body but Muff, and you were yourself. "Your fellow" (she whispers Muff—you are half asleep, in a quiet dose, and in a wonderfully easy position, for her ministrations) "is quite right—getting time for your nasty medicine; so don't go to sleep, there's a dear!" It wants twenty minutes of tia time, and you have been asleep for two weeks; but you were just then so tranquil and so comfortable! Muff would be bitterly hurt if told that she is worse than useless in a sick-room; and it is the most aggravating circumstance in her case that you love her with all your heart, and to complain (one of the invalid's greatest comforts) would be almost next to murdering her.

Then there is the conscientious nurse, hard and practical: that kind of nurse which goes on turning its own handle according to the tune set for it by the doctor. Grimbones can not judge for herself. She can not understand, or, understanding, act faithfully, and with punctuality and precision; but she has no originality, and must work according to the prescription of the doctor. If the doctor says that certain medicines—sleeping draughts, for instance—are to be given every three hours, and you happen to fall asleep when it is a sweet and dreamless sleep, which was the very effect the medicine was intended to produce. But Grimbones has always been obedience is the cardinal virtue. There are moral pedantries in nursing as well as any thing else. Grimbones is a purely pedantic nurse—reliable with spare shoulders, a flat back, and bony hands, who dresses in black masks skimp and light, and usually loves to mention medicines quite grimly to her waist, and a half-mourning—always looking like a half dirty—cap. Grimbones is a good woman, but an awful nuisance, and is going to hover round a sick man's helpless bed. She is usually your mother-in-law. Therefore give Grimbones the keys of the store-cupboard, the wine-cellar with perfect confidence; give her also dominion over your servants; but tell her gratefully, kindly (for Mercy's sake don't offend her), that you would much rather she would not nurse you.

Escape, if you can, from the watching nurse, whose eye is never off you, who won't let you turn in bed your arm, or your leg, or even wink, without her interference, who turns you every five minutes by asking "what you would like now?" who can never let well alone, and has the profoundest contempt for the healing powers of nature; who thinks that constitutions are babies, and have to be lifted on their legs every second, as they can never get up of themselves.

I think I prefer her, and even Grimbones and Muff, to Aunt Gruesome. When that little gray shadow flits across the floor, the enemy is the stairs by express train from any remote part of the country to take possession of them, as if they were a conquered state. Aunt Gruesome has always children, and your man-servant and your maidservant, and even the stranger that comes with the meat. Aunt Gruesome's every body-only your dear sharp, short directions—snapped off in broken sentences by her teeth—as if subject to a spell. She is no sister of mercy (though in a measured, angular way) that she never seems to sit down; the most she can do is to lean her little person against the edge of a chair, because the room is a bile moment for housemaids. Then it is that Aunt Gruesome darts cutting glances into the corners of rooms and cupboards, and finds a fever. She is to you, helpless and forlorn, feel that the management of the banished wife of your cousin is being arranged, and, with your consent, most unnecessarily criticised. I dare say Aunt Gruesome is not wholly unknown to some of my readers.

But last and best of all, there is the dear fairy nurse, who is never in the way at the wrong time, and never out of the way at the right time; who, when you wish for her, appears like magic by your side, and, when you want any thing else, brings that very thing. She is marvelous tactful, and, above some unexplained source; who is always cheerful and never tired; who seems fresher after sitting up for the night than when the rest of the household after seven hours' bed; who, when you can sit up, achieves worlds of ease and comfort with pillows, and bits of bed, and cozy footstools; who tells you exactly what you ought to know, and won't let you be bothered with any news that might worry you; whose sympathy, though tender, is invigorating, for she never "poor-dellows!" you, as Muff does a hundred times a day: who does your work for you in quiet, unostentatious way, and contrives to let you have the impression that it did itself, like the tangled wool or golden web of fairy tales; who sees jellies which no confectioner could approach, and mulls claret as if she had been taught the process by a special patent. This fairy nurse, this deity of a sick-bed guardian, this exquisite undertaking of nature, reconciles you to nursing womanhood in general, and makes you once more believe in the good gifts of feminality. I know such a nurse; with heart, head, and senses in unfailing harmony. Under her delightful administrations it is almost a pleasure to be ill. Such a nurse is like the poet, "born, not made." But even she may be benefited by scientific rules. Indeed, she is almost the only kind of nurse who can be so benefited; for all the rest only add a little scientific pedantry to their other qualifications for or disqualifications for their work.

The most sensible book ever written on the subject is Miss Nightingale's Notes on Nursing. Her rule of rules, the one which stands as the first commandment on which hang all the rest, is "TO KEEP THE AIR THE PATIENT BREATHES AS PURE AS THE EXTERNAL AIR WITHOUT CHILLING HIM." Nursing of a sick-room by means of inside windows, or doors opening into corridors, passages, halls, courts, or any other inclosed space. The outside air, and when it does not blow cold and freest, is all that she will admit. With this commandment firmly established next comes the need of some special and peculiar knowledge—namely, how to chilly hours of early morning, when the patient's vital powers are low, and before the food and warmth of the day have roused him up from the healthy action or to feverish heat; and at all times —morning, noon, and night alike—in weak, protracted, or exhausted cases, when very often the patient is lost for want of this one matter of simple care and forethought. Hot bottles, hot flannels, warm drinks, a good fire, and protection generally to the bodily condition, are needed in such cases; and all this extra external warmth can go on together, with the smallest amount of ventilation from the outside. "People don't catch cold in bed," says Miss Nightingale: a truth that can not be too strongly impressed on those who have to attend to the sick or the aged.

In the matter of cleanliness it is enough to say that nothing can be too great or too minute to eradicate for the proper management of a sick-room. No dirty rags left fluttering about; no airing of damp linen or clothes upon the valuable furniture; no superfluous drapery any where, and not a rag of carpet if possible to be done without; no dirty pots and pans; no decaying vegetables or meats swimming on the hob; no unwashed glasses, with the lip mark left in filthy ripples at the edge, nor spoons left in the jelly, or clustering round the bowl, or with the dregs of the draught congregated into a mahogany-colored pool; not the smallest thing about the room to shock the keenest sense of nose or eye, and then, perhaps, you may come up to the mark of the needful amount of sick-room cleanliness. Make no noise, and do as little as need be; but for the sake of suffering humanity do not imitate Muff, and think that whispering and creeping about is the proper sister sick-room silence. These are almost worse than our dear elephant's mode of slapping things down with a bang, and of speaking to you from the top of the stairs, or hailing a man-of-war. "A firm, light, quick step, a steady, quick hand are the desiderata; not the slow, lingering, shuffling foot, the timid, uncertain hand. Slowness is not gentleness, though it is often mistaken for such. Quickness, lightness, and gentleness are quite possible in it." The nursing nurse is an abomination; a nurse with crinoline, silk petticoats, creaking stays, or squeaking shoes, with keys hanging in her pocket, with a chain that flaps against her steel buckle, with jingling bracelets or charms, or even with floating ribbons, is absolutely inadmissible in a sick-room, and should be gently shown the door at the earliest opportunity.

Never stand or fidget about when the patient speaks with you, and always sit where he can see you without turning his head. Be careful of attentiveness when you speak to him, and never gesticulate. Speak with an even voice, without undue emphasis, without drawl, and with distinctness and never speak from behind the door, or from the fire-place, or with your back turned. Never speak at all to other people toward the time while your patient is standing or moving about: "a patient in such a state is not going to the East Indies," and if you would wait no more than ten days, ten years further, any promenade he could make would be over. Under no pretense whatever wake him out of his sleep. He who should do it, says the hungry Frenchman, gnyly; and he who sleeps in sickness is getting all the good which food or medicine could give him. Never disturb your patient for any irresolution, doubt, or change in your own mind. "People who think outside their heads," as one knows about every day in the week, though they have no business with the sick, for they fatigue them by their changes of imagination quite as much as if they carried the patient about, makes as many yards or miles as they proposed. Leave the sick-room quickly, and come in quickly—not with a rush, not suddenly, and like a bull, but lightly and decidedly; not as if you were leaving half your mind behind you, and the other half were turning round to seek it. "Conciseness and decision in your movements are as necessary in the sick-room as silence, gentleness, and smile. Possess yourself entirely with respect to your time from failing, either loitering or hurrying." Reading aloud to the sick is to be avoided as the very rarely followed, and then only under strict charge, of clear, distinct, even-toned, and not lengthy trials: taking care that every word is heard distinctly, that there is no mouthing, and no plunging, and that the course is short and unflagging.

"Variety of form and brilliancy of color in the objects presented to patients are actual means of recovery;" whereupon, by all means gather together as much variety as possible. Hang up an engraving where the patient can see it, and change it every day, or week, or month, as may be; have a growing plant or a few cut flowers near the patient; let the light come in freely and lovingly, but unless in such cases as it is painful and hurtful; and, if possible, let the bed be so placed that he can look at the view from it, and gather into his sick soul a little of the health and vigor of the natural world. Let him have bright and cheerful subjects for thought, and turn his mind as much as possible from the eternal contemplation of his own miseries, and the terrible self-consciousness which creeps over us all during illness. But this variety must be given temperately and judiciously; care must be taken not to fatigue by a too rapid change, or by the exhibition of colors or of objects which, through some idiosyncrasy or other, exhaust and depress rather than stimulate and encourage. Again, as soon as the sick can use their hands, let them. Let them have a little needle-work, a little netting, a little manual labor of same kind. The doing faculty is so large a one, instinct with humanity that absolute idleness soon becomes one of the most intolerable of curses.

Never let a patient see his food raw, or smell it in the process of cooking, or know any thing about it until it is presented to him tastefully and neatly, and at the right moment, when his appetite is most craving. Hours of appetite vary in different individuals, and it is well to study their period of recurrence in the particular case under charge. If twelve be better than two, or four than six, make the principal meal appear at the former hours. But it is mere patient nursing that one o'clock, or twelve, or two, is to be the hour of dinner, liked or not; and that it is the wholesomest time to eat, though he must be what is right. People, sick people at least, will only do what they like; and what they like is generally from their own mode of determining her opinion as to what they ought to do and ought to have. Do not leave uneaten food by the patient; and, above all, never wish him to eat nothing at all, do not let him "always have something beside him." Be careful that every thing about his meals is scrupulously clean; that every article of food be fresh and in good condition. Be chary of jellies, except as refreshment for a parched mouth, but do not trust to them as nourishment; and with beefsea, regard it rather as containing a "certain reparative quality, we do not know what," than as so much actual nourishment. The Christian says of beef-tea, that "possibly it belongs to a new denomination of remedies" for patients can take this who reject every other diet, and can maintain life on it into the bargain. Cream, in many long chronic cases, is irreplaceable by any other article whatever—it makes them, sweets, jams, negus, drinks, or sugared tea, come under the strictest ban. Especially with fever patients, whose furred tongues and parched throats demand something sharp or pungent. Tea and coffee are both good as restoratives, but tea is the best, being the more digestible; yet neither ought to be given after five o'clock in the afternoon, as both help to keep up the excitement which causes sleepless nights. On the other hand, a cup of tea given at five or six in the morning, after one of these sleepless nights, will often tranquilize and compose the patient, and send him off after a sleep of two or three hours. Typhus patients often refuse their tea, and one of the first signs of their recovery is their asking for it again. Some attempts have been made to substitute cocoa for tea and coffee; but independently of the fact that the many sick dislike it, it has no restorative power. It is an oily starchy nut that increases fat, and does no more. It is pure mockery of the sick to call it a substitute for tea;" and "Cocoa as an exciting stimulus it has not, might just as well offer chestnuts instead of tea," says Miss Nightingale, scornfully. Arrowroot is an excellent vehicle for wine, but has great nutritive power in itself; buttermilk is often of exceeding service, especially in fevers; even cheese has its place of much value, and that to a great under circumstances of disease which would seem specially to forbid it. Cold Nature sometimes plays false to all known science, and asserts her independence in the most extraordinary language.

"Feverishness is generally supposed to be a symptom of fever—in nine cases out of ten it is a symptom of bedding:" a symptom of piles of mattresses, with pillows, a feather-bed or two on the top, never unpicked, never cleansed, never changed or aired, and saturated with the moisture of the patient. Have you an iron bedstead with a hair mattress, light Witney blankets, no counterpane, no valance, no curtains. If possible, have two such beds for the very sick, who are obliged to be always in bed, and change the patient's restingplace every twelve hours. In the mean time, hang up the bed-clothes to air, and throw the bed open for the same purpose. Let the bed be low; if you make it too high the patient feels like a sandwich between four and a mattress; and let it be even with the throat of the chimney, and that in the current of best air; also let it be small, so that a nurse can easily manage it. Do not put a table or place it with one side to the wall; never put a tray down on it; let it be set in the lightest part of the room, and where the patient can look out of the window: in case of bed-sores, eschew blankets underneath, for they act as poultices and retain the damp. And let there be light—sunlight purifies, renovates, strengthens; unless in certain acute, nervous, or ophthalmic cases, light is almost always over-valued by the sick—always and without exception by the weakly and convalescent, to whom it acts as a tonic and a stimulant. If possible, have your walls painted with oil paint, which can be washed; cultivate a horror of the ordinary unglazed bed-room papers, which absorb the dirt from the air, can not be cleansed, and are mostly held to their places by putrid paste.

Abolish carpets, and have the floor perpetually swept and washed. Never offer advice. "Chattering hopes and advices" are moral nuisances that can not be admitted for a moment. To talk cheerfully is not to exaggerate stories of recoveries, or to make light of present danger; sympathy does not mean the proffering of all sorts of wild opinions, when the nurse requires only to be encouraged, and must know best what ought to be done—when, too, the adviser does not know all the facts of the case, nor the circumstances that modify it, nor can only judge of the broken leg by looking at the bedclothes. Have immense faith in "baby." Bring in baby for a minute, in the course of an hour, as the case may be; and those cool lips, those little fresh unconscious hands, those sweet wondering infant eyes, will do more for the patient than all the stupid words of all the foolish people in the world. Baby is a blessed creature in the sick-room, and has its little mission of usefulness and good. And a bit of pleasant news, a bit of good fortune happening to any of your friends, is good too, and brings a little of the outside cheerfulness of life flushing like health and youth into the chamber.

The chief mental or intellectual quality in a nurse is, perhaps, the power of observation. An observant nurse is a great mistake as Elephant or Muff, and the type of the Dutch nurse, "Sairy Gamp," a nurse who confounds instead of distinguishing between similar symptoms, is apt to lead her patient with no inquiring mind into a ditch. But this is a knowledge which comes only by experience, actual bedside experience, coupled with superior teaching, and, therefore, the more reason that the latter be severely visited. It only helps us to understand the full importance of accurate observing, and to hide, with Miss Nightingale, that this may be made a matter of scientific training and teaching, and that all professional education in this country is obliged to go through a regular system of instruction which shall qualify them for their work into something very different from Grimbones or Mrs. Gamp.

To this end, and to every other end ever so remotely connected with the sick-room, nursing, and with nursing of every kind, Miss Nightingale's Notes will conduce more effectually than any thing that has ever been written or spoken on the subject.

ON THE WAY TO CHARLESTON.

NO. II.

WASHINGTON CITY, April 9, 1860.

JEST tew think, dear Uncle Jack, that I'm a stayin' here tew the White House, as sosherble as a schoolmaster tew keep hum in his district, or a pop'lar with the children. Why, Mr. Buchanan ain't no more stuck up than our minister, and wears a white cravat just like ourn. As for Miss Lane, his neice—there, 'tain't no use—she's one of the puttyest gals ever you seed in all your born days. Ain't no wonder, when you think on it, that her Uncle Jemes hain't never got married, for she looks arter all his things, and never bothers him about nothin'. She seems tew be plus tha', for as John Bunyun sez in his Paradise Lost,

"My heart's down East, wherever I roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home:
And though I'm fur away from the old shop,
My heart's down East wherever I go!"

The President gits up bright and early, I tell you, and likes tew have them folks on afore I tew take tew drive the cous tew pastur. Then he shaves himself, not fancyin' moustaxhees, and ties on his cravat, and then sets down tew breakfast. Then he reads his neus paper, the Constitushun, but I don't see nuthin' funny in it, tho' they dew say it's masterly good. Arter that he sees sum company.

About half arter seven—sharp — breakfast's ready, down in the little dinin'-room, where there's a picter of Washington hangin' over. The restorator, I spose they call him, but ain't sure, is a Britisher named Pendergast, who cum over with a feller named Bulwer, and finally got into place. He cooks most splendid, and I'm sure, for the day or tew I shu'be here as Kabinet officer. But he gits my bill sum'h'r, I'll swar; and havin' sed the great cumin' here on that consarned skuner, I've put my considerashun in.

Well, arter breakfast Mr Buchanan walks about a little, and then goes up tew his offis, wher he gits sum letters. Sumtimes he don't, for I'm lucky if he hain't got no postage tew pay, I tell yew; and I'd rather read the warrant cullin' a tew mestin Mormons tew be hung than git a letter. Then he reads 'em, and some he answers, and some he tears rite up, and some he gives to little Jemes Buchanan, his secretery who has a masterly perlite little old chap a helpin' him write.

Then the Members of Congress come, and they call, say the Kabinet days, but I guess they don't. I hain't seen no grind-stone yet, but sort o' guess there's one in his offis, for some on 'em cum out a lookin' pale and miserable. Perwided I expect they be, these here members, arter all sorts of places, 'specially for boys as West Pinters, or in the Middshipmen's Skool at Annypolis. But the last is I dunno, but guess they take there leaves and goes to forrin parts.

Well, Fridy's the Kabinet days, but other days the President's tew hum tew the people when they hist the flags up on the State House to call in the Congressers, just as in Downinvil we stick eout a little red caller for the baker tew stop. And 'ain't tho a crowd! Mighty Cain! Why, the dipt down tew Portland ain't nothin' tew it. And they all want sumthin'—con'rully offices or sumthin tew draw pay fur. But he shakes 'em off rapidly. I tell yew, I'd as lief be Uncle Sam's bills furnishin' tew anshun, never stoppin' tew dwell. I shu think he'd git eout of all pashents, but it seems tew agree with him, tho' when tew o'clock strikes the sho's over, and those who go eout don't get no chexs.

Then the President writes his letters, and sees perticuler people till three o'clock, when he walks eout. He's got four hosses, and tew backs, and fellers to drive 'em rigged eout in uniform, but he loves them for Miss Lane, and stubs it off as independent tew his mind as any tew interest.

At five there's dinner. Can't say I fancy it, for the things ain't put on the table at furst, and when one hez been waitin' for 'em a half an hour's nice, and Miss Lane talks tew me about Downingville, and we drinks tew yew in sum Californy champain, which is good sort ov cider, I sed on with salleratus tew make it bubble mightily.

When he can, the President goes inter a parler, and plays with his children, three on 'em eout up in his offis, and lites his segar, and talks. Any how, up stairs or downs, mushin' or talkin', he's off tew bed at ten o'clock. I'm a kind ov old-fashioned style, fust havin' read the Herald, which he'l'eves in.

I mite go on and tell yew about the big green hous, where Mister Weed cums (no relashun of the psalms and hymns) has a mighty putty lot of flours, or of the watchman's rooms, where I love tew talk with a feller named Hopkins, who cum from New Hampshire, or the liber for sterrin' heat inter pipes, fired up by George Runlett. All this is mighty interestin.'

But I like tew hav Mr. Buchanan send Edward down arter me, and tew go up inter his offis, and tell. Sumtimes he's writin' his speech, that used tew print the Portland Argus, will cum in, and sumtimes Mr. Browne, that prints the Constitution, but generly he's alone, and I tell him, and any how we talks Charlestun.

As for bein' vestigashuns, Mr. Buchanan keeps his offis open 'round'th'clock. He hain't got nuthin tew hide, and he don't care, and the fellers that 'ain't satisfied with their share may go tew Haller-fax for all he cares, only he don't want his popularity tew know how he's accused by people who don't like him, and how his eggs'cutive and adjoyer a wig, which wig principles he's ollers gone agin.

Nor be ain't no candidate. I know this, for he's show'd me sum letters, for one of his Pennsylvany frends tew read tew the convention, fust thing. Don't mention this, but it's so.

Short, very. I'll be back tew go in fur? Tew which I say, sez I, I dun no! But it ain't a man whose furst name's Steven and whose last name's Douglas! Fact. Nor Jeff Davis, whose name's Jeff, nor Bell, whose name's Johnny. Your affexshunet nephew,

BENJAMIN DOWNING.

P.S.—Ther's a feller keeps a pesterin' me to claim for the time our country marched under Sargent Joel tew Madewaskur. He ses he'd will giv him half he'll git a big appropriation, and wants five dollars in advance. What da yew say?

ANOTHER ESCAPE OF A BALLOONIST.

WE are enabled, through the politeness of a Savannah correspondent, to publish the accompanying picture of the narrow escape of Mr. Cevor, the balloonist, from the ocean at Savannah, Georgia, on 8th March. Mr. Cevor gave the following account of his voyage to the editor of the Savannah Evening News:

Taking advantage of the slight lull in the wind, he ascended very rapidly from Armory Hall yard at three minutes after five o'clock, sailing away to the northeast, and gradually ascending; in the hope of meeting a current that would carry him more to the westward, until he had reached an elevation of about two miles and a half. Here he found a current that suited him to a nicetrue. Upon his right the vast ocean loomed away in the distance: while under him the forests, rivers, and habitations of men appeared very near as distant and as perfectly defined as the eye could desire, presenting a picturesque appearance, the most vivid imagination can conceive of, while every object, however minute, was distinct to sense. Finding that his course was gradually tending seaward, and quite certain that he would fail to encounter a current which would carry him further into the ocean, and not wishing to encounter that, there was a prospect of doing so in safety. The descent was commenced, when he struck a current which threatened to carry him out to sea, when he discharged more gas from his balloon, and hastened his downward course. Observing the precipitation, Mr. Dalton, that they must go into the water, which he saw was inevitable, his throat being very dry, he could only utter the words, if you can;" for the first time since their start exclamation of fear was uttered, having preserved a coolness and exhibited a nerve that but few men can boast of possessing.

He informed him that such a course would be certain death to both. Then changing positions—Mr. D. taking the reins, and Mr. Cevor standing into the car—the balloon quickly descended; and at twenty minutes after five o'clock, precisely, the vessel Oshgosa Sound, four miles distant from the city. The car was rapidly dragged through the water, the balloon surging and struggling to right itself, and ascend, and for nearly an hour Mr. Cevor was immersed up to his breast, until at last he was drawn on board the boat by the hands of Capt. Head. His descent had been attentively watched by Mr. Hopkins, who had procured with his wagon to render assistance, and rescued him and his companion from their perilous position. While in the water, one of the rope-rings broke, and the vessel, and the other broken: so that no means of controlling the balloon remained to them, and the combined effects of Mr. Savage, his negroes, and the accounts were of no avail in attempting to hold the monster; and rudely breaking away from its captors, it darted aloft, like a projectile, and in one moment more was hurtling away, like the fierce wind upon whose pinions it was borne, careering in the freedom that was its own, and by which it was carried off, over the sea, away from the land. Those who saw it, it could not penetrate, to the home of balloons alone. Dripping and cold, his wayward and volatile bearer gone, he was met with that unaffected and hearty welcome that a good and honest heart only knows how to offer, and conducted by Mr. Savage to his house.

ARREST AND RESCUE OF MR. SANBORN AT CONCORD, MASS.

WE publish on the following page a picture of the strange scene which took place at Concord, Massachusetts, on the night of the 3d instant. Mr. Sanborn, of New Hampshire, had refused to obey the summons of the Senate Investigating Committee, and that body had dispatched the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, Mr. Hume, to bring him. He was arrested in his own house, but was immediately rescued by his friends. He himself has published the following account of the affair:

"CONCORD, MASS., April 3, 1860.

11 P. O'CLOCK AT NIGHT.

"To the Citizens of Massachusetts:

"I have to inform you that a cowardly assault was committed on me this evening, at about a quarter past nine o'clock, in my own house, by four or five persons claiming to have authority to arrest me. The facts are these:

"I came in from a call about nine o'clock, and was sitting in my slippers, at my desk, when a knocking called me to the door. I went down stairs, opened the door, when a small man entered and said, 'Does Mr. Sanborn live here?' 'That is my name, Sir,' said I, putting out my hand to welcome him. 'Here is a paper for you,' said he, handing me a folded one, which I took.

"At that moment a gray-haired, tall, and stout man entered the front door, and said, 'I arrest you, Mr. Sanborn.' 'By what authority?' said I, 'and what is your name?' He gave me a name, but said, 'I am from the United States Marshal's office,' or words to that effect. I said, 'What is your authority, your warrant?' repeated it. 'I have no warrant,' said he, 'but I have a letter.' At this time two more men appeared. 'Show it, read it,' said I. A small crowd having himself gathered in the yard, for some would give their names), began to read a paper, but had got only a few lines when the gray-haired ruffian took a pair of handcuffs from his pocket and proceeded to put them on my wrists, I standing in my slippers, without a hat or coat, and thin in slippers of cloth.

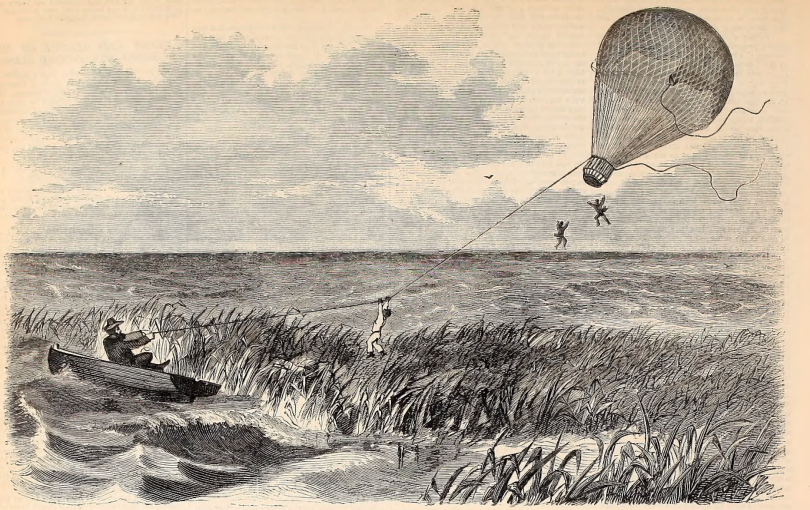
"A violence was given, some men rushed in, none of them known to me, and carried me by force to the street, where stood a carriage with two horses. They lifted me from the ground, and tried to put me in the carriage. I resisted with my feet, for my hands were fast in the manacles. They then lifted me three times without success, breaking the carriage: but the horses started and they could not get me in. In the mean time my cries and those of my sister had called my neighbors from their houses, who surrounded the ruffians and prevented them from carrying me off.

"I stood in the street in my slippers half an hour, wearing the handcuffs, until Deputy Sheriff Keyes came by force from the ruffians' hands under a writ of habeas corpus, issued by Judge Hoar. Their names, given after a long time, are as follows: Asa Fowle, Deputy Sheriff Coolidge, ——Tarleton, and —— Freeman. There were two or three others, whose names I have not learned.

"Fifteen minutes after I was handcuffed, standing in the street, Senator Wilson arrived, accompanied by the President Breckinridge, for my arrest, with an indictment from M'Neir, Sergeant-at-Arms of the United States Senate, authorizing the arrest, and I was put in jail. He did it I have said. People of Massachusetts, act as it seems to you best in this case.

"FRANKLIN B. SANBORN."

The subject has since been taken up in the Legislature of Massachusetts, which sympathizes warmly with Mr. Sanborn, and the prisoner having been brought up on habeas corpus before the Supreme Court, was promptly liberated.



Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

The New Paper
OF
"CLINGHAM & CO., BANKERS."
BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW,
AUTHOR OF "THE HASHEESH EATER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XII.
IN WHICH CLINGHAM & CO. GET THEIR NEW PARTNER.

AFTER John Masters had departed Clingham & Co. remained with her forehead pressed against a pane of a window, which looked out upon the street, for more than a quarter of an hour, and until it became perfectly evident that her father was not intending to return without full information. Another season of solicitude, almost as long, she spent in attempting to read, and repeatedly finding the attempt vain, as time and again she shut the book and walked to the window. At last her solicitude became an agony, and she determined that she would not wait any longer, but would go forth to seek Clingham & Co. and if he had come, to throw herself at his feet and supplicate that, whatever might be disclosed, he would have mercy upon one, for a heart-broken, much loving woman's sake.

True, she did not believe Ernest had ever committed any flagrant crime, for in the slightest connected with the difficulties in the Bank she had risen utterly above the unfath omable suspicion; but against the charge against him, his own absence was against him, and, worst of all, the dead superintendent might have accused him, and hoped or remedy by all sorts of false entries, interpolations, erasions upon the books which the Bank's province to keep, and which he, like all subordinate officers in such an institution, was far from having entirely under his own control. "Even now," said Nora to herself, "the tarry-breeches may be there; at this very moment he may be examining records whose falsity there is no living tongue to witness, and in his thought accusing Ernest of the blackest crimes at their instigation. Deliberate forgeries he was not to blame, interpolations of which he was never guilty, all the venomous lies that distil from the tongue of ill rumor, may be charged to his account and treasured up for the day when he shall be confronted with them, an innocent but a defenseless man." Then the horrible picture which the mysteriously dead superintendent had drawn, of a doom to State Prison for life, came floating in more than its original vividness before her eyes, carrying more fearful solemnity and omen with it from the fact that the lips which painted it were at that time so unaware near their last utterance. She could bear it no longer. It never once came into her mind what other women would do under the circumstances. She acted now just according to her noble womanhood; its pure, uncorrupted instincts leading her into the commission of that which as, even under protest, I will not connive with a lying social folly by calling it impropriety, I will coin a name for—she committed an unsanctity.

NARROW ESCAPE OF A BALLOONIST AT SAVANNAH, GEORGIA, MARCH, 1860.—FROM A SKETCH BY AMBROSE SPENCER, ESQ.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

ARREST AND RESCUE OF FRANK B. SANBORN, ESQ., AT CONCORD, MASSACHUSETTS, ON THE NIGHT OF APRIL 3, 1860.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

She dressed herself for the street, therefore, and set forth, as I have said, to visit the partner. But before she left the house she unlocked one of the drawers of her bureau and took from its recesses a small morocco-covered box, which she wrapped carefully in several layers of paper and hid beneath her mantilla. She then thought and felt a prayer for help and success, too deep for audible utterance, and departed with it, issuing out of her soul as she went.

John Potts's Tavern—the Eagle—being the house where, as its landlord was wont to say, every body that was any body stopped, and he cared for nobody else, Nora directed her steps thither. She rang at the private entrance and asked to see Mr. Potts. He heard the request, but only answered that there was no man of the name of Clingham in his house—no partner of any kind—he had his own wife, and he supposed she wouldn't do.

Nora turned away slowly from the door, wondering deeply within herself where she should go next, when a person whom she had never seen before—but whom we may recognize in brass-buttons, as large protuberance in the commissariat department of his being, a venerable white beard, and a pair of dust goggles—approached from the pump in front of the tavern, where, during all her interview with John Potts, he had been assiduously regarding the region of the milky way—bowed, and said, in a low tone,

"Did I understand the young lady to ask where she might find the partner who is here from Clingham & Co.?"

"I did ask that," said Nora, looking at the stranger with a gaze of surprise and search; "is he in town?"

"He is, Madame."

"And can you tell me where I may find him? You will confer a favor on me by doing so, if you have any right."

"The fact is this, Madame—the partner, being not as young as he once was, objects decidedly to fatigue; and as he knows that five of the six thousand estimable people who compose Chewick would be in his bedchamber at this moment, did they but know where that honored locality lay, he therefore, from motives of prudence, has not yet put up the handbills saying where he is to be exhibited. I have the honor to be Monsieur Achille Bindaud, the illustrious partner's valet de chambre, and her ladyship's very humble servant." And M. Achille Bindaud abased his venerable head until it hit the lower button of his waistcoat. Nora was about to turn away, thinking the man crazy, when he continued:

"Can Madame keep a secret? I doubt not that—yes? Let us go, then. If Madame preserve the silence and forgive the talk room where my poor venerable Mister must rest on account of the weak eyes, the rheumatiz, the liability of to speak above the littlest voice for his malady of the throat—all can be arranged. Let us go! Pardon that I go before to show the way."

"I can do no better than to follow him," thought Nora. "He is yet early twilight, and he seems only a comical fellow who is not at all mischievous. It is perfectly natural, too, that the partner should not wish to receive all Chewick, as he would have to do if it were known where he is. He is a very old man, it seems—God grant that he may be also a fatherly!"

Her voluble guide managed to get out of Chewick Main Street without addressing any further remarks to her. He turned down a secluded side street, out of that into another, and finally, when Nora had begun to wonder whether all this were a plot or a serious jest, he stopped at a quiet and entirely unpretentious house of brick, that was once white, but needed sadly to be reminded of it by the partner, and opened the picket gate in front, saying,

"This is the place, Madame. Excuse the looks, I pray you."

Nora hesitated about entering.

"Frankly, Madame suspects the house? I do not marvel. But let me give a proof."

He threw open the front door, and on a large trunk, which he dragged out to the light for her inspection, was plainly painted, with a far from recent look, "Clingham—New York."

Nora summoned her heart and passed in. There was no reason to suspect evil except her loneliness, and that gave her the right to ask a better protection than man's.

"Will Madame walk into the parlor one instant, while I mount on high to announce her to Monsieur?"

"Certainly."

He flung back the door of the room at their right hand and drew a curtain to the window, bowing Nora into it. After which he hurled himself up stairs in a manner very juvenile for a valet with so venerable a beard.

Nora had no time, even had she wished it, to prepare her overflowing heart for any set and formal speech. There was a sound overhead of rumbling and thumping, as of men putting things to rights in a hurry—and then Achille returned, saying,

"Would Madame ascend? Monsieur would gratify himself much of that honor."

With a spirit that could not Heaven in inaudible agony for wisdom, help, fortitude to bear the best or worst, Nora followed the valet up to his master's room. It was twilight, as has been said, but a balmy summer one, so that the lamps were not lighted, and the air from without fanned gratefully in through the wide open windows, just perceptibly rustling the curtains. There could not have been a pleasanter room for an invalid as the poor partner who had come to settle Chewick's troubles seemed to be. He sat in a large easy-chair, his feet resting on another, and a shawl thrown over him. His forehead rested on his hand, and as Nora came in and modestly bowed, with her sad, earnest face and drooping veil, he only feebly inclined his head in a gentlemanly recognition, and said in a half whisper,

"Please be seated."

Then nodded and waved his hand to the faithful Achille to withdraw, which he had not obeyed the summons the partner bowed to Nora again to intimate his audience.

"Mr. Clingham," she began, with a painful trembling in her voice, "I am a young lady whose name would perhaps be familiar to you, if connected with that nature of my business with you makes it desirable, for the present at least, that I should not name myself. There is a letter—"

"Excuse me, Madame," he said, and in it perfect confidence that neither it, nor any thing else I shall say to you, shall ever be communicated to another?"

"You may, Madam, with perfect security," he whispered.

"I wish to say, then, that I know, through no improper or unreliable sources, something of the reason why you are here. There have been recent transactions, perhaps, in the way in your Banking House in this place. There are rumors abroad that all the officers of the Bank, save one—Mr. Newton—have absconded, that he is dead, strangely dead, are now in confinement on serious criminal charges."

The gentleman sighed and uttered, "True!"

"And to-day there came to my father's house a person in search of one who has not yet been arrested, but who, I fear, will answer to similar accusations." Nora's voice, which had hitherto been tremulous, now grew strong and clear.

"I come to you to speak of that one particularly. I have a deep interest in that man; you, Clingham, have I be, I owe it to you, if evil comes to him—I—I—"

Her voice choked again, and she could not complete her sentence. The partner buried his face in both hands and was visibly moved; his whole frame shaking like a leaf, in sympathy with the young girl's emotion. She governed herself, and went on calmly:

"The name of the young man—Ernest—Beckford. The affairs of the Bank may be so complicated that he may seem to be involved. His enemies may have made his books tell lies, for there was one who I do not believe lived that—though he is dead, I will mention his name—Mr. Green. Perhaps in his life he may have wronged him. Circumstances may look dark against him; but he is, oh, Mr. Clingham! he is as innocent as Heaven! And now, the request I have to make is this: If you have examined the books of the Bank, or if you shall, and find any deficiency that would fall to his account, let me plead with you, let me entreat you not to deal with him by law! I have brought you all I have—neither it is much or little I do not know, but it is all my mother left me." And Nora opened the little morocco box.

"Here is a gold watch—it is large and old-fashioned, but it is an excellent time-keeper. Here are two bracelets—pearls. And here is a pearl necklace here too, besides a pair of pearl ear-drops and several rings, one of them a diamond. I have been counting them up, and if I calculate right there are things here that are worth several hundred dollars. Keep, I shall never wear them, and if you will not take them and save him I shall hate them always! Will they not partly pay the deficiency that may be in his books? If they will, dear Sir! forgive me for asking you to take them, and give him time to pay the rest. He will do it—he would work like a slave—work to the death to do it, though he is innocent. Oh, for the dear sake of our Father in heaven, be merciful like Him, and take them!"

As she said this she tried to put them into his hand, but he gently pushed them away. She thought he was refusing her prayer—for the shadow which, as night grew deeper, was creeping closer over all things had him and the trees which were running through his fingers—and she threw herself upon her knees in the desperation of the one last entreaty:

"Oh, pity me! pity me!" she cried. "Are you a father—or if not that, haven't you some one, something to love—do you not at least love God?—and how could you bear it if He were torn out of the heavens and away from you? Have mercy—and that the God of an innocent man and of a broken-hearted girl, who will pray for you day and night, will bless you! He is innocent. Come whatever may upon his head, God is with him for evermore. The noble, the pure, the high-souled one; that knows baseness only as a terrible distant name: that is the best, the truest, the most upright man who breathes! Save him! But save him or not, I also, will love Him till time is no more."

"Amen! and as God liveth, not even death shall henceforth part thee and me."

"My God!" said Nora, "who spoke then?"

The partner, now standing up in his manly erectness, led her, all bewildered and pale as snow, to the faint twilight of the window. What it that up through that sky, measureless in the bivouac of the hosts of God, the lights really burned gladder for the joy they shone on, or did Love give a miracle of clearness to the eyes of the soul? for there was light enough at that window for Nora to see that the partner into whose arms she fell was none other than—Ernest Beckford!

CHAPTER XIII.

YET NOT OF ERNEST Beckford; for as will have already been discovered, the young man who, to detect the chief causes in the ruin which wickedness was bringing upon Chewick's Branch and its insnared junior officers, took this assumed name with the position of a subaltern, was truly the youngest partner of the name and house of Clingham. Save the other members of the firm none had known the secret, not even the renowned and reformed little Filkins had been intrusted with it until his return from New York, for the last was the dramatic transformation of Achille Bindaud.

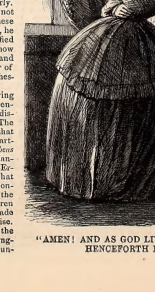
The affairs of the Bank were discovered to be in a truly lamentable condition. The superintendent had used his position to issue forged paper to large amounts, for which the Bank was, at least, in honor bound. The widows and orphans who had received it, and, absurdly enough, honor and necessity were synonyms with the Messrs. Clingham, which fact made the conscience of the house, though for a time only, better off than their ledgers. I am happy to say that in those extreme Lake Green none of the subalterns were found to be involved very deeply. Todds, cashier, was the most so. To pay his punishing defalcation Green had defalcated also to the amount of $1500. His poor old father, the worthy butcher we have mentioned, paid this for him, and every vigorous measures were taken, and, to save the excellent man's gray hairs from so sorrow-ing grave, the son was allowed to escape by flight. That is to hope he does better at Geoding, where he follows the paternal trade, than he did here.

As for the other errors amount to nothing besides drunkenness, shameless carelessness, and irresponsibility. Luke Green had supplied them with money for their vices, gambling it back from them till they had no more, and taking their notes for the balance. The wallet which Ernest had seized by his hazardous but successful stroke at the punch-party was full of these, with other evidences of the superintendent's guilt. Ernest returned, with several reprimands and a thorough fright, to the heedless victims who had given them; and they felt their punishment augmented by their profit, though they did have to be dispensed with by the Bank. May they too learn a lesson not to be a knave's fools!

Little Filkins was fortunately taken in hand soon enough to save an excellent man made of him. He is a blessing to the "fine mother and splendid sisters" of whom he is justly proud, as well as to another young woman, who finds him a great comfort on Sunday evenings, and shows symptoms of meaning before long to take him eternally. Though he has not gone into the Siamese fraternal business, he feels perfectly satisfied with his lot, being now that most estimable and responsible cashier of Clingham & Co., Chewick Branch.

But we are leaving a very excellent gentleman in a very disagreeable place. The very same night that Nora visited the partner a writ of habeas corpus took Mr. Manton out of jail—Ernest explaining, what he could not in honor explain, that the change of children which had been made was after this wise. He himself was the son of Samuel Clingham, and the youngest of four of his own sex. Mr. Joseph Clingham, on the other hand—as the mother of Luke Green had said—was the father of an unmarried family of girls. When he, Ernest namely, was born to Samuel, and a girl, Nora by name, was given by Heaven to Joseph, the two brothers, for variety's sake, proposed an exchange. But Samuel Clingham and his wife felt a delicacy about having this fact known. Ernest was then employed their old friend John Manton to go to the secluded town of Hyde Park with their boy and make the transfer for them. Now Green met him there, and, as was intended, got the idea that the boy John Manton gave her was his own. The name of the girl whom he received from her struck him as a pretty one, and when, several years after, he had a daughter he named her Nora Clingham Manton. Which state of facts, together with an old woman's forgetfulness of the lapse of recent time, caused Luke Green's mother to make the mistake she did about the identity of John Manton's daughter. When, upon Ernest's appearance before herself and the coroner, she was fully aware of the phantasm and gilt lie she had persuaded her unprincipled son to chase to his death, she went home to Blinker's Court, and on the morrow was found to have followed him—dead in her bed—by poison, or nature and terror, I know not. The explanation just detailed, together with Turkle's and Filkins's affidavits as to the manner of Luke Green's discovery, satisfied the ends of justice and Coroner Doldrum, if indeed that be not a repetition of the same idea; this worthy magistrate having, if any part of justice, the ends, and the very small ends at that. So Mr. Manton was restored to his house.

It was thought better, after all the troublous experience which these chapters have recited of engineering Chewick Branch through uninterested subalterns, that a resident partner should take the superintendence. It was Ernest Beckford, now no longer Beckford but Clingham, in name as in truth, who was elected to the place. And it was on the very first day of his presidency that he took into the firm



THE NEW PARTNER OF CLINGHAM & CO., BANKERS"

—took her in with bride-cake and blushes—with the sweetest smiles of heaven and kisses of earth. Took her in to be ready Nora Clingham —as she played she was in her Banking-room soliloquy, where Ernest first heard her dear voice—and John Manton had his draft honored, his coat repaired by getting a new one, and his head once more uplift among his equals. Took her in to write the paternal-sole and the human-heart sides of the Bank House in an indissoluble marriage; so that golden plenty should flow across to the family-pair, and they love should hover like a winged flame over the head of the new president in his office, coming from the west wide to where the sun appears when work was done. Took in the New Partner, finally, with great thanksgivings audible from the heart, and prayers, and praises unspoken, from the mingled soul of them both, to Him who had so opened their doors to Love, Angel-daughter Faith, that blessing them for their welcome, she made within them a dearer home for her sister Love, where both dwelt, twin angels, unshakably, eternally.

"All the life of the young man is but a pilgrimage from one sweet woman's breast to one other. From the bosom out of whose life he came, he goes voyaging wearily, painfully, and yet he hath none, until he come to the bosom with whose life he is to be one for evermore."

Faith had sung, "Be sure that rest will come!" Love, in silvery antistrophe answered back, "I have found it!"

THE END.

"AMEN! AND AS GOD LIVETH, NOT EVEN DEATH SHALL HENCEFORTH PART THEE AND ME."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

Premature Loss of the Hair,

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and it has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth.

It is unrivaled as a dressing for the hair, a single application rendering it soft and glossy for several days.

The following testimonial is conclusive of its efficacy in the case of Baldness.

BOSTON, November 24, 1859.

Gentlemen: When I first used your Cocoaine, I had been bald seven years. In the mean time I had used a dozen different preparations, specially recommended for baldness, and all claiming to be infallible), without any beneficial effect.

The ladies of my household urged me to try your Cocoaine, which I did, to please them, not having, myself, any faith in the power of man to restore my hair. I have used the contents of one bottle, and my bald pate is covered all over with young hair, about three-eighths of an inch long, which appears strong and healthy, and determined to grow.

In a word, your Cocoaine is excellent—the best preparation for the hair I have ever known, and the only one which accomplishes more than it promises.

Very truly your obliged and obd't servant,

D. T. MERWIN.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by druggists, generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

F. L. HEDENBERG & SONS,
No. 3 Bond Street, near Broadway,

Revolving Refrigerators.

PARLOR, HALL, AND OFFICE STOVES, COOKING RANGES, HEDENBERG'S PORTABLE HEATERS AND FURNACES, HOT-AIR FURNACES FOR COAL AND WOOD,

REGISTERS, VENTILATORS, ETC.

This Refrigerator is made in an octagon form, and is very economical as well as useful. The ice-chamber is situated at the top, occupying one half the area of the box, and about half its depth. The chief half of the top of the box, to half the depth of the ice-chamber, is the milk and butter cellar. It has a zinc bottom, and is entirely separate from other parts of the Refrigerator. Access is gained to this as well as the ice-chamber, by raising the top. Under the milk and butter is a wire-closet of the same size. The balance of the Refrigerator is in one general apartment, where all kinds of meat, poultry, fish, fruit, &c., &c., can be kept in a pure, healthy state. The shelves consist of wickets, which turn on an axis, bringing any article that may be desired in front of its respective door. They are well ventilated, use very little ice, and have three times as much storage room as any other refrigerator in the market. The same space on the floor. Please call and see them, or send for circular giving full description. They can be shipped to any part of the country with safety.

N. B.—Prompt attention paid to heating, ventilating, repairing, &c., &c., in city or country.

Spring Card.

Our importations and selections of all choice fabrics of the French and English markets suitable for our city trade, have been received, and are now ready. They embrace many beautiful styles of Cassimeres, Spring Coatings and Vestings of our own special designs, to be found nowhere else. Our friends would do well to make early selections.

Our stock of Spring Clothing both for men and boys is now ready, and in great variety. Notwithstanding the well-known superiority of our make and style, we are prepared to sell at the lowest figures in the trade.

DEVLIN, HUDSON & CO.,
258, 259, and 260 Broadway.

"Trefelio" is the Beauty.

"TREFELIO" Cures all Eruptions.

"TREFELIO" Softens the Skin.

"TREFELIO" Beautifies the Skin.

"TREFELIO" Eradicates Humors.

"TREFELIO" 50 cents a bottle.

$1200 per year. Agents wanted. Send stamp to Excelsior Agency, N. Y. City.

Cataract Washing-Machine.

CLOTHES WASHED AND LABOR SAVED—by the best WASHING MACHINE ever invented, and the only one that accepts the action of the water WITHOUT RUBBING, and without wearing out clothing. PRICES, $15, $14, AND $16. Wholesale Depot, No. 56 Beekman Street, New York. Rights for sale.

SULLIVAN & HYATT.

LONDON and PARIS WORLD of FASHION.—Monthly—Price $4 a year—Single copies 50 cents—arrives here about the Twelfth of each month. The best and most reliable for Fashions actually worn. Contains Four Colored Fashion Plates, and one plate Millinery, and a full size paper pattern cut out ready for use.

WILLMER & ROGERS, 43 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Asthma or Phthisic.

A spasmodic affection of the Bronchial Tubes, which are covered with a dry, tenacious phlegm.—Dunglison's Bronchial Troches" will, in some cases, give immediate relief. If of long standing, persevere with them—they will alleviate in time.

"An old lady friend having tried many remedies for Asthma, with no benefit, found great relief from the Troches."—Rev. D. LEYS, Frankfort, Ill.

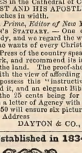
A GREAT GOSPEL PICTURE.—THE CHEAPEST ENGRAVING EVER PUBLISHED.—Dayton & Co.'s Magnificent Engraving of Thorwaldsen's SACRED STATUES in the Cathedral of Copenhagen, representing CHRIST AND HIS APOSTLES, 50 inches in length and 24 inches in width.



From Rev. Dr. Prime, Editor of New York Observer.

THORWALDSEN'S STATUARY.—One of the pictures hangs in our study, and we regard the work as eminently suitable for the walls of every Christian household.

The religious Press of the country speak in enraptured terms of the work, and recommend its introduction into every family in the land. The proof-sheets were sold at $20 each; but with the view of affording every family an opportunity to possess this "instructive picture," the engravers publish it, and an elegant Blake bound in velvet, for $3 25, the 25 cents being for return postage. $1 11 will secure a Copy and Agency with one copy of the Engraving. $4 50 will ensure six pictures, postage free, to one address. Address

DAYTON & CO., 37 Park Row.

Established in 1834.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,
Manufacturer of the Overstrung
GRAND & SQUARE PIANO-FORTES
Manufactory and Warerooms
No. 432 to 438 East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five Years, and Prices are moderate.

At Walker's Warerooms,
Cisters Building, corner Broadway,
A Large Stock of Pianos of every description for sale and hire.

FOUR DOLLAR HATS.—LEARY & CO. 98 CORTLANDT STREET, & 97 DEY-STREET, No. 2 & 4, and 5 Astor House, having increased their facilities of manufacture, and purchased their materials generally in EUROPE and in this market, are now prepared to offer at the above price an article which, in quality, style and finish, can not be approached by any other house in the trade. These Hats are all of their own production, and made under their personal supervision; and as for a series of years every improvement has been introduced in their factories, they now state confidently that their fabrics are unsurpassed.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have just Published,

THE HISTORY OF FRANCE.

From the Earliest Times to the French Revolution of 1789.

Vol. I.
(ANCIENT GAUL.)

By PARKE GODWIN.

8vo, Muslin, $2 00.

This is the first complete and elaborate History of France, from original sources, ever attempted in the English language. Mr. Godwin has been many years engaged in its preparation, and has spared no pains to make it worthy of his own reputation.

The publication will, it is believed, add another to the brilliant list of great historical works, by which Bancroft, Prescott, Hildreth, and Motley have already placed American authors high in the ranks of historical literature.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the normal labors of the female organs produce a variety of diseases which this Catholicon will counteract and cure. It can be relied upon in cases of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation, Profluous Uteri, Leucorrhœa, Ulceration of the Womb, Faintness, Lassitude, &c. Where every thing else has failed, this article is never taken without benefit. The suffering female should have it united. A pamphlet, with full symptoms, treatment, letter, &c., sent (gratis) by mail, delivered by any Agent. It is sent by every town, or sent by express. Be cautious of an imitation, connected similar in name, with my certificates altered, &c. Address BARNES & PARR, No. 13 Park Row, N. Y.; J. R. PARK, Cincinnati or Louisville; WEEKS & POTTER, Boston; or CALLENDER & CO., Philad.

J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Utica, N. Y.

NEARLY READY.

The First Volume of Harper's Library Edition
of
BULWER'S NOVELS.

THE CAXTONS.

A Family Picture.

By Sir E. B. LYTTON.

12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 85.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, N. Y.

"The Little Giant of the West."

LIFE OF STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS,
UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.
WITH
His most Important Speeches and Reports.
By a MEMBER OF THE WESTERN BAR.

One handsome 12mo, with a Portrait on Steel, Price $1. Cheap Edition, not including all the Speeches, 50 cents.

The Publishers are confident that the above volume, containing

AN ACCURATE AND RELIABLE
BIOGRAPHY OF SENATOR DOUGLAS,

will be welcomed by the great mass of the Democratic Party in all parts of the country, and read with interest by men of all parties in the world.

"The most important of Mr. Douglas's Speeches are incorporated in this volume, and the whole work submitted, before publication, for criticism to some of Mr. Douglas's most judicious friends, and by them it is cordially approved and recommended.

DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers, New York.

Copies by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publishers.

"Just the Book to cheer up a Young Fellow."

"A Thoroughly Sound and Healthy Book."

"I recommend every father of a family to get this book, and let his boys read it—and then read it himself."

SELF-HELP.
With Illustrations of Character and Conduct.

By Samuel Smiles.

One Volume 12mo.

"THE LIFE OF GEORGE STEPHENSON."

With complete Analytical Index. New Edition. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

Mr. Smiles's book—so full of bright nuness, touching narratives, and lofty instruction—we pass with commendation to a public that is sure to be gratified with it.—Athenæum.

We can not imagine a more useful guide to put into the hands of a youngster about to carve his own way in life than this book.—Boston Bee.

Altogether a thoroughly sound and healthy book, and we can not imagine any one reading it without catching a portion of the fervor with which the author has illustrated and enforced his subject.—PRESS.

No young man can read this work, if there are any life and enterprise in him, without receiving a stimulus to his desire to be the need of his powers, and encouragement to help himself along the road to distinguished usefulness, if not to distinguished greatness. Such a book is eminently fitted to the meridian of the United States, a country where men make themselves and the name which they bear.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send "Self-Help" by mail, postage pre-paid, on receipt of 75 cents.

THE GRANGER PATENT SELF-WEDDING ENVELOPE, just issued, very beautiful (copyright secured), at EVERDELL'S Wedding Card Depot, No. 302 Broadway, cor. Duane Street. Also, French PAPER.

The Greatest Medical Discovery of THE AGE.

Dr. Kennedy, of Roxbury, Mass., has discovered a common pasture weed that cures every kind of HUMOR from the worst SCROFULA down to a common pimple.

By strict attention to the direction in the pamphlet around each bottle, and a judicious application of the Salt Rheum Ointment, Healing Ointment, and Scrofula Ointment, ULCERATION and CORRUPT ULCERS are cured in a few weeks.

For sale by every Druggist in the United States.

ARTHUR'S
GREAT AND BEST TEMPERANCE BOOK.
The Tavern Keeper's Victims.
A SERIES OF TEMPERANCE TALES.
By T. S. ARTHUR.

1 vol. 12mo, with Ten Electrotype Illustrations—bound in embossed cloth, gilt backs.

Retail Price, One Dollar.

This work is undoubtedly one of Mr. Arthur's best productions, and it will be found to exceed many in popularity and successful sale.

Agents are wanted everywhere to engage in its sale.

Price One Dollar.

Copies sent by mail on receipt of the price.

LEARY, GETZ & CO., Publishers,
Philadelphia.

LADIES desiring UNDER-LINEN READY MADE will find at the STORE 907 BROADWAY, above 20TH ST., a choice assortment exclusively to this, an assortment, especially for "EVERY-DAY WEAR," of entirely new and beautiful make.

LADIES' and CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.—S. CHAMBERS'S ESTABLISHMENT, the oldest and best in the United States, has always on ample supply of LADIES' and CHILDREN'S CLOTHING. Children's Wardrobes, Infants', Dresses, and Babies de Chambre. The only establishment where Ladies and Merchants can all be supplied with the newest and best Styles. S. CHAMBERS has secured the best talent, both native and foreign, with a capacity for each element of the newest Fashions. Ladies and Merchants supplied at the lowest prices, wholesale and retail, by S. CHAMBERS, No. 503 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel.

LABOR-SAVING ARTICLE.

F. A. Cannon's Patent Smoothing and Polishing Iron.

Having a Roller, By the aid of which, A fine finish to linen is produced on all Linens, with half the Labor and half the time.

For sale by the Trade.

W. A. CORBIERE, Agent, 373 Broadway.

Spalding's Prepared Glue.

For mending Toys, Crockery, &c. Manufactured by HENRY C. SPALDING & CO.,
No. 43 Cedar Street, N. Y.

CARD.

A. & G. A. ARNOUX, so long and reputably known as Fashionable Tailors, beg to announce to the public that they have added a department for Boys' Clothing to their establishment, in which all the finest and newest styles of goods will be kept. This will enable our customers to obtain all the goods they may be in need of for themselves and the male part of their families at our house.

Of our Men's Furnishing Department it is unnecessary for us to say any thing, as it already has the name of having the best goods, and best styles of goods, to be found in the city.

521 Broadway, under St. Nicholas.

MR. MCCUNE, formerly of Genin's Bazaar, will be happy to see his friends in our new location, to which not only he, but Mr. Ireiton, the Superintendent there of the Boys' work have removed.

$100 PER MONTH made by any one with our $10 Stencil Tools. Address JOHN MILLIKEN, Lawrence, Mass.

Throat and Lung Diseases.

Of all remedies for Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Influenza, Croup, Whooping Cough, Asthma, Phthisic, Quinsy, Tickling, Irritation, or Inflammation of the Throat, Chest, or Lungs, Incipient Consumption, &c., there is no one which, for safety and efficacy, or which affords such rapid and permanent relief, as the well-known and long-established

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

The only genuine is prepared by SETH W. FOWLE & CO., BOSTON, and is sold everywhere.

!!SOMETHING NEW!!

A HEMMER, TUCKER, FELLER, BINDER, AND GUAGE combined, just patented, simple, hemming any width and thickness of cloth either side, applied to any Sewing Machine by any one in a few minutes. Retail price $5. LIBERAL DISCOUNT TO THE TRADE. Orders by mail supplied, postage paid. Instructions accompany every hemmer. Send for a circular.

UNIVERSAL HEMMER CO.,
429 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Harnden's Express.

—DAILY—

Forwards Valuables and Merchandize to and from, and collects Drafts and Bills, in all parts of the

EAST, WEST AND SOUTH.

Will receive goods, or orders to "call," at

74 Broadway.

'Children's Fancy Hats.

In obedience to a growing demand for a high order of

Dress Hat for Children,

we have just opened a new, select and beautiful assortment of recent importation and manufacture, comprising every desirable description and pattern, and furnished in the most appropriate manner. A general assortment of BOYS' and YOUTH'S HATS and CAPS, LADIES' RIDING HATS, &c., &c.

WARNOCK & CO.,
613 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel.

S. S. & W. WOOD, WHOLESALE BOOKSELLERS AND PUBLISHERS,
No. 389 Broadway,

Invite the attention of Country Merchants and others to their stock of

SCHOOL, CLASSICAL AND MEDICAL BOOKS, comprising all the varieties used in the different sections of the Union. BLANK BOOKS and STAPLE STATIONERY of every description. Liberal wholesale rates.

No. 389 Broadway.

MADAME RALLINGS,
515 CANAL STREET, N. Y.,

Has opened a superior assortment of French millinery. ☞ French Pattern Bonnets received monthly.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.

SINGER'S No. 1 FAMILY MACHINE, $75.

HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

The Readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY

Can have purchased and forwarded to them, with dispatch, any Article this City affords, by sending their Orders, addressed to WM. S. WYSE, Office HARPER'S WEEKLY.

N. B.—Orders from Ladies will receive the attention of MRS. W., if required.

BRODIE'S GRAND OPENING FOR SPRING AND SUMMER MANTILLAS, AT No. 300 CANAL STREET, AND FIFTH AVENUE, CORNER 23d STREET, (Under the Hotel.) on Tuesday, April 10.

The Canal Street store needs no comment; its well-known reputation is world-wide. The Fifth Avenue is unequaled in the world, and goods corresponding.

A QUICK ARTICLE.

A good Agent wanted in each large town of the Union for

DENSLOW'S SARSAPARILLA—QUART BOTTLES.

Retail price only 50 cents. Terms peculiarly favorable. Address the depot,

159 WATER STREET, NEW YORK.

Crystal Battery Magnetic Machine, For Extracting Teeth without Pain, and for Medical Purposes.

INVENTED BY S. B. SMITH. PRICE $12. "This is the only instrument in the world with both the DIRECT and TO-and-FRO Currents. The Zinco never requires cleaning. Expense of running it, One Cent a week. Address Dr. S. B. SMITH, 742 Canal Street, N. Y.

COURT OF DEATH.

For One Dollar and 4 postage stamps, the subscriber will forward post-paid, one engraving of this sublime painting. Address G. Q. COLTON, 37 Park Row, New York. P. O. Box 4,586.

MME. DEMOREST'S brilliant display of PATTERNS of the Spring and Summer FASHIONS; and Mme. Demorest's Prize-Medal HOOP SKIRTS, for Wednesday. Patterns sent by mail or express. Send for Circular.

"A most Stirring Narrative of Border Life."

—

Life and Times of Gen. Sam. Dale, THE MISSISSIPPI PARTISAN.

By J. F. H. CLAIBORNE.

Illustrated by JOHN McLENAN.

12mo, Muslin, $1.

Fiction has presented few inventions so full of absorbing interest as the life of "Gen. Dale, the Mississippi Partisan, who was one of the bold and unconquerable spirits who fought the red-skins beyond the Great River toward the setting sun," who, "on his individual career, performed acts of personal daring that would have suffered for a regiment of latter-day land heroes, and who, after voluntarily fighting through the Creek War, was made a brigadier-general and a colonel at half-pay, as a mark of gratitude, by the Alabama Legislature, and subjected to various other marks of well-deserved honor. The incidents of his eventful life are collected in a handsomely printed and beautifully illustrated volume, made up from his personal recollections of "one who knew him," by J. F. H. Claiborne, a very graphic writer. It will make the reader familiar with a most interesting phase of our country's history.—Troy Daily Times.

We doubt not that this work will be one of thrilling interest, and will command a large sale throughout the whole country. Col. Claiborne, above all other men in the State, is peculiarly fitted for a literary labor of the kind—whether as an epistolary, political, or biographical writer, he ever fails to charm with the flowing ease and polished eloquence of his pen. SAM DALE was a man of no ordinary parts, and his name and fame may be esteemed as devoted to having such a faithful chronicler.—Mississippian.

The book abounds in thrilling narratives of Indian warfare.—Cincinnati Gazette.

An entertaining and exciting as a romance.—Providence Journal.

A most stirring narrative of border life.—Norfolk Examiner.

The Hon. Mr. Claiborne, late a member of Congress from Mississippi, has rescued from oblivion the romantic life—the Indian fights—the daring exploits—the heroic character—the dauntless courage, and devoted patriotism of Gen. DALE, whose name was familiar as a household word to all the early log-cabin settlers of the southwest, as well as terror to the Indian tribes, whose "massacre" of the "early settlers" are yet "familiar tales" of the venerable men who still linger here and there, memorials of a glorious, heroic, and dangerous past! Thanks to Mr. Claiborne for this book. It will find thousands of readers in the South and West; and the hundreds of Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, and Mississippi will live their lives over again, and have their youth renewed as they bend over its exciting pages and read of scenes of "youthful times," "when the war-whoop waked the sleep of the cradle."—Carr. Cleveland Leader.

More interesting than a work of fiction.—Eastern Argus.

The book will not only interest for its stirring adventure, but it will benefit the reader by bringing him in contact with a sterling and brave nature.—N. O. Christian Advocate.

A genuine picture of border life, instinct with the true spirit of American adventure.—Boston Transcript.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of $1 00.

Life and Services of STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS.

By J. W. Sheahan, Editor of the Chicago Times.

FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES.

With Portrait. One Vol., 300 pages, 12mo, $1 00.

WILL BE SHORTLY ISSUED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square.

Early orders solicited.

VIOLIN MUSIC—A New Collection. ONE HUNDRED BEAUTIFUL MELODIES for the Violin, selected from all the best Operas. Price 63 cents. Sent by mail on receipt of the price. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

AGENTS WANTED

To sell, by subscription, PARTON'S LIFE OF ANDREW JACKSON, to be published in three large 8vo volumes, with steel Portraits, price in plain binding, $3 50 per volume. This is one of the most salable books ever published in this country. The volumes are now ready, and the third will be issued next August. It is, consequently, now the best time to canvass for it. NOW SETS ARE BEING ASKED FOR AGENTS, and to such liberal commissions are given, with exclusive territory.

Published by MASON BROTHERS, Nos. 5 and 7 Mercer Street, New York.

30,000 Copies sold since January 1st.

EVERYBODY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS.

By FRANK CROSBY, OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR,

Tells you how to draw up Partnership Papers, Bonds and Mortgages, Deeds and Leases, Wills, Notes and Bills of Exchange, and gives general forms for Agreements of all kinds, Bills of Sale, Leases, Notices, Receipts and Releases.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the LAWS for the Collection of Debts, with the Statutes of Limitation and amount each State will allow you to collect, exclusive, in every State; also how to make an Assignment properly, with forms for Composition with Creditors, and the Insolvent Laws of every State.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the legal relations existing between Guardian and Ward, Master and Apprentice, and Landlord and Tenant; also, what constitutes Libel and Slander, and the Law of Libel; Barratry, Dower, the Wife's Right in Property, Divorce and Alimony.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the LAW for Mechanic's Liens in every State, and the Naturalization LAWS of this country, and how to comply with the same; also, the Law concerning Pensions, and the Patent Office, and the Pre-emption Law to Public Lands.

CROSBY'S LAWYER gives you the Law for Patents, with mode of procedure in obtaining one, with Interferences, Assignments and Sales, and how to make your Will, and how to Administer on an Estate, with the law and requirements thereof, in every State.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the meaning of Law Terms in general use, and explains to you the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Powers of both the General and State Governments; also, how to keep out of law, by showing how to do business legally, thus saving a vast amount of property and vexatious litigation by its timely consultation.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS contains 300 pages, is bound in a strong and open type, and will be sent by mail, neatly bound and postage paid, by express, free of charge, to Merchants, every Man of Business, and everybody in every State, on receipt of $1 00, or in law style at $1 25.

Address FRANK CROSBY, Publisher, No. 2 South Fifth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA

Is the best and cheapest corrective and alterative medicine in the world; delicate ladies and young children are benefited and strengthened in a surprising manner under its renovating and invigorating influence.

CHILTON ON THE CROTON, OR RIVER WATER.

The Displays, Politics, Fashions and Fun of McKENZIE & O'HARA, is the kind of groove Filter to which I alluded in my last request to the public for food. I consider the artificial sandstone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose, as the stuff is quite durable, and only requires to be reversed occasionally to insure its purity.

JAMES B. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.

Manufactured and sold by MCKENZIE & O'HARA, No. 564 4th Street, corner of Bowery.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

AN ENTIRE NEW STYLE,

Designed for all manufacturing purposes.

Noiseless in its operation, and capable of every kind of work, it is the best machine ever produced.

Price only $130.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

TWO WORKS, VALUABLE TO THE SICK OR WELL, sent by mail, to pay expected until received and read and approved. Address, Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

1st. Six lectures on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to 160 years. 360 pages, 96 engravings. Price fifty cents, in silver or Postoffice stamps.

2d. A work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Nervous System, Blood, Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Palsy, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what to prevent it. 112 pages, 50 engravings. Price 26 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, State, county, town, and postoffice.

Attractive NEW BOOKS.

WOMAN (La Femme). By Michelet.....$1 00
LOVE (L'Amour). By Michelet.....1 00
THE HABITS OF GOOD SOCIETY.....1 25
THE GREAT METROPOLITAN. 2 vols.....2 00

 Sold by all booksellers, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by ROUSE & CARLETON, Publishers, 130 Grand Street, New York.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR GOUT AND RHEUMATISM. PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Druggists, 15 Beekman Street, New York.

"HOW TO USE GOOD AND GET PAID FOR IT."—AGENTS—Druggists—and everybody also—Teachers, Preachers, and others, who may wish to engage in a local or traveling agency for our Books, Journals, etc., may now find it necessary to return mail, by addressing the publishers as follows: FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

Watches Given Away!!

A GIFT valued from two dollars to one hundred dollars is given with every $5 worth of retail prices.

At least one Watch is guaranteed to every Dollar Stock!

These inducements are offered by the Suffolk Exchange Co., 116 Washington Street, Boston.

The most extensive and most liberal Gift concern in existence. Send for a Catalogue. Those who have purchased this article have particularly requested to request themselves with our terms. Our inducements are unrivalled, and all others are in the shade.

The following are some of the Gifts to purchasers of books.

English Lever Gold Watches, hunting cases.
Patent Lever " " open face.
Ladies' Lever " " "
Detached Lever Silver Watches, hunting cases.
Lepine Silver Watches, open face.
Gold Lockets, all styles.
Ladies' and Gents' Gold Chains, various styles.
Ladies' and Gents' Gold Sleeve Buttons and Studs, all patterns.
Gents' Bosom Pins, new and rich styles.
Gold Pencils and Pens.
Ladies' and Gents' Gold Rings.
Gold Watch Keys and Belt Pins
A great variety of Jewelry, Pins and Ear drops, comprising all the styles now worn, such as Cameo, Mosaic, Coral Stone, Lava, Florentine, &c., &c., &c.
Gold Bracelets, all styles.

The List of Books comprises a great assortment of standard works in the different departments of literature, interesting to the young and old. Do not fail to send for a Catalogue. Orders promptly filled by any address. Apply to SUFFOLK EXCHANGE COMPANY, 116 Washington Street, Boston.

C. W. ELDRIDGE, Treasurer.

IRON IN THE BLOOD.

DYSPEPSIA, SCROFULA, GENERAL DEBILITY, and Affections of the Skin.

Headache.

Why is Iron beneficial in disease?

Why is it efficacious in so many diseases apparently opposite in their nature?

Why is "PERUVIAN SYRUP," or Protected Solution of Protoxide of Iron, more beneficial, better than any other medicinal preparation of iron?

Since the remarkable cures effected through the Agency of PERUVIAN SYRUP, "Iron in the blood" has been made public, the above questions are frequently asked respecting it. They are fully answered in a pamphlet on "Iron" (importance of Iron in the Blood," which can be had on application. We have also received from numerous well-known testimonials of remarkable cures from the following well-known physicians, clergymen and others, viz:

Rev. John Pierpont, Rev. John W. Olmstead,
Rev. Warren Burton, Rev. Lewis Johnson, M.D.,
Rev. Arthur B. Fuller, Roswell Kenney, M.D.,
Rev. Aug. R. Pope, S. H. Kendall, M.D.,
Rev. Gordon Hayes, W. R. Chisholm, M.D.,
Rev. Sylvanus Cobb, Francis Dana, M.D.,
Rev. Thos. Whittemore, Jeremiah Brown, M.D.,
Rev. Richard Metcalf, Jose Antonio Sanchez, M.D.,
Rev. M. P. Webster, Marcellus Leonardo Sandz, M.D.,
Rev. Alex. Jackson, Abraham Wendell, M.D.,
Rev. J. Boyle, Peter Parker, M.D.,
Rev. Henry Upham, Jose d'Espinal, M.D.

Pamphlet on any application to the agents, or to N. L. CLARK & CO., Proprietors, Boston.

Sold by Druggists and Dealers in the United States. Sold wholesale and Retail by HARDY & CO., 429 Broadway.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 Pages and 1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to each of whom a special District will be given. Early application is necessary. Applicants should name the Counties they would prefer. For full particulars address LOSSING, ELLIOTT, AND HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES would grow on the face, use my eugenol polish. Rated 1856), which will force them to grow six weeks from the first application, and without stain or injury to the face. Price 50 cents by mail, post free, to any address. R. G. GRAHAM, 169 Nassau Street, New York.

☞ 5000 AGENTS WANTED — To sell a new invention. Agents have made over $300 in one, no—better than all other similar agencies. Send four stamps and get full particulars and sample. EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

Important Invention for married people. For particulars address inclosing stamp. Dr. H. JAMES FIELD, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 425 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ OLD DR. HEATH'S BOOK OF Cures and private advice, for Male and Female Indiscretions, with full directions for the certain cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Coughs, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Fevers, Heart Disease, Scrofula, Cancer, Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Gravel and Urinary Deposits, Female Complaints, &c. Illustrated with hundreds of certificates of cures and engravings. For the purpose of rescuing as many suffering fellow beings as possible from premature death, it will be sent to any part of the continent, by sending 25 cents to DR. HEATH, 647 Broadway, New York. Hours, Medicines and examinations of the Lungs, &c., free. Sold also in Brooklyn by Mrs. Sayres, 115 Fulton; Mrs. Spencer, 191 Fulton; Mrs. Hoyt, 129 Atlantic, and the respectable druggists in New York, and throughout the country.

Scrofula, or King's Evil.

One quarter of all our people are scrofulous; their persons are invaded by this lurking infection, and their health is undermined by it. To cleanse it from the system we must renovate the blood by an alterative medicine, and invigorate it by healthy food and exercise. Such a medicine we supply in the most effectual remedy which the medical skill of our times can devise for this every where prevailing and fatal malady. It is combined from the most active remedies which have been discovered for the expurgation of this foul disorder from the blood, and cures of the system from its destructive consequences. Hence it should be employed for the cure of not only scrofula, but also those other affections which arise from it, such as ERUPTIVE and SKIN DISEASES, ST. ANTHONY'S FIRE, ROSE, or ERYSIPELAS, PIMPLES, PUSTULES, BLOTCHES, BLAINS and BOILS, TUMORS, TETTER and SALT RHEUM, SCALD HEAD, RINGWORM, RHEUMATISM, SYPHILITIC and MERCURIAL DISEASES, DROPSY, DYSPEPSIA, DEBILITY, and, indeed, ALL COMPLAINTS ARISING FROM VITIATED OR IMPURE BLOOD. The popular belief in "impurity of the blood" is founded in truth, for scrofula is a degeneration of the blood. The particular purpose and virtue of this Sarsaparilla is to purify and regenerate this vital fluid, without which sound health is impossible in contaminated constitutions.

AYER'S Compound Extract of Sarsaparilla,

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & CO., LOWELL, MASS.

Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

LE BON TON is the best LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen copies, with two patterns, will be sent for 20 cents.
S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 407 Broadway, N. Y.

To Wholesale Dealers in Jewelry.

The undersigned begs leave to say that, owing to his unsurpassed facilities, he is able to offer to the Trade a variety of any description on better terms than any other house in New York.

All orders will receive the most careful and prompt attention. W. A. HALL,
208 Broadway.

FOREIGN NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS.—Subscriptions received for all foreign Newspapers and Periodicals, English, Scotch, Irish, French, &c., furnished with any desired publication, or sent by mail to all parts of the U. S. Priced lists of One Thousand different publications sent free.
WILLMER & ROGERS, 42 Nassau Street, N. Y.

FOWLER AND WELLS'S American and Foreign Patent Agency,

308 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

All kinds of business pertaining to the Patent Office done in the most prompt and satisfactory manner on reasonable terms.

ALSO,

Quer's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, is taken without nausea.

ALSO,

Quer's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil—The great combination of the medicinal virtues of Castor and Salt cause any constipation after use. It is the best purgative for children. To be had of all druggists, at No. 128 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. PEN-FOLD, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 15 Beekman Street.

PURE WATER.

United States Carbon Filter Company.

CARBON FILTERS of all sizes and descriptions, adapted to Families, Hotels, Steamboats, Factories, &c. Also, a great variety of Portable Self-Acting Filters, for Sportsmen, Travellers, Druggists, &c.
164 Broadway, N. Y.

LOUISVILLE ARTESIAN WATER.—This NATURAL MINERAL WATER, now very extensively used, is for sale by all Druggists.
S. T. THOMPSON, Agent,
No. 629 Broadway.

To Obtain Subscribers for HARPER'S WEEKLY.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 99 to 80 pages—and from one third to one half—more reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each).....2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $5.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

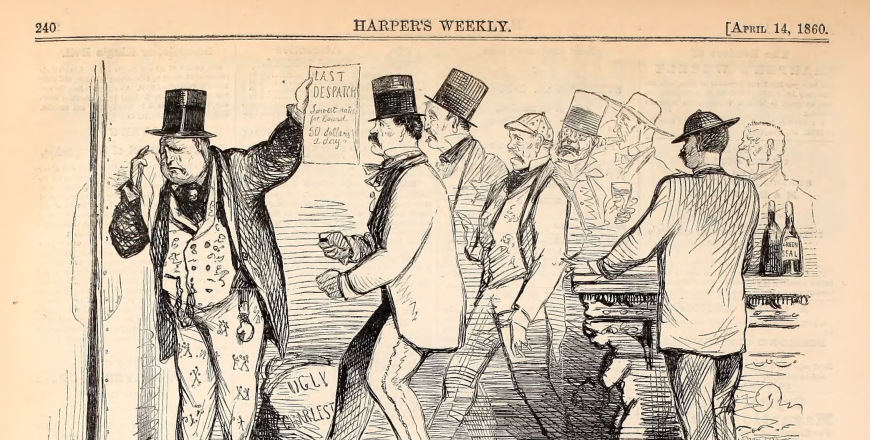
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR; $2 50 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks.....$1 00
One Copy for One Year.....2 00
One Copy for Two Years.....4 00
Five Copies for One Year.....8 00
Twelve Copies for One Year.....20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year.....40 00



An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $4 00.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or Longer.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

STARTLING AND HEART-RENDING NEWS.

Affecting scene among the Shoulder-hitters on receiving the latest dispatch from Charleston—Board $50 per day—in advance.

"OLD BOSS SHASH'M, log. (holding up dispatch). "Boys! can't stand that—my 'motions overcome me—we are walued too high. Can't stand the figer. What'll we do? Take the town? (weeps.) All we weep."

A SUPERB PICTURE.

Rosa Bonheur's Great Painting

In Oil Colors.

MAGNIFICENT CHROMO LITHOGRAPH,

PRESENTING EVERY TINT AND SHADE AND COLOR OF THE ORIGINAL PAINTING IN ALL OF ITS EXTRAORDINARY SPLENDOR.

The first impressions of a new and superb engraving of ROSA BONHEUR'S celebrated Painting of THE HORSE FAIR, printed in beautiful oil colors, are now ready. It is executed by Sarony, Major and Knapp, who have undertaken to make it the most splendid work of the kind ever issued from their extensive establishment. Its size is nearly 3 by 3 feet, embracing more than TWENTY DIFFERENT TINTS, SHADES AND COLORS, and it will present, upon the walls of the parlor, drawing-room or art gallery, all the splendid effect of a superb oil painting. So rich and costly an engraving, requiring so much artistic labor and skill in its production, has never before been sold in this country or Europe for less than $5 to $10 per copy; yet as most of the sale of a very large edition, we shall furnish them at the low price of

$1 50 per Copy,

delivered, free of charge, at any Post-Office in the United States, and an extra copy for a club of five.

We will furnish the above engraving, with the UNITED STATES JOURAL, one year, for $5, and an extra copy of each for a club of five.

The London Times said of the painting, of which the engraving is a copy: "On standing before it, all preconceived ideas vanish. We have a splendidly luminous effect; the most powerful, natural, and truly elegant painting that has been exhibited in this country for many years past."

William Ross Wallace, on receipt of a copy, wrote a beautiful poem, from which we quote the following lines:

"Fire-eyed Arab of the desert!
In your bridle-hand why need
Are you made the only lover
Of the glorious, gallant steed?
Do you only prize his fleetness
Lightning-like along the plain—
There rejoicing in the tempest
Of his wildly-streaming mane?

"No!—behold the eager millions
Of our own majestic race
This miracle of Bowanga
Giving, in their households, place!
No!—the Anglo-Saxon's spirit
Loves the charger strong and brave,
Strides him with a steel-armed triumph,
As the steamship strides the wave!

"Millions! gaze upon the picture:
Answer will ye'ch the eye:
Lo! the mighty Norman charger
Bearing in his pride on high,
He has yet to be outdone—
Splendid son of splendid sire,
While, of old, at Senlac, HAROLD Storming through the battle-fire!"

* * * * * * *

T. P. Rossiter, the distinguished artist, says of the engraving: "It is a spirited translation of the original, and is admirably adapted to promote the interests of art."

The Rev. Dr. Prime, of The New York Observer, says: "I prize it as a most successful and beautiful work of art."

The Rev. Dr. Stevens, of The Christian Advocate, says: "It is worthy of the fine original. I could give it no better praise. The public can not fail to appreciate and commend your enterprise in providing so superb a work of art so low."

$1000 can be made within a few months by engaging as Agent for the above Engravings. We want an agent in every county and city. A copy can be sold at almost every house, for rarely no lover of art and the beautiful will let pass the opportunity to obtain so rich and splendid a work, at so low a price. The engraving will be rolled in a strong tube, so that it can be sent by mail or express without injury.

Money securely inclosed, in well sealed and plainly directed letters, may be sent by mail at our risk. Bills current in any section of the country received at par.

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Publishers, in Peterson's Intestor, say: "Messrs. Knerten & Co. have been for many years connected with the publishing business, and we can assure our readers that whatever they promise will be fulfilled."

J. M. EMERSON & CO.,
No. 57 Park Row, New York.

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices.
Made to Measure at $18 per doz. or Six for $9.
MADE OF NEW-YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosom, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2.50 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I cannot make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 Linen Shirts.

3Dyards of New-York Mills muslin at 14½c. per yd.	$4 35
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard	3 50
Making and cutting	6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c.	1 50
Profit	3 65
Total	$18 00

Self Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

The Express charges on one dozen Shirts from New-York to New Orleans is about $1.

WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between White & Walker Streets, NEW-YORK.

Please copy my address as other houses in the city are selling inferior made shirts at my prices.

1828. T. H. Chambers' 1860.

PIANOS, Established in 1828. Formerly Dubois & Stodart, and Dubois, Bacon & Chambers, Steinway Hall, corner of 4th St. and 4th Avenue, opposite the Peter Cooper Institute, New York.

Improved Over-strung, Iron-frame Pianos.
Second-hand Pianos in good repair at $75 to $175.
Pianos hired. Allowance on hire if purchased.

Sheldon & Company
PUBLISH ON WEDNESDAY,
April 4,
VOLUME SECOND
OF THE FLORENCE STORIES:
GRIMKIE.
By JACOB ABBOTT,
Author of "The Rollo Books," "Histories," &c.
1 vol. 16mo.
With Seven Illustrations from Designs by H. W. Herrick.
Price 60 cents.

From the Boston Journal.

"Mr. Abbott is always an entertaining writer for the young."

From the New York Observer.

"Mr. Abbott is known to be a pure, successful, and useful writer for the young and old. He is also the most popular author of juvenile books now living."

For sale by all bookseller, or sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the price annexed.

A Chance to make Money. Read the Advertisement of ROSA BONHEUR'S GREAT PICTURE.

WHITE'S PATENT LEVER TRUSS AND SUPPORTER

White's Trusses. White's Trusses.

HERNIA AND UTERINE DISEASES CURED.

An illustrated pamphlet containing all particulars sent free to any one by addressing HAINES & PARK, General Agents, Nos. 13 and 15 Park Row, New York.

METHODIST BOOK CONCERN,
200 MULBERRY STREET, NEW YORK.

Being in constant receipt of inquiries from our brethren, respecting Sunday Medicine, with requests to recommend and purchase, we have, in conjunction with some lady friends, carefully and thoroughly examined the various machines, of practical value for family sewing, and find those made by THE WHEELER & WILSON MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 505 Broadway, New York, to fully combine the essentials of a good instrument, and such as we can confidently recommend.

Having seen on favorable results from their use, in our own and the households of our friends, we are desirous that their benefits should be shared by all our brethren, and hence have interested ourselves in their behalf.

With best wishes, your Brethren,

Abel Stevens,	Thos. Carlton,
James Floy,	J. Porter,
David Wise,	J. Beal, Edwards,
David Terry,	Wm. A. Cox.

Winant's Excelsior Billiard Tables.
Manufactory 71 Cold Street, N. Y.

No. 6, No. 6, No. 6,
BEADLE'S DIME
Song Book,
No. 6,
NOW READY.

FUN! FUN!
LOTS OF FUN!
BEADLE'S DIME
Book of Fun,
Illustrated.

OTHER DIME BOOKS.

Beadle's Dime Speaker. Beadle's Dime Dialogues.
Beadle's Dime Cook Book. Beadle's Dime Recipe Book.
Beadle's Dime Letter Writer.
Beadle's Dime Book of Dreams.
Beadle's Dime Book of Etiquette.
Beadle's Dime Melodist, music and words.
Beadle's Dime Song Books, No's 1, 3, 3, 4, 5, and 6.
For sale by all book and news-dealers. By mail, postpaid, ten cents each; $1 per doz. Address
IRWIN P. BEADLE & Co., 137 William St., N. Y.

No more Hard Work.
House Cleaning Mere Play.
EDWARDS'S PAINT RESTORER
FOR SPRING CLEANING.
Price per package sufficient to clean a moderate sized house.
25 CENTS.
Sold by all Druggists, Grocers, &c.
Address
FISHER, DAY & CO.,
Proprietors,
Salem, Mass.
(Agents Wanted.)

ASTHMA. For the INSTANT RELIEF and PERMANENT CURE of this distressing complaint, use
PENDT'S
BRONCHIAL CIGARETTES.
Made by C. B. SEYMOUR & CO., 107 NASSAU ST., N. Y. Price, $1 per box; sent free by post.

The Parker Sewing-Machine Co.'s
FIRST-CLASS, DOUBLE THREAD, Rapid, Noiseless and Beautiful $40.—NEW SEWING-MACHINE.—$40.
Under Patents of Howe, Grover & Baker, and Wheeler & Wilson. Agents wanted. Office No. 469 Broadway.
VERNON & CO.

English Carpeting.
ENGLISH MEDALLION,
ENGLISH VELVET BRUSSELS,
THREE-PLY & INGRAIN CARPETS,
Oil-Cloths, Rugs, Mats, Matting, Table and Piano Covers, Druggets, &c.,
AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.
HIRAM ANDERSON,
Ten spacious Salesrooms, 92 Bowery.
(Sign of Gold Eagle.)
N. B. English Brussels, 75 cents to $1 per yard.
Ingrain Carpets, 25 cents to 40 cents.
☞ Orders executed promptly.

Wheeler & Wilson's
SEWING MACHINE.
WHO WRITES FOR IT?
Send for a Circular and see!
Office 505 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. IV.—No. 173.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

HON. STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

HON. STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS.*

To the Hon. STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS is conceded by his friends and opponents an importance in the political concerns of the United States not exceeded by that of any living statesman. His great abilities, his great successes, as well as his unfortunate courage, have made him for many years a leading man in the councils of the nation, and have drawn to him the warm admiration and unflagging devotion of a vast body of the Democratic party. Though it is an accepted doctrine of the Democratic party that the nominee for President is the only choice of the party, and that, after the nomination, the nominee is the only man that ought ever have been spoken of for the office, yet Mr. Douglas has attracted to himself at this cause thousands upon thousands who religiously believe him to be only Democrat who has the public confidence at the North to an extent that can warrant or lead to success in the contest of 1860. This paper, however, has nothing to do with the controversies in or out of the party, as to the strength of Mr. Douglas, or of any one else, as a candidate for the Presidency. We find his name conspicuously presented to the public, and as conspicuously presented by his opponents as by any one else; and in view of the all-absorbing topic of the Charleston Convention, we propose to lay a brief statement of his history before our readers.

Mr. Douglas is a descendant of the great Scotch family of the same name. Two brothers of the name of Douglas emigrated to America at the same time; one went to Maryland, and his descendants are to be found on the banks of the Potomac, in Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, and perhaps other Southwestern States; the other brother remained at New London, in Connecticut, and from his latter brother proceeded the ancestors of Stephen A. Douglas. The family of Douglas intermarried with that of Arnold—the family of which Benedict Arnold was associated with, or Williams in the settlement of Rhode Island, and whose son was afterward Governor of that province. Hence the name of Arnold, which name was also by Dr. Stephen A. Douglas, the father of the statesman of the present day. Dr. Douglas was born in Rutland County, New York, and removed to Vermont, where he graduated at Middlebury College, studied medicine, and soon after becoming of age, entered upon a good practice as a physician. He married Miss Sarah Fisk, the daughter of a farmer, and in July, 1813, while holding Stephen in his arms, and his little daughter on his knee, died suddenly of disease of the heart.

Mr. Douglas was born at Brandon, Vermont, on the 23d of April, 1813, and on the day of the meeting of the Charleston Convention will have completed the forty-seventh year of his age.

His earlier days were spent with his mother and sister upon a farm—the joint property of his mother and her brother, a bachelor. Just about the time fixed upon for young Douglas to enter college, Mr. Fisk married, and the cares of a young family rendering him unable or unwilling to lay upon himself the expense of giving his nephew a collegiate education. The man who has since then found the means and ability, and exhibited a fondness for the constitutional rights of the Southern people, was even in boyhood gifted with an energy and a will which enabled him able to cope with the most disadvantageous circumstances. Instead of repining and weeping over the bitter downfall of his expectations, he picked up such necessary clothing as he could conveniently carry, and, with his bundle on his back, left home, and on foot proceeded to the nearest town, and indentured himself as an apprentice to a cabinet-maker.

For two years he worked assiduously at this business, when, he became most proficient in it, ill health and a small physical frame rendered it impossible for him to endure the severe labor which was required of him. He therefore left the shop, intending to return to it after he should have recruited his health; and in the mean time entered school at Brandon. After he had been at school a year or more, his mother and sister both married, and removing to Canandaigua, New York, induced him to accompany them.

At Canandaigua he entered a classical academy, and also read law in the office of Mr. Hubbell. During this period he made great progress in the classical studies, and also in his legal acquirements. As an orator, even at that early day, he was noted for the force and power of his logic. He was particularly conspicuous in the discussion of political questions; was an active supporter of General Jackson in the contest between Jackson and Granger, was a warm friend and advocate of the former.

In June, 1833, he left Canandaigua for the Western country. He reached Cleveland, but, under further examination of age, and the law requiring him to have been a resident of the State one year before admission to the bar, he accepted the position of clerk in the office of the Hon. S. A. Andrews, with a promise of partnership in the future. A severe attack of illness, protracted for several months, however, destroyed this arrangement, and in the fall Mr. Douglas left Cleveland, in search of some eligible point where he might engage in the practice of the law. His ambition was to appear at the bar, having no doubt of his success. He proceeded by canal-boat from Cleveland to the Ohio River, and, stopping by chance in Cincinnati, was feeble in health, and with very few dollars in money. His necessities demanded immediate employment, and he canvassed Cincinnati and Louisville seeking that employment, but failed to find any.

He then left for St. Louis—an undefined impression that Illinois was to be his ultimate destination leading him on toward that region. Arrived at St. Louis, the Hon. Edward Bates, now a candidate for the Republican nomination for the Presidency, tendered Mr. Douglas the free use of his office and library until he could do better; but Mr. Douglas's necessities required employment upon which he could derive a revenue, and failing to obtain such in St. Louis, he pushed on to Jacksonville, Illinois, where he arrived in December, 1833. He was equally unsuccessful at Jacksonville in finding employment; so he proceeded on foot to the town of Winchester, sixteen miles distant. He had but thirty-seven cents in money, and knew not where he was to get more. The next day the Winchester lawyers met in the public square, who had been gathered to attend an application sale; the sale could not proceed for want of a clerk, and young Douglas was at once appointed to and requested to serve in that capacity. He served three days as clerk, and received six dollars for his services. He had pleased the farmers very much; he had defended Jackson and his policy with a warmth and a vigor that was unusual. He made himself acquainted with the whole week's school of forty scholars, at three dollars each per quarter, was made up, and Mr. Douglas entered upon the office-business.

In March, 1834, still lacking one month of being twenty-one years old, he was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court; with the approbation of his school, and such small fees as he had earned in the mean time by attending cases before the Justices' Court, he started upon a new track and moved up to Jacksonville, the county seat of Morgan County, then one of the largest counties in the State.

He opened a law-office in Jacksonville, and soon was known as an ardent Democrat. General Jackson's bank policy was the leading public topic, and upon it Democrats were divided, and the Whigs were fast gaining strength. The county, owing to the influence of the Yankee settlements, had become decidedly Whig in its politics. Douglas and some friends called a mass meeting to defend General Jackson's bank policy. The appointments was considered a most daring one. When the day arrived he alone had the courage to offer the resolutions. He did so, and made the opening speech. He was replied to by a Mr. Lamborn, one of the ablest lawyers of the county, in a speech of much severity. It was a fierce assault upon Douglas. He at once met the issue. He rejoined in a speech which has become historical in Illinois. In a very short time his words of burning eloquence drove Lamborn from the Court-house, and then for an hour he held the meeting bound in spell-binding astonishment by his powerful defense of the President. When he had concluded his resolutions were adopted, and he was elected by acclamation to a second large men and carried through the town in triumph. Henceforth Douglas was recognized as the leader of the Democracy of the county. At the meeting of the next Legislature he was elected State's Attorney for the first judicial circuit, over the hero-Illinois, Hon. Joseph Duncan, and was also, though opposed, carried it into successful operation. A Democratic ticket was nominated, but which was the weakest ever run in Illinois, a opinion that some of the candidates withdrew, and Douglas was forced to take a place on the ticket for the Legislature. He canvassed the county thoroughly, and the result was that the entire Democratic ticket, with one exception, was elected. General Duncan was defeated.

Mr. Douglas took his seat in the Legislature in the winter of '36–7, and was an active and laborious member. In July, 1837, he was appointed Register of the Land Office at Springfield. In the fall of that year he took an active part in establishing the Democratic press of that city, in opposition of candidates for State offices, and saw it put into successful operation.

In November, 1837, he was nominated by a Democratic Convention for Congress, in the immense district extending from Jacksonville to the eastern limit of the State, and which embraced places in August, 1838, and during that time Mr. Douglas and his opponent, Mr. Stuart, canvassed it as far as was practicable. The district had a Whig majority of over 3000 majority; at the official canvass recorded Stuart only five majority in an aggregate vote of nearly 40,000. Douglas was elected by several hundred votes by tricks and unjust practices. The campaign was regarded, however, as a general triumph.

Mr. Douglas during the next two years devoted himself to a successful practice in the law, taking a prominent part in the Democratic caucuses of the Supreme Court. He undertook the great case which resulted in Governor Ford's "plain vote" case—a vote which secured the State for Van Buren in 1840.

In 1840 he canvassed the State for Van Buren; and to his efforts has always been attributed the successful issue of that election in Illinois, one of the two Southern States where the Democratic flag was not defeated.

In January, 1841, he was appointed Secretary of State. At this time the judges of districts in the Supreme Court was remodeled—that is, the number of Judges was increased from four to nine; and in February Mr. Douglas was elected a Judge of the Supreme Court. He was then less than twenty-eight years of age. He continued as Judge, performing his duties with such ability as acknowledged ability until June, 1843, when he was nominated for Congress. The district was a Whig one, and he was interested in no other contest than on the ground that he was the only Democrat who could hope to be elected. He at once, with Mr. Browning, his Whig opponent, entered upon the canvass, and they spoke daily until the election, when both were prostrated with illness. Douglas's majority was 645.

In December, 1843, he took his seat in Congress, being several months less than thirty years of age. In 1844 he was re-elected by 1700 majority, and in 1846 by over 3000 majority; but after the last election, and before the commencement of his term under it, he was elected a Senator of the United States.

One of his first speeches in Congress was the memorable one in support of the bill to refund the fine imposed on General Jackson by Judge Hall at New Orleans. That speech was afterward declared by General Jackson to be the best and only proper vindication of his conduct on that occasion.

Mr. Douglas was an active and ardent supporter of the American title up to the line of 54° 40' on the Oregon boundary question, and was one of the last to surrender it.

He was also a supporter of the annexation of Texas; and his speeches on that question, and upon the several issues arising out of the Mexican war, form perhaps the clearest and ablest vindications of the purity and patriotism of the administration of President Polk that are to be found in the Congressional debates.

He has been always a strict supporter of the "Monroe Doctrine," in the right and propriety of keeping the American continent free and exempt from any and all settlement or colonization, under any pretense, by European Power. His votes against the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, because it was a partnership with England in the affairs of Central America. His votes against the treaty with Mexico, because it contained an implied pledge not to annex any more territory of that Republic. He is opposed to making any bargain or contract about annexation of territory, because he wishes the United States to be left free and untrammeled to act as the best interests may require whenever the occasion arises. If it be deemed necessary at any time to acquire Cuba, he is for having the action of the Government of the United States, and not clogged by any treaty stipulations with European Powers, who by right have no concern in the affairs of the American continent.

He differs from many on the question of filibusterism. He denies the power of the United States to follow adventurers across to other lands, and arrest them there, on a charge of violating the neutrality laws; the power and authority of the United States extending but a little distance of one marine league from the coast; and once beyond that, the expeditions can not be arrested by the United States. He is opposed to Daniel Walker, or any other American, the privilege of expatriating himself, and of going to other lands and there taking upon himself a new allegiance.

When Mr. Douglas entered Congress, and while he was a member of the House, he voted steadily against the reception of abolition petitions; and so long as the same rule prevailed in the Senate he adhered rigidly to it.

He was from the first a firm advocate of the extension of the line of 36° 30' to the Pacific Ocean. He proposed the admission of the plan for the annexation of Texas, and had the gratification of seeing it adopted.

He proposed to extend the same line as a permanent settlement of the slavery question, during his whole service in the House and in the Senate up to 1850. He was the leading champion and prominent defender of the Missouri Compromise. Upon the failure of the Omnibus Bill the separate bills of Mr. Douglas were taken up and passed.

He reported the Nebraska-Slave Act, and a few months after its passage met an armed mob in Chicago, and defended that act so effectively that his Common Council unanimously repealed certain nullification resolutions they had previously adopted.

In 1854 he proposed the Kansas-Nebraska Act repealing the Missouri restriction upon slavery north of 36° 30', on the ground that Congress in 1820 had exceeded its constitutional power, and Slavery in the Territories should be left exclusively to the determination of the people settled there.

He extended the Kansas-Nebraska Act through in the face of an opposition more fierce and determined than was ever before arrayed against any measure. It was denounced throughout the North by every description of indignity. When he reached home in the character "a slave vote" already cast in favor than he found the Fugitive Slave Act in 1850. He announced his intention to defend it. At the meeting he was met by another armed mob, who, fearing the power of his argument, refused to let him be heard. For three hours he stood up before the mob and addressed them in calm and fair manner, defended the President, and defended the repeal of the Missouri restriction. But little that he said was allowed to be heard. He was groaned, hissed, and by all the means that a mob can find to insult the object of their hatred he was insulted and assailed. He was not conquered, though he was denied the privilege of being heard.

In spite of all these demonstrations, in spite of a thorough combination of the Know-Nothings and Republicans, Illinois in 1854 elected a Democratic State ticket and her five Democratic members of Congress.

In 1856 Mr. Douglas took the stump in behalf of Mr. Buchanan and the Cincinnati platform, and successful in securing the vote of Illinois for the Cincinnati nominees.

In 1857 the unfortunate Lecompton controversy arose. Mr. Douglas thought that, under a strict adherence to Democratic faith, Congress ought not to accept a Constitution unless it was the act of the people. The President thought differently. The Lecompton controversy then arose, and individuals supposed to be rival candidates for the Presidency, instead of reconciling the difficulty, sought to widen the breach. In the final settlement of the controversy Mr. Douglas acquiesced, but his enemies sought his destruction. They opposed his re-election in 1858; but after one of the most eventful political contests in the Union, Mr. Douglas carried the State Legislature, and in January 1858 was re-elected to the Senate.

The above is a hurried sketch of the public life of Mr. Douglas. It is a mere outline of his political acts. His name is prominently before the country as a candidate for the nomination by the Charleston Convention; and the multitudes at the North who call themselves his friends are sanguine that the Convention will select a candidate whose nomination will of itself be the certain precursor of victory. Such a candidate they claim Mr. Douglas to be.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1860.

THE APPROACHING CONVENTION.

THE topic of the day is the Convention which is to meet at Charleston on 23d for the purpose of selecting a Democratic candidate for the Presidency, and we accordingly devote most of our available space to illustrating the place where the Convention will be held, and the men who are likely to figure as candidates.

We publish on pages 248 and 249 eleven portraits of prominent candidates, representing every faction of the Democracy—from Douglas and Pierce to Slidell and Davis. When all of these, if any of them, will obtain the nomination no man can tell. A few months ago the chances of Senator Douglas were very brilliant; they have, however, been impaired by the undisguised hostility of the Southern leaders of the Democracy. Between him and them there is a gulf not on the question of territorial sovereignty; and as they will have the settlement of the platform, it seems hardly possible that they can frame it so that he can stand upon it. Furthermore, the law of political parties is clearly opposed to the preferment of individuals who have bolted from the party on questions of such magnitude as the Lecompton affair. For these reasons, while Douglas is manifestly the candidate under whose banner the Democracy would go into the election, there is a strong probability that he will be passed over, and the nomination given to some one who shall sympathize cordially with the views of the Southern masses on the subject of slavery in the territories.

Whether that man will be Breckinridge, or Guthrie, or Buchanan, or Jo Lane, or Houston, or any of the other leaders whose names we now publish, no one can venture to predict. It is pretty clear that, if an ultra-Southern man is nominated, he will have but a small vantage nominee, and will run very strongly indeed. Indications are not wanting of Republican tickets in Maryland, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Delaware. There are in all these States old Whigs who might not be disinclined to support a Republican nominee running on a conservative platform. In Maryland, too, in Virginia there are leading men whose adhesion to Seward is said to have been privately promised, in the event that his platform shall diminish sectional hostility; and in case it exists at present.

These considerations will have their weight with the Charleston Convention. The business of nominating is not a mere political affair; so grave a matter as a Presidential nomination, involving the government of the country and the disposal of $50,000,000 a year of patronage for four years, is not to be settled by methods of mere feeling, or fancy, or prejudice, or rhetoric. The members of the Charleston Convention must, before they make a choice, calmly weigh the consequences of defeat. The Convention, before they stake their fortunes upon the prospects of a personal favorite, how the party will stand the risk. If they hazard the nomination they should have witnessed a successful Republican administration, and an acquiescence in Republican supremacy by the rank and file of the Southern people.

Of course there is no lack of people who declare that the election of a Republican will be the signal for the dismemberment of the Confederacy. But this, again, is much easier said than done. With the remembrance of the John Brown raid fresh in our minds, and with the evidence around us of the lively sympathy expressed for him by many Northern people, one can readily understand the feeling which may persuade many Southerners to seek refuge in secession; and it is by no means certain that it may not have to come to this at last. But if it does, the operation will be overly, painful, and, at least for the time, destructive and oppressive. Democrats who contemplate secession as a last resource should calmly weigh the cost of such a step, on the one hand, and on the other, the inconvenience of selecting a candidate who may not be their first choice, their especial favorite; there strikes a balance between the two and act accordingly.

It was Macaulay, we believe, who first said that politics was the science of expedients, and that theories were all nonsense. There is enough practical common sense in the dictum to entitle it to careful consideration at the hands of the Southern delegates to Charleston.

---

* The Life of Hon. Stephen A. Douglas, 500 pages 12mo, by J. W. Sheahan, Esq., editor of the Chicago Times, has just been published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers.

THE LOUNGER.

NATIONAL ACADEMY.

The twenty-fifth exhibition is open. The pictures bloom with the flowers, and spring, which opens the door to so much, opens none to the picture-mania and lovers more attractive than that in Tenth Street. To be sure, when it is opened, the result is not always in keeping with the expectation. The patrons of the Academy are neither spacious nor splendid; but then we go to see pictures, not rooms.

The opening night brought the usual gay throng. There was a time when speeches were made and punch flowed freely upon such an occasion; but it is gone now, and a better, cleaner, comelier festival is the result. It is quite worth while to attend an opening night, were it only to discover how many distinguished people there are in New York—how many that we are all glad to look at as having done something—or left it undone. They laugh at us for the facility with which we Americans make great men. But we ought to produce them much more frequently than any country in the world, and you have only to go to an opening night to see if we do not do our duty.

Several of the familiar names are absent this year. Gray and Hicks and Kensett and Rossiter and Church are among those who do not exhibit. But Huntington, Gignoux, Elliott, Stone, Baker, Durand, Gifford, Hubbard, the Harts, Gay (of Boston), Staigg, Eppinger, the Browns, Cafferty, Casilear, Cropsey, Lossing, Lang, Hall, Corbyn, Easter, Eastman Johnson, M'Entee, Mignot, Shattuck, and the Thompsons are names familiar, and always welcome.

The exhibition is a good one; the artists themselves seeming to consider it not very remarkable. There is, however, one work which instantly reproduces all the rest in attraction and importance, but there are many which are very carefully and thoughtfully executed—the poor portraits have been very generally suppressed—and there is a pleasant variety of subject. But an exhibition is a mixer. It requires exploration, and to the Lounger can only speak of a general impression.

Upon entering the visitor is saluted by crayon heads of Bryant (22) and Mr. Irving (21); but neither fairly represent the poets. There is a benign sweetness mingled with the Quaker severity of Whittier's head, which is not found in this drawing; and Longfellow's genial, fastidious, piercing eye is wanting. The Boston artist, Joseph Ames (24), is an excellent likeness. Staigg has a portrait of a lady (271), which is remarkable for its musical richness and fidelity. He has not been afraid to paint hands for hands, nor a face with wrinkles. It is an admirable work, in the best style of portraiture, and the more striking as coming from a painter whose studies hitherto have lain among miniature heads. Near by hangs one of Elliott's strongest (23). It is a portrait full of individual character, and consequently a capital likeness. In this latter point the touch of Elliott seems to be quite unerring.

No. 224 is Florence at Sunset, from the San Miniato Hill, by George L. Brown. It is put over the door. Some pictures must be put over the door, probably, but a Lounger must needs bewail the fate of the painter. Seen from below, the aerial perspective of the picture appears to be very well done; and there is a broken splendor in the clouds, the reflections in the water, the towers and domes of the city, and the gleaming mountain sides which many a traveler will remember. On the other hand, seen, at least, from below, the picture seems to be somewhat superficial. There is a want of depth in the splendor. But, good or bad, the picture charms the eye—or is it only the memory?

Mr. Gignoux, whose exquisite picture of Niagara by Moonlight our readers will remember was engraved in the Lounger, contributes but one work to this exhibition—"Morning in May" (256). A cloud of apple-blossoms whitens the scene until it becomes a picture reproductive of the white-piece for which Gignoux is so noted, and the bright, sweet, fresh spring renews the air. It is the same breadth and core which distinguish all his work. But why should that admirable painter, Mr. Gifford, wish so much to be gay, with so delicate a touch, with so felicitous a fancy—why should he steep every scene he paints in that vague, shimmering, sandy hue, which spectator believes that he sees only a mirage, and not the fair, substantial reality of earth and sky and sea? His pictures are so tender in sentiment, and he has evidently such a refined talent, that he surely does not need to cultivate a marked mannerism. It is akin to a mistake of some of our popular poets, who think they can not write poetry without using certain luscious words and pulpy phrases. If they can not do it without that habit, they certainly can not with it. So Gifford "Coming Rain" (407) is delightful. The moist coolness of the shower breathes out of the picture. How delicious to see in a hot summer morning!

Mr. Eastman Johnson's "Mating" (465) is exquisite. In the freeness of his handling and confidence in the expression of details, Mr. Johnson recalls Stuart Newton. Like him, too, he has really poetic perceptions. Would the Lounger do wrong to call him the "champion" both of this exhibition and of the one last year?

Certainly he will not do so until greater familiarity with the pictures justifies his doing so. And all this talk about pictures is such poor stuff! What is it that we see in them? One man sees months of struggle, yearning, doubt, exultation, despair—he sees the crowded chapter of a life—and his neighbor sees some execrable mountain, hands of men and women that seem to him carved from turnips.

"A picture is a picture," says Jones. "You can't make any thing else of it."

Yes; but when Keats looks at it, and tastes nectar, and sees Arcadia; and Jobbett looks, and sees only a poor sketch of a hill pasture—shall not painter have the credit of Arcadia or of the pasture?

L. N.

It is interesting to observe how surely Louis Napoleon accomplishes what he wishes—how timidly he seems to hold Europe in his hand, and yet how entirely incredulous every body is, even in France, of the permanence of his power. He can do every thing, says common opinion, but seat himself upon his own throne.

But the explanation of one of these facts simplifies the other. A survey of Louis Napoleon's whole career shows clearly that in ascending to power he did not bring with him the vengeful passions of an older day. He distinctly recognized the one great truth which kings, especially hereditary kings, are never permitted to see, that human civilization and progress are synonymous terms, and that the tendency of all society is more to individual independence. The king, who formerly ruled by the grace of God (as he said) and in spite of the people, now rules by their favor. That is to say, the historical development of the race, in the more civilized countries of Europe, has reached the point at which the whole movement appears to some degree and for the first time, be recognized.

In semi-barbarous countries, like Russia and Austria, where the feudal system lingers in a more vital form than in the west of Europe, the people, as a political power, are still unknown. Russia, more homogeneous, more powerful than its neighbor, crouches intrenched in its old traditions; but Austria, more exposed to the attrition of civilization, is ruled by a government which is opposed to the people, and will consequently ruin the empire. Austria is a modern and more foolish Canute, who sits upon the shore and with threatening scepter commands the waves to retreat. But the waves obey celestial laws, and he is doomed to destruction.

In all his policy Louis Napoleon seems to have followed the lead of the popular instinct, and to have relied upon it. He is a man with a vast deal of feeling in Italy, and of the kind of action to be counted upon, he has moved steadily forward, expelling Austria from Italy, and even defying the Pope out of the Legations; then appealing to the popular wishes in the matter of union with Piedmont, while he leaves Savoy with Victor by "loyal leave."

The net result of the Napoleonic game in Europe is, for Italy, the humiliation of Austria toward the position of a secondary state; the erection of Italy into a first-rate power, fully allied to France; and the aggrandizement of the French territory by Savoy and the command of the Alpine passes. All this is doubtless satisfactory to the great multitude of the people interested. It is, in fact, an execution of their wishes. If you add to this a French alliance with Russia, and a powerful employ in his free-trade policy at home and cordial alliance with England, you have described such changes as would have been impossible for centuries since Bonaparte and Frederick the Great could have effected, and a political insight quite as profound as these "practical statesmen" will may be.

Why, then, is the tenure of his dynasty so uncertain? Simply because the cardinal fact which he recognizes, the universal progress of the people, is far will, puts all permanent political relations in doubt. An emperor in France must henceforth rule by the people, or he must although he might control the army, he could only maintain a fight with it: he could not altogether suppress the people, On which they would ultimately, very recruited.

It would save a deal of trouble, probably, if kings and emperors, like popes, were held to be, ex officio, infallible. But they are not, and it of doubtful expedience to tolerate a second Presidential term. But a married king is scheming for an irrelievable series of terms.

MELANCHOLY TRUTHS.

THE Lounger receives a great many letters full of all kinds of inquiry about the prospects and rewards of literary labor. He has always the same reply to make; and although to offer statistics to an ardent aspirant for fame is like going to a miser by to give a stone where bread was asked for, yet the following facts are so curious and useful that the Lounger gives every literary aspirant to do what he has done—cut them out.

"Out of 1000 published books, 600 never pay the cost of printing; 200 just pay the cost; 100 return a slight profit, and only 100 show a substantial gain. Of these 100 books, 6/0 are issued in the first year of the year, and 350 more at the end of three years: only 50 run to seven years' existence. Of the 50,000 publications put forth in the 17th century, hardly more than 50 have a great reputation and are reprinted. Of the 80,000 works published in the 18th century, one-fifth is hardly preserved more than were rescued from oblivion in the 17th century. Men have been writing books for 3000 years, and there are hardly more than 500 writers throughout that long period who survived the ravages of time and the forgetfulness of man."

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

MISS. M. A. K. The verses are declined, with many thanks from the Lounger for the kind words and the pretty tribute of flowers. "Your letter is so kind and candid," he will justify your opinion by saying that he is not more sensitive to merited praise, although plenty of good feeling, in the lines.

—A. "A Prayer" is very good, if you will work it out more carefully. But you must not dispense with articles. Why do you say "at sunset hour?" Do you say "at the sunset hour?" If the metre requires a certain number of feet, take care that they are whole feet. Don't pull off even the smallest toe.

—Tom. A letter addressed "Charles Reade, Author, London, England," will reach him. The English Postoffice is one of the most perfectly methodized and efficient institutions in the world. The United States P. O. is not.

—"GUY HEVINGSTONE" and "The Sword and Gown" were written by an English barrister by the name of Lawrence.

ON THE WAY TO CHARLESTON.

No. III.

Two Major Jack Downing, Downingsville, Downing County, Maine; in care of Mr. Harper, which send it in print.

WASHINGTON METROPOLIS, April 11, 1860.

DEAR UNCLE JACK,—It's busy times here, I tell you, and I and the President's got our hands chock full of busyness. Aunt Nabby used tew say that it's a man's work to run sum tu-ns—'woman's work ain't never done;' but she hadn't never bin here tew Washington, and seen what a President has to do. Jest now I'm in the Cabinet-room where he looked arter, of which more anon—then there's the office-se kers, a pesterin' on him like green-head flies on a hoss in the hale endevors—then there's wimmen that's got claims or sons tew be made Westpinters of—and last, but by no means leste, there's them pesky Representatives a pryin' and a peekin' round, jist like Joe Hiss when the Massachusetts General Court gin him leve tew go to the Roxberry Nursery.

Now that air Know Nawthin' Committee looked terrible sort o' wamble-crop when they didn't find nawthin' tew pump me on, and I guess that three ore peekin' committees won't make much cost of Old Buck. I spose the Democrats have razed sum think, and pulle the wool over their eyes, and made speechifiers, but who hain't? As Mr. Buchanan said t'other day, see he, "Let the politykisiuns that is smugly fixed mind their stores as be fust."

Sez I, "If they do, jist let me catch 'em and there 'ent back—for tew can play tew any games."

"True," sez he.

It's sort o' wurryin', tho', tew the old gent, tew have these things clouded at him now, jist as yu, Uncle Jack, used tew like tew have your apples shuns agin the Nollyfiers in '32 brot up, and 'vere targeted. Nobody never kno'ed who pole the club of Sergeant Hubbard was, for he "Indepenent Downin'vil Cadets" on bear to keep Mr. Calhoun's folks quiet. And if they did all git land warrants, jist as the 'Lection was sure and fair to whose forit win it? The fact on't is, that nun on yu polytishoners air tew cousin'd honest, and it's jist Dick, pull devil, pull baker, all the time. If Mister Kenwood wut jist look inter our Mane dis'ns here, and rair up all the hobbyin' that got up a-ridin' round, I guess we'd down in a hurry. It puts that he'd think the New York tavern wun't be the only plais what ded't disdyer's tin a goin'on.

Now Jeff Davishun, tew which plais this ole hoss seems tew be on the way from all pints of the compass, and Bobolink Rhett, and the Governor of these tew wate on these Delliegates when we so there nunes on the tavern hooks, and take 'em rite tew the White House, and the Secretary tew takes rite up inter Mr. Buchanun's office, and goes in without knockin'—the Substetutes we takes inter the private Secretary's office, and the Editors I takes kere on—and the Ex-Members of Congress, that are a looking out arter offs, we takes tew the Congressshun Intelligencer, and General Bowman tells 'em how much he saved the kuntry when he fixed the printin' so that nobuddy but him can make a cent out on it.

Then we puts in, I tell yeou, 'cordin tew the man. We hunts for Hunter, we goes it for Gutherie, we so Mr. Lane, or we takes ground for Breckinridge, or we does sumthin' for Davis, 'cordin tew our customer. But we don't say no good word for Douglas, for he's in sum books; but I tell yeou, Uncle Jack, I don't believe he cares a pistareen.

Sumtimes, tew, these folks that listen tew us, and sort o' tork about different pollytishuners, are soon arterwards a-comin' deown stares from ever Mrs. Gilliss' and Mrs. Lane's, and tew Brown's Hotel, which a the bed quarters ov the Little Gyant, as they calls him. They've got all sorts of places on him, and sumtimes he's Secretary ov Nevy, mertaimes he jist as natral as life, and a side-bord in a corner cupbord fire-grate. And hire-by hangs a lot ov Mr. Douglas's speeches tew go all round. All this we kno' all about tu the White House, but we'll hed it off, tho' frankly I sort o' feel sorry for the poor critters arter all, for he's a masterly smart kind o' feller, I tell yeou. Mister Buchanun ses that he's a sort o' complex amentary party, by, but he can't rench the 9 vote.

Thair ain't, howsumever, no nun who'll be Governor till sort o' Christmas time, sumwhere, for I'm a-gineasted to here that Douglas's short but stubbed legs has carried him abed, or that they has picked sum sun as the baby's never yet un nawthin' tew, 'cept I don't know nawthin', and don't a No-Knawthin' but tikes his tod like a knaservytiv old Wig.

Sez I to the boy, sez I, "Jest hand tew me that."

T'other side's a watchin' sharp, I tell yeou. And, don't yeou think, Mr. Sewerd hid me tew dine with him t'other day, and I went, 'cordin tew my lite. Buchanun's white cravats, which Miss Lane side in the puttyest little not, makin' me look like a mannister.

Mr. Sewerd's a pert, wiry little man, with gray hare an' a big nose, and a sleepy David sort o' look, but he's gittin' tew be a terrible thinkin'. He goes in for bein' popular, and sure as I'm born there tew bile table was Parson Lovejoy and Guvvernur Makra, and sum of the Black Republikin kicked up such a dust up tew Congress a few days afore. I guess deown tew Downin'vil yeou thort they was a goin' tew do it? Want on't. Only make believe, like the sham fites tew grinul trainin', and here they wos, a drinkin', and a jokin', jist like the District lurney and Squire Fessenden after jurin' afore a jury jist as if that'd eat each other up. Sewerd seemed to try tew keep 'em all good-natured, but he was sort o' unnatural, and folks as his chance's sort o' small. Guess it's so?

Sum gent in a kind o' nudge Machine, who's mighty near the steppin'-cest pint, but they want Pitt Fessenden for Vice, and a great Vice he'd be, for he's mastarly smart, I tell yu. A fu follers me a bulletin' for Banks, but the Pennsylvania Dutchmen sent, West wunt listen tu no dark-lantern tork. "Sam" wos a good-larted fellur, but folks who ased him can't shine, and Banks hain't got no shadder of a sho'.

Wa'al, I kinder guess I've told yu all about this terrible busyness, and a rumpsy means tew go from here, yesterday see Mr. Buchanan, ses he:

"Benjie!"

I new he wos good-natured, cos if he hadn't a bin he'd a sed Mister Downing.

"Sir?" sez I.

Ses he: "I want tu kno' jist heow Hunter stands tew hum, and tu kno' whether Old Virginny will go Yaw, Waw, or other-wise."

Ses I: "I'm off!"

Ses he: "Stop. There's going to be a big celebrashun Monday, and a company means tew go from hear, and I'll have ya invited."

Sew he sends his perlite little man (who bothers me to death upon every occasion) tew get duly, and up comes an invite to Corporal Benj. Downing, 3d, to alsumpenary the National Rifles tew Washington, writ on guilt-edge papur, and seled with red wax.

"Thunder!" sez I.

"What's the matter?" sez Mr. Buchanan.

"I hain't go no uniform," sez I, feeling bad enuff to boo-hoo right out in meetin'.

"Well I kin that," sez he. So he sent for a cote he used to ware tew Court in London, and a sword, and the Irisher went and bought a yard of red cotton velvet, and Miss Lane, she went tew work a stunt with her from Philadelfy, sewed it on, and I was fixed out, I tell yeou. Why the pictors of fellers for the Frank Leslie Illustrated Nuse, got me a stunt tew Lewis Napoleons, Esq., wa'n't nauthin' tew compare to me.

This afternoon the cumpeny's a cumin' tew escort me, and wun't I cut a dash! So my next letter 'll be from Richmond, and I'll tell ya all about tew-day, and Miss Lane, whose got sum fust famoleys. Tell Sarah Hale that I'm true till death, and I'm yours, the perlite little old chap writes for the Freedmen's Book, sez, with a sad expreshun of esteem, and high consideration,

Very respectfully, your obedient nephew,

BENJAMIN DOWNING, 3d.

THE CITY OF CHARLESTON.

Of the following page the reader will find a fine engraving of the city of Charleston, where the Democratic Nominating Convention is to meet on 23d inst. It is, as we need hardly add, one of the oldest, noblest, and most beautiful cities of the South. The ground-plan of the present city covers, north and south, a space of seven nearly three miles long, by something less than two miles at the widest, east and west. The population within these limits of late amounted to ranges between fifty-five and sixty-five thousand souls. The Palmetto City is happily placed within two spacious rivers, the Cooper and the Ashley—the Etiwan and Kiawah of the Red men. These unite to form the harbor, which is ample, and attractive to the eye in high degree, forming a beautiful escenade, not less sweet than spacious.

An eminent Southern writer has thus described the entrance to the port of Charleston:

"As you enter from the sea, between the Islands of Sullivan and Morris, the city opens before you in the fore-ground, at the distance of about seven miles. Very few, from the ocean. It is built, like Venice, upon flats and shoals of sand and mud. So low it its land, that the islands that it is built on directly in the continuous till you approach quite near it. This illusion is produced by the appearance of the city, which from the opposite yet for the relief which would be yielded by an elevated base appears to lay lofty eminences on either side. As you advance the bay expands, wide and majestic, forming a harbourage to which there can be no objection, were it for its safe anchorage alone. Just at the entrance, which forbids the admission of ships of very heavy draught, you see the fortress which guards the Charlestonian—supposed to be quite feasible—to dredge the channel so as to remove obstructions. In the event, Charleston must necessarily acquire a large and imposing commercial marine of her own. In front of you, commanding the channel, is Fort Sumter, a formidable pile of fortress, with double tier of heavy cannon, rising from the water in the form of a pentagon. In passing Sullivan's Island, the eye readily distinguishes the Moultrie House, famous as a local watering-place of the old more fashionable days, which bears the name of Moultrie, distinguished in American history as the scene of the first and most decisive check given to the Britannic, when a few hundred native riflemen, who had never fired a cannon before, successfully repulsed under a formidable British fleet, making such slaughter among them as, in proportion to the numbers engaged, was not surpassed by the carnage at Inkerman and the Nile. On the right you see Hudrtle's—Mount Pleasant village—which nies the Cooper as the fortresses of '76. On the left are the shores of James and Morris Islands, the latter bearing the light-house of the Palmetto City. You see the fort of Castle Pinckney, which was erected from the British, prior to the battle of Fort Moultrie, to which it is a small fort, of citizen soldiery. Here, at the very portals of the city, you encounter Castle Pinckney, covering an equal number of guns, and here we appear to give you a bird's-eye view of the city itself. We are now in the eastern city itself—the Palmetto City. You see the best ensemble at a glance, and perceive its two most prominent characteristics—the verandas, balconies, piazzas, with the simple gardens and their foliage, which isolate every dwelling-house, and form a substitute for public squares, in which Charleston is lamentably deficient. But for the largeness of the several lots, and the taste of the people for shade trees, the deficiency would be fatal at once to the health and the beauty of the place.

"This city is one of many beauties, arising from this isolation of the dwellings, and from the ample verdure which girdles them."

THE CITY OF CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, WHERE THE DEMOCRATIC NOMINATING CONVENTION WILL BE HELD.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

"QUICK AS LIGHTNING TWO BLACK SINEWY PAWS SEIZED HIM," ETC.

Captain Brand,

OF THE

SCHOONER "CENTIPEDE,"

A PIRATE OF EMINENCE IN THE WEST INDIES:

His Loves and Exploits,

TOGETHER WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF THE SINGULAR MANNER BY WHICH HE DETACHED THEM LIFE.

By LIEUT. H. A. WISE, U.S.N.

(HARRY GRINGO),

AUTHOR OF "LOS GRINGOS" AND "TALES FOR THE MARINES."

ILLUSTRATED BY

C. PARSONS AND A. LUMLEY.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

CHAPTER VI.

DANGER.

IN all this time so little noise had been made that even the watch below, in the brig's forecastle, were snoozing away without a dream of danger - though had one of them shown his nose above the fore-peak he would have either been knocked down and murdered like the mate, or, with a peg in his jaws, been hurled overboard. When the leader of the pirates stepped again on deck, he said to his companions, who were still clustered around the companion-way,

"Well, my boys, we have 'arned a good prize —a fine cargo of the real stuff—silks, wines, and what not, besides a few of the shiners!" Here he jingled the bag of gold and dollars in his paws, and then threw it, with an easy, indifferent toss, on to the side of the companion-way.

"But what think ye, lads?" he continued, in a hoarse whisper; "there's a petticoat aboard ! and as sure as my name's Bill Gibbs, here goes for a look; for there's nothing like lamplight for the lovely creetures!"

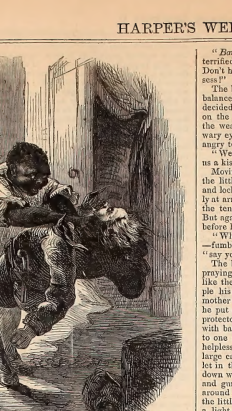
As he skewed round on his bare feet to approach the entrance to the deck cabin, a move was made in the same direction by two or three of the wretches of his band; but shoving them roughly back with his heavy fist, and clapping a hand to his belt, he said, in a threatening tone,

"None o' that, my souls! I takes the first look myself; and if I think her beauty 'll suit the chief, why—I shall be able to judge, ye know, whether she'll go farder on the cruise, or swim ashore with the rest of the lubbers at daylight to Jamaiky. Keep your eye on the schooner, Pedro, and don't make no more sail! D'ye hear?"

"Ay, ay, Si Señor!" quoth that worthy, as he and his fellows fell sulkily back. It took but three strides for Mr. Bill Gibbs to reach the cabin door, when finding it hard to open, after several trials at the knob, he placed his burly shoulder against the edge of the panel work, and, throwing his powerful weight upon it, the door yielded with a snap of the lock, and he pitched forward full length upon the cabin floor. The noise startled the lady within, and speaking as if half asleep, she called,

"Banou! Banou! what is the matter?"

"Mon Dieu, Madame! we are prisoners in the hands of pirates!"



Before more words were uttered, Mr. Bill Gibbs, who by this time had regained his feet while giving vent to a volley of blasphemous curses, roared out as he beheld the black, "Ho! nigger passengers, hay? A meanser of color, as I'm a Christian! I say, cucumber shins, is that 'ere woman as is talkin' as black as you be?"

He was not left long in doubt concerning the color of the person he alluded to, for at the instant the state-room door flew open and the lovely woman, in her loose night-dress and hair streaming in brown, heavy, silken tresses over her fair neck and shoulders, with a pale and terror-stricken face, stood before him. Speechless with agony, she gazed at the coarse ruffian who had, at the moment, reached the swinging cot which held the little boy, and while he was in the act of looking at the sleeping child the mother uttered a fearful cry and the boy awoke.

"Sarvice, Madam! don't be scared! come and take the little chap! I ain't goin' to hurt him—that is, if it be a him."

The frightened mother, spell-bound at first, needed no second bidding, and forgetful of her dishevelled dress, sprang forward, and with outstretched arms, bare to the shoulder, was about to snatch her child. The pirate, however, with his red eyes gleaming with unholy fire, threw his great arm around the lovely woman's waist, and with a hoarse, fiendish chuckle of triumph, attempted to draw her toward him. But quick as lightning, two black, sinewy paws clutched him with such a steel-like grip about the throat that his sacrilegious arm dropped by his side, and he was hurled violently back against the cabin bulkhead. Then standing before him, the negro glared like an angry lion roused from his lair, as he looked round inquiringly at his mistress.

"Ho!" sputtered the ruffian, as he pulled a pistol from his belt, "ho! you mean fight, do ye?"

"Banou! mon pauvre Banou!" screamed the terrified woman. "Yield! Oh, Sir, spare him! Don't harm us, and we will give you all we possess!"

The burly scoundrel hesitated a moment, and balanced the cocked pistol in his hand, as if undecided whether to blow the black's brains out on the spot where he stood; and then shoving the weapon back in his sash, and keeping a wary eye on his assailant, he exclaimed, in an angry tone:

"Well, come here, then, my deary, and give us a kiss for this nigger's bad manners."

Moving forward as he spoke he caught up the little boy from the cot, tore the gold chain and locket from his neck, and shook him roughly at arm's-length, in hopes, perhaps, of enticing the tender mother within his merciless grasp. But again the black interposed his heavy frame before his mistress.

"What! at it again, are ye? Well, then" —fumbling with his left hand for his pistol— "say your prayers, ye imp of darkness."

The black seemed, however, in no mood for praying; and putting forth his slabs of arms, like the paws of an alligator, he tried to grapple his foe by the throat. The cries of the mother now mingled with those of the child as he put out his little arms to shield his black protector. The ruffian failed in his purpose, with baffled rage evaded the negro by stepping to one side; and as he did so, he hurled the helpless child with great force from him. The large cabin windows at the stern were open to let in the breeze; and as the brig sank slowly down with her counter to the following waves, and gurgled up as the sea eddied and surged around the rudder, the faint, plaintive cry of the little boy arose above the seething waters—a light splash followed—and the mother had lost her child!

"Oh, monster!" cried the heart-broken woman. "Oh, my boy! my boy! May Heaven curse you forever!" as she sank down senseless on the deck.

The awful howl of vengeance which burst from the deep lungs of Banou came simultaneously with the report of the pirate's pistol, the bullet from which struck the black hard in the left shoulder; but putting out for the third time his sinewy arms, and this time with an iron gripe that only left the ruffian time to yell with a stifled curse for help, he was hurled headlong, smashing through the latticed cabin door, and fell sunanned upon the outer deck. In an instant half a dozen pistol-balls whistled around the negro's head, and the knives of the pirates flashed from their sashes as they rushed forward to bury the blades in his body; but keeping to one side, and while two more bullets were driven into him, he seized an iron-stool pump brake from the bulwarks, and, with a mighty bound, he whirled it once with the rapidity of thought high above his head, and brought it down on the leg of his prostrate foe. Such was the force of the blow that it smashed both bones, and drove the white splinters through the brutal trousers, where they gleamed out red and bloody by the light of the binnacle lamp. Even then, wounded, and the blood flowing from several places, and though almost encircled in the grasp of the scoundrels, Banou made good his retreat to the cabin, and planted his powerful body firmly against the door.

With a volley of polyglot curses and yells in all languages, two or three stepped to raise their fallen leader, while the others, leaving the wheel and vessel to herself, rushed in pursuit of the black. Scarcely, however, had they made a step when their ears were saluted by a stunning crash from a heavy cannon, and the peculiar humming sound of a round shot as it flew just above their heads between the brig's masts.

There, within half a cable's length to windward, loomed up the dark hull of a large ship. The crew were evidently at quarters, with the battle lanterns lit and gleaming in the ports, while the rays shot up the black rigging and top-hamper, and spread out over the sails in fitful flashes as she slowly forged abreast the brig, with her main top-sail to the mast. For a minute not a sound was heard, though the decks were full of men, some with their heads poked out of the open ports beside the guns, or swarming along over the lee hammock nettings and about the quarter boats; but the next instant there came in a voice of thunder through the trumpet,

"What's the matter on board that brig?"

There was no answer for a few seconds, until a choking voice, as if with a pump-bolt athwart the speaker's mouth, mumbled out,

"We're captured by pi—"

A dull, heavy blow cut short these words; and though the reply to the hail could hardly have been heard on board the ship, yet, as if divining the true state of the case, loud, clear orders were given:

"Away there, third and fourth cutters! away! spring, men!" Then came the surging noise of the whistles as the falls dropped the boats from the davits; then the men leaping down into the cutter—silently and quick—no sound save the clash of a cutlass or the rattle of an oar-blade as they took their places and shoved off. Again an order through the trumpet:

"Clear away the starboard battery! Load with grape! Sail trimmers! stations for wearing ship! Hard up the helm! Fill away the main-yard!"

The Scourge had by this time forged ahead of the brig, her sails black or shivering, as she came up and fell off from the wind, and the boats dancing with full crews toward her. No sooner, however, had the presence of the unwelcome stranger been made known on board the brig than the pirates seemed seized with a panic, and without a second thought they scudded to leeward, where their boat had been hauled alongside, and forgetful or indifferent for the fate of their companions below, though dragging the while their maimed comrade to the rail, they lowered him into the boat, jumped in themselves, and pulled away with all their strength toward the schooner near. They were not, however, a moment too soon; for as the last of the band disappeared down the side, and supplied by a crowd of nimble sailors to windward, headed by an officer with his sword between his teeth as he swung over the bulwarks. The first sound which greeted the new-comers was from below, and from the throat of the honest skipper. Down the open companion-way leaped the officer, with half a dozen stout, eager sailors at his heels, and dashed right into the lower cabin. There was the brave old skipper, with but one arm free, shielding himself and struggling—faint and well-nigh exhausted—from the knives of the drunken brace of rascals who had been left to guard him. A pistol in the hands of one of the new comers was pointed with an unsteady aim at the officer as he entered, but the ball struck the empty rum-bottle on the table and flew wide of its mark; and before the smoke of the powder had cleared away a sword and cutlass had passed through and through both their carcasses, and they fell dead upon the cabin floor.

THE NIGHT CHASE.

While Captain Blunt found breath to give a rapid explanation of the trouble, and while the brig was once more got under control and the wounded cared for, we will take a look at the man-of-war and the part she bore in the business.

At the first sound of the warning gun from the cruiser the schooner began to show life, and drawing her head sheets she were short round on her heel, with every thing ready to run up her fore and aft sails, while a stay-tackle was likewise rove and hanging over the low gunwale to hook on to the boat and hoist it in the moment it came alongside. Meanwhile the Scourge had risen ahead of the brig, and swerving round her fore-foot, with her starboard tacks on board, she emerged out beyond, with a bound just stipped from the leash. As she cleared the brig the schooner lay with bare masts about three cables' length to windward, and while many eyes and teeth lit up in the gbre; then, too, the crews of the guns, in their trim frocks and trousers; the marines on the top-gallant fore-castle, with their firelocks and white cross-belts; and then shaft a knot of officers on the poop, with night-glasses to their eyes—all standing out as clear as day in the sudden flashes from the cannon. Then followed the concussive roar, and the next instant you could hear the hurtling rush of the iron ball, as it flew singly or in bunches through the air, or skipped in its deadly flight from wave to wave, until it came crashing into the pirate's boat, slapping with heavy thumps against the schooner's side, or flowing along her decks; while a shower of the splinters flew high over her lee rail, and told how well the iron had done its bidding. Then were heard dying groans and imprecations, rapid orders, the shattered and sinking boat cut adrift, and, a moment after, the hulls of the vessel spread as flat as a wall, the sheets flat aft; and, taking the breeze, she heeled over till her lee rail was all awash, and away she walked, close hauled, right up to windward.

But again came the clear, commanding tones on board the cruiser, mingled with the jumping of the crew and ramming home the charges in the guns:

"Load! round shot! Run out! One point abaft the beam! Fire as you bring the schooner to bear!"

Out belched the red flames, the heavy glides of iron—like so many black pens in daylight—sung their deadly note as they darted on their way, and the pirate gave a little heel to starboard as the shock of the explosion was felt. One shot dropped within fifty yards of the low hull of the schooner, bounded clear over it, and after deck, knocked off the head and shoulder of a man at the tiller, and then went skipping away over the water like a black foot-ball. Another messenger cut off the schooner's delicate fore-topmast as clean as a bit of glass, bringing down the gaff-sail, and, what was equally pleasant, the fellow who was setting it—pitching him over and over like a wheel, until he fell in bruised and lifeless lump of jelly, on the oak bits at the foremast. Before, however, they were treated to another of these mortific dons the pirate had her chair cast in splendid style, and with every stitch of her canvas spread, and tugging and straining, she rushed on with the heels of a race-horse, within three points of the wind. The Scourge, too, was now close hauled, her yards braced as fine as needles, and crowded with every rag of sail that would draw; and every ten minutes or so she would let slip two or more guns from a division at the chase. But the unsteadiness of starlight, the darkening effect of the passing trade clouds, made the little vessel a very difficult object to see; and though one of the last balls struck her on the narrow deck, and, passing through that and the water-ways, and out on to board, spoiled two of her timbers, and no end of planking, still she was the last damage she received. Her crew, also, had got what was could be out of harm's way—both the sound and wounded—and were lying quietly as possible, deep down in the vessel's run. The daylight broke the heaven began to slacken, but she was by this time hull down from the corvette, a long way beyond the reach of her long eighteens in the bow-ports, and eating her way to windward, with no chance of being taken.

"It's no use," said the captain of the corvette to his first lieutenant, as they stood watching the receding chase. "We may as well give it up; she has the heels of us in this light wind, and will soon be out of sight. I think, however," continued the captain, with a smile, "that he'll remember the Scourge when he meets her again. This is the second time we've chased that fellow; and this heat, by the way the splinter flew, we must have peppered the skin off his back."

Shutting up the joints of the spy-glass which he held in his hand, he took hold of the main rope of the poop-ladder, and as he put his foot on the steps, he said,

"You can go about, Mr. Cleveland, and run down to the brig."

CHAPTER VII.

THE MEETING AND MOURNING.

THE afternoon following the night when the foregoing events transpired, the Martha Flint sailed slowly along the sandy tongue of land which separates Port Royal from Kingston, and dropped anchor in the harbor. As the cable rumbled out with a grating sound through the hawse-hole, and the clerk-ship were furling the sails, a large, gayly-painted barge, pulled by a dozen blacks shaved by a striped awning, shot with astonishing celerity from under the wharves, and clapping their hands, and shouting joyously. A rope was immediately thrown from the gangway of the brig, and a light, handsome man, with a broad Panama hat, loose white jacket and trowsers, sprang with a bound up the side, and leaped on deck.

Captain Blunt stood there to receive him. A broad white bandage was passed around his head, and the tears trickled slowly down his bronzed and honest cheeks. Just beyond him, under the shade of the awning, lay Barton, stretched out at full length on a mattress; while Ben, the helmsman, was kneeling beside him, fanning him and scattered flies from the wounded paulin. A yard or two beyond, on a broad plank resting on trestles, lay the mate, Mr. Binks, cold and rigid as marble, with his face and the union-jack folded modestly over his corpse. The black breathed heavily and in pain; but when he caught sight of the gentleman as he stepped on deck, a deathly blue pallor came over his countenance, and, closing his eyes, the hot sun burst suddenly on the white of his ball.

"My God! Captain," said the gentleman, with a bewildering stare, "what's all this? Where's Mr. Cleveland?"

The old skipper merely made a motion with his hand toward the cabin, and leaning painfully against the mast, with a wailing cry the gentleman's blood forsook his cheeks, and, with his knees knocking together, he staggered like a drunken man into the cabin. Then, after a few minutes later he emerged, bearing in his arms the drooping, sobbing form of his wife. Starting from his chair, and seeing the husband as he bore her to the gangway, she gave one shuddering, terrified, searching gaze over the blue water, to seaward, and then, with a wailing cry that would have shook the hardest heart, she fell sobbing again into her husband's arms.

The voices and the sobs of the two persons in the barge alongside subsided into low mourning groans; four or five came up and carefully lowered Barton down, then all got into the boat, and she moved mournfully away toward the shore.

WRITTEN BY MY LADY.

I SUPPOSE I write this in the desperate hope of awakening an interest. I could have closed it, and I shall never know it. It is a dreadful thing to go to the gallows abhorred by every body: it is a more dreadful thing to live abhorred.

Not the gallows! it is not that I am afraid of. When I heard the words, "To be hanged by the neck till you are dead," I could have kissed the judge for that righteous and most merciful sentence. Any thing to escape from the intolerable loathing of myself—intolerable, I feel sure, to no one of them who, in detestation of my crime, has less of pity for me than I myself. The thought of pain, of suffering, is a consolation and a relief to me; I would have it crueler, more shameful, if it might be. No horror that could be inflicted would compare with the horror unspeakable in the dock after such a deed. I must hope, as I suppose we all do, that death will bring some change involving of not pardon and peace, some relief for the unendurable present. At times I fancy it will all prove a dreadful dream; that I never did it.

From my childhood I have had to remember, I was of an eager, passionate nature, impulsive to a degree which would often have covered me with confusion and trouble, but for the check of unconquerable shyness, partly inherent, partly the result of circumstances. A plain-featured, awkward, sensitive person was the result of a first marriage (she wedded again in the second year of her widowhood), my surroundings might have been happier. I was brought up with a sister less than affectionately, under the care of a step-father. He ruled his family absolutely, but with as much justice as was consistent with the narrowest-mindedness common to men of his stamp. I think his creed, one of the severest as regards this life and the next, intensified the misery I felt myself to be. I am sure it did not make him, or my mother or me, any better or happier. Love had not sufficient force of character, and respected him not sufficient to touch to attempt or to effect any modification of it. So he had his way in every thing.

Ours was a dull household: mine was a somber boyhood. I had plenty of repression, little love. I had little beauty to look at, and no graces. The instincts of whose heart were wiser than the dictates of her husband's head. I believe her child stood unreasonably in the way of every thing that gives him a step-father for his sake rather than her own, being left very poor at her husband's decease. But she never could show it. Her love was open as to excite his successor's suspicion or jealousy. He might have grown kinder if he had had children of his own; but, with the exception of a baby which died in its infancy, my mother brought him none. I have heard that he seemed sorry and disappointed at this.

Passionate, impulsive, and shy—these, I repeat, were its predominant features: the latter resulting from my constant association with persons of my own age, and from a consciousness of awkwardness and plainness of feature. I was jeked on both subjects by my school-fellows until I became angrily sensitive to them, and painfully conformed in my shamefacedness. This, and the repressive influences at home, induced a morbid habit of reserve, which my approbativeness often burst through, to my subsequent chagrin and mortification. As my opinion of temper brought earnestness or sharp comment from my step-father I had additional reason for self-control; but until manhood I never attained much more than the semblance of it. Then it deceived people, and in some degree myself, with respect to my disposition. If none of this had been forced upon me; if my eager, ardent nature had been allowed healthy vent; if what was good within me had ripened in the sunshine of affection, what had, freely but tenderly repressed, I might at this hour be an honored and happy man, instead of a condemned murderer. But God knows best. I will not.

School-days over, I entered my step-father's office. He was a solicitor in good practice. I had no predisposition for the profession, but his aspersion carried its weight of authority; my mother thought it very respectable," and I had hardly turned my thoughts in any definite direction. It answered indifferently well, and in due time I was articled.

Coming manhood did little toward emancipating me from the restraints of home. I had scarcely any communion with my mother. I was a standing repudiation that I should be in-doors every night by ten o'clock, virtually debarred me from amusements absurd. Until I was 21 miles, still more, in a struggle, effected the abolition of the latter privation, and none, but no considerable, improvement in the former. I was succeeded in unwillingly and after pertinacious opposition, originating a series of quarrels which, after my mother's death, terminated in the total estrangement of myself and step-father.

I forget her death the more rapidly from a youthful passion which I cherished for the first time. It is my intention to speak only of circumstances which had a direct influence on my character, and this boy-love may be dismissed in a few sentences.

I fell in love with a sister of one of my acquaintances: a handsome, gay girl, my senior by a year, a coquette by nature. I submitted to her whims for twelve months, when we quarreled our last quarrel over a ball-room flirtation, after which I urged my suit had overborne her original distaste for my ugliness—it was no longer mere passion, but love, deep, humiliated, and sincere. She broke off, in spite of miserable humiliation on my part, leaving me to digest the pain and mortification of it. I saw her but once more (she married and went to India) she will think she had a happy escape. Perhaps she had.

I seriously dwell upon this passion from so common an experience. It made me doubly sensitive to my defects, natural and acquired. I brooded retrospectively and morbidly, developed self-esteem into cankthered egotism, yet despised myself for my recent folly. I refused to attain self-control, and, as aforesaid, achieved a mere mask of it. At this period the alienation between myself and my step-father began to widen, and terminated in my withdrawal both from his office and home.

I was able to keep myself, having acquired, with a world of pains, the art in the exercise of an amount of patience foreign to my nature. The art of stenography; though not a proficient in the craft, I had mastered enough to be useful. Also, I presently began to write for magazines and periodicals, at first poorly enough, and with proportionate remuneration. This, with my occasional services at my step-father's prohibition, I had become an eager reader of fiction, and this, germinating in a feverish, unhealthy, and unnatural manner, produced fruit of a sort which yet commanded a certain price.

Years passed, and I prospered, leading a very different life from that natural to me by temperament, but not a better one. My step-father's example had disgusted me with professions of religion: I had no faith and no moral grounds to restrain me from vicious indulgence, for my disposition was not calculated to attract those who could have given me healthy pleasures, nor was it improved by pecuniary success.

That accursed shamefacedness, always my enemy, now developed a species of impertinence—I went far enough to confound evil with good—impelled me to reject kindly advances made by the better sort; a proceeding which soon left me to the companions, but no friends. My employers respected my intellect, but disliked me. Not to exaggerate my position, I will say that it was rather unsatisfactory than habitual, nor ever openly defiant of the decencies of society. I lived this life for ten years. When I was 30 I longed for a wife, a home, the recollection of past mortification, of present unfitness, of my motives, deterred me from seeking them. Instead, self-indulgence pulling upon my appetite, I presently devoted myself exclusively to literary ambition.

Four years of persistence produced their results. I came now to the train of circumstances which brought me here.

It was at Scarborough, whither I had gone in consequence of indisposition, that chance made me acquainted with Mary Ann. You know whom I mean by her—there is no need to mention names. A watering-place intimacy sprang up between us, which was renewed on my return to town and to the metropolis. He was an old bachelor, fond of books, and curious about authors. He invited me to his house at Greenwich, and I presently opened it. I went there idly, out of courtesy to him, or out of curiosity. I wish I had fallen dead on the threshold.

They were hospitable people, dwelling in a pleasant house in a London suburb, with a garden and conservatory. I was not long cured from business on something more than competence. His family consisted of a son and two daughters. She was the youngest. I will not dwell on her that is should light up such a fire in my heart?

A girl of sixteen, with kind, thoughtful, brown eyes; soft, smooth, fair hair; and rosy cheeks. That was all. A mere girl, less than half my age, pretty, very pretty, but neither clever nor beautiful. I had looked upon scores of faces more perfect in feature, brighter in intellect, without my quickening of the pulse more than transient admiration. Yet I was and from the first. I could tell how imperviously the passion took possession of me, how it enthralled my whole nature to the exclusion of every thing but that one tyrannic idea, the crowning horror that grew out of it might be understood if not pitied.

I began insensibly enough, God knows. I went to the house, as I have said, at first in company with her uncle, then with or without him, always obtaining a cordial welcome. There was a goodness, an unaffected kindness in the little family, manifest in its mutual relations, its behavior to friends and servants, which seemed new in spite of my distrust of myself and others. I had never seen any thing like it, never known how much of affection, of unconscious self-control, of modest esteem and forbearance might be comprised in the one word home.

The girls often sang to us of evenings. I wonder whether I am unusually sensitive to sweet voices, that here should have affected me as it did, making my whole assembly insensibly pause in my soul as for something I had never known, something I should never attain, which was delicious, yet exquisitely painful.

Her girlish ways, her manner as she went about her household duties or performed the little rites of hospitality, possessed an indescribable fascination for me, totally irreconcilable with reason or with any other judgment; for, strange as it may seem, I knew as well as she was, even when under the influence of the passion which controlled me. I knew it, but had no power to break the enchantment.

She never suspected it—as how should she? It was as much as her elder that she regarded me as out of the pale of those to whom might be attracted by her girlish beauty. To her, a girl of sixteen, I was an old-looking man, a visitor, a friend of the family, nothing more. My intellectual superiority was not her timid. She never dreamed of her power over me.

The touch of her hand, accidental contact with her dress, the upturned glance of her kind, calm eyes, filled me with tremor; my self-possession became resonant to her presence. When I conversed it was always with a secret hope that she would listen or read. I never spoke to her, except in miserable desire to interest her, and a wretched sense of failure. I revolved over and over again in my mind the trivial words that passed between us, pondering on the tones in which she had spoken, and nursing the unrest which devoured me like a burning fever.

So it went on, day by day, week after week, for six months.

There was a handsome lad of fifteen, a schoolfellow of her brother, who came to the house, and whose fancy selected her as the object of a boyish passion: one rife with daily day-dreams and romance, but of no more depth or consequence than such fancies ordinarily are. I noticed it at the outset. I believe I discovered it before he himself had any distinct consciousness of the feeling. When evident to all, and something of a joke in the family, he was severely chaffed, and, though I felt pretty sure that the object of his boyish devotion was not indifferent to him, I presently began to write for magazines and periodicals, at first poorly enough, and with proportionate remuneration. This, with my occasional services at my step-father's prohibition, I had become an eager reader of fiction, and this, germinating in a feverish, unhealthy, and unnatural manner, produced fruit of a sort which yet commanded a certain price.

Years passed, and I prospered, leading a very different life from that natural to me by temperament, but not a better one. My step-father's example had disgusted me with professions of religion: I had no faith and no moral grounds to restrain me from vicious indulgence, for my disposition was not calculated to attract those who could have given me healthy pleasures, nor was it improved by pecuniary success.

That accursed shamefacedness, always my enemy, now developed a species of impertinence—I went far enough to confound evil with good—impelled me to reject kindly advances made by the better sort; a proceeding which soon left me to the companions, but no friends. My employers respected my intellect, but disliked me. Not to exaggerate my position, I will say that it was rather unsatisfactory than habitual, nor ever openly defiant of the decencies of society. I lived this life for ten years. When I was 30 I longed for a wife, a home, the recollection of past mortification, of present unfitness, of my motives, deterred me from seeking them. Instead, self-indulgence pulling upon my appetite, I presently devoted myself exclusively to literary ambition.

Four years of persistence produced their results. I came now to the train of circumstances which brought me here.

It was at Scarborough, whither I had gone in consequence of indisposition, that chance made me acquainted with Mary Ann. You know whom I mean by her—there is no need to mention names. A watering-place intimacy sprang up between us, which was renewed on my return to town and to the metropolis. He was an old bachelor, fond of books, and curious about authors. He invited me to his house at Greenwich, and I presently opened it. I went there idly, out of courtesy to him, or out of curiosity. I wish I had fallen dead on the threshold.

They were hospitable people, dwelling in a pleasant house in a London suburb, with a garden and conservatory. I was not long cured from business on something more than competence. His family consisted of a son and two daughters. She was the youngest. I will not dwell on her that is should light up such a fire in my heart?

A girl of sixteen, with kind, thoughtful, brown eyes; soft, smooth, fair hair; and rosy cheeks. That was all. A mere girl, less than half my age, pretty, very pretty, but neither clever nor beautiful. I had looked upon scores of faces more perfect in feature, brighter in intellect, without my quickening of the pulse more than transient admiration. Yet I was and from the first. I could tell how imperviously the passion took possession of me, how it enthralled my whole nature to the them now: he, with his youthful, glowing face, all admiration and enjoyment; she, in her light dress and straw-hat, her sweet eyes just raised in answer to him, and a smile on her lips. One of the party jestingly called my attention to them once—as if that were needed.

We rambled about in the forest until noontide, and for an hour longer, presently dining in an open space where were some fallen trees and a little spring. It was for her fact, and as much as mine he engrossed her conversation. Her brother joked him on it, and I joined in the laugh. We were all very merry together, and my presence took no suspicion. I talked gayly, and observed her looking at me more than once in quiet surprise. Fury and despair were raging in my heart, yet I talked lightly and merrily; and when the brother proposed that we should show our skill in shooting at an extemporized target, I bore my part like a boy among boys.

Firing at this and of other sports, we rambled hither and thither. Then I feigned drowsiness, and they left me, to come back in an hour or so, bidding me take care of our dinner-basket. The brother left his pistol; it was heavy, and he tired of his plaything. When they had all gone off among the bushes, I sat up on a fallen tree, and loaded the weapon. I declare before Heaven I had no thought then of the dreadful use to which I was soon to put it. I had an inclination to play with the idea of suicide.

It was fascinating, in my maddened, morbid state, to toy idly with the heaven-by-my-hand fancy what pulling the trigger would effect. I imagined it in detail. A horrible crash and a great darkness. I should be found on their return, lying beside the log, dead. How shocked they would be—how horrified! What would she say? Would she be sorry? How little she or any one in the world would suspect the cause of it! I should carry my secret with me into the next world, perhaps I should be at rest, and people would pity me.

The thought grew upon me so that I rose to dispatch it—rose, and strolled off among the trees, with the accursed pistol in my pocket. My hands behind me, my head bent low, my eyes on the grass, I went, with no object, thinking of her.

It might have been five minutes, it might have been an hour, when I heard a sigh—a long, deep sigh, merely—voice and song I knew well. My dizziness was in my ears, my heart throbbed tumultuously and painfully. I raised my eyes and saw her near, coming toward me, down a foot-path into which I had wandered.

She had on a wide-leaved prettier or kinder. There was a rosy flush of health and exercise upon her cheek, a sweet light of love in her eyes, and a glory of golden sunshine streaming through the boughs upon her fair brown hair. Something told me that the boy's order had won, if not a reciprocation of my passion, at least an unusually favorable hearing. I turned, and we walked side by side. "Where were the others?" I asked.

"Oh, some-where a long way behind. She had run away from them." And she laughed.

"Why?"

"They had teased her. She was glad to have met me, as I would take her part."

"And Harry?" She blushed, and, returning an evasive answer, stole a sidelong glance at me. I looked behind, too. There was no one visible.

"He loves you," I said. She blushed deeper than before, and turned her face away, and we walked on in silence for a few seconds. Then I came. "I?" I said. "Do you know what a man's love is?" And I poured forth a flood of passionate, incoherent words, such as can not be recited or written down, such as men sometimes utter once in a lifetime.

She listened, amazed—affrighted. There was more than fear in her face. As I seized her hand and told her of my hopelessness and agony, I saw, distinctly, in the girl's countenance, a look of compassion and aversion. She broke from me, and attempted to run away. The next moment I stood with the discharged pistol in my hand, a thin smoke curling upward from its muzzle.

* * * * *

What need to narrate how I fled from the spot, the long red bars of sunset streaming after me through the wood, like the fires of hell? How I longed for rest, and had not the courage to end myself? How I gave myself up to justice for that which I meant, found guilty, and condemned to death?

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, April 9, in the Senate, a resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire by what authority the United States naval forces would be employed to evacuate new Fort Cruz recently. The memorial of the New York Chamber of Commerce on amendment of the law relating to the liabilities of ship-owners was presented. Notice was given of a bill providing for more effectual suppression of the slave-trade. Senator Davis's resolutions relative to slavery in the Territories were taken up. Senator Chestnut, of South Carolina, made a long speech on the subject. Mr. Davis, a resolution was offered declaring upon the President for information respecting the African slave-trade. The report of the Committee investigating Committee, recommending the arrest of Collector Schell, of New York, for contempt, was taken up. The minority report was presented, justifying Mr. Schell in withholding from the Committee the names of the subscribers to the New York Hotel Electioneering Fund. After some debate the report was recommitted. Reports of the Judiciary Committee on the President's proclaiming were presented.

On Tuesday, April 10, in the Senate, a bill was passed providing for the extension of the period in which Oregon can locate certain grants of land. Senator Simmons presented a memorial from Frank B. Sanborn, the individual who resisted the United States officers in Massachusetts recently, and whose affray was illustrated in our last number. The memorial was laid on the table. The Homestead Bill was then taken up, and a discussion ensued upon the slavery question, in which Senators Pugh, little, Mason, Crawford, and others took part. In the House, Mr. Taylor, from the Judiciary Committee, presented a minority report on the President's proclaiming message, sustaining the position of the President. The bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union was then taken up and debated till the adjournment.

On Wednesday, April 11, in the Senate, the bill amending the Patent law was rejected by the casting vote of the Vice-President. The Judiciary Committee asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial asking for the location of United States Courts at Binghamton, New York. A bill for the protection of witnesses in criminal cases in the District of Columbia was introduced. A motion was made to refer to the Committee on Foreign Relations the subject relative to the transportation of the mails overland to the Pacific, but after some discussion the subject was passed over. A resolution was adopted directing inquiry as to whether any corporation holding lands was constituted for flogging in the navy, and also as to what steps have been taken with regard to the Fort Sumter murder. It was reported that the United States steamer Brooklyn in New York harbor more than once, recently, had been prepared for action for an adjournment of Congress from the 13th to the 16th of April, in order to afford members an opportunity to attend the Charleston Convention. The Homestead Bill was then taken up, and debated till adjournment. In the House the debate on the bill to admit Kansas into the Union under the Wyandotte Constitution was resumed and concluded, and the bill passed by a vote of 134 to 73. Mr. Grow's resolution relative to the Mexican treaty was taken up and debated till adjournment.

On Thursday, April 12, in the Senate, Senator Mason's resolution for an appropriation of $30,000 for the 30th instant, in order to enable the members to attend the Charleston Convention, was rejected. The consideration of the session was occupied with business relating to the District of Columbia. A bill was passed appropriating for the support of the public schools of the District $20,000 for the year, and providing a mode for the collection of the funds be donated to the education of the colored population. The bill for the Kansas admission, was in committee ensued, and the Senate adjourned without coming to a decision on the question. In the House, taking the question on the Homestead Survey was received, showing the practicability of constructing the Pacific Railroad, and a Ferry Investigating Committee in not summoning Governor Wise, of Virginia, as a witness. The bill was passed by Senator Mason, the Chairman of the Committee, and the House went into Committee of the Whole on adoption of some verbal amendments to the bill amending the Patent Office law, and after a lengthy debate, the rate bills, the Senate went into executive session and then adjourned. A message from the President—In the House nothing of general interest occurred.

ALMOST A DUEL.

An affair of honor between Pryor, of Virginia, and Potter, of Wisconsin, has almost grown out of a personal altercation between them in the House of Representatives, on Wednesday, in connection with Lovejoy's speech.

The New York Herald gives the following version of the affair:

It is understood that after Mr. Potter replied to Mr. Pryor's first note, that no personal allusion or message that might be sent him in the District, Mr. Pryor asked if any of the friends of Potter were in the House, and replied that he would inform him whenever a challenge was received. Mr. Pryor then sent the second note in which Mr. Potter replied, referring him to Colonel Lander, in the District, with whom he would meet. This was declined, on the ground that the weapons were barbarous and inhuman, and not such as gentlemen. To this Colonel Lander replied that Mr. Potter detested the use of bowie knives, but would accept pistols or rifles, but being called to account for the exercise of free speech on the floor of the House, he considered he was accustomed to the usual weapons of the duelist, to meet him on a spot that would place them on equal terms, and to name the time, place, and weapons. But as the weapon selected by Mr. Potter was objectionable to Colonel Lander, without Mr. Potter's knowledge, tendered himself to Mr. Pryor, which was accepted, and Potter declined, on the ground that he had no quarrel with Colonel Lander.

THE CORRESPONDENCE.

The correspondence will shortly be published. The main points in it are said to be as follows:

First—Several notes passed to determine whether the challenge should be given and accepted by the party of the first part. Pryor objecting the Southern code by refusing to meet the fabricator, and subsequently, the party of the first part, leaving it.

Second—The challenging party went to Virginia, from which they dated their notes and gave the challenge, which was received and accepted by the party of the first in the District.

Third—Potter's ultimatum was sent to Pryor last night, about eight o'clock, announcing that he would fight with double-barrels, in a room, at ten paces, the eighth twelve hours. That the principals should take their positions within four feet of the muzzles of the double-barrels, should commence at a given word, which should be announced by one of the seconds, and that the principals should stand in the rear of his principal, armed with a Colt navy pistol, to be given him.

Fourth—At about eleven o'clock Pryor's second, Mr. Chilman, had a new interview with Colonel Lander, and Hester, returned an answer, declining the terms, and suggested from as hostile terms.

Fifth—Mr. Lander, the second of Mr. Potter, immediately replied that if the terms were not accepted, he believed the whole code of honor no less so, and in order to accommodate the gentlemen proposed that the encounter should take place on the following morning at ten o'clock, at the same place, and with the same weapons meeting him.

And here ends the correspondence. This last note of Mr. Chilman was received by Colonel Lander at seven o'clock a.m. on the morning of the appointed day, and upon the subject, it is said that Mr. Potter will not permit it to be published, as he thinks it unbecoming, and at most close in his note declining to accept the proposal of Colonel Lander. It is also said that Mr. Pryor has not obtain satisfaction now is by a street attack, which Mr. Potter will undoubtedly meet.

ARRIVAL OF A JAPANESE VESSEL AT SAN FRANCISCO.

His Imperial Japanese Majesty's war steamer Candinmaru, commanded by Kat-sin-karoh, a captain in the Japanese navy, arrived at San Francisco March 17, and anchored off Valley Street wharf at three o'clock P.M., after thirty-seven days' passage from Uraguwa, and landing on board the Chief Admiral of the Imperial Japanese navy, Co-zo-ke-no-ka-mo-ki-on. The object of the visit of this Commissioner is as a tender or preceding vessel to the United States steamer Powhatan, which left Japan on the 10th of February, bound to San Francisco, having on board the Japanese Ambassador and his suite, sent by the Emperor to Washington. The following are the names of the officers of the ship: Admiral, Co-ser-ke-no-ka-mo-ri-um; Captain, Kat-sin-karoh; Captain Attending, Manager; Lieutenants, So-ke-nah-to-ka-mah, Kim-ma-ra-ta-ka-ma-ta-ka-ma-ta-ka-ma

PROMINENT CANDIDATES FOR THE DEMOCRATIC NOMINATION

AT CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.—[From Photographs by Brady.]

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

We publish on the two preceding pages portraits of eleven prominent candidates for the Democratic nomination at Charleston. The biography of Hon. Stephen A. Douglas we publish on page 242. Brief sketches of the other candidates we subjoin:

HON. JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE, OF KENTUCKY

John C. Breckinridge, Vice-President of the United States, was born near Lexington, Kentucky, on 21st January, 1821, and is consequently thirty-nine years of age. His father was an eminent clergyman; his grandfather served a term in the United States Senate, and held the office of Attorney-General of the United States. The family has always been conspicuous for prosperous.

Mr. Breckinridge was educated for the bar, and, after a successful career, was elected in 1850, as the Union man and prospective anti-nullifier, to the retired house, and established a large practice. At the age of thirty-six he was appointed by Governor Letcher, During the angry session of Congress in 1856, Mr. Breckinridge took an active part as one of the Administration leaders, and was drawn into a personal affair with Mr. Cutting, of New York, which very nearly ended in a duel. Shortly after this affair—in which Mr. Breckinridge's coolness and firmness were highly commended—Mr. Pierce offered him the mission to Spain. Mr. Breckinridge declined to leave the country, and Mr. Dodge, of Iowa, was appointed to the post. Mr. Breckinridge was nominated for Vice-President on the ticket with Mr. Buchanan, and was elected in the fall of the same year, 1856. He has discharged the duties of President of the Senate with dignity and impartiality, and, though he has been censured who ever filled the post, it thought compare favorably with his predecessors. His knowledge is believed to be more moderate in his views on the slavery question than many other Southern leaders, and has many friends in the North.

SENATOR HUNTER, OF VIRGINIA.

Robert M. T. Hunter, United States Senator from Virginia, was born in Essex County, in the eastern part of that State, on the 21st of April, 1809. James Hunter (the father of the subject of this sketch) was elected a member of the Virginia Legislature. He gave his son a liberal education, and the young man, after having graduated at the College of William and Virginia, studied law with Judge Hardy St. George Tucker, of Winchester.

In 1830 Mr. Hunter commenced the practice of his profession in his native county where, in 1832, he was his first political office, that of Sheriff. He, however, espoused the cause of State Rights in the ultimate result of the nullification excitement in Carolina, and was elected to the Virginia House of Delegates by the Opposition party. He served three years, and took a high stand as an independent, original legislator, opposing the Administration on its hostility to "nullification" and its exertions to "coerce a sovereign state" in the recovery of the public property, the veto of the United States Bank and the efforts to abolish the "American system" of Henry Clay.

In 1837 Mr. Hunter was elected to the Twenty-fifth Congress as a representative of the Whig party, and was re-elected to the Twenty-sixth from those States Rights Whigs who had supported Judge White for the Presidency, he decisively opposing the United States Bank.

When the Twenty-sixth Congress met, the organization of the House was delayed by the first of the four numerous contests for the Speakership which have occurred during the present century. It was not till the fifth of December Mr. Hunter was elected Speaker by three majority.

Re-elected to the Twenty-seventh Congress, Mr. Hunter found himself in the midst of many disturbing measures introduced by the Whigs after their triumphant election of Harrison and Tyler.

In the Presidential campaign of 1844 Mr. Hunter advocated the election of Mr. Clay, and was also himself successful as a candidate for the House of Representatives.

Elected in 1846 a Senator in Congress from Virginia, he took his seat in December, 1847, and was placed on the Committee on Finance, of which Daniel S. Dickinson, of New York, was chairman.

In 1849 Senator Hunter succeeded Senator Dickinson as Chairman of the Committee of Finance—a responsible position, which he still occupies.

In person Senator Hunter is not a brilliant man. Grave and dignified, his expression of countenance is peculiarly quiet and subdued—often languid and indifferent. His face is pale, and his dark complexion is swarthy. His form is compact, and there is an intimation of nervous energy in his movements. If he has passions, they have little effect upon his exterior—the iron alone is visible in the man, with little energy of action. His attire is careless; his manners are frank and cordial.

GENERAL SAM HOUSTON, OF TEXAS.

General Samuel Houston, of Texas, was born in Rockbridge County, Virginia, on March 2, 1793, and is consequently, at the present time, sixty-seven years of age. At a very early age he left his father, and with his mother removed to Tennessee, where he received what little education he ever had, and early entered public affairs. He had, he entered a country store as clerk; this employment not suiting his active spirit, he left it and went to school; but finding this still less to his taste, he left it alone, and enlisted in the army. He distinguished himself at that time conducting a war against the Creek Indians, and under him, at the age of twenty-four years, he learned his first lesson of war. In the course of four or five years he rose to the rank of Lieutenant, and to the esteem of Jackson and his officers. At the close of the war he took up the study of law, entered the study of and the practice of politics. In 1823 he was sent to Congress from the district of which he was a resident. In 1827 he was elected Governor by three terms of office. At the close of his gubernatorial career he removed to Arkansas, resolving to live in the way which suited him best—in the backwoods with the Indians. The Indians received him genius. Discovering, shortly after his settlement in Arkansas, that he was not to be permanently victimized by the Government Indian agents, he undertook their representation, and made several journeys to Washington to plead on their behalf. It is understood that the unending of his labors in this way for the Texas soldier, and his missions were unsuccessful. It was on his return from one of these that he happened to be present in Texas just at the time that the Texans were beginning to agitate actively for independence. They had chosen a convention, and invited Houston to a seat. He drew their new Constitution, and shortly afterwards was appointed major-general upon them by Santa Anna, the President of Mexico, subsequently to be, and for reasons secret to no man under General Austin. At the death of the latter General Houston became commander-in-chief of the Texan forces. He prosecuted the war with vigor and ability, and brought it to a successful close by the victory of San Jacinto, in April, 1836, which secured the independence of Texas.

General Houston was the first President of the Texan Republic, and served, subsequently, another term in the same republic. He was from the first an ardent advocate of annexation to the United States; and when that step was decidedly taken in 1844, he was named one of the United States Senators from Texas. He served in the Senate until last year, when he was elected Governor of the State—an office which he now fills.

General Houston is known all over the Union as a whole-souled, honest patriot. He is no orator, and seldom addresses the Senate; but, when he does, he is always acted with the democracy; but his views are very liberal, and he was an opponent of the Nebraska bill and its sequels. He is very eccentric in his manner and habits—a strict sportsman and tactician, and fond of simple rural life. In the Senate he used to spend a portion of each day in "whittling" sticks into various forms and toys, which he presented to ladies of his acquaintance. General Houston has many friends who seek to elevate him to the Presidency.

HON. JEFFERSON DAVIS, OF MISSISSIPPI.

Hon. Jefferson Davis was born in Mississippi about 1809. The exact date of his nativity we do not know, and the best education the country afforded. After the usual course at school, he entered Transylvania College, Kentucky, where he remained until his father obtained for him a cadetship at West Point. He was in 1828 or 1829 entered West Point Academy; he left it, with honor, in 1833. At twenty-one years of age, in 1833, he was found was placed in active service. The only wars of the time in which he participated were the Black Hawk and the young Davis distinguished himself in so marked a manner that, when the war was over, he was offered, though he at once obtained a commission as first lieutenant.

In 1835 Lieutenant Davis left the army, took to the wood, and likely to remain so, Lieutenant Davis gave up his military life, and devoted himself entirely to a cotton plantation in Mississippi.

In 1844 he was in training for Polk; and having attracted no little attention in his State by his vigor and ability, he was elected to Congress. The election took place in 1845. He had only been a few months at Washington when the Mexican war broke out. He at once earnestly urging upon his friends not to allow Mississippi to be behind-hand in the contingent to be raised for the war. This manner was an announcement that a commission would be required for himself, which he soon obtained as he ordered. He resigned his post in Congress, and, at the head of a regiment of Mississippians, joined General Taylor.

Many new officers in the army which marched against Mexico achieved no such distinction as Colonel Davis. His regiment was conspicuous for its bravery in almost the campaign; suffice it to say, that wherever danger was to be encountered, or work to be done, Jefferson Davis and his Mississippi rifles, was to be found.

After the war Colonel Davis and his Mississippians had volunteered having expired, they were disbanded; and the President of the United States offered Colonel Davis active service, in order to give that attention to his private affairs which his knowledge is believed to be more moderate in his views on the slavery question than many other Southern leaders, and has many friends in the North.

SENATOR BUNTER, OF VIRGINIA.

Robert M. T. Hunter, United States Senator from Virginia, was born in Essex County, in the eastern part of that State, on the 21st of April, 1809. James Hunter (the father of the subject of this sketch) was elected a member of the Virginia Legislature. He gave his son a liberal education, and the young man, after having graduated at the College of William and Virginia, studied law with Judge Hardy St. George Tucker, of Winchester.

In 1830 Mr. Hunter commenced the practice of his profession in his native county where, in 1832, he was his first political office, that of Sheriff. He, however, espoused the cause of State Rights in the ultimate result of the nullification excitement in Carolina, and was elected to the Virginia House of Delegates by the Opposition party. He served three years, and took a high stand as an independent, original legislator, opposing the Administration on its hostility to "nullification" and its exertions to "coerce a sovereign state" in the recovery of the public property, the veto of the United States Bank and the efforts to abolish the "American system" of Henry Clay.

In 1837 Mr. Hunter was elected to the Twenty-fifth Congress as a representative of the Whig party, and was re-elected to the Twenty-sixth from those States Rights Whigs who had supported Judge White for the Presidency, he decisively opposing the United States Bank.

When the Twenty-sixth Congress met, the organization of the House was delayed by the first of the four numerous contests for the Speakership which have occurred during the present century. It was not till the fifth of December Mr. Hunter was elected Speaker by three majority.

Re-elected to the Twenty-seventh Congress, Mr. Hunter found himself in the midst of many disturbing measures introduced by the Whigs after their triumphant election of Harrison and Tyler.

In the Presidential campaign of 1844 Mr. Hunter advocated the election of Mr. Clay, and was also himself successful as a candidate for the House of Representatives.

Elected in 1846 a Senator in Congress from Virginia, he took his seat in December, 1847, and was placed on the Committee on Finance, of which Daniel S. Dickinson, of New York, was chairman.

In 1849 Senator Hunter succeeded Senator Dickinson as Chairman of the Committee of Finance—a responsible position, which he still occupies.

In person Senator Hunter is not a brilliant man. Grave and dignified, his expression of countenance is peculiarly quiet and subdued—often languid and indifferent. His face is pale, and his dark complexion is swarthy. His form is compact, and there is an intimation of nervous energy in his movements. If he has passions, they have little effect upon his exterior—the iron alone is visible in the man, with little energy of action. His attire is careless; his manners are frank and cordial.

GENERAL SAM HOUSTON, OF TEXAS.

General Samuel Houston, of Texas, was born in Rockbridge County, Virginia, on March 2, 1793, and is consequently, at the present time, sixty-seven years of age. At a very early age he left his father, and with his mother removed to Tennessee, where he received what little education he ever had, and early entered public affairs. He had, he entered a country store as clerk; this employment not suiting his active spirit, he left it and went to school; but finding this still less to his taste, he left it alone, and enlisted in the army. He distinguished himself at that time conducting a war against the Creek Indians, and under him, at the age of twenty-four years, he learned his first lesson of war. In the course of four or five years he rose to the rank of Lieutenant, and to the esteem of Jackson and his officers. At the close of the war he took up the study of law, entered the study of and the practice of politics. In 1823 he was sent to Congress from the district of which he was a resident. In 1827 he was elected Governor by three terms of office. At the close of his gubernatorial career he removed to Arkansas, resolving to live in the way which suited him best—in the backwoods with the Indians. The Indians received him genius. Discovering, shortly after his settlement in Arkansas, that he was not to be permanently victimized by the Government Indian agents, he undertook their representation, and made several journeys to Washington to plead on their behalf. It is understood that the unending of his labors in this way for the Texas soldier, and his missions were unsuccessful. It was on his return from one of these that he happened to be present in Texas just at the time that the Texans were beginning to agitate actively for independence. They had chosen a convention, and invited Houston to a seat. He drew their new Constitution, and shortly afterwards was appointed major-general upon them by Santa Anna, the President of Mexico, subsequently to be, and for reasons secret to no man under General Austin. At the death of the latter General Houston became commander-in-chief of the Texan forces. He prosecuted the war with vigor and ability, and brought it to a successful close by the victory of San Jacinto, in April, 1836, which secured the independence of Texas.

General Houston was the first President of the Texan Republic, and served, subsequently, another term in the same republic. He was from the first an ardent advocate of annexation to the United States; and when that step was decidedly taken in 1844, he was named one of the United States Senators from Texas. He served in the Senate until last year, when he was elected Governor of the State—an office which he now fills.

While a member of Congress, Mr. Slidell was selected by the President to act as Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary to Mexico. The circumstances then imparted unusual importance to the mission. War was actually on the point of breaking out. After many and futile discussions the Mexican Government refused to receive Mr. Slidell; and after much strenuous exertion on the part of the latter to divert from Mexico the blow that was preparing, he finally demanded his passport and returned home.

Mr. Polk, on assuming the direction of the government, tendered to Mr. Slidell the post of United States minister to Austria. Unfortunately the offer was declined. Our interests in Central America were represented by Mr. Squier, and the Presidential term of Mr. Pierce passed away without witnessing the solution of any of the important questions which are involved in our relations with our Southern neighbors.

Mr. Slidell was elected to sit in the Senate for which the post of United States Minister to Madrid. Mr. Slidell was opposed to the Administration for the unexpired term, and at the close of this term he was re-elected for six years. He is now the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate. He is more felt in council than in debate. His person has a full habit of body; his face is round, about the middle height, with a bold, dignified mien. His features are rather handsome.

EX-PRESIDENT PIERCE, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire, ex-President of the United States, is thought by his friends to have some claims upon the Democracy of the United States. He was born in 1857. He was born in Hillsborough, New Hampshire, in 1804, and is consequently now in the prime of his present time. He received in his youth a good education, studied the law, and became a prominent lawyer among the lawyers of New Hampshire. In 1833 he was elected to the House of Representatives. He was in the House of Representatives, became a member of the Senate in 1837. In 1842 he resigned his seat, and repairing to Concord, New Hampshire, devoted himself to the practice of his profession. In 1846 he left the profession, and was frequently retained as consulting counsel in cases in which the United States. On the outbreak of the Mexican War Mr. Pierce volunteered, and was at once appointed to the command of a brigade. He might have had the Secretaryship of War but he knew not popular enough for that office. He was, however, admitted; but the basis on which the unpopularity rested was not at once. Mr. Pierce was not popular from the duties of his office with fairness and honesty; his errors did not wholly heavily against him in the judgment of posterity.

HON. ALEX. H. STEPHENS, OF GEORGIA.

Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, was born on the 11th of February, 1813, on his father's plantation in Taliaferro, now Wilkes County. Taliaferro [pronounced Tolliver] County, Georgia. When in his fourteenth year his father died, leaving a homestead on a small portion of the entire estate being about five hundred acres.

After the death of his father good friends offered to aid young Stephens in obtaining education, and he accepted their aid, but only on condition that the money advanced should be refunded. He at once set to work, he completed his preparatory studies, and entered the University of Georgia, at Athens, in 1828. He had little taste for any study except the Latin classics, but applied himself to the mastery of mathematics, logic, rhetoric, and the like: and by the time he graduated he had refunded to his friends to defray expenses.

In May, 1854, Mr. Stephens commenced the study of law in the office of Mr. Crawford, his aid of any lawyer.

In 1850, while dangerously ill with congestive fever, Mr. Stephens was elected member of the Georgia Legislature, in the lower branch of which he served in 1837, 1838, and 1839.

In 1842 he was persuaded to accept a seat in the State Senate, which he accepted, considered himself rich in a book and in the unconscientious but most important task of framing a State Constitution.

In 1843 Mr. Stephens was, without his knowledge, nominated as a candidate for Congress, to fill a vacancy. He "took the stump," and, after a most exciting political canvass, was elected. He took his seat with the Whig party in its palmy days, and his speeches at home carried the day.

In 1845 Mr. Stephens commenced the study of the own heart. He drew for her such gorgeous pictures of the life she should enjoy with him in Italy, or some such fair and beautiful land, that her warm imagination was charmed. And then he described the dull, still, passionless life she would pass with our gentle Jamie until she grew pale with dismay at such a future. She used to walk with him day after day on the sunny banks of the river down yonder in the meadow. Far better would it have been for her if she had been sitting under the hemlock-trees among the water-snakes and poisonous weeds.

What was Jamie doing all this time? He was away from home studying diligently,—writing frequently to Paquette of his progress, and how the thought of her cheered him in his labors. His father intended to leave the ministry and Jamie was to take his place. And at the time for his return drew near how sweet and tender grew his hopes! how full of earnest love were his words! I used to think that if Jamie had remained in Paquette would never have loved Marmaduke. But I do not know. There was a sympathy wanting between them—the lack of which she felt, I dare not. He could never reach to the height of her genius, and I fear she never sounded to the depth of his love.

He came home to find his affections thrown aside; his hopes crushed; but no murmur or complaint ever escaped his lips. He saw that none was happier with Marmaduke than she had ever been with him, and her happiness was dearer to him than his own.

But there came an end to this happiness. I scarcely need tell you how it ended. It is the same old story which has been told over and over again. Marmaduke left us in the winter, saying that in the summer-time he would return and claim Paquette for his own. "What could I do but give my consent; for I knew she loved him most fervently, although I was when I thought she could not love other. And Marmaduke returned not in the summer; but there came to us tidings of his marriage with some Spanish maiden. I looked for some violent sign of grief from Paquette when she was told this, but she gave no such sign. Gradually her cheek lost their sparkling brilliancy, her cheek its roundness and bloom; her step its joyousness.

I dread to tell you why October is the most sorrowful of all the months of the year to me. Many long years have passed since that fearful October night; but they seem to me as if I were writing on this very seat—my little Paquette and I. It was a clear, bright night. The full moon was high in the heavens and poured its light over all things. Then Paquette spoke to me of her love for Marmaduke, and how cruelly he had deceived her. She spoke calm and low, and was so very calm! She showed me a letter he had written a short time before, in which he told her that he had never loved her, and that he supposed she had ceased to feel any affection for him, and concluded by hoping she was happy with Jamie. Such a letter to such a girl! I was quiet! I wondered at her calmness. He requested an interview with her, in order to exchange the notes and little love-tokens which had passed between them.

"I have written to him," said she, rising, "that I go now to meet him on the river bank, under the hemlock-trees."

She still spoke soft and low, and was so very calm!

She left me, and went into that woodline arbor, and out of it into the maple wood, and down that winding path to the river side. I noticed how heavily and slowly she walked pressed upon the withered leaves, and how different it was from her usual light, airy tread. I watched her as she went through the maple wood, her white dress flitting among the trees. The golden and crimson leaves were scattered over her like gems. I saw her clothed in the glory of the moonlight, and then she disappeared amidst the black shadows.

So shadowy was I, in thinking of my darling that I took no note of time. It may have been an hour or more after she left me that I was aroused from my revery by Jamie. He seized my arm, and demanded of me where Paquette had gone. I could not answer him, for I was horror-stricken as his wild look fell upon me. He almost dragged me through the maple wood down to the river, involuntarily close my eyes now when I think of the sight which met my view. Marmaduke lay stretched upon the ground—dead. The grass around him was stiff and purple with the dark blood which had flowed from a wound in his side. His face was white and wan. A branch of the dearly nightshade hung over him, and the dew was dripping off from the flowers upon his cheek. His right hand was tightly clenched around a steadier sapling of the water-hemlock. Dark-hued clusters of poisonous berries hung in his staring, sightless eyes. A huge adder was slowly trailing over the prostrate body, and water-snakes were gliding quietly among the mushrooms which lined the river bank, and gave to the place the dead calm of a churchyard. The shadows lay heavy and black over all.

But where was Paquette? Jamie drew a little dagger out of the heart of the dead man, and picked up a jeweled sheath, which lay among the poisonous weeds.

"Hide them!" he hurriedly exclaimed. "Let nothing witness against her!"

And then he fled from the spot like one pursued by a demon. I hid the bloody dagger and its bright sheath into the dark waters.

But where was little Paquette? Where was the beautiful maiden? I had but lately seen her crowned with golden and crimson leaves, and clothed in the glory of the moonlight?

That question has never yet been answered. God only knows where the Little Paquette spent that fearful night. God only knows what misery and remorse she suffered through weary years. God only knows the agony of her bitter after-life.

But Jamie said she would return to us. Weeks and months and years rolled away, and she came not, nor did we hear aught of her. But still Jamie said she would return; and with a sweet, patient hope, and a love that outlived time and sorrow, and rose above sin and despair, he sat every summer evening in the woodline arbor to await her coming. And close beside it he built a small cottage, and every winter night you could see the light gleaming from the casement, and streaming far into the maple wood. And thus for years he watched and waited.

I used often to come to this seat under the beech-tree, and I never failed to be here on every anniversary of that sad night on the river. I had last seen my little Paquette; and once, as I sat here, while the full moon high in the heavens above me, watching the yellow and crimson leaves as they fell from the trees, and thinking of that night, years before, when I had last my darling, I heard the same heavy, crushing footfall upon the withered leaves, and then I knew she had come back. I looked eagerly around me, but I could discern only the shadows and the darkness. She came slowly into the maple wood.

The trees threw down upon her their golden and crimson leaves. The moonlight gleamed upon her like a glory, but her long hair was unbound, and it floated around her—a dark shadow between her and the moonlight.

I did not go forward to meet her. There was one then waiting in the woodline arbor whose coming I was first to welcome to our home.

When I entered the arbor I found Jamie seated on the mossy floor holding her in his arms. Her eyes were closed. Her face was very thin and pale, but on it was such an expression of sweet peace and holy love as I had never hoped to see on earth again. Her hands were as white and as marble. I thought she was dead, and I thanked God that I had been permitted once more to look upon my Little Paquette.

But she did not die then. It was not until months afterward that Jamie and I laid her in the grave. She was dying, and she knew it, and so was darling. She was gentle and loving to Jamie and me, especially to Jamie; and we both knew that she was better, and holier, and purer than she who left us—better, and holier, and purer than she had been in her happy childhood—and with this knowledge we were content. I left you to read from these pictures of sin, and want, and despair!

And holily and calmly she died, and peacefully she sleeps, and by her side lies Jamie; and there in that woodline arbor you will find their grave.

THE SOUTH CAROLIN INSTITUTE IN WHICH THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION IS TO MEET.

We give on the following page a view of the building of the South Carolina Institute, in which the Democratic Convention will meet, and which is a partial view of the Circular Church (Presbyterian, formerly Congregational), which stands beside it.

The South Carolina Institute was designed for the promotion of the mechanical and agricultural arts in South Carolina. City and State have equally (we believe) appropriated money to its objects. The building of the Institute, as here shown us, is a structure of the Italian style. It fronts on Meeting Street, with a façade of eighty feet. The entrance is through a lofty archway, with staircases on either hand, leading to the hall shown above. This spacious apartment will seat three thousand persons. The Roman-Corinthian portico shown in our picture, near the Hall of the Institute, is that of the Circular Church.

A BURNING SHIP.

We engrave on the following page a picture of the ship Jacob A. Westervelt, which was burned in New York Bay on the evening of Wednesday last. The conflagration was a fine one. The following account of the disaster we condense from the Daily Times:

"The fire originated in the between decks, aft, and was caused by the upsetting of a lamp. The captain had gone below, in company with a boy, for the purpose of procuring some of the passengers' money for safe-keeping in number, and while this engaged the boy let the lamp fall. It struck the deck, and the contents took fire, and in a few minutes the smoke was so dense as to defy the exertions of the men sent below to extinguish the flames.

"The Harbor Police steamboat Magnolia, with a squad of fifteen men on board, was the first on the fire, drawing about nine feet, immediately repaired to the ship and removed the crew and passengers, some sixty in all, also furnishing the ship's sails, some rigging, captain's sextants and other instruments.

"The crews of Brazilian corvette Dauna Isabel and of the United States revenue cutter M'Lane were early on the fire, and rendered valuable aid. They were lowered down the side of the burning vessel, which were brought ashore by the pilot-boats.

"The steam-tugs Mercury and Samson and the steam ferry-boat Telford, all of which have the Worthington pumps on board, also rendered very timely assistance, streams of water were thrown into the ship. The anchors of the burning vessel having been slipped she was towed ashore, between Bedlow's and Gibbet Island, where she grounded head to the wind. The circumstances caused the fire to work forward slowly. In order to try exertion the fire gained headway, and at 7½ p. m. the masts could be seen burning fore and aft. At 8 she had so increased that the mainmast went by the board, and the forward vessel burning fore and aft. At 9 o'clock the whole interior of the ship was a mass of fire, and all hopes of saving her hull had been abandoned.

"The vessel was scuttled where there is but sixteen feet of water at low tide. This was done at the request of one of the owners; but it proved a fatal mistake, as had she been sunk at the point where she lay when the fire broke out, doubtless her hull would have been saved."

Vessel and cargo are estimated at $235,000; supposed to be insured in Europe.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "ANTED DARK," ETC., ETC.

MISS HALCOMBE'S NARRATIVE CONCLUDED.

* * * * *

July 6th.—Eight o'clock. The sun is shining in a clear sky. I have not been near my bed. I have sat upon my chair always, wakeful eyes. From the same window at which I looked out into the darkness of last night I look out now at the bright stillness of this morning.

I count the hours that have passed since I escaped to the shelter of this room by my own sensations—and those hours seem like weeks.

How short a time—and yet how long to me—since I sank down in the darkness here, on the floor, drenched to the skin, cramped in every limb, cold to the bones—a useless, helpless, panic-stricken creature.

I hardly know when I roused myself. I hardly know when I groped my way back to the bedroom, and lighted the candle, and searched (with a strange ignorance at first of where to look for them) for dry clothes to warm me. The dawning of those things is in my mind, but not the time when they were done.

Can I even remember when the chilled, cramped feeling left me, and the throbbing head came in its place?

Surely it was before the sun rose? Yes: I heard the birds twittering in the fore-court the time by the sudden brightness and clearness, the feverish strain and excitement of all my faculties which followed it. I remember my resolution to control myself, to wait patiently hour after hour, till the chance offered of removing Laura and myself from the place, without the danger of immediate discovery and pursuit. I remember the persuasion settling itself in my mind that the wisest thing I could do was to lie on each other would furnish us, not only with our justification for leaving the house, but with our weapons of defense against them as well. I recall the impulse that awakened in me to prepare those words in writing exactly as they were spoken, while the fact was my own, and while my memory vividly retained them. All this I remember plainly: there is no confusion in my head to-day. But coming in here, from the bedroom, with my pen and ink and paper, before sitting down at the window, I opened window to get all the air I could to cool me—the ceaseless writing, faster and faster, harder and harder, coming on, more and more wakefully, all through the dreadful interval before the house was astir again—how clearly I recall it, from the first beginning by candle-light to the end on the page before this in the sunshine of the new day!

Why do I sit here still? Why do I weary my hot eyes and my burning head by writing more? Why not lie down and rest myself, and try to quench the fever that consumes me in sleep?

I dare not attempt it. A fear beyond all other fears has got possession of me. I am afraid of all this head that burns my skin. I am afraid of the creeping and throbbing that I feel in my head. If I lie down now, how do I know that I may have the sense and the strength to rise again?

Oh, the rain, the rain—the cruel rain that chilled me last night!

* * * * *

Nine o'clock. I was it nine struck, or eight? Nine, surely. I am beginning again with my writing, from head to foot, in the summer air. Have I been sitting here asleep? I don't know what I have been doing.

* * * * *

Oh, my God! am I going to be ill?

* * * * *

Ill at such a time as this! No, no; not ill. Only cold. So cold, so cold!

My head—so proud of my head. I can write, but the lines all run together. I see the words. Laura—I can write Laura, and see I write it. Laura—mine—which was it?

So cold, so cold—oh, that rain last night!—and the strokes of the clock, the strokes I can't count, keep striking in my head—

* * * * *

NOTE.

[At this place the entry in the Diary ceases to be legible. The two or three lines which follow contain fragments of words only, mingled with blots and scratches of the pen. The last marks on the paper bear some resemblance to the letter or letters (L. and A.) of the name of Lady Glyde.

On the next page of the Diary another entry appears, in the same woman's handwriting, large, bold, and firmly regular; and the date is "July the 13th." It contains these lines:]

[POSTSCRIPT BY A SINCERE FRIEND.]

The illness of our excellent Miss Halcombe has afforded me the opportunity of enjoying an unexpected intellectual pleasure.

I refer to the perusal (which I have just completed) of the above Diary.

There are many hundred pages here. I can lay my hand on my heart and declare that every page has given me unmixed delight and me.

To a man of my sentiments it is unspeakably gratifying to be able to say this.

Admirable woman!

I refer to Miss Halcombe.

Stupendous effort!

I refer to the Diary.

Yes! these pages are amazing. The tact which I find here, the discretion, the rare courage, the wonderful power of memory, the accurate observation of character, the easy grace of style, the charming outbursts of womanly feeling, have all inexpressibly increased my admiration of this sublime creature, of this magnificent Marian. The presentation of my own character is masterly in the extreme. I certify, with my whole heart, to the fidelity of the portrait. I feel how vivid an impression I must have produced to have been painted in such strong, such rich, such massive colors as these. I lament afresh the cruel necessity which sets our interests at variance, and opposes us to each other. Under different circumstances how warmly I should have been of Miss Halcombe—how worshiped by Miss Halcombe would have been of us!

The sentiments which animate my heart assure me that the lines I have just written express the Profoundest Truth.

Those sentiments exalt me above all merely personal considerations. I bear witness, in the most disinterested manner, to the excellence of the stratagem by which this remarkable woman surprised the private interview between Percival and myself. Also to the marvelous accuracy of her report of the whole conversation which is beginning to its end.

Those sentiments have induced me to offer to the unimpressionable doctor who attends on her my vast knowledge of chemistry, and my luminous expressions of the more subtle resources which medical and magnetic science have introduced at the disposal of mankind. He has thrown himself proudly at usual himself of my assistance. Miserable man!

Finally, those sentiments dictate the lines—grateful, sympathetic, paternal lines—which appear in this place. I close the book. My strict sense of propriety restores it (by the hands of my wife) to its place on the drawing-room table. Events are hurrying me away. Circumstances are guiding me to serious issues. Vast perspectives of the most splendid nature expand before my eyes. I accomplish my destiny with a calmness which is terrible to myself. Nothing but the homage of my admiration is my own. I deposit it, with respectful tenderness, at the feet of Miss Halcombe.

I breathe my wishes for her recovery.

I condole with her on the inevitable failure of every plan she has formed for her sister's benefit. At the same time, I entreat her to believe that the information which I have derived from her will in no respect help me to contribute to that failure. I gratefully confirm the plan of conduct which I had previously arranged. I vow to think these pages for awakening the finest sensibilities in my nature—nothing more.

To a person of similar sensibility this simple assertion will explain and excuse every thing.

Miss Halcombe is a person of similar sensibility. In that persuasion, I sign myself,

FOSCO.

THE NARRATIVE OF FREDERICK FAIRLIE, ESQ., OF LIMMERIDGE HOUSE.*

It is the grand misfortune of my life that nobody will let me alone. Why—I ask every body—why was I born? Nobody answers that question; and nobody lets me alone. Relations, friends, and strangers all combine to annoy me. What have I done to deserve it? Ask my servant, Louis, fifty times a day—what have I done? Neither of us can tell. Most extraordinary!

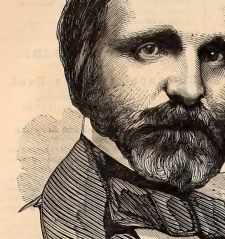
The last annoyance that has assailed me is the annoyance of being called upon to write this Narrative. As a man in my state of nervous wretchedness can be of writing a narrative? When I put this extremely reasonable objection I am told that certain very serious events relating to my affairs have happened within my experience, and that I am the fit person to describe them on that account. I am threatened, if I fail to comply with the unanswerable request, with consequences which I can not so much as think of without perfect prostration. There is really no need to threaten me. Anything rather than my miserable health and my family troubles, I am incapable of resistance. If you insist, you take your own responsibility, and I give way immediately. I will endeavor to remember what I can (under protest), and to write what I can (also under protest). And then I can't remember and can't write Louis must remember and write for me. He is an ass, and I am an invalid; and we are likely to make a nice set of mistakes between us. How humiliating!

I am told to remember dates. Good Heavens! I never did such a thing in my life—how am I to begin now?

I have said Louis. He is not quite such an ass as I have hitherto supposed. He remembers the date of the event within a day or two—and I remember the date of the person. The date was either the fifth, sixth, or seventh of July; and the name (in my opinion a remarkably vulgar one) was Anne.

On the fifth, sixth, or seventh of July I was reclining, in my usual state, surrounded by the various objects of Art which I have collected about me to improve the taste of the barbarous people in my neighborhood. That is to say, I had the pictures and some of my pictures, and shells and coins, and so forth, all about me, which I intend, one of these days, to present (the photographs, I mean, if the clumsy English language will let me mean any thing)—to present to the Institute at Carlisle (horrid place!), with a view to improving the tastes of the Members (Goths and Vandals to a man). It might be supposed that a gentleman who was in course of conferring a great national benefit on his countrymen was the last gentleman in the world to be unfeelingly worried about private difficulties and family affairs. Quite a mistake, I assure you, in my case.

* The manner in which Mr. Fairlie's Narrative and other Narratives that are shortly to follow it, were originally elicited, forms the subject of an explanation which will appear at a later period of the Story.



THE SOUTH CAROLINA INSTITUTE, AT CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, IN WHICH THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION WILL MEET.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

However, there I was, reclining, with my art-treasures about me, and wanting a quiet morning. Because I wanted a quiet morning, of course Louis came in. It was perfectly natural that I should inquire what the deuce he meant by making his appearance when I had not rung my bell. I seldom swear—it is such an ungentlemanlike habit—but when Louis answered by a grin, I think it was also perfectly natural that I should damn him for grinning. At any rate I did.

This rigorous mode of treatment, I have observed, invariably brings persons in the lower class of life to their senses. It brought Louis to his senses. He was so obliging as to leave off grinning, and inform me that a Young Person was outside wanting to see me. He added (with the usual talkativeness of servants) that her name was Fanny.

THE SHIP "JACOB A. WESTERVELT" ON FIRE IN THE HARBOR OF NEW YORK, APRIL 11, 1860.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

HON. JOHN F. FOTTER, OF WISCONSIN.—PHOT. BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 247.]

"Who is Fanny?"

"Lady Glyde's maid, Sir."

"What does Lady Glyde's maid want with me?"

"A letter, Sir—"

"Take it."

"She refuses to give it to any body but you, Sir."

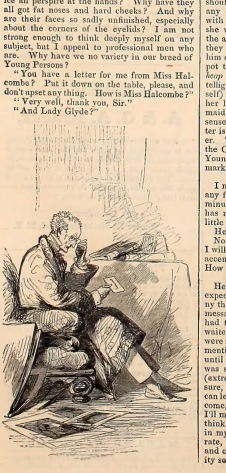
"Who sends the letter?"

"Miss Halcombe, Sir."

The moment I heard Miss Halcombe's name I gave up. It is a habit of mine always to give up to Miss Halcombe. I find, by experience, that it saves noise. I gave up on this occasion. Dear Marian!

"Let Lady Glyde's maid come in, Louis. Stop! Do her shoes creak?"

I was obliged to ask the question. Creaking shoes invariably upset me for the day. I was resigned to see the Young Person, but I was not resigned to let the Young Person's shoes upset me. There is a limit even to my endurance.



Louis affirmed distinctly that her shoes were to be depended upon. I waved my hand. He introduced her. It is necessary to say that she expressed her sense of embarrassment by shutting up her mouth and breathing through her nose? To the student of female human nature in the lower orders, surely not.

Let me do the girl justice. Her shoes did not creak. But why do Young Persons in service all perspire at the hands? Why have they all got fat noses and hard cheeks? And why are their faces so sadly unfinished, especially about the corners of the eyelids? I am not strong enough to think deeply myself on any subject, but I appeal to professional men who are. Why have we no variety in our breed of Young Persons?

"You have a letter for me from Miss Halcombe? Put it down on the table, please, and don't upset any thing. How is Miss Halcombe?"

"Very well, thank you, Sir."

"And Lady Glyde?"

I received no answer. The Young Persons face became more unfinished than ever, and I think she began to cry. I certainly saw something moist about her eyes. Tears or perspiration? Louis (whom I have just consulted) is inclined to think tears. He is in her class of life, and he ought to know best. Let us say tears.

Except when the refining process of Art judiciously removes from them all resemblance to Nature, I distinctly object to tears. Tears are scientifically described as a Secretion. I can understand that a secretion may be healthy or unhealthy, but I can not see the interest of a secretion from a sentimental point of view. Perhaps, my own secretions being all wrong together, I am a little prejudiced on the subject. No matter. I behaved on this occasion with all possible propriety and feeling. I closed my eyes, and said to Louis,

"Endeavor to ascertain what she means."

Louis endeavored, and the Young Person endeavored. The result was confusing each other to such an extent that, I am bound in gratitude to say, they really amused me. I think I shall send for them again when I am in low spirits. I have just mentioned this idea to Louis. Strange to say, it seems to make him uncomfortable. Poor devil!

Surely I am not expected to repeat my niece's maid's explanation of her tears, interpreted in the English of my Swiss valet? The thing is manifestly impossible. I can give my own impressions and feelings perhaps. Will that do as well? Please say, Yes.

My idea is that she began by telling me (through Louis) that her mistress had dismissed her from her mistress's service. (Observe, throughout, the strange irrelevancy of the Young Person. Was it only fault that she had lost her place?) On her dismissal she had gone to the inn to sleep. (I don't keep the inn; why mention it to me?) Having had a bad night and seven Miss Halcombe had come to say good-by, and had given her two letters: one for me and one for a gentleman in London. (I am not a gentleman in London—hang the gentleman in London!) She had carefully put the two letters into her bosom (what have I to do with her bosom?); she had been very unhappy when Miss Halcombe had gone away again; she had not had the heart to put bit or drop between her lips till it was near bedtime; and then, when it was close on nine o'clock, she had thought she should like a cup of tea. (Am I responsible for any of these vulgar fluctuations, which begin with unhappiness and end with tea?) Just as she was warming the pot (I give the words on the authority of Louis, who says he knows what they mean, and wishes to explain; but I snub him on principle)—just as she was warming the pot the door opened, and she was struck of a heap (her own words again, and perfectly unintelligible this time to Louis. Tell us to myself) by the appearance in the inn parlor of her ladyship, the Countess. I give my niece's maid's description of my sister's wife with a sense of the highest relish. My poor dear sister is a tiresome woman to be married to a foreigner. To resume: the door opened, her ladyship, the Countess, appeared in the parlor, and the Young Person was struck of a heap. Most remarkable!

I must really rest a little before I can get on any farther. When I have reclined for a few minutes, with my eyes closed, and when Louis has refreshed my poor aching temples with a little eau de Cologne, I may be able to proceed.

Her ladyship, the Countess—

No. I am able to proceed, but not to sit up. I will recline, and dictate. Louis has a horrid accent, but he knows the language and can write. How very convenient!

Her ladyship, the Countess, explained her unexpected appearance at the inn by telling Fanny that she had come to bring one or two little messages which Miss Halcombe in her hurry had forgotten. The Young Person thereupon waited anxiously to hear what the messages were; but the Countess seemed disinclined to mention them (so like my sister's tiresome way!) until Fanny had had her tea. Her ladyship was surprisingly kind and thoughtful about it (extremely unlike my sister), and said, "I am sure, my poor girl, you must want your tea. We can let the messages wait till afterward. Come, come, if nothing else will put you at your ease, I'll make the tea and have a cup with you." I think those were the words, as reported excitably in my presence by the Young Person. At any rate, the Countess insisted on making the tea, and carried her ridiculous condescension of humility so far as to take one cup herself and to insist on the girl's taking the other. The girl drank the tea, and, according to her own account, entertained the extraordinary occasion five minutes afterward by fainting dead away for the first time in her life. Here, again, I use her own words. Louis thinks they were accompanied by an increased secretion of tears. I can't say myself. The effort of listening being quite as much as I could manage, my eyes were closed.

Where did I leave off? Ah, yes, she fainted after drinking of tea with the Countess; a proceeding which might have interested me if I had been her medical man, but being nothing of the sort, I felt bound by hearing of it nothing more. When she came to herself, in half an hour's time, she was on the sofa, and nobody was with her but the landlady. The Countess, finding it too late to remain any longer at the inn, had gone away as soon as the girl showed signs of recovering, and the landlady had been good enough to help her up stairs to bed. Left by herself, she had felt in her bosom (I regret the necessity of referring to this part of the subject a second time), and had found the two letters there quite safe but very much crumpled. She had been giddy in the night, but had got up well enough to travel in the morning. She had put the letter addressed to that obtrusive stranger, the gentleman in London, into the post, and had now delivered the other letter into my hands, as she was told. This was the plain truth; and though she could not blame herself for any intentional neglect, she was sadly troubled in her mind and sadly in want of a word of advice. At this point Louis thinks the secretions appeared again. Perhaps they did; but it is of infinitely greater importance to mention that, at this point also, I lost my patience, opened my eyes, and interfered.

"What is the purport of all this?" I inquired.

My niece's irrelevant maid stared, and stood speechless.

"Endeavor to explain," I said to my servant. "Translate me, Louis."

Louis endeavored, and translated. In other words, he descended immediately into a bottomless pit of confusion, and the Young Person followed him down. I really don't know when I have been so amused. I left them at the bottom of the pit as long as they diverted me. When they ceased to divert me, I exerted my intelligence and pulled them up again.

It is unnecessary to say that my interference enabled me, in due course of time, to ascertain the purport of the Young Person's remarks. I discovered that she was uneasy in her mind, because the train of events that she had just described to me had prevented her from receiving those supplementary messages which Miss Halcombe had intrusted to the Countess to deliver.

"OH, MY GOD! AM I GOING TO BE ILL?"

She was afraid the messages might seem of great importance to her mistress's interests. Her dread of Sir Percival had deterred her from going to Blackwater Park late at night to inquire about them; and Miss Halcombe's own directions to her, on no account to miss the train in the morning, had prevented her from waiting at the inn the next day. She was most anxious that the misfortune of her fainting-fit should not lead to the unjust misfortune of making her mistress think her neglectful, and she would humbly beg to ask me whether I would advise her to write her explanations and excuses to Miss Halcombe, requesting to receive the messages by letter, if it was not too late, or to make no apologies for this extremely prosy paragraph. I have been ordered to write it. There are people, unaccountable as it may appear, who actually take more interest in what my niece's maid said to me on this occasion than in what I said to my niece's maid. Amusing perversity!

"I should feel very much obliged to you, Sir, if you would kindly tell me what I had better do," remarked at the long-winded Young Person.

"Let things stop as they are," I said, adapting my language to my listener. "I invariably let things stop as they are. Yes. Is that all?"

"If you think it would be a liberty in me, Sir, to write, of course I wouldn't venture to do so. But I am so very anxious to do all I can to serve my mistress faithfully—"

People in the lower class of life never know when or how to go out of a room. They invariably require to be helped out by their betters. I thought it high time to help the Young Person out. I did it with two judicious words:

"Good morning!"

Something outside or inside this singular girl suddenly creaked; Louis, who was looking at her (which I was not), says she creaked when she courtesied. Curious. Was it her shoes, her stays, or her bones? Louis thinks it was her stays. Most extraordinary!

As soon as I was left by myself I had a little nap—I really wanted it. When I awoke again I noticed dear Marian's letter. If I had had the least idea of what it contained I should certainly not have attempted to open it. Being, unfortunately for myself, quite innocent of all suspicion, I read the letter. It immediately upset me for the day.

I am by nature one of the most easy-tempered creatures that ever lived—I make allowances for every body, and I take offense at nothing. But, as I have before remarked, there are limits to my forbearance. I laid down Marian's letter, and felt myself—justly felt myself—an injured man.

I am about to make a remark. It is, of course, applicable to the very serious matter now under notice, or I should not allow it to appear in this paper.

Nothing, in my opinion, sets the odious selfishness of mankind in such a repulsively vivid light as the treatment, in all classes of society, which the Single people receive at the hands of the Married people. When you have once shown yourself too considerate and self-denying to add a family of your own to an already overcrowded population, you are vindictively marked out by your married friends, who have no similar consideration and no similar self-denial, as the recipient of half their conjugal troubles and the born friend of all their children. Husbands and wives talk of the cares of matrimony, and bachelors and spinsters hear them. Take my own case. I considerately remain single, and my poor dear brother Philip inconsiderately marries. What does he do when he dies? He leaves his daughter to me. She is a sweet girl. She is also a dreadful responsibility. Why lay her on my shoulders? Because I am bound, in the harmless character of a single man, to relieve my married connections of all their own troubles. Poor single people! Poor human nature!

It is quite unnecessary to say that Marian's letter threatened me. Every body threatens me. All sorts of horrors were to fall on my devoted head if I hesitated to have Limmeridge House into an asylum for my nieces and her misfortunes. I did hesitate, nevertheless.

RECOGNITION.

COULD we believe when life is o'er,
When turns to dust this weary head,
When these cold lips shall speak no more,
Sunk to the silence of the dead;
That in that starry world beyond,
Unclouded by one human care,
No well-known form shall blast our gaze,
No loved or lost one linger there:

Oh, if in ours these longing eyes
No more shall look with tender gaze,
No circling arms, no sweet caress,
E'er bless us as in other days;
Say what a glorious cheat would be
This gift of life beyond the tomb,
If with us all our loves and hopes
Sink in its silence and its gloom!

C. C. COX.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A FAIR EXCUSE.—Our fair cousin Fanny (we dare not give her surname) says she really is surprised at the ridiculous complaints which men keep making about Crinoline; for of course they must admit that the widest of wide petticoats cover both ins and outs!

VERY URBANE.—A discerning friend of ours told us, a short time back, that in his opinion "there was nothing like humbug in the world." This may or may not be the case. One thing, however, is pretty certain: if there is nothing else, there is, at any rate, a great deal of the original article itself.

A TRAP TO CATCH LANDLADIES.

LANDLADY.—I beg to tell you, Sir, that you are out of gin (produces empty bottle).

TRAVLR.—Impossible; but stop, I'll see. (Goes into bedroom, and returns with a full bottle.) I thought you were wrong. I must tell you that I got three two bottles at the same time. The bottle you hold in your hand I got as the ingredient for your special consumption —the bottle I have here I kept under lock and key in the other room for my own private use. The truth is, you drink much faster than I do. Where your bottle is empty, you see mine is scarcely touched. So, as I said at first, no use, it is not that an out of gin, but rather yourself."

[The Landlady is most virtuously indignant, but evidently guilty.]

"DONE TO RAGS."—Austrian finances.

THE CLOAK OF RELIGION.—A Cardinal.

A TRIPLE HATFUL OF MONEY.—His Holiness the Pope appears to be making a good thing out of the tribulation with which he is afflicted. Last heard has been offered in a letter written to Mr. Cullen, the titular Archbishop of Dublin, for the Peter's Pence fund, "It is not with that I should return in our name, and in the warmest terms, our sincere thanks to your faithful clergy and people for the third sum of £1000 which they have offered to us through you." Three hats for Peter may have their use, but for money; but the less appears likely to be more than made up to him in Peter's pence.

UNCOMMONLY NICE.—The standing dish at the Tuileries' dinners just now is Gâteau de Savoie.

A HOSTILE TRETH.—You know the number of friends a man can lose by the manner of smiling in the wrong sense.

ONLY WHAT MIGHT BE EXPECTED.—The adhesion of Savoy to France is the work of vassal Savoyard crpens.

THE ART OF CONVERSATION.—A remark, apparently neat, but upon examination exceedingly hollow, was recently made by a misogynist. He said, Man is, but with women it is the converse.—The Hermit of the Haymarket.

A QUESTION FOR PHILOLOGISTS.—Philosophers are raising the important demand whether the inter-onest parts of the human individual solely by mind.

WONDERFUL METAMORPHOSIS.—A tectotaler was seen, a day or two ago, to turn into a public-house!

A preternaturally intelligent thing was said upon the stage of the Adelphi Theatre, the other day, at rehearsal. The morning was extremely wet. Mr. Paul Bedford was on his stage, when enter to him enquiry in a shower. "If the weather, for both had been caught in a shower. "If am so wet," observed Bedford, "that I am wetter," said Mr. Bedford, "and as my pat'e over I shall retire and dry." "Yes," said the acting author (not touching), "Superfluous lags the writer 'un on the stage."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Brown's Bronchial Troches

Can not be spoken of too highly. We have used them, and received great benefit from them. They are recommended to us by one of our best physicians. Try them, reader, if you are suffering from any of the complaints for which they are recommended. — Concord Standard.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.
A NOVEL.
BY THE AUTHOR OF
"Adam Bede" and "Scenes of Clerical Life."
Library Edition, 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Cheap Edition, 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Life and Services
of
STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS.
By J. W. Sheahan,
Editor of the Chicago Times.
With Portrait. One Vol., 8vo pages, 12mo. $1 00.
FROM AUTHENTIC SOURCES.
BOOK AGENTS WANTED.
For Circulars, address
GEO. F. TUTTLE,
No. 108 Nassau Street, New York.

A GREAT GOSPEL PICTURE. THE UNRIVALED ENGRAVING FOR PUBLICATION.—Dayton & Co.'s Magnificent Engraving of Thorwaldsen's SACRED SYMBOLS in the Cathedral of Copenhagen, representing CHRIST AND HIS APOSTLES, 36 inches in length and 24 inches in width.

From Rev. Dr. Prime, Editor of New York Observer.

THOMWALDSEN'S STATUARY.—One of the pictures hangs in our study, and we regard the work as eminently suitable for the walls of every Christian household.

The religious Press of the country speak in enraptured terms of the work, and recommend it to introduction into every family in the land. The proof-sheets were sold at $25 each; but, with a view of affording every family an opportunity to possess this "instructive picture," the proprietors offer a full and elegant Bible Family Record, for $3 25, the 25 cents being for return postage. $1 75 will secure a copy of Agency with one copy of the Engraving. $4 50 will ensure six pictures, postage free, to one address. Address

DAYTON & CO., 57 Park Row.

LADIES and CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.
S. CHAMBERS'S ESTABLISHMENT, the oldest and best in the United States, has always an ample supply of LADIES' and CHILDREN'S CLOTHING. Children's Wardrobes, Hats, Bonnets, and Robes de Chambre. The only establishment where Ladies and Merchants can at all times procure the newest and best Styles. S. CHAMBERS has secured the best talent, both native and foreign, with a supply by each steamer of the newest Fashions. Ladies and Merchants supplied at the lowest prices, wholesale and retail, by S. CHAMBERS, No. 503 Broadway, cor. Nicholas Street.

LE BON TON is the best LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen copies, with two patterns, will be sent for 20 cents.
No. 737 TAYLOR & SON, 481 Broadway, N. Y.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

Premature Loss of the Hair.

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and it has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth.

It is unrivaled as a dressing for the hair, a single application rendering it soft and glossy for several days.

The following testimonial is conclusive of its efficacy in the case of

Loss of Hair.

BOSTON, July 19, 1857.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.:

I can not refuse to state the salutary effect, in my own aggravated case, of your excellent Hair Oil—Cocoaine.

For many months my hair had been falling off, until I was fearful of losing it entirely. The skin upon my head became gradually more and more inflamed, so that I could not touch it without pain. This irritated condition I attributed to the use of various advertised hair washes, which I have since been told contain camphene spirit.

By the advice of my physician, to whom you had shown your process of purifying the Oil, I commenced its use the last week in June. The first application allayed the itching and irritation; in three or four days the redness and tenderness disappeared—the hair ceased to fall, and I have now a fine growth of new hair. I trust that others similarly afflicted, will be induced to try the same remedy.

Yours, very truly,
SUSAN B. POPE.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by dealers, generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

Spring Card.

Our importations and selections of all choice fabrics of the French and English markets suitable for our city trade, have been received, and are now ready. They embrace many beautiful styles of Cassimeres, Spring Coatings and Vestings of our own special designs, to be found nowhere else. Our friends would do well to make early selections.

Our stock of Spring Clothing both for men and boys is now ready, and in great variety. Notwithstanding the well-known superiority of our make and style, we are prepared to sell at the lowest figures in the trade.

DEVLIN, HUDSON & CO.,
258, 259, and 260 Broadway.

Established in 1834.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,
Manufacturer of the Over-strung
GRAND & SQUARE PIANO-FORTES
Manufactory and Warerooms
75 to 85
East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, may be assured of receiving by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five Years, and Prices are moderate.

At Walker's Warerooms,

Clinton Hall, Astor Place, near Broadway,
A Large Stock of Pianos of every description for sale and hire.

The Greatest Medical Discovery of THE AGE.

Dr. Kennedy, of Roxbury, Mass., has discovered a common pasture weed that cures every kind of HUMOR from the worst SCROFULA down to a common pimple.

By strict attention to the direction in the pamphlet around each bottle, and a judicious application of the Salt Rheum Ointment, Healing Ointment, and Scrofula Ointment, CHRONIC and CORRUPT ULCERS are cured in a few weeks.

For sale by every Druggist in the United States.

LONDON and PARIS WORLD of FASHION.—Monthly—Price $4 a year. Single copies 50 cents—arrives here about the Twelfth of each month. The best and most reliable for Fashions extant, by work. Contains four Colored Fashion Plates, and one plain Millinery, and a full size paper pattern cut out ready for use.
WILLMER & ROGERS, 42 Nassau Street, N. Y.

THE ORANGE BLOSSOM WEDDING ENVELOPE, just issued, very beautiful (copyright reserved), at the Wedding Card Depot, No. 302 Broadway, cor. Duane Street. Also, French Paper

A Card.—$100.

The undersigned will pay ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS for the best POEM descriptive of Rembrandt Peale's Painting of "THE COURT OF DEATH," the Poem to consist of not more than 100 lines—the award to be made by three distinguished American Poets (to be hereafter named) on or about the 4th of July next. The names of the authors to be covered by seal till after the decision, and only the selected one to be made public.
Address G. G. COMPTON,
No. 37 Park Row, New York.

Court of Death.

This sublime Painting, by REMBRANDT PEALE, is now on exhibition at the

Cooper Institute,

From 9 to 9 and 7 to 9 o'clock P. M. Description given at 4 and 8. Admission, 25 cents. FAC-SIMILE COLORED ENGRAVINGS of the Painting (size, 23 by 31 inches) may be obtained of the subscriber at the unprecedented low price of $1. Said subscribers will add four letter stamps to pay postage. Engravings rolled and sent with perfect safety. They may also be obtained at the Exhibition, Cooper Institute.

Letters should be addressed G. G. COLTON,
P. O. Box, 5,643, New York City, 37 Park Row, New York.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI,
Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the normal habits of female life superinduce a variety of diseases of the Uterine System, which, if unobserved and cure. It can be relied upon in any case of Painful, Suppressed or Irregular Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, Ulceration of the Womb, Faintness, Lassitude, &c. &c., when every other has failed, this article is never taken without benefit. No suffering female should know it untried. A pamphlet, with full symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent (gratis) by mail, or delivered by my agents. Sold by druggists in every town, or sent by express. Be cautious of an imitation, somewhat similar in name, by certificates almost, &c. Address HARNES & PARK, No. 13 Park Row, N. Y. J. B. MARCHISI'S Genuine Article. SWEET & POTTER, Boston; or CALLENDER & CO., Philadelphia; J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Utica, N. Y.

"Trefelio" is the True Secret of Beauty.

"TREFELIO" Cures all Eruptions.
"TREFELIO" Softens the Skin.
"TREFELIO" Beautifies the Skin.
"TREFELIO" Eradicates Humors.
"TREFELIO" 50 cents a bottle.

1828. T. H. Chambers' 1860.

PIANOS, Established in 1828. Formerly Hazelton & Stodart, and Dubois; Stecca & Chambers, 324 Broadway, corner of Six Grand Avenue, opposite the Peter Cooper Institute, New York.

Improved Over-strung, Iron-frame Pianos.
N. B.—Send for a Circular, with description of styles and Schedule of prices.

PURE WATER.

United States Carbon Filter Company.

CARBON FILTERS of all sizes and descriptions, adapted to the Hydrant in Dwelling Houses, Factories, &c. Also, a great variety of Portable Self-Acting Filters, for Sportsmen, Travellers, Druggists, &c., &c.
164 Broadway, N. Y.

CHILTON ON THE CROTON,
OR RIVER WATER.

The Diagram Filter, manufactured by McKENZIE & O'HARA, is the kind of porous Filter to which I alluded in my recent report to the Croton Board. It combines the artificial sandstone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and only requires to be renewed occasionally to insure its action.
JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.
Manufactured and sold by McKENZIE & O'HARA, No. 564 4th Street, corner of Mercer.

Harnden's Express.
—DAILY—

Forwards Valuables and Merchandise to and from, and collects drafts, bills, &c., in all parts of the

EAST, WEST AND SOUTH.

Will receive goods, or orders to "call," at
74 Broadway.

Spalding's Prepared Glue.

For mending Toys, Crockery, &c. Manufactured by HENRY C. SPALDING & CO.,
No. 48 Cedar Street, N. Y.

!! SOMETHING NEW !!

A HEMMER, TUCKER, FELLER, BINDER, and GUAGE combined, just patented, simple, humming say width and thickness of cloth either side, applied to any Sewing Machine by any one in a few minutes. Retail price $5. LIBERAL DISCOUNT TO THE TRADE. Orders by mail, with price, promptly paid. Instructions accompany every hemmer. Send for a circular.
UNIVERSAL HEMMER CO.,
429 Broadway, N. Y.

The Great Romance of the Day!
11,000 Copies in Four Weeks!

A plot of weird and mysterious interest;
The most subtle and delicate analysis of character;
Refined criticism on the master-pieces of Italian art;
Exquisite pictures of Italian scenery;
A style of the utmost purity, simplicity and vigor;
Constitute the attractions of

The Marble Faun:
OR THE
Romance of Monte Beni.
By NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE,
Author of "The Scarlet Letter," &c.

Opinions of the English and American Press.

The cultivated reader will mark in it an advance and an expansion. It is the best book yet written by the author of "The Scarlet Letter."—London Critic.

One of the most remarkable novels 1860 is likely to give us, whether from English, French, or American sources. Also in Italian we have not had since Herr Anderen wrote his "Improvisators."—[London Athenæum.

Never before has Italy inspired a romance-writer with a work so composite in its elements, so perfect in their organic harmony.—[London Spectator.

The story possesses a powerful excitement, which few will be inclined to resist.—[N. Y. Tribune.

Many of the scenes are harrowing in their intensity of excitement. * * * Every way worthy of the high and peculiar fame of the writer.—[N. Y. Evening Post.

We are charmed beyond expression with his exquisite pictures of Italian scenery and works of art.—[N. Y. Independent

"The Marble Faun" is a book which might well make a new era in novel writing. It is in all respects superior to anything which has come from Mr. Hawthorne's pen. —[Boston Sat. Express.

Fascination is the word which describes the emotion the reader of "The Marble Faun" will experience.—[Boston Sat. Gazette.

One of the few modern books which the world will not willingly let die. * * * Full of feeling and fancy.—[Phila. Press.

No such living picture of Italy has ever been transferred to paper.—[Phila. Ledger.

A fascinating story. * * * In style, this book is a study. —[Taunton Gazette.

In many respects, this will be considered the most charming of Hawthorne's romances. —[Springfield Republican.

We believe it to be surpassed in fascination by no romance ever written. * * * There is a charm in every line. —[Lynn Reporter.

* * * A grave poem, bearing the seal of inspiration on every page.—[Welcome Guest.

Strange and beautiful. * * * By far the best thing yet written by Hawthorne.—[Portland Transcript.

We have no hesitation in pronouncing it to be his best work.—[Baltimore Exchange.

IN TWO VOLS. 16MO. PRICE, $1 50.

TICKNOR & FIELDS,
BOSTON.

☞ Copies sent, post-paid, to any address in the United States, on receipt of price.

LOUISVILLE ARTESIAN WATER.
THE NATURAL MINERAL WATER, now very extensively used, is for sale by all Druggists.
S. T. THOMPSON, Agent,
No. 639 Broadway.

CARD.

A. & G. A. Arnoux,

So long and reputably known as Fashionable Tailors, beg to announce to the public that they have added a department for Boys' Clothing to their establishment, in which all the finest and newest styles of goods will be kept. This will enable our customers to obtain all the goods they may be in need of for themselves and the male part of their families at our house.

• 521 Broadway,
Under St. Nicholas Hotel, N. Y.

"CHAMPION"
Fly and Mosquito Catcher."

Will catch 1100 flies in a minute! No Trap, but a Catcher. A number of flies may be caught at any part of the country on receipt of One Dollar.

Agents wanted in every city and town.
Send for circular containing full particulars.
Address GEORGE C. BRIGGS,
Boston, Mass.

Editors inserting this advertisement, and sending copy of paper, will have a sample sent them.

Children's Fancy Hats.

In obedience to a growing demand for a high order of Dress Hat for Children,
we have just opened a new, select and beautiful assortment of recent importation and manufacture, comprising every desirable description and pattern, and furnished in the most appropriate manner. A general assortment of BOYS' and YOUTH'S HATS and CAPS, LADIES' RIDING HATS, &c., &c.
WARNOCK & CO., Hatters,
No. 513 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel.

MADAME RALLINGS,
313 CANAL STREET, N. Y.,
Has opened a superior assortment of French millinery.
☞ French Pattern Bonnets received monthly.

A World-Wide Circulation!!!

REPUBLISHED IN ENGLAND!!

REPUBLISHED IN GERMANY!!

30,000 Copies of the English Edition already Sold!!!

SAY AND SEAL.

By the Author of

"WIDE, WIDE WORLD,"

and the Author of

"DOLLARS AND CENTS."

2 vols. 12mo. Price $2 00.

Just Published,

By J. B. Lippincott & Co.

We are credibly informed that during the few weeks allowed to the English Publishers, in advance of the issue of the work in this country, 30,000 COPIES HAVE BEEN SOLD!

In further evidence of its great popularity, we need only say that, up to the present time, we have been unable to furnish the book as rapidly as ordered.

We invite attention to the following notices:—

"The authoress has secured their intellectual wealth to the best purposes. Such books are better than hundreds of mere controversial sermons." — E. Shelton Mackenzie.

"Decidedly the best book emanating from the authoress of 'Wide, Wide World.'"—Inquirer.

"A delightful book it is."—The Press.

"It is superior to 'Wide, Wide World.'" — North American.

For Sale by Booksellers generally, or will be sent by Mail, Postpaid, on receipt of the Price by the Publishers either in Money or Postage Stamps.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,
92 and 94 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia.

LADIES wishing UNDER-LINEN READY MADE will find at the Depot 907 BROADWAY, near 28TH ST. devoted exclusively to them, an assortment, unequalled, of "EVERY-DAY WEAR," at entirely neat and trustworthy make.

To Wholesale Dealers in Jewelry.

The undersigned has now but one, owing to his unsurpassed facilities, he is able to offer to the Trade Jewelry of any description on better terms than any other house in New York.

All orders will receive the most careful and prompt attention. W. A. HAYWARD,
288 Broadway.

FOREIGN NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS.—Subscriptions received for all foreign Newspapers and Periodicals, English, Scotch, Irish, French, &c., and Magazines supplied on account of Steamers, or sent by mail to all parts of the U. S. Priced lists of Terms and Publications may be had on application.
WILLMER & ROGERS, 42 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Watches Given Away!!

A GIFT varied from two dollars to one hundred dollars given with every Book sold at retail prices.

At least one Watch is guaranteed to every twelve Books!

These inducements are offered by the

Suffolk Exchange Co.,
113 Washington Street, Boston.

The most extensive and the most liberal Gift concern in existence. Send for a Catalogue. Those who have patronized other Gift Houses are particularly requested to acquaint themselves with our terms. Our inducements are unrivalled, and put all others in the shade.

The following are some of the Gifts to purchasers of books:

English Lever Gold Watches, hunting cases.
Patent Lever, " "
Ladies' Lever " open face,
Detached Lever Silver Watches, hunting cases.
Lepine Silver Watches, open face.
Gold Lockets, various sizes.
Ladies' and Gents' Gold Chains, various styles.
Ladies' and Gents' Gold Sleeve Buttons and Studs, all patterns.
Gents' Breast Pins, new and rich styles.
Gold Pencils and Pens.
Ladies' and Gents' Gold Rings.
Gold Watch Keys and Pins &c.
A great variety of Ladies' Jewelry, Pins and Ear drops, comprising all the styles now worn, such as Cameos, Onyxes, Gold Stone, Lava, Florentine, &c., &c. &c.
Gold Bracelets, all styles.

The List of Books comprises a great assortment of standard works in every department of literature, interesting to the young and old. Do not fail to send for a catalogue. Catalogues sent free to any address. Apply to

SUFFOLK EXCHANGE COMPANY,
113 Washington Street, Boston.
C. W. HANCOCK, Manager.

Quevu's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly

The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, is taken without nausea.

Sold by all Druggists.

Quevu's Patent Jellied Castor-Oil.—The grossly nauseous oil of Castor is thus healed, and it does not cause any constipation after use. It is the best purgative for children. To be had of the inventor's office, No. 132 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. PENFOLD, FIELD & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 15 Beekman Street.

Important Invention for married people. For particulars address, inclosing stamp, Dr. H. HIRSH-FIELD, 1013 Race street, Philadelphia, Pa., Broadway, N. Y.

TWO WORKS, VALUABLE TO THE SICK OR WELL, sent by mail, no pay expected until received, free, and read and approved. Address, Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

1st. Six lectures on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female complaints. On the perils of Preserving Health to 100 years. 260 pages, 25 engravings. Price fifty cents, in silver or Postoffice stamps.

2d. A work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Palsy, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what causes disease. 111 pages, 6 engravings. Price 25 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, State, country, town, and postoffice.

THE BIBLICAL REASON WHY
A HAND-BOOK FOR Biblical Students & Sunday School Teachers,
BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED.
GUIDE TO FAMILY SCRIPTURE READING.
Large 12mo, Cloth, Gilt side and back. Price $1 00.

This book makes the Bible a pleasant, as well as profound subject of study. It leaves no difficult or obscure point unexplained. It renders every passage clear. It is exactly the volume for students, which reads at all, imperatively needs to place beside the Bible as its best companion.

This Volume answers 1,493 Questions in a clear manner.

"I have examined the "Biblical Reason Why," and find it to be a repository of facts on Biblical subjects, set forth in a plain and intelligible way. Indeed, I am surprised at the amount of matter that is compressed into this volume. For use in families and schools I consider it the best book of the kind I have seen."

REV. JOHN MCCLINTOCK, D.D., LL.D., President of the Troy University, and Pastor of St. John's Church (Methodist Episcopal), New York.

Published by JOHN E. FITZGERALD,
No. 18 Ann Street, New York.

Also for sale by all Booksellers.

Copies of the above Book sent by Mail, to any address, free of postage, on receipt of One Dollar.

☞ Agents wanted in every section of the Country, to sell this and other popular books; for particulars address the publishers.

CURIOSITIES OF LITERATURE.

(From "The Democrat.")

Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machine!

WHO WRITES FOR IT?

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR, AND SEE.

Office, 505 Broadway, New York.

The above moreous in the advertising columns of a cotemporary piqued our curiosity to know who were the Chief Contributors of so much Romance, Poetry and Pathos. We have received the following list of the age. We accordingly "sent for a Circular." Not even the Ledger, or Appleton's Encyclopœdia, could show a more imposing array of contributors. Did the modern Wheeler & Wilson machine belong to the ordinary dodges of advertising, we should meet everywhere,

"Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machine.

MRS. MARY HOWITT WRITES FOR IT.
MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS WRITES FOR IT.
MRS. E. OAKES SMITH WRITES FOR IT.
MRS. ANNA CORA RITCHIE WRITES FOR IT.
MRS. SARAH LANE LEE WRITES FOR IT.
MRS. ALICE B. HAVEN WRITES FOR IT.
MRS. M. M. PULLAN WRITES FOR IT.
REV. T. S. ARTHUR WRITES FOR IT.
REV. DR. STORRS WRITES FOR IT.
REV. DR. PRIME WRITES FOR IT.
REV. DR. STEVENS WRITES FOR IT.
REV. DR. OSGOOD WRITES FOR IT.
REV. DR. LEAVITT WRITES FOR IT.
REV. DR. BRIGHT WRITES FOR IT.
REV. DR. FLAG WRITES FOR IT.
REV. DR. ABELL WRITES FOR IT.
REV. DR. PORTER WRITES FOR IT.
REV. DR. LUDLOW WRITES FOR IT.
REV. DR. BIDWELL WRITES FOR IT.
REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER WRITES FOR IT.
REV. HENRY J. FIELD WRITES FOR IT.
REV. GORHAM D. ABBOTT WRITES FOR IT.
REV. A. A. LIVERMORE WRITES FOR IT.
HON. N. P. WILLIS WRITES FOR IT.
HON. HORACE GREELEY WRITES FOR IT.
HON. JOSIAH MEIGS WRITES FOR IT.
HON. GEORGE MORRIS WRITES FOR IT.
DR. A. K. GARDNER WRITES FOR IT.
F. P. WILLIS WRITES FOR IT.
C. D. STELLE WRITES FOR IT.

and, if current reports be true, 31,206 others 'wrote for it' the past year, and we doubt not it would pay well for 50,000 more to 'write for it' the present year."

DO YOU INTEND TO TRAVEL?—If so, secure at once a copy of MURRAY'S HAND-BOOK TO EUROPE, which you will find a complete guide as to Hotels, Routes, Expenses, &c., &c. It is now Ready for 1860, for an entire tour through Europe. Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of $1. Address

CHARLES B. NORTON, Agent for Libraries,
Irving Building, New York.

DO YOU INTEND TO REMAIN AT HOME—If so, you will secure at once a copy of MURRAY'S HAND-BOOK FOR EUROPE, Giving a complete and perfect view of all the principal cities and points of interest in Europe; including, also, Egypt, Morocco, and the Mediterranean. Sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of $1. Address

CHARLES B. NORTON, Agent for Libraries,
Irving Building, New York.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES can be produced in 21 days by the use of Barry's (established 1852), which will force them to grow six weeks from the first application, and without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1. Sent by mail, post free, to any address. R. G. GRAHAM, 169 Nassau Street, New York.

"HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET PAID FOR IT."—AGENTS—Young men—and women also—Teachers, Preachers, and others, who may wish to engage in a local or traveling agency for our Books, Stationery, Gift Enterprises, &c., can learn by return mail, by addressing the publishers as follows: FOWLER AND WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

30,000 Copies sold since January 1st.

EVERYBODY'S LAWYER
AND
COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS,
By FRANK CROSBY,
OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR.

Tells you how to draw up Partnership Papers, Bonds and Mortgages, Affidavits, Powers of Attorney, Notes and Bills of Exchange, Leases, Receipts, general forms for Agreements of all kinds, Bills of Sale, Leases, Petitions, Receipts and Releases.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the Laws for the Collection of Debts, with the Statutes of Limitation and Exemption and Stay of property exempt from execution, in every State; also how to make an Assignment properly. Forms for Compositions with Creditors, and the Insolvent Laws of every State.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the legal relations existing between Guardian and Ward, Master and Apprentice, and Landlord and Tenant; also, what constitutes Libel and Slander, and the law as to Marriage Dower, the Widow's Right in Property, Divorce and Alimony.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the Law for Mechanic's Liens in every State, and the Naturalization Laws of this country, and how to comply with the same; also the Law concerning Pensions, and how to obtain one, and the Pre-emption Laws in Public Lands.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the Law for Patents, with mode of procedure in obtaining one, with Interference, Assignments, and Forms of Deed, &c., how to make your Will, and how to Administer on an Estate. With the Law and Commercial Interest, in every State.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the meaning of Law Terms in general use, and explains to you the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Powers of both the General and State Governments. Every one has to keep out of jail, by showing how to do your business legally, thus saving a world of trouble and vexatious litigation, and many pecuniary consultations.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS contains 324 pages, printed in a clear and open type, and will be sent by mail, neatly bound and postage paid, to every person in the United States, every plan of business, and everybody in every State, on receipt of $1, or in sets of 4 at $3 50.

$1000 A YEAR can be made by every Agent in the country who may engage in selling the above work, as our inducements to all such are very liberal.

For single copies of the Book, or for terms to agents, with other information, apply to or address

JOHN E. POTTER, PUBLISHER,
No. 617 SANSOM ST., Philadelphia, Pa.

FOWLER AND WELLS'S
American and Foreign Patent Agency,
389 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

All kinds of business pertaining to the Patent Office done in the most prompt and satisfactory manner on reasonable terms.

Parlor Glees, with Piano Accompaniments.

THE PARLOR GLEE BOOK, containing the principal and most valued compositions of Hackel's "Lyra Celtica," nearly 20 choice Piano Songs, the usual price of which is 25 cents each, for 12½ cents by mail, post paid, on receipt of the price. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

CONSUMERS OF SAUCE

Will please observe that every new Sauce brought before the public is invariably tested in the kitchen of Worcestershire Sauce, thereby giving unwilling testimony to the world-wide reputation of the genuine WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN & SONS, No. 405 Broadway,
Sole Agents for the United States.

AGENTS WANTED

To sell, by subscription, PARTON'S LIFE OF ANDREW JACKSON, to be completed in three large 8vo volumes, with steel portraits, price in plain binding, $2 50 per volume. This is one of the most salable books ever published in this country. Two volumes are now ready, and the third will be issued next August. It is, consequently, now the best time to canvass for it. NONE BUT FIRE BEST AGENTS ARE WANTED, and to such liberal inducements are given, with exclusive territory.

Published by

MASON BROTHERS,
No. 5 and 7 Mercer Street, New York.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.

SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $90.

HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $80 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 453 Broadway, New York.

Barney's Opera Perfume.

DEDICATED TO MLLE. ADELINA PATTI.

A new and delightful perfume, combining exhilarating beautiful and exquisite odors; as truly fascinating as the beautiful young songstress whose name it bears. Manufactured by Wholesale by J. W. NORCROSS & CO., 91 Fulton Street. Retailed by all Druggists and Fancy Good Dealers.

Stop Bleeding—Stop Spitting Blood.

PENFOLD READY. — A certain cure for Hemorrhage and all derangements of the secretions. Sold by druggists generally. Depot for sale, 15 Beekman Street.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR
GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.
PENFOLD, FIELDE & MOWER,
Wholesale Druggists,
15 Beekman Street, New York.

WHO HAS NOT HEARD OF SANDS' SARSAPARILLA? How many have come to be thankful that it has cured their ailments, raised them from a bed of sickness to the enjoyment of health, and saved them a doctor's bill every year. Buy it, and all persons requiring the genuine article should ask for SANDS' SARSAPARILLA, and take no other.

Throat and Lung Diseases.

Of all remedies for Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Influenza, Croup, Whooping Cough, Asthma, Phthisic, Quinsy, Tickling, Irritation, or Inflammation of the Throat, Chest, or Lungs, Incipient Consumption, &c., there is no one which, for safety and efficacy, or which affords such rapid and permanent relief, as the well-known and long-established

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

The only genuine is prepared by SETH W. FOWLE & CO., BOSTON, and is sold everywhere.

From the Providence Journal.)

"Dr. Halsted's system of treatment has been approved by some of our most intelligent citizens, and has received the most flattering commendations in all parts of the country." See Circular, sent gratis. Address Round Hill Water Cure, Northampton, Mass.

WANTED.

A FEMALE AGENT IN EVERY CITY AND Town in the United States, to sell a patent article required by every woman. Applicants must have at least $50, and furnish good references. Those acquainted with the nature and treatment of Female Diseases preferred. Such persons will find this a profitable undertaking.

Apply to HALSEY & KING,
168 Clark St., Chicago, Ill.

$100 PER MONTH made by any one who will SUPPLY us with Stencil Tools. Address JOHN MILLIKEN, Lawrence, Mass.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 20 to 50 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

Close of the Tenth Year and Twentieth Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CXX. CONTENTS. (MAY.

LOUNGINGS IN THE FOOTPRINTS OF THE PILGRIMS.—RALEIGH AND HIS CITY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Sir Walter Raleigh.—Depot.—A Bad Investment.—Cedar Bay.—Cedar Bay Landing.—Dismal Swamp Canal.—Gretna Green.—Elizabeth City.—An Impracticable.—Inland Travel Railway.—Live-Oak.—The Beach.—Roanoke Island.—Hope.—Chantry.—An Eminent Banker.—Site of Raleigh.—Entrance of the Expedition.—After Dinner.

ANCIENT MONUMENTS IN THE UNITED STATES. No. I. By E. G. SQUIER.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Mound on Tonawanda Island.—Ancient Circle, Mound, and New House.—Ancient Work, Seneca County, New York.—Ancient Work near Buffalo.—Ancient Work near Attica.—Survey of Ancient Work.—Ancient Work, Genesee County, New York.—View of Ancient Work, Genesee County, New York.—Ancient Work, Ontario County, New York.—Ancient Work, Ontario County, New York.—Cutting Comb, England.—Map of Ancient Monuments, Scioto Valley, Ohio.—Ancient Works, Chillicothe.—Diminishing Mound.—Tool of Iscoloh.—Mound and Circle near Bienvenistown's Island.

THE SILK-WORM.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Silk-Worm Butterfly.—Eggs.—Moulting Apartment.—Worm Spinning.—Worm, Cocoons and Hairs.—Fore-Leg and Hook.—Head of Worm.—Heart.—Cocoon.—Silk Reel.—Silk Rag and Instruments.—Small Reg and Arbery.—Stomach.—Body.—Embryo.—Cocoon Gauge.—Carding Silk.—Interior of Cocoon.—Chrysalis.—Last of Skin of Caterpillar.

MISS BUFFET AND THE SPIDER.

MILTON.

ROUND NEWCOMB.

HOW A FRENCH KING ONCE OVERTHREW THE FRENCH CHURCH.

THE CUCNOES OF CASTLE CONOR. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

MARY HOWELLS: A CASE OF DOUBLE CONSCIOUSNESS. By REV. WILLIAM S. PLUMER, D.D.

AFTER THE BURIAL. By MRS. J. SIGOURNEY.

LOVEL THE WIDOWER. By W. M. THACKERAY.

CHERRY IN A BLACK HOOD.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—A Black Sheep.—Where the Sugar goes.—Secret Opinions.

CHARLOTTE BRONTE'S LAST SKETCH.

OUR CELEBRITIES.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

MASTER LAMBERT'S PRIZE-FIGHT.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Training.—Practising.—Dieting. Study.—Getting Ready for the Ring.—Interference of the Authorities.

FASHIONS FOR MAY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Street Costume.—Promenade Dress.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year $6 00.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Twenty cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIFTY COPIES A NUMBER FOR A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 00
One Copy for Two Years	3 00
Five Copies for One Year	8 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $4 00.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or Longer.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

AT CHARLESTON.

Scene, a Bedroom; Time, Midnight. Exhausted Delegates, &c., occupying every nook and corner—Closets, Mantelpiece, on Table and under. Enter two of the Unterrified from New York.

"Hello JIM! where's them beds of our'n we paid $5 00 in advance for, eh? This won't do. I think we'll have to clean this ranch out."

Weak and Aguish Delegate from Illinois, in corner, says a short prayer, and wants to go home.

JIM (log.) "I Sail in. Hi, hi, hi!" (The sequel is left to the reader's imagination.)

GEORGE G. EVANS'
Gift Book Establishment,
No. 439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA.

Valuable Gifts
FOR THE YEAR 1860.

IMPORTANT TO BOOK BUYERS!

Owing to the extensive patronage bestowed upon the

ORIGINAL GIFT-BOOK ENTERPRISE,
INSTITUTED IN 1854,
BY
GEORGE G. EVANS,

And now permanently located in the large Iron Building,

No. 439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA,

And, from the increased facilities of the establishment, and the inducements offered by the leading manufacturers and publishers, he is now prepared to distribute

More Valuable Gifts

Than heretofore to all who patronize his liberal method of disposing of New and Standard works, and to award

A LARGER PER CENTAGE TO AGENTS,

Than any other establishment in the country.

IF YOU WANT A BOOK,
SEND TO THE HEADQUARTERS
OF
GEORGE G. EVANS,
PROPRIETOR OF THE OLDEST AND LARGEST GIFT-BOOK ENTERPRISE
IN THE WORLD,
No. 439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA,

Where all books are sold at the publisher's lowest prices, and you have the

ADVANTAGE of receiving
A HANDSOME PRESENT,
Worth from 50 cents to 100 Dollars,
WITH EACH BOOK.

YOU CAN ORDER ANY BOOKS that you may want, (of a moral character,) in any department of literature, of which the retail price is $1, or more, and, if in print, they will be furnished at the publisher's prices, and promptly sent, accompanied with Gifts, to any part of the world.

PERFECT SATISFACTION GUARANTEED to all who may favor us with their orders.

SEND FOR A CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE of Books, which contains a full description of over 16,000 volumes, comprising the writings of all the popular and standard authors of the age. This Catalogue will be sent free.

SELECT YOUR BOOKS, enclose the price, with the amount required for postage, and one trial will satisfy you that the best place in the country to purchase books is at

THE EXTENSIVE
GIFT-BOOK ESTABLISHMENT
OF
GEORGE G. EVANS,
No. 439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA.

IN SENDING FOR BOOKS,

The title only should be used: the writing plain; and, to avoid mistakes, give the name, post-office, county, and State.

An Order for Ten Books, and upwards, should be sent by Express, if possible, as it is cheaper than by Mail, unless at a great distance.

When Books are ordered by Express, the money required to prepay postage need not be sent, as the freight can be paid upon receipt of the Books, by the parties ordering them.

All Money, if convenient, should be sent in the form of a draft, payable to the order of G. G. EVANS, as it is the safest plan.

MONEY MAY BE SENT AT OUR RISK,

Provided it is enclosed in presence of the postmaster, properly sealed, and witnessed by a respectable and responsible person, and registered according to law.

Agents Wanted,

To whom greater inducements than ever are offered.

Any person, either male or female, who is desirous of engaging in an

HONORABLE AND PROFITABLE EMPLOYMENT,

Requiring but little time, and no outlay of money, and by which they can obtain, gratis,

A VALUABLE LIBRARY,
A FINE GOLD WATCH AND CHAIN,
A HANDSOME SERVICE OF PLATE,
A SPLENDID SET OF JEWELRY,

Or any of the choice articles enumerated in the List of Gifts, can do so by acting as an agent for this establishment.

Any person, in any part of the country, can be an agent, simply by forming a club, sending the list of books, and remitting the amount of money required for the same.

SEND FOR A CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE OF BOOKS,

Which will be sent, gratis, to any person who will send for it, and which contains a complete list of Books, Gifts, and all the desired information relative to agencies and the formation of clubs.

Now is the time, as we are determined to maintain the reputation and character that has already been bestowed upon this establishment.

And, to insure promptattention and honorable dealing, address all orders to

George G. Evans,
Publisher, and Originator of the Gift-Book Enterprise,
No. 439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA.

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices.
Made to Measure at $18 per doz. or Six for $9.

MADE OF NEW-YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosome, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2,50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I cannot make a good Shirt for $15 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts.

39 yards of New-York Mills muslin at 14½c. per yd..$4 35
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard..... 3 50
Making and cutting..... 6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c..... 1 50
Profit..... 2 65
Total.....$18 00

Self Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and no easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

The Express charges on one dozen Shirts from New-York to New Orleans is about $1.

WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between White & Walker Streets, NEW-YORK.

Please copy my address as other houses in the city are selling inferior made shirts at my prices.

Winant's Excelsior Billiard Tables.
Manufactory 71 Gold Street, N. Y.

CHILDREN TEETHING.

Mrs. Winslow,

An experienced nurse and female physician, has a Soothing Syrup for children teething, which greatly facilitates the process of teething by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation; will allay all pains, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, relief and health to your infants; perfectly safe in all cases.

Millions of bottles are sold every year in the United States. It is an old and well tried remedy.

Price only 25 Cents a Bottle.

None genuine unless the fac-simile of CURTIS & PERKINS, New York, is on the outside wrapper.

PIANOS AND MELODEONS.—Hallet & Cumston's Parlor Grand and Square Pianos, full iron frame and all modern improvements. Fully guaranteed. Lowest factory prices. S. D. & H. W. Smith's Melodeons, of every style, for Parlor, Church, or School use. New and Secondhand Pianos to rent at low rates.
A. M. KANOUSE, 416 Broadway.

Here's Health for the Million!!
Dr. Clarke's Vegetable Sherry Wine BITTERS!

Palatable and Healthy!
COMPOSED OF ROOTS AND HERBS.

For Mechanics, Farmers, Clergymen, and Public Men in General. No medicine can be better adapted for their purpose.

TRY THEM!

All ye lovers of good Bitters and good health, and you will find them a cheap, effectual, and pleasant remedy. 5,000,000 bottles sold last year.

Prepared by DR. E. R. CLARKE, Sharon, Mass.
Sold by all Druggists.

A Friend in Need. Try it.

Sweet's Infallible Liniment is prepared from the recipe of Dr. Stephen Sweet, of Connecticut, the great bone setter, and has been used in his practice for the last twenty years with the most astonishing success. As an external remedy it is without a rival, and will alleviate pain more speedily than any other preparation. For all Rheumatic and Nervous Disorders it is truly infallible, and as a curative for Sores, Wounds, Sprains, Bruises, &c., its soothing, healing and powerful strengthening properties, excite the just wonder and astonishment of all who have ever given it a trial. Over four hundred certificates of remarkable cures, performed by it within the last two years attest this fact.

For sale by all Druggists.

Rogers' Citrate of Magnesia,

To which we call the attention of Country Druggists and the Public generally. Put up carefully in tin form of Powder, to keep in any climate. For sale by all Wholesale Druggists.
Manufactory 192 Spring Street, New York.

Ice Pitchers. Ice Pitchers.

A new and beautiful style of ICE PITCHERS; also, a general assortment of new and beautiful PLATED GOODS,

Just received from factory, for sale, wholesale and retail, by
WM. S. MURRAY, No. 23 John Street, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IV.—No. 174.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 28, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

To Advertisers.

The Cheapest and Best Advertising Medium in the Country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

A Magnificently Illustrated Paper, Circulating in every Section of the Union,

Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.

5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

WE devote the bulk of our space this week to illustrations of the momentous Convention now in session at Charleston, and upon the fruit of whose labors the destiny of the Union may depend. We give below a picture of the Delegates leaving the Charleston Hotel on the morning of 23d; on page 260, a picture of the gathering in the area of the Convention Hall; and on pages 264 and 265, a fine engraving of the Convention in session on 23d April. These pictures explain themselves, and need no verbal description.

ON THE WAY TO CHARLESTON.

No. IV.

Tew Major Jack Downing, Downingsville, Downing County, Maine; in care of Mr. Harper, who'll send it in print.

CHARLESTON HARBOR, April 16, 1860.

HERE I be at last, Uncle Jack, large as life and twice as natteral, with the schunnur ankerd rite off again the city, and the stars and stripes a flyin' from the gaff. Hoorah! ses I, for the man that wins; and if yeou goes in for him, Uncle Jack, yeou'll be Postmaster jist so long as yeou pleas.

Furst and fourmost, tho', let me tell yeou how I went tew Old Virginny tew help unkiver the marble imortashun of Henry Clay. I told yeou how Mr. Buchanan had me fixed up, and away I went with them air Natshunel Rides, feelin' jist as good as enny on 'em. We went down tew Richmond in grate stile, and I told the fellurs heow we went tew Madawaska tew fite the Brittishurs; and a French fellur, who was a pioneuer with a big and dull axe, told 'em heow he wos a Nashurral Gard under a Mister Louis Phillips, and sung about "infants of Tut lic," who was a continuerly a-"marchin' on," which he called a Marsells Hymn, but which ken't in the regular 'dishun of Watts & Hopkins. All this tyme we was a goin' it inter Virginny, I tell yeou, and a keepin' the konducter awake by shoin' our tickets.

At last ses he, "Richmond!" and thair we wos, and thair was a cumpenny all reddy to receave us, and didn't they give three chears for Corporol Downing, I tell yeou! Then they 'scorted us tew our hotel, a reg'lor dubble-barril affair on tew sides ov a street, with a bridge atween the tew sides up stares and know toll tew pay.

Furst we all tuk a julup. An' I kept it up, a puttin' them air julups deown jist so long as I stay'd thair; an' I tell yeou, no wun noes what sweetun'd lickur is till they drinks julups. If I'd a dyed, and bin sent tew Downinville, and berry'd in the gardin, they'd a bin a mist patch thair furever. Mint's a Virginny institushun.

The next day thair was the parsid. Cavalry a prancin' aboout like fun on all sized hosses, and infantry a marchin' arter, and carriges with invited gests, ov which I wos wun. I sot along side ov "Tyler tew," who's a rampagin Dimmercrat now, and has a big nees, and axed me tew his farm. The Chefe Marshall was a Mr. Dimmick, frum Cape Cod, an' a pesky spri little chap he is, bein' genurrally tew the bed of the Republic Gard—a set ov fellurs who watch the pennertenshery and keep things sort ov strate.

Thair wos an uncommun lot ov folks tew see the immortashun unkiver'd, and it bete Forth ov July, specially fur ladies in whoops. I tell yeou tu tell Sarah Hale that sir set on 'em maid sout ov grapevines I got for her aint a circumstance. Wa'al, finolly, they all got fixed, and then they prey'd, and a fellur told us all aboout Mr. Clay, and then they tuk the sheet of, an' thar he stud. It deon't amount tew much, arter awl, and wun't kumpair with Crawford's Washington—a mitey fine peace of brass casting, I tell yeou.

Arter the norgurashun thair wos a dinner, tew with yeour old frend Mister Brooks maid a pliamin' speech, as did uthers. I, bein' called upon, and totully unprepar'd, drew eout my old Forth o' July oration, citto'd ovur, and spoke it right eout, lickutty-cut. Mister Botts wasn't missed a bit.

The next day the sogers went away, and I sort o' sounded reound, and I writ to Mister Buchanan: "Play Hunter agin Wise, jist as yeou dew the New Yorkers, but go in fur Breckinridge." Neow yeou see if he deon't dew jist so.

Then I went deown tew a place they calls Rochette, whair I feound the old pink-starn schunur a

DELEGATES TO THE DEMOCRATIC NOMINATING CONVENTION LEAVING THE CHARLESTON HOTEL ON THE MORNING OF APRIL 23, 1860.

[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR ARTIST CORRESPONDENT.]

waitin' for me, and we got aborde. Every man in arest a girl, 'cause we was a spik', and 'commandin shuns seem to be kind o' scairs. Easy how, lots an' cords or fellers are dyin' tew go, but can't raze the wind.

The coste ov North Karrylina is terrible flat and missurabal, and they air ketchin' a powerful grist ov shad all along jist nowr, with the darkies fetch of tew the schanur, and traded rite pert. York about the way these hear fellers is treated; why, this how we run in Sparringville, without it's the hogs, that dus so little, etes so much, and dosen't dew nuthin' except sleep half the time. "Unhappy descendants ov Ham," the perpetual slerstorry of the "Downing Fillanthropic Society" is bilin'-hot-biled-rite for Regenerastin Kansas' and sich 'em. But I calls 'em "Happy packers away ov Bacon," and eggs, and the best corn bred ever yeou tasted.

Wal, arter cruisin' along we got hear, and as we went buy old Fort Moultry, whar Gin'ral Jackson had his name in sully'fying crowns tew, I run up the flannel gridiron, and fired the old swivel, "bang." I kind o' guess it sort o' stir'd up the Armory and Knavery fellers chair; an' if they'd a known who I wos, the'd a reciprekated the salute. As it wos, it was like Israel Andrews's reciprocity treaty, all wynn-sided.

This here Charlestun's a sort o' low place, and most on it looks orful old and stashinary. The folks look as if they'd all been tew a ball the nite afore, and most tired out, and didn't keer about doin' much.

The first place I went tew was the Kuryur office, before wich is a Palmetter tree, which is the arms of South Karrylinar, and terrilual prickly arms 'tis tew. Then they tuk me tew see a grate bear, they sed, and ses I, "I'm a judge of Suffolks and Chesters;" but 'twarn't no hog, but a hoal right decent sewer so mennow-fashind bear, with the fur ofel that comes a spoutin'. They calls it sum hard name, and it's hard drinkin', I tell yeou, but good for dispessee.

Talk about Funnell Hall Market tew Bosting. Why, it ain't a cirkumstans tew the long markets hear, whair there's all sorts ov grass garden sass a'ready, and the biggest lot ov fat darkies ever yeou seed in yeour born days, and whappin' grate turkey-buzzards a-makin' wonderful pickin' ov offal. Tew shute wen ov these burds is tew be fined ten dollars and whipped if yu've a cullurd'd passun, for wich they have to pay the feller that lales it on half a dollar more, wich is hard.

It's a queer place, I tell yeou, and they talkes in easy, but a grate deel in brisk' up and shutes their grubbles acordin' tew a Kode, by wich they goes in and blazes weigh tew each other, jist as the Kongress men duz in the Post book.

Politycs is hear jist as 'tis in Maine, only t'other way. There's folks wot's got offis, and draws pay from Uncle Sem, and that's Kalhoon's party. Up our weigh the folks wot dosn't go agin the insturtushun—deown hear they goes in for it. Up our weigh the folks wot dosn't goes in for gittin' cullur'd people aweigh from deown South tew Kannady—deown hear they goes in for gittin' cullur'd people aweigh from Afrikey to hum, and Kanady—deown hear they

Hence, while he lived at a period and in a country of many and profoundly exciting questions, and wrote books for nearly half a century, he rarely, if ever, alluded to controverted topics, and then expressed no decided preferences. This was not moral weakness, certainly, nor intellectual apathy; it was merely that overmastering geniality and unwillingness to hurt the feelings of others, which, when it is sincere—as we have known it in some women—is an exquisitely touching trait of character. Mr. Bryant, in his eulogy, recalls a forgotten incident which illustrates this quality in Irving.

In the year 1822 a London publisher undertook to reprint Mr. Bryant's poems, if Irving would introduce them with a preface, which he consented to do. But the publisher—a true Briton—objected to a line in one of the poems—

"Where the oppressor sleeps timeless."

"And Irving," says Bryant, "good-naturedly consented that it should be altered to

"The famous troubles in his camp."

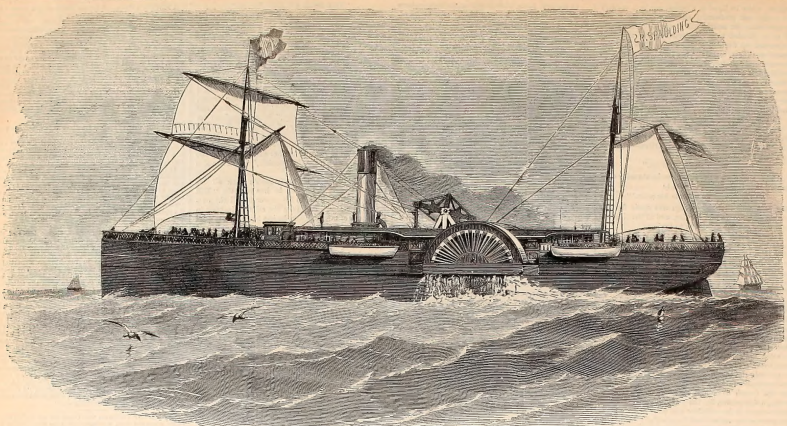
The poet adds that the change was made from a simple desire to do him service, and at the time he acknowledged his gratitude to Irving.

Irving's early friend Paulding would have been more likely to make the line stronger, or to italicize, than to alter it; and the fact explains much of the difference in the men, and of their relative position at the close of their lives. A man of vigorous mind and of patriotic sympathies, Mr. Paulding threw himself actively into the fierce political quarrel with England, and struck some stalwart blows. But these were strictly occasional works. Neither their matter nor their manner survived a long date for them; and yet this kind of work seems to have been more congenial to his sympathy than the purely literary effort. But when his "Dutchman's Fireside" was published, it was at once considered to be the best of his writings, and is precisely the one in which he is most genial and contemplative in tone. It is a pleasant sketch of the old Dutch city and customs, with a very strong a fascination for the early authors of Manhattan—and it is doubtless the work with which the name of its author will be especially identified in our literary history.

SOLDIERS.

WHEN people shake their heads over the letter of Macaulay, of which we spoke last week, and wonder whether he is not more than half right, they forget one essential difference between the United States and every great modern state in the world since the time of Charles VII. of France, and that is the army. Comparatively speaking, every thing is safe so long as we have no army, and the man who should propose to augment the standing military force of the country would probably have no to do destruction.

A standing army is a third estate in the realm, and it is that which keeps the others quiet. The European revolutions have always been so fierce and desolating because they have been repressed by the armies which they have accumulated with fury that nothing can withstand them. Then they swell and sweep onward, carrying away every thing in their course. In any community men and women, which, by its very nature, must be perpetually moving and changing, to enforce an absolute rule by the strong arm is found only to sit upon the safety-valve. You do not prevent the accumulation of steam, but you only secure a fearful explosion.



Our party contests are as vehement, probably, as any that were ever waged; but the issue in inevitably peaceful. Not only for the moment is peace is best for all kinds of private prosperity, but because the country is always so equally divided that any other method than the verdict of the ballot evidently fruitless. Great measures with us have never been carried—and it is fortunate for us that it is so—by overwhelming majorities. The reason is that the great minority is always a security for moderation upon the part of the majority. The victorious party can proceed very widely, but very slowly, or its victory will be wrested from it. And there is this further advantage, that great changes in affairs rarely can be made gradually and but with the least possible rupture in the general course of events—a policy which is imposed upon the successful party by the number and importance of the opposition.

It is easy to see how utterly all this might be changed by the existence of a large standing army. The military band has always been used to subvert constitutions and destroy independence; and it would be very easy for any party which got into power—even in our most intelligent, enlightened, and Christian America—to persuade itself that the good of the country required that the party policy should be maintained by military force. In every country of Europe the game of aspirants and intriguers is not the conversion of public opinion, but the command of the army; and the most fatal mistake can be brought to any people trying to hold himself upon his tottering throne is, that the soldiers fraternize with the people.

In every people, our government like ours, constitutions will always mean what the people, or the majority, decree. But fortunately their decree can only be made to be enforced by argument and appeal. There is no club at hand for them in the shape of an army, by which they can enforce a word with a blow—a word, only in those extraordinary, which happily have never yet arisen, that the mass of the people themselves would take up arms.

A LITTLE REASON.

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER.—We sent you, a few weeks since, the Life of ——, and the

THE STEAMSHIP "S. R. SPAULDING," IN WHICH THE NEW ENGLAND DELEGATION LIVES AT CHARLESTON.

THE "S. R. SPAULDING."

We publish herewith an engraving of the S. R. Spaulding steamer, in which the Democratic delegates from New England have taken passage to Charleston. The Spaulding left Boston on Friday 13th, arrived in Baltimore on Sunday 15th, and sailed for Charleston on 18th.

The S. R. Spaulding is a new iron steamer, built at Wilmington, Delaware, last year. Her tonnage is 1360 tons, her length 218 feet, breadth of beam 33 feet; she has one beam engine 56 inch cylinder and 11 feet stroke. She is commanded by Captain Howes. She carries three brass guns, two of them were used in the battle of Bunker Hill, and the other was taken from the Spanish wreck, San Pedro, sunk in the Bay of Cumana, 1815.

The S. R. Spaulding has been chartered for eighteen days by the Democrats of New England for $10,000. Among her passengers, who number one hundred, are Hon. Caleb Cushing, Benjamin F. Butler, B. F. Hallett, etc.

The Herald correspondent thus describes her accommodations:

"Extra accommodations have been fitted up for the purpose of the present excursion. Berths with curtains have been constructed in the forward between decks, and seem to be comfortable. The state-rooms are commodious for a sea-going steamer. The saloon is neatly furnished, and every thing thus far indicates that the boat is staunch, well appointed, and well commanded. A regular bar is established on board, where good liquors are dispensed at ten cents per glass. It is patronized to a moderate extent—it being one of the regulations of the ship, and one of the primary stipulations of the excursion, that all persons found at all over the boy shall at once be sent to Frans, the steward, for external manipulations and for the application of internal cataplasms in the shape of raw oysters."

The New England delegates to the Convention have resolved to live on board the S. R. Spaulding until the Convention breaks up; they can thus live more cheaply, and probably more comfortably, and certainly more healthily, than in the overcrowded hotels of Charleston.

THE AREA OF THE CONVENTION HALL AT CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, ON THE MORNING OF APRIL 23, 1860.

THE PIRATES' DEN.

Captain Brand,

OF THE

SCHOONER "CENTIPEDE,"

A PIRATE OF EMINENCE IN THE WEST INDIES:

His Lobes and Exploits,

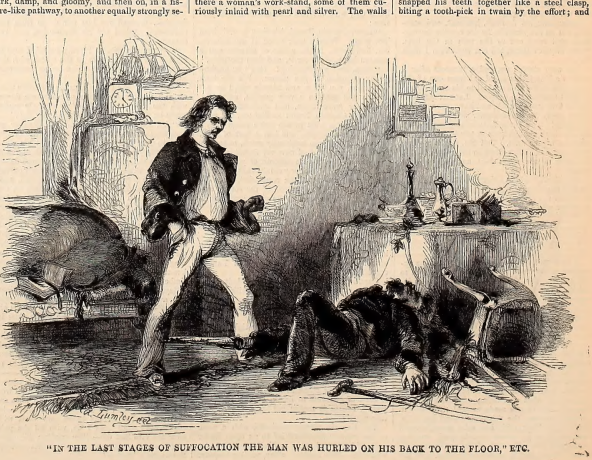
TOGETHER WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF THE SINGULAR MANNER BY WHICH HE DEPARTED THIS LIFE.

By LIEUT. H. A. WISE, U.S.N.
(HARRY GRINGO),
AUTHOR OF "LOG GRONGO" AND "TALES FOR THE MARINES."

ILLUSTRATED BY
C. PARSONS AND A. LUMLEY.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

CHAPTER VIII.



CAPTAIN BRAND AT HOME.

UPON a broad, flat rocky ledge, near a small landlocked narrow inlet, of one of the clustering Twelve Apostle Keys on the south side of Cuba, stood a red-tiled stone building, with a spacious veranda in front, covered by plaited matting, and cnvas curtains tricecl up all round. The back and one side of the building rested against a craggy eminence which overlooked the sea on both sides of the island and commanded a wide sweep of reef and blue water beyond. A few clumps of cocoa-nut trees and dwarf palms, with bare gaunt stems and tufted tops, stood out here and there along the rocky slopes, while lesser vegetation of cactus and mangrove bushes were scattered thickly over the island, cropping out with jagged edges of rock, down to the sandy beaches of the sea-shore. A deep narrow inlet of blue water lay pure and still near the base of the rocky height, where, too, was a shelving curve of white sand, sprinkled about by a few mat sheds, and on the other side the rocks arose to the elevation of a hundred and fifty feet and acted as a precipitous wall to the water. The inlet here took a sharp turn, scooped out in a secluded basin, and then narrowing to less than forty yards in width, it wound and twisted for a good mile in a thin blue channel to the open sea. Half that distance further out was a roaring ledge of white breakers, where the long swell came hammering on it, bursting up in the air in brightish green masses, and then tumbling over the reef and bubbling smoothly on toward the shore. On a level with the water no channel could be discerned through the ledge; but looking down from the heights around the inlet a narrow blue gate-way was marked out, skirted on the surface by frothy crests of dead foam, and near where flocks of cormorants and gulls were riding placidly on the inner side of the ledge. The island itself was about two miles broad and seven long; and about midway of its width the inlet formed a forked strait, one branch finding its way to the north, between a low succession of sandy hummocks where the water was too shallow to float a duck, and the other finding an outlet, scarcely a biscuit-toss wide, between two bluff rocks. With the trade-wind this passage was safe and accessible; but or the change of the moon, with a breeze and swell, the south, the sea came bowling in, in boiling eddies and whirlpools, and it required a nerve of iron to attempt an entrance. Just within this narrow mouth, on a flat beveled edge of rock but a few feet above the water, was a small battery of two long eighteen-pounders, and two twenty-four carronades mounted on slides and trucks, with platforms laid on a bed of sand. Near by, beneath a low shed of tiles and loose stones, was a pile of round shot, nicely blacked, and some stands of grape and canister in canvas bags and cases, together with a large copper magazine of cartridges. Seated a little way off on a low stool was a dingy Spaniard with a telescope laid across his knees, which every little while he would raise to his eye and take a steady glance around the horizon to seaward. At other times he would roll and light a paper cigar, murmuring some low ditty to himself as he sent the smoke in volumes through his nose. A small brass bell hung beside the shed near the battery, which was connected by a wire strung on low posts, or hooked from rock to rock to the stone building away up at the basin. To return, however, to the building: the veranda rested on square rough masonry full twenty feet from the ground, which was loopholed for musketry, and with but one narrow slip of a door-way that fell like a portcullis, banded and strapped with bars and studs of wrought iron. Within this stone inclosure was a large and roomy vault, half filled with cases, barrels, and packages, and at the upper angle was a narrow subterranean vaulted passage, barred also by an iron-bound door which led to a succession of whitewashed chambers, dark, damp, and gloomy, and then on, in a fissure-like pathway, to another equally strongly secured outlet on the other side of the crag. Leading to the veranda was a tastly stretched rope-ladder lashed to eye-bolts let into the natural rock below and hooked on to the edge of the floor above. This was the only approach to the main floor of the building from the outside, though within were heavy trap-doors like the hatches of a ship, which communicated to the chambers beneath. The whole structure was of stone and tiles, roughly built, but yet strong and durable, and capable of resisting any assault, unaided by cannon, that could be brought against it. The floor was divided into four rooms, the smallest used for a kitchen, the next for a magazine of small-arms, and the third a spacious bedchamber, which opened into a large square apartment facing the veranda, and which deserves more notice.

The lofty ceiling came down with the slant, showing the bare red tiles and heavy square beams which supported the roof. In one of the stoutest of these beams was an eye-bolt and copper-strapped block, through which was rove a long green silk rope, with one end secured by a cleat on the wall and the other dangling loose and squirming, whenever a current of air struck it, like a long, slim snake. Around the sides of the room, which were paneled with cedar, stood four or five quaint ebony armories, and as many cabinets, clocks, and book-cases, with here and there a woman's work-stand, some of them curiously inlaid with pearl and silver. The walls were hung with a great number of pictures of all kinds of vessels—generally, however, of the merchant description—under full sails, with vivid light-houses in the distance, and combing breakers under the lee; and all portraying gallant crews and buoyant freights, which probably had never reached their destinations. Among this gallery of marine display was a broad framing of the "Flags of All Nations;" and codes of signals, too, in bright colors, hung beside them. Further on, in a pretty panel by itself, surrounded by an edging of mother-of-pearl, was a triple row of female miniatures, a number of them of great beauty, and many executed in excellent taste and art. In one corner was a large chart-stand, covered with rolls of maps and nautical instruments; while above were suspended, by white rope grummets, a pyramidal line of spy-glasses and telescopes of all sizes and make. Near the centre of the apartment stood a large round dining-table, on which were laid things for a breakfast, a box of cigars, and a small silver pan of live coals. There were but two windows to this room, both hung with striped muslin curtains, the one-leaves going to the floor, and looking out upon the veranda; and but two doors, one leading to the kitchen, and the other to the sleeping-chamber on the opposite side.

Presently this last door opened, and, pushing aside a blue gauze curtain which hung before it, an individual of about eight-and-twenty years of age stepped languidly into the room. He was a tallish man, rather spare in build, and though pale apparently from long illness, yet he was evidently very active and muscular when his nerves were called into action. Had it not been for a choleric curve to his large nose, and a little parting at the corners of his wide mouth and compressed lips, the face might have been thought handsome. The eyes were light blue, set close together, but hard and stony, with no ray of mercy or humanity in them. He wore no beard, and his light-brown hair was thin and dry, and carefully parted at the side. He was dressed in a snow-white pair of loose drilling trowsers, cut sailor fashion, straw slippers, and silk stockings; and above he wore a brown linen jacket with large pearl buttons and pockets. As he entered the room he held a delicate cambric handkerchief with a fine lace border in his hands, which he seemed to regard with curious interest as he lounged toward the windows of the veranda.

"I wish I could remember," he muttered musingly to himself, "which of these sisters this bit of cambric belonged to, marked with an E—Ellen or Eliza—hum! They would die—silly things!—tried to stab me! Ho! ho! ho! Never left me even a miniature either for my collection. Bueno! There's more fish in the sea—and under it too!" he continued, with an unpleasant elevation of his eyebrows. By this time he had approached the open window, and shoving the delicate fabric daintily in his pocket, he gave a slight yawn and looked out. Before him lay the deep blue basin of the inlet, with a couple of boats hauled up on the shore; a few idle sailors moving about, or squatted beneath the shade playing cards or sewing. Without letting his eye rest more than a moment on this scene, he turned and gave a long earnest gaze between an opening of the rocks to seaward. Then with an angry frown he approached the table, poured out a cup of black coffee, threw rather than dropped in a lump of sugar, and sat himself down for his morning's meal. He had scarcely, however, gulped down his cup of coffee and choked after it a slice of toast, than he pushed away the breakfast things, snapped his teeth together like a steel clasp, biting a tooth-pick in twain by the effort; and then, tossing the pieces away, he dashed his hand into the cigar-box, extracted one, touched it to the pan of coals, and began to smoke savagely. At first the grateful smoke appeared to soothe his chafed spirit, for he threw himself lazily into a large cane-bottomed settee, and, stretching out his legs, seemed to enjoy the tranquil scene around him with uninterrupted pleasure. But soon a novel darkened his face, he dropped his cigar on the floor, and springing to his feet as if touched by a galvanic battery, he snatched down a telescope from the wall, steadied it at the window-sash, and peered again long and anxiously to windward. He saw nothing, however, save the long, glassy, unbroken undulations of a calm tropical sea, rolling away off beyond the ledge under a burning sun; no sign of a breeze—not even a cat's-paw; and only now and then the leap of a deep-sea fish sparkling for a moment in the air, and some sluggish gulls and pelicans sailing and diving about the reef for their prey. Shutting up the glass with a crash that made the joints ring, he strode to the settee, where hung several knotted bell-ropes, and seizing one gave it a sharp jerk. Then going back to an aperture in the wall, where was a hollow cane tube like the mouth of a speaking-trumpet, he listened attentively till a hoarse voice answered the word "Sedor." Putting his mouth to the tube, he said,

"IN THE LAST STAGES OF SUFFOCATION THE MAN WAS HURLED ON HIS BACK TO THE FLOOR," ETC.

"Can you make out the Centipede from the crag station?"

"Not sure, Sir, this morning; but last evening, at sunset, I saw a sail which I took to be her. The sea-breeze is just beginning to make in, and if she's to windward of Punta Arenas she'll soon heave in sight."

This colloquy was held in Spanish; and when the signal-man had ceased speaking the interlocutor lit another cigar mechanically, kicked a foot-stool out of his way like a football, and thus communed with himself as he rapidly paced between the table and the verandas:

"Twelve days ago yesterday since the schooner was off Matanzas; not a word of news to cheer me through all that weary time of the spring trade down, and the track deserted by this time!"

Then pausing in his walk he stopped at the chart stand, and unrolling a map, he went on:

"Where, in the devil's name, could she possibly have gone to? She might have been to Cape Horn and back before this. Miserable fool that I was to trust the craft with that thirsty, thick-headed lout! Dared to be may be she's been captured, and if he has, I hope his neck has been stretched like a shred of jerked beef."

Even while talking a bell struck sharply in the settee, and putting his ear again to the tube, the hoarse voice said, "I can make her out now, Sedor! She's just caught the strong, steady breeze, and is hull up, coming along with the bonnet off her foresail and a reef in her mainsail. I'll keep a bright look-out here, and you to have the pleasure too of a visit from the Tuerto, the mercenary old owl, with his account of sales and purchases. But let me once catch him foul, and, my one-eyed friend, I'll treat you to such a dance that you won't need shoes!"

Here he gave such a cunning look at the pale settee, and putting his ear again to the tube, the hoarse voice said, "I can make her out now, Sedor! She's just caught the strong, steady breeze, and is hull up, coming along with the bonnet off her foresail and a reef in her mainsail. I'll keep a bright look-out here, and you to have the pleasure too of a visit from the Tuerto, the mercenary old owl, with his account of sales and purchases. But let me once catch him foul, and, my one-eyed friend, I'll treat you to such a dance that you won't need shoes!"

Here he gave such a cunning look at the gleaming from beneath a striped Madras turban wound round her head.

"Babette!" repeated the Captain, resuming his seat and his habitual polite air and voice, "Serve out a barrel of Bordeaux and a beaker of old Antigua rum to the Centipede's crew to drink my health; and, Babette, my beauty! hand in a pig or two killed, tell the boatswain to haul the seine, and have a good supper for all hands to-night. And, Babette!—he was on as if he had just thought of something—"there's my friend Gibbs lying there—I believe he has fallen down in a fit—keep careful of him—have him laid in the vault—a little biscuit and water—he may be feverish when he wakes up, you know! And Babette, mind, if you are in want of Valenciling wood, you may as well use that timber leg of our friend Gibbs! I don't think he'll want it again. Good-bye, my dear, Bobs!"

The negress gave a deep grunt of assent, and, seizing the senseless body lying on the floor, she dragged it out of the room. Returning a few moments after, she wiped up the blood with a cloth dipped in hot water, and finally disappeared.

LITERARY.

THE LIFE OF STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, by James W. Sheahan. (Published by Harper & Brothers.) The author of this Life is the editor of the Chicago Times, and a volunteer personal friend of the distinguished Senator from Illinois. Though the work as completed has not been submitted to Mr. Douglas, it yet we know that he furnished the data necessary to its preparation. This is the only Life of Mr. Douglas which has been written with his knowledge and assistance. It narrates the incidents of his early career, his connection with the politics of Illinois, and his subsequent course in respect to the great questions of the day. It also contains the famous essay on "Popular Sovereignty," upon which he has based his best title to fame as a statesman, and his claim to the highest office in the gift of the American people.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

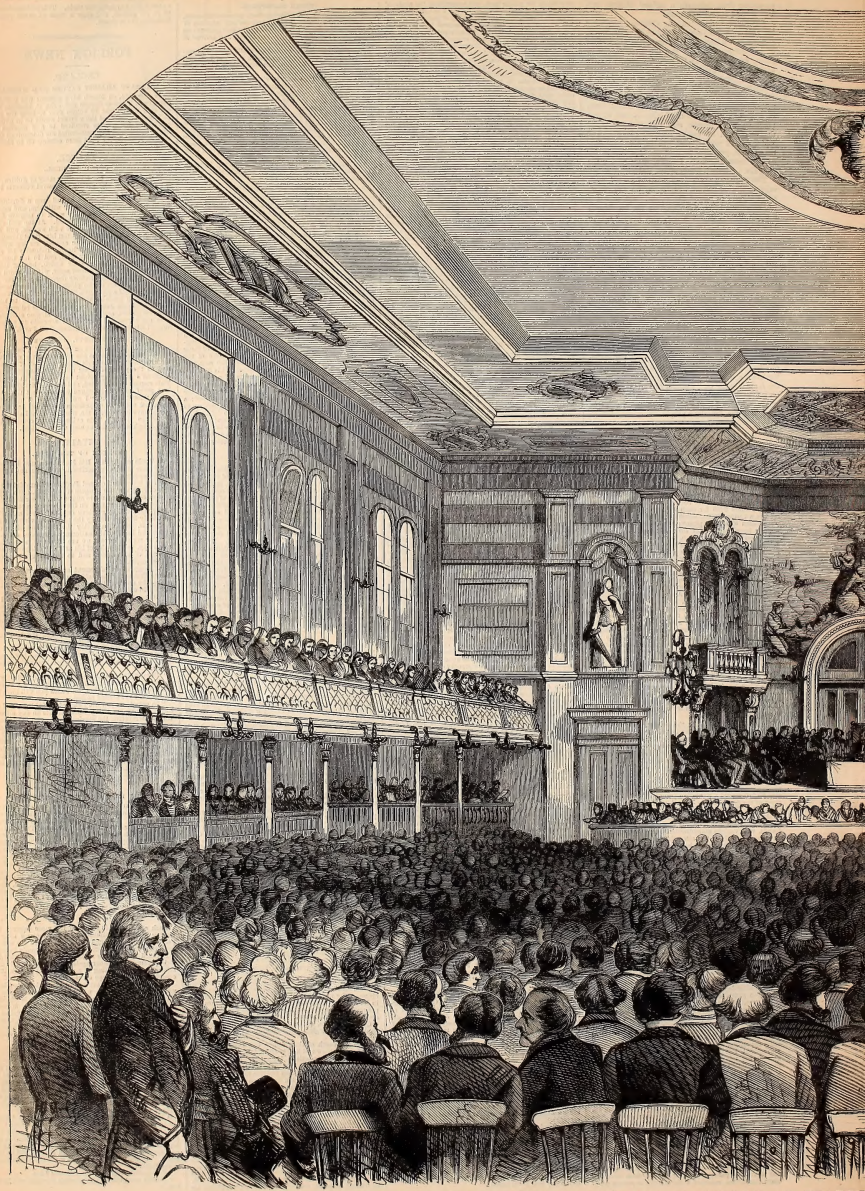
CONGRESS.

On Monday, April 16, in the Senate, Senator Wilson introduced a bill to improve the military code, especially for the suppression of the slave-trade. It calls for five fast steamers, already in the African seas which require the bounty: offers $100 for each kidnaped African delivered to a United States Marshal; insures the speedy and safe preparation of slavers prizes; substitutes for the death penalty imprisonment for life; and requires American vessels sold abroad to return to the United States for a new register. Senator Mason laid before the Senate the case of John Brown, Jun., and P. H. Judson, stating that arrests could be effected in other countries without further action by the Senate. Remarks were made by Senators Mason and Mason in relation to the case, considering briefly the bill amending the Patent Laws, the Senate then went into the House, the debate upon sending the appointment of subordinate officers of the Navy to the Committee was discussed, and referred to the Committee on Accounts. A bill, introduced by Mr. Rice, prohibiting the transportation of coolies in American vessels, was referred to the Committee on Commerce. The Senate resolution appropriating $50,000 for the ascertainment of the Japanese Embassy was concurred in. The consideration of the President's protest and the report of the Judiciary Committee thereupon coming up as the unfinished order, was postponed until May 1. The bill organizing the Census Bill, reported from the Judiciary Committee, was passed. Repeated attempts were made during the session to obtain an adjournment until after the Christian Convention.

On Tuesday, April 17, in the Senate, a message from the President in relation to the improvement of Japanese relations in foreign military service, was received. The memorial of Mr. Frank Basbourn was referred to the Committee upon Military Affairs. Senator Hale, calling up the resolution approving the Senate from April 19 to May 27, Sundays excepted, moved to substitute May 1 as the latter term. The subject was discussed in a desultory way, and various amendments were suggested; but the resolutions were finally tabled by a large majority. Senator Bell's bill for the removal to proper places of the Department of the Senate every three days, from the 19th inst. to May 1, was then taken up. After a brief executive session, Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, reported back from the Committee on Territories upon Kansas and Nebraska, with various amendments. Senator Johnson, of Arkansas, opposed the admission. The bill, as now reported, sells land to the heads of families only, at the price of 25 cents per acre, and requires a residence of five years on the land before the title shall be perfected. There were other points of difference of minor importance. An amendment of the House to a Pension Bill excited considerable debate; so did also the Homestead bill of the Edwards relief bill.——In the House the report of members was received, a resolution of Mr. Schwartz, of Pennsylvania, constituting the text. The House took up a report from the Committee upon Public Lands, with various amendments. Senator Johnson, of Arkansas, explained the alterations. The bill, as now reported, sells land to the heads of families only, at the price of 25 cents per acre, and requires a residence of five years on the land before the title shall be perfected. There were other points of difference of minor importance. An amendment of the House to a Pension Bill excited considerable debate; so did also the Homestead bills of the Edwards relief bill.——In the House the report of members was received, a resolution of Mr. Schwartz, of Pennsylvania, constituting the text. The House took up a report from the Committee upon Public Lands, with various amendments. Senator Johnson, of Arkansas, explained the alterations. The bill, as now reported, sells land to the heads of families only, at the price of 25 cents per acre, and requires a residence of five years on the land before the title shall be perfected. There were other points of difference of minor importance. An amendment of the House to a Pension Bill excited considerable debate; so did also the Homestead bills of the Edwards relief bill.

On Wednesday, April 18, in the Senate, a number of Abolition petitions were presented by Senator Wade, a Republican vote, laid upon the table. Senator Wilson's resolution of inquiry into the contracts for iron made by the War Department was previously debated by its proposer and Senator Hale, and was finally laid aside. Senator Biddle's resolution, providing for a series of adjournments from the end of this to that of May, coming on, the same opposition it was passed by a vote of 30 to 24. The Homestead bill was then discussed. Senator Gwin's amendment relative to the mineral lands encountered some remarks. It bears on the land titles of California. Without action the Senate adjourned.——The House resumed its business for the day by passing the Deficiency Bill. The Senate amendments to the Military Academy Bill, authorizing a regiment of mounted volunteers for the Texas boundary, was subsequently considered in Committee of the Whole; Mr. Stanton opposing and Mr. Curtis advocating the amendment. The debate was participated in by Messrs. Reagan, Hamilton, and Gilin, but without action the Committee rose. An adjournment over resolution of Mr. Bonham were read for information, but the Republicans objected to a vote.

On Thursday, April 19, in the Senate, the Committee appointed to investigate the rumored misuse of the printing made its report. The House bill in regard to the census was passed. Senator Bayard, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a bill relative to private property taken for public uses, and prescribing the mode of valuation and compensation. After a debate in which Senators Mason, Wigfall, and Latimer participated, the bill was set aside, and the Homestead bill taken up. Senator Gwin modified his amendment respecting the occupancy of mineral lands, by excluding foreigners who have merely declared their intentions from the advantages of the Act. Senator Lane, of Oregon, and Senator Bragg, of North Carolina, spoke in modification of which it was rejected. Senator Fitch offered an amendment, which was rejected, providing all soldiers who had been in actual service to locate a quarter section. Senator Crittenden proposed to amend the bill so as to secure most restricting the benefits of the bill to persons actually residing on the country at the passage of the act. The amendment was rejected by Senator Johnson, of Arkansas, and was concurred in. The question recurring on it made the vote stand 29 to 29, when it is understood the vote shall be taken, and the Senate went into Executive session. The House bill to increase the War Medal was discussed the Senate amendment to the Military Academy Bill, whereby some $800,000 are appropriated to raise and equip a regiment of mounted volunteers in Texas. Messrs. Stanton, Curtis, and M. Jones participated in the debate. After the rejection of the amendment, Messrs. Stevens and Stanton proposed that the latter proposition be reconsidered, which failed, authorizing the President to employ the same number of volunteers as regulars in the regular army, and detail it to the Indian service. Mr. Otero, the delegate from New Mexico, replied to the former appropriation for his Territory. A vote was at length obtained upon the Senate's amendment, which was lost, 90 to 91, and the Committee rose. The House then accepted the Senate's amendment by a close party vote.



On Friday, April 20, the Senate not being in session, the House devoted its entire time to the Private Bills Passing several of them, and among the number that providing a pension of $30 per month to the widow of Generals Macomb, Smith, and Riley. At the opening of the session Mr. Crawford submitted a resolution for a tournament until Tuesday, but the proposition was opposed by Mr. Pryor, Mr. Stevens, and others, and carried. The Committee on Elections reported in regard to the membership for Kansas, and Mr. Montgomery, Mr. Ely, Mr. Daly, rather than the sitting delegate, Mr. Kentalrook, elected by 1,700 votes. Mr. Montgomery then made a motion of a resolution instructing the Committee on Foreign Affairs to inquire into the case of Mr. Koszta and Mr. Bardinian Mission to first-class grade. The House adjourned to Monday.

MORE CHALLENGES.

At Washington, on April 19, the Hon. Robert J. Walker, as agent for the property of Messrs. Slidell, Mason, and Black, by the hands of Senator Bowie, of Mississippi, sent a challenge to Senator Douglas, which was declined without explanation. This action of Governor Walker grows out of the testimony of Mr. Schmahs, of Pennsylvania, before the Covode Committee.

THE DOINGS OF THE LEGISLATURE.

We read in the Albany Evening Journal for April 11: "The Legislature has adjourned. The session has been a busy one. It is rare that so many important measures are got up at once as have this year. We briefly recapitulate the important of such as are leading measures: The completion of the canal enlargement has been pushed forward, and the last has been let. The long-desired relief from the abuse of the Canal Board, by the Auditorship bill was passed by the Assembly, but failed in the Senate. The Auditorship bill was finally laid in agreement between the two Houses, which the Comptroller recommended in his message to the Senate. The Liberty railroad bills were passed. One was signed by the Governor, and the other will be signed. The Loan bill was very then passed through both Houses by a two-thirds vote. The bill authorizing the Saratoga and Hudson River Railway and Susquehanna Railroad was first passed by the Assembly, but failed in the Senate. The Senate bill, and the reduction concurred in by the Senate. The Governor vetoed the bill, but subsequently signed it. The bill was lost in the Assembly.—The Annual Appropriation bill, as passed by the Senate, was finally passed by the House. The Tax bill have also become laws. The total tax this year is $3,000,000, which is a reduction of one million. For schools, three quarters of a mill; completion of canals, one mill; general fund, one mill; canal debt, one million loan, quarter of a mill; for support of Government, a quarter of a mill; deficiency, one mill; canal, a mill and one-eighth.—The Capital Punishment Bill, establishing the punishment of death by electricity, passed, and making one punishable with imprisonment for life, is also a law.—The Assembly passed a concurrent resolution in regard to alienation to dead, commonly called the 'Anti-Slavery Bill,' declaring that it is unnecessary, unwise, unconstitutional amendment abolishing the property qualification of colored voters. The Senate refused to concur. The bill securing to married women their earnings and property from their husbands passed. The Senate amendments of the Metropolitan Police act were passed and go to the Governor. The bill establishing Commissioners of Public Charities in the City of New York passed last night, and has been signed by the Governor. The bill providing for the sale of the West Washington Market in New York, Jefferson Market, wood, and Tompkins Market, to vote in each House over the veto.—The bill to remove the Five Points House of Industry to Central Park passed both Houses.—The Divorce bill failed to pass either House.—The bill to prevent the sale of liquor on Sunday failed to receive the sanction of either House.—The bill to prevent the issuing of certificates of indebtedness exceeding a specified amount, in certain cases, was passed both Houses.—The bill establishing a Board of Police passed both Houses, with a provision that it is not to take effect unless the City of New York, represented by local stockholders from voting by proxy, and that employees of the Croton Aqueduct Department shall not vote by proxy, both failed to pass.—The extension of the Croton Aqueduct was passed by the Assembly, but lost in the Assembly.—The bill providing for the appointment of Canal Appraisers, and for the appraisement along line of the canal failed to become a law.—The exchange of Canal lands for lands of the Long Island Railroad passed both Houses.—The bill providing for the State custody of canal moneys, and that the savings banks failed to pass either house.—The bill to abolish the Court of Over and Terminer, also failed to become laws.—The bill 'to lengthen the Session' failed to pass either House.—The bill passed the Senate, but was not acted on in the Assembly.—The bill providing for the Public Instruction

THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC NOMINATING CONVENTION IN SESSION AT CHARLE

STON, SOUTH CAROLINA, ON APRIL 23, 1860.—[From a Sketch by our Artist Correspondent.]

LOST AND FOUND IN THE WOODS.

I.

ALL ready for a start. The farm horse is harnessed to the old-fashioned chaise with a top that looks as though saying, "How d'ye do?" with many bows; the whip, jitting loosely in the socket, is making a graceful angle with the dashboard; while its lash, unfolding old Dolly into the belief that it is a troublesome but feeble fly on her back.

"Come, Aunt Ruthy!"

The childish voice echoes almost strangely in the old house, for Katie does not live there. She is the father and mother's sole care-taker as baby brother on a journey for his health, leaving her in Aunt Ruthy's charge. Poor Charlie! he did not find the cure he sought, and the childish way he was tired of life. His big eyes grew bigger and sadder, his arms were thin and pitiful, and he was the spirited prisoner. Dr. Carver had come and gone again many times. Charlie had put out his tongue, and had held out his tiny hand for Dr. A——— to feel the little pulse that beat so feebly, until he was fairly tired. Every body stared at him, and grew wondered what ailed him, while Aunt Ryan trembled what ailed him, while Aunt Ryan trembled what ailed him, while Aunt Ryan trembled their house were to let, and nobody could be induced to look at them, except the people who couldn't let them, and had nothing else to do but look at them all day. I lay a night upon the road and enjoyed delectable cookery of potatoes, and some other sensible things, adoption of which at home would inevitably be shown to be fraught with ruin, ruin here or other, to that rickety national blessing, the British farmer; and at last I was rattled, like a single pill in a box, over leagues of stones, with a deeply cracking, plunging, and flourishing two gray tails about—I made my triumphal entry into Paris.

Whenever I am in Paris I am dragged by invisible force into the Morgue. I never want to go there, but am always pulled there. One Christmas Day, when I should rather have been any where else, I was attracted in to see an old, gray man lying all alone on his cold bed, with a cup of water turned over at his gray hair, and running, drip, drip, drip, down his wretched face until it got to the corner of his mouth, where it took a turn and made him look sly. One New-Year's morning (by the same token, the sun was shining outside, and there was a neuralgically balmy touch of feather on the nose within a yard of the gate), I was pulled in again, to look at a flaxen-haired boy of eighteen with a heavy blow, but who was dying immediately to open them, shake his head, and "come up smiling." Oh, what this large, dark man could tell of that night city!

It was very hot weather, and he was none the better for that, and I was much the worse. Indeed, a very small pleasant little woman, with the key of her lodging on her forefinger, who had been shoving him to her little girl while she and the child ate sweetmeats, observed monsieur looking poorly as we came out together, and asked monsieur, with her wondering little eyebrows prettily raised, if there were any thing the matter? Faintly replying in the negative, monsieur crossed the road to a wine-shop, got some brandy, and resolved to fortify himself with a dip in the great floating bath on the river.

The bath was crowded in the usual airy manner by a set of customers in striped drawers of various gay colors, who walked up and down arm in arm, drank coffee, smoked cigars, sat at little tables, conversed, played cards with the boards who dispensed the towels, and every now and then pitched themselves into the river head foremost, and came out at the other end: this social routine, I made haste to participate in the water part of the entertainment, and was in the full enjoyment of a delightful bathe, all in a moment I was seized by an unreasonable idea that the large dark body was floating straight at me.

I was an old diver, and dressing instantly. In the shock I had taken some water into my mouth, and I coughed and sick, for I fancied that the contamination of the creature was in it. I had got back to my cool darkened room in the hotel, and was lying on a sofa there before I began to reason with myself.

Of course I knew perfectly well that the large dark creature had been dead, and that I should no more come upon him out of the place where I had seen him dead than I should come upon the cathedral of Notre Dame in an entirely new situation. What troubled me was the picture of the creature; and that had so curiously and strongly painted itself upon my brain that I could not get rid of it until it was worn out.

I noticed the peculiarities of this possession while it was a subject present to me. That very day, at dinner, some morsel on my plate looked like a piece of him, and I was glad to get up and go out. Later in the evening, I was walking along the Boulevard Saint Denis, when I saw a bill at a public room there, announcing small-sword exercise, broadsword exercise, single-stick, and other such feats. I went in, and, some of the sword play being very skilful, remained. A specimen of our own national sport, the British Boxer, was announced to be given at the close of the evening. In an evil hour I determined to wait for this Boxer, as because a Boxer was a chance of many specimen (educated by two English grooms out of place), but one of the combatants receiving a straight right-hander with his left between his eyes, did exactly what the large dark creature in the Morgue had seemed going to do—and finished me for that night.

There was a rather sickly smell (not at all on unusual fragrance in Paris) in the little ante-room of my apartment at the hotel. The large dark creature in the Morgue was by no direct experience associated with my sense of smell; but when I came to the knowledge of him, he lay behind a wall of thick plate-glass, as good as a wall of steel or marble for that matter. Well, the whiff of the room never failed to reproduce him. What was more curious was the capriciousness with which the association seemed to light itself up in my mind elsewhere; I might be walking in the Palais Royal lazily enjoying the shop windows, and might be regarding with envious eye the really-magnificent clothes shops that are set out there. My eyes, wandering over impossible-waisted dressing-gowns and luminous waistcoats, would fall upon the master or the shopman, or even the very dummy at the door, and would suggest to me, "Something like him!"—and instantly I was sickened again.

This would happen at the theatre in the same manner. Often it would happen in the street, when I certainly was not looking for the likeness, and when probably there was no likeness there. It was not because the creature was dead that I was so haunted, because I know that I might have been (and I know it because I have been) equally affected by the image of a living aversion. This lasted about a week. The picture did not fade by degrees, in the sense that it became a whit less forcible and distinct, but in the sense that it obtruded itself less and less frequently. The experience may be worth considering by some who have the care of children. It would be difficult to overvalue the intensity and accuracy of an intelligent child's observation. At that impressible time of life it means something more than close observation. If the fixed impression be of an object terrible to the child, it will be (for want of reasoning upon) inseparable from that object. It will cleave to it at such a time, be Spartan with it, send it into the dark against its will, keep it in a lonely bedroom persisting in it, and will not loiter under it.

On a bright morning I rattled away from Paris in the German chariot, and left the large dark creature behind me. I was ill, and very ill indeed, though, that I had been drawn back to the Morgue, after he was put under ground, to look at his resting-place, and that I found him there. Like him —particularly his boots. However, I rattled away for Switzerland, looking forward and not backward, and so my parable ends.

I went away in the German chariot on sunrise, and rattled on, day after day, like one in a sweet dream, with a change of scene to bulk on the harness of the horses that the nursery rhyme about Banbury Cross and the venerable lady who rode in state there, was a vile one to carry. And now I came into the land of wooden houses, innocent cakes, thin butter soup, and spotless little inn bedrooms with a full complement of flies. And now the Swiss marketmen were forever rifle-shooting at marks across gorges, so exceedingly near to my road that I felt as if I were in the Cantos of Tells, and went in highly-deserved danger of my tyrannical life. The prizes at these shooting matches were watches, smart handkerchiefs, hats, spoons, and (above all) tea-trays; and at these contests I came upon a more than usually interesting and delectable countryman of my own, who had shot himself deaf in whole years of competition, and had won so many tea-trays that he had covered his entire family with his carriage full of them, like a gloriously Cheap-Jack.

In the mountain country into which I had now travelled a yoke of oxen were sometimes hooked on before the post-horses, and I went lumbering up, up, up, through the clear, cold air. Rest to me, or of falling water for change of music. Of a sudden mist and rain would clear away, and I would see vineyards, orchards, and little villages, with towering spires and odd towers; and would stroll afoot into market-places in steep winding streets, where a hundred women in bright shady hats were selling butter and fruit, and suckled their children as they sat by their clean baskets, and had such enormous calves (or glandular swellings) that I wondered that it became a science to know where the nurse ended and the child began. About this time I deserted the German chariot for the back of a mule, and went up a thousand rugged ways, and looked down on a thousand woods of fir and pine, and would, on the whole, have preferred to be sleeping; a little nearer to the inside, and not usually travelling with a hoof or two over the precipice, though much consoled by reflection that this was to be attributed to his great sagacity, by reason of his carrying bread loads of wood at other times, and not being clear but that I was privileged to that station of life, and required as much room as they. He brought me safely, in his own wise way, among the passes of the Alps, and here I enjoyed a dozen climates a day; being now (like Don Quixote on the back of the wooden horse) in the region of wind, now in the region of rain, and now in the region of tinkling ice and snow. Here I passed over trembling domes of ice, beneath which the cataract was roaring; and here I passed under arches of icicles of unspeakable beauty; and here the sweet air was so bracing and so light that at bathing-places I rubbed myself dry with a towel that had been in an Arctic condition a mile off, would steam again. By such ways and means I would come to the dinner-table at the end of the day, and go to the track to see the waterfall; and then, uttering a howl like a young giant, on espying a traveller in a rather woolly, unwashed, and tangled way on the steep, the idiot flung on the wood-pile who sunned himself and roared his gritty, would rouse the ostler struggling within the inn, who would stream out bustily, throwing her child over one of her shoulders and her gridiron over the other, as she came on with the relays and religious houses, and bleak refuges of many kinds, on this journey, and by the drive at night, and by the dawn, and would see the day perished within call, in wreaths and drifts of snow. One night the stove within, and the cold outside, wrought a delicious entertainment in the window-pane, and I dreamed I was in Russia—the identical sort out of a picture-book I had, before I could read it for myself—until I found that I was to be bound by a noble personage in a fur cap, boots, and ear-rings, who, I think, must have come out of some melodrama.

—The sky became overcast without any notice; a wind very like the March east wind of England set in, across me; and a voice said, "How do you like it? Will it do?"

I had merely shut myself, for half a minute, in a Gurney vehicle that stood for sale in the Saint Denis Carriage Department of the London Pantechnicon. I had a commission to buy it for a friend who was going abroad; and the look and manner of the chariot, as I tried the cushions and the springs, brought all these hints of traveling remembrance before me.

"It will do very well," said I, rather sorrowfully, as I got out at the other door and shut the carriage up.

CANADIAN TESTIMONIAL TO GENERAL CODRINGTON.

The subjoined letter will explain the engraving on the following page:

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

MONTREAL, March 30, 1860.

Inclosed you will find a photograph of the Testimonial about to be presented to "Sir W. W. Codrington, K.C.B., Bart.," Governor of Gibraltar, by the "Jewish Ladies of Canada," for which I hope you will find a corner in your esteemed Journal.

It is a copy of the Old Testament, richly bound in blue velvet and morocco leather, the large clasp having the word "Lord," in Hebrew characters, worked on it in gold. On the plate is the following inscription:

PRESENTED TO
SIR W. W. CODRINGTON, K.C.B., BART.,
Governor of Gibraltar,
BY THE JEWISH LADIES OF CANADA,
As a Testimonial
Of their high appreciation of his generous philanthropy toward their distressed co-religionists from Morocco.
A.M. 5620.

The Bible is placed in a case of bird's-eye maple, decorated with silver and lined with crimson velvet—the whole being of Montreal manufacture.

THE CLAY STATUE AT NEW ORLEANS.

On 12th April, Mr. Joel T. Hart's grand statue of Henry Clay was inaugurated at New Orleans, in presence of one of the largest concourses of people ever assembled in that city. Mr. Hart was the orator of the day; in opening his oration he thus alluded to the statue, which we engrave on the following page:

"In the year 1850, a number of public-spirited and patriotic citizens, desirous of manifesting their veneration for the character and public services of Henry Clay, formed themselves into a society named the 'Clay Monumental Association of New Orleans.' Their object, as their name indicates, was to erect in this city a suitable monument to the illustrious man whose memory they designed to honor.

"They determined to erect a bronze statue of Mr. Clay, and they fixed upon a sculptor for its location, with the permission of the city authorities.

"On the 12th of April, 1856, the corner-stone of the pedestal was laid with appropriate solemnities. The work of making the statue was intrusted to Mr. Joel T. Hart, of Kentucky. The artist accepted the high and delicate commission, and in the most important work to a native artist has given distinguished evidence in the world of Art gave an earnest of its admirable execution; and who, born by the side of the illustrious patriot, and having early imbibed the spirit of his principles, would bring to the performance of his grateful task a genius glowing with the enthusiasm of a personal and fervent admiration.

"Equally judicious has been the selection of this site for the statue. In the very centre-ground hemisphere of our city—in the very heart of the metropolis, overlooking the Mississippi, the great avenue of our internal commerce, and one of the strongest natural bonds of the Union—it stands conspicuous; a noble and permanent monument of the people's love, and a monument of the gratitude and veneration of a free people."

The statue is about twelve feet high, the pedestal is somewhat taller than it appears in our picture.

Mr. Clay is represented in the act of addressing the Senate, the left hand resting on the pedestal, the right gracefully extended.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

MR. FAIRLIE'S NARRATIVE—Concluded.

I HAVE mentioned that my usual course hitherto had been to submit to dear Marian, and make no noise. But the present occasion the consequences involved in her extremely inconsiderate proposal were of a nature to make me pause. Mr. Clay is represented in the act of addressing a Lady Gyde, what security had I against Sir Percival Glyde's following her here, in a state of violent excitement, and accusing me of harboring his wife? I saw such a perfect labyrinth of troubles involved in this proceeding that I determined to keep my head, as it were. I wrote, therefore, to dear Marian, to beg (as she had no husband to lay claim to her) that she would come here to myself first and talk the matter over with me. If she could answer my objections to my own perfect satisfaction, then I assured her I would receive our sweet Laura with the greatest pleasure—but not otherwise. I felt, of course, at the time, that this temporizing on my part would probably end in bringing Marian here in a state of virtuous indignation, banging doors also; and of the two indignations and bangings I preferred Marian's, because I was used to her. Accordingly I dispatched the letter by return of post. It gained me time, at all events—and, oh dear me! what a point that was to begin with.

When I am totally prostrated (did I mention that I was totally prostrated by Marian's letter?) it always takes me three days to get up again. I was very unreasonable—I expected three days of quiet. Of course I didn't get them.

The third day's post brought me a most impertinent letter from a person with whom I was totally unacquainted. He described himself as the acting partner of our man of business—our dear, pig-headed Old Stager. In consequence of his decease, the letter had been addressed to him at Miss Halcombe's handwriting. On opening the envelope, he had discovered, to his astonishment, that it contained nothing but a blank sheet of note paper. This circumstance appeared to him so suspicious (as suggesting to his restless legal mind that the letter had been tampered with) that he had at once written to Miss Halcombe, and he had received no answer by return of post. In this difficulty, instead of acting like a sensible man and letting things take their course, his next absurd proceeding, on his own showing, was to pester me, by writing to inquire if I knew any thing about it. Why the deuce should I know any thing about it? Why alarm me as well as himself? I wrote back to that effect. It was one of my keenest letters. I have produced nothing with a sharper epistolary edge to it since I tended his dismissal in writing to that extremely troublesome person, Mr. Walter Hartright.

My letter produced its effect. I heard nothing more from the lawyer. This, perhaps, was not altogether surprising. But I was seriously a remarkable circumstance that no second letter reached me from Marian, and that no warning signs appeared of her arrival. Her unexpected absence did me amazing good. It was so very soothing and pleasant to infer (as I did of course) that my determined objections had made it up again. Five days of undisturbed tranquility, of delicious single blessedness, quite restored me. Six days—I am strictly within the truth or sixteenth of July, as I imagine—I felt strong enough to send for my photographer, and to set him to work again on the presentation copies of my art-treasures, with a view, as I have already explained, to the improvement of tastes in this barbarous neighborhood. I had just dismissed him to his work-shop, and had just settled comfortably with my cousin, when Louis suddenly made his appearance with a card in his hand.

"Another Young Person?" I said. "I won't see her. In my state of health Young Persons disagree with me. Not at home."

"It is a gentleman, this time, Sir."

A gentleman of course made a difference. I looked at the card.

Gracious Heavens! my tiresome sister's foreign husband. Count Fosco!

Is it necessary to say what my first impression was when I looked at my visitor's card? Surely not. My sister having married a foreigner, there was but one impression that any man in the world could possibly feel. Of course the Count had come to borrow money of me.

"Louis," I said, "do you think he would go away if you were to tell the five shillings?"

Louis looked quite shocked. He surprised me inexpressibly by declaring that my sister's foreign husband was dressed in mourning, and looked the picture of prosperity. Under these circumstances, my first impression altered to a certain extent. It never took a favorable shape that the Count had matrimonial difficulties of his own to contend with, and that he had come, with his wife, out of the family, to cast them all on my shoulders.

"Did he mention his business?" I asked.

"Count Fosco said he had come here, Sir, because Miss Halcombe was unable to leave Blackwater Park."

Precisely so, apparently. Not exactly his own, as I had supposed, but dear Marian's. It made very little difference. Troubles, any way. Oh dear!

"Show him in," I said, resignedly.

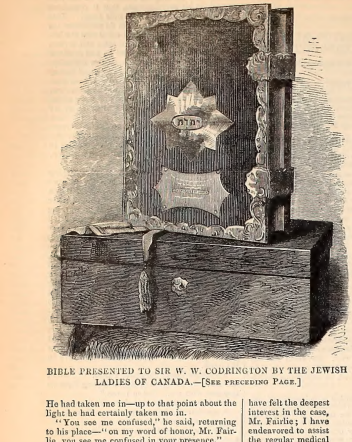
The Count's first appearance really startled me. He was dressed in an alarmingly large person, that I quite trembled. I felt certain that he would shake the floor, and knock down my arttreasures. He did neither the one nor the other. He was refreshingly dressed in summer costume; his manner was delightfully self-possessed and easy; his head is a strong one. My first impression of him was highly favorable. It is not creditable to my penetration—as the sequel will show—to acknowledge this; but I am a naturally candid man, and I do acknowledge it, notwithstanding.

"Allow me to present myself, Mr. Fairlie," he said. "I come from Blackwater Park, and I have the honor to be the husband of being Madame Fosco's husband. Let me take my first and last advantage of that circumstance by requesting you to make no apology to me. I beg you will not disturb yourself—I beg you will not move."

"You are very good," I replied. "I wish I was strong enough to get up. Charmed to see you at Limmeridge. Please take a chair."

"I am afraid you are suffering to-day," said the Count.

"As usual," I said. "I am nothing but a bundle of nerves—dressed up to look like a man."



"I have studied many subjects in my time," remarked this sympathetic person. "Among others, the inscrutable subject of nerves. May I make a suggestion, at once the simplest and the most profound? Will you let me alter the light in your room?"

"Certainly—if you will be so very kind as not to let any of it in on me."

He walked to the window. Such a contrast to dear Marian! so extremely considerate in all his movements!

"Shall I," he said, in that delightfully confidential tone which is so soothing to an invalid, "is the first essential. Light stimulates, nourishes, invigorates. You can no more do without it, Mr. Fairlie, than if you were a flower. Observe. Here, where you sit, I close the shutters to compose you. There, where you do not sit, I draw up the blind and let in the invigorating sun. Admit the light into your room, if you can not bear it on yourself. Light, Sir, is the grand decree of Providence. You accept Providence with your own restrictions. Accept Light on the same terms."

I thought this very convincing indeed.

BIBLE PRESENTED TO SIR W. W. CODRINGTON BY THE JEWISH LADIES OF CANADA.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

He had taken me in—up to that point about the light he had certainly taken me in.

"You see me confused," he said, returning to his place—"on my word of honor, Mr. Fairlie, you see me confused in your presence."

"Shocked to hear it, I am sure. May I inquire why?"

"Sir, can I enter this room (where you sit a sufferer), and see you surrounded by these admirable objects of Art, without discovering that you are a man whose feelings are acutely impressionable, whose sympathies are perpetually alive? Tell me, can I do this?"

If I had been strong enough to sit up in my chair I should of course have bowed. Not being strong enough, I smiled my acknowledgments instead. It did just as well; we both understood one another.

"Pray, follow my train of thought," continued the Count. "I sit here, a man of refined sympathies myself, in the presence of another man of refined sympathies also. I am conscious of a terrible necessity for lacerating those sympathies, by referring to domestic events of a very melancholy kind. What is the inevitable consequence? I have done myself the honor of pointing it out to you already. I sit confused."

Was it at this point that I began to suspect he was going to bore me? I rather think it was.

"Is it absolutely necessary to refer to these unpleasant matters?" I inquired. "In our homely English phrase, Count Fosco, won't they keep?"

The Count, with the most alarming solemnity, sighed and shook his head.

"Must I really hear them?"

He shrugged his shoulders (it was the first foreign thing he had done since he had been in the room), and looked at me in an unpleasantly penetrating manner. My instincts told me that I had better close my eyes. I obeyed my instincts.

"Please, break it gently," I pleaded. "Any body dead?"

"Dead!" cried the Count, with unnecessary foreign fierceness. "Mr. Fairlie! your notional composure terrifies me. In the name of Heaven, what have I said or done to make you think me the messenger of death?"

"Pray accept my apologies," I answered. "You have said and done nothing. I make it a rule, in these distressing cases, always to anticipate the worst. It breaks the blow by meeting it half-way, and so on. Inexpressibly relieved, I am sure, to hear that nobody is dead. Any body ill?"

I opened my eyes and looked at him. Was he very yellow when he came in? or had he turned very yellow in the last minute or two? I really can't say; and I can't ask Louis, because he was not in the room at the time.

"Any body ill?" I repeated; observing that my notional composure still appeared to affect him.

"That is part of my bad news, Mr. Fairlie. Yes. Somebody is ill."

"Grieved, I am sure. Which of them is it?"

"To my profound sorrow, Miss Halcombe. Perhaps you were in some degree prepared to hear this? Perhaps, when you found that Miss Halcombe did not come here by herself, as you proposed, and did not write a second time, your affectionate anxiety may have made you fear that she was ill?"

I have no doubt my affectionate anxiety had led to that melancholy apprehension, at some time or other; but, at the moment, my wretched memory entirely failed to remind me of the circumstance. However, I said Yes, in justice to myself. I was much shocked. It was so very uncharacteristic of such a robust person as dear Marian to be ill that I could only suppose she had met with an accident. A horse, or a false step on the stairs, or something of that sort.

"Is it serious?" I asked.

"Serious — beyond a doubt," he replied. "Dangerous — I hope and trust not. Miss Halcombe unhappily exposed herself to be wetted through by a heavy rain. The cold that followed was of an aggravated kind; and it has now brought with it the worst consequence — Fever."

When I heard the word Fever, and when I remembered, at the same moment, that the unscrupulous person who was now addressing me had just come from Blackwater Park, I thought I should have fainted on the spot.

"Good God!" I said. "Is it infectious?"

"Not at present," he answered, with detestable composure. "It may turn to infection; but no such deplorable complication had taken place when I left Blackwater Park. I Glyde. I am Sir Percival's oldest friend; I am related to Lady Glyde by marriage; I am an eye-witness of all that has happened at Blackwater Park. In those three capacities I speak with authority, with confidence, with honorable regret. Sir! I inform you, as the head of Lady Glyde's family, that Miss Halcombe has exaggerated nothing in the letter that she wrote to your address. I affirm that the remedy which that admirable lady has proposed is the only remedy that will spare you the horrors of public scandal. A temporary separation between husband and wife is the one peaceable solution of this difficulty. Part them for the present; and when all causes of irritation are removed, I, who have now the honor of addressing you—I will undertake to bring Sir Percival to reason. Lady Glyde is innocent, Lady Glyde is injured; but —follow my thought here!—she is, on that very account (I say it with shame), the cause of irritation while she remains under her husband's roof. No other house can receive her with propriety but yours. I invite you to open it!"

Cool. Here was a matrimonial hailstorm pouring in the South of England, and I was invited, by a man with fever in every fold of his coat, to come out from the North of England and take my share of the pelting. I tried to put the point forcibly, just as I have put it here. The Count deliberately lowered one of his horrid fingers, kept the other up, and went on—rode over me, as it were, without even the common coachmanlike attention of crying "Hi!" before he knocked me down.

"Follow my thought once more, if you please," he resumed. "My first object you have heard. My second object in coming to this house is to do what Miss Halcombe's illness has prevented her from doing for myself. My large experience is consulted on all difficult matters at Blackwater Park; and my friendly advice was requested on the interesting subject of your letter to Miss Halcombe. I understood at once—for my sympathies are your sympathies—why you wished to see her here before you pledged yourself to inviting Lady Glyde. You are most right, Sir, in hesitating to receive the wife until you are quite certain that the husband will not exert his authority to reclaim her. I agree to that. I also agree that such delicate explanations as this difficulty involves are not explanations which can be properly disposed of by writing only. My presence here (to my own great inconvenience) is the proof that I speak sincerely. As for the explanations themselves I—Fosco—I who know Sir Percival much better than Miss Halcombe knows him, affirm to you, on my honor and my word, that he will not come near this house, or attempt to communicate with this house, while his wife is living in it. His affairs are embarrassed. Offer him his freedom by means of the absence of Lady Glyde. I promise you he will take his freedom, and go back to the Continent, at the earliest moment when he can get away. Is this clear to you as crystal? Yes, it is. Have you questions to address to me? Be it so; I am here to answer. Ask, Mr. Fairlie—oblige me by asking to your heart's content."

He had said so much already in spite of me, and he looked so dreadfully capable of saying a great deal more, also in spite of me, that I declined his amiable invitation in pure self-defense.

"Many thanks," I replied. "I am sinking fast. In my state of health I must take things for granted. Allow me to do so on this occasion. We quite understand each other. Yes. Much obliged, I am sure, for your kind interference. If I ever get better, and ever have a second opportunity of improving our acquaintance—interview.

STATUE OF HENRY CLAY, AT NEW ORLEANS, INAUGURATED APRIL 12, 1860.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY J. H. CLARK, ESQ., OF NEW ORLEANS.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

He got up. I thought he was going. No. More talk; more time for the development of infectious influences—in my room, too; remember that, in my room!

"One moment yet," he said; "one moment, before I take my leave. I ask permission, at parting, to impress on you an urgent necessity. It is this, Sir? You must not think of waiting till Miss Halcombe recovers before you recite Lady Glyde. Miss Halcombe has the attendance of the doctor, of the housekeeper at Blackwater Park, and of an experienced nurse as well—three persons for whose capacity and devotion I answer with my life. I tell you that. I tell you, also, that the anxiety and alarm of her sister's illness has already affected the health and spirits of Lady Glyde, and has made her totally unfit to be of use in the sick-room. Her position with her husband grows more and more deplorable and dangerous every day. If you leave her any longer at Blackwater Park you do nothing whatever to hasten her sister's recovery, and, at the same time, you risk the public scandal, which, you, and I, and all of us, are bound, in the sacred interests of the Family, to avoid. With all my soul I advise you to remove the serious responsibility of delay from your own shoulders by writing to Lady Glyde to come here at once. Be your affectionate, your honorable, your inevitable duty; and, whatever happens in the future, no one can lay the blame on you. I speak from my large experience; I offer my friendly advice. Is it accepted—Yes, or No?"

I looked at him—merely looked at him—with my sense of his amazing assurance, and my dawning resolution to ring for Louis, and have him shown out of the room, expressed in every line of my face. It is perfectly incredible, but quite true, that my face did not appear to produce the slightest impression on him. Then without nerves—evidently born without nerves!

"You hesitate?" he said. "Mr. Fairlie! I understand that hesitation. You object—sec, Sir, how my sympathies look straight down into your thoughts!—you object that Lady Glyde is not in health and not in spirits to take the long journey from Hampshire to this place by herself. Her own maid is removed from her, as you know; and of other servants fit to travel with her from one end of England to another there are none at Blackwater Park. You object, again, that she can not comfortably stop and rest in London on her way here, because she can not comfortably go alone to a public hotel when she is a total stranger. In one breath I grant both objections—in another breath I remove them. How me, if you please, for the last time. It was my intention, when I returned to England with Sir Percival, to settle myself in the neighborhood of London. That purpose has just been happily accomplished. I have taken, for six months, a little furnished house, in the quarter called St. John's Wood. Be so obliging as to keep this fact in your mind, and observe the programme I now propose. Lady Glyde travels to London (a short journey—I myself meet her at the station); I take her to rest and sleep at my house, which is also the house of her aunt; when she is restored, I escort her to the station again; she travels to this place, and her own maid (who is now under your roof) receives her at the carriage door. Here is comfort consulted; here are the interests of propriety consulted; here is your own duty—duty of hospitality, sympathy, protection, to an unhappy lady in need of all three—smoothed and made easy, from the beginning to the end. I cordially invite you, Sir, to second my efforts in the sacred interests of the Family. I seriously advise you to write by my hands, offering the hospitality of your house (and heart), and the hospitality of my house (and heart), to that injured and unfortunate lady whose cause I plead to-day."

He waved his horrid hand at me; he struck his infectious breath! he addressed me oratorically—as if I was laid up in the House of Commons. It was high time to take a desperate course of some sort. It was also high time to send for Louis, and adopt the precaution of fumigating the room.

In this trying emergency an idea occurred to me—an inestimable idea, which, so to speak, killed two intrusive birds with one stone. I determined to get rid of the Count's tiresome troubles, by complying with his odious foreigner's request, and writing the letter at once. There was not the least danger of the invitation being accepted, for there was not the least chance that Laura would consent to leave Blackwater Park while Marian was lying there ill. How like a charmingly convenient obstacle could have escaped the officious penetration of the Count I was impossible to conceive—it had escaped him. My dread that he might yet discover it, if I allowed him any more time to think, stimulated me to such an unusual exertion that I struggled into a sitting position; seized—really seized—the writing materials by my side, and produced the letter as rapidly as if I had been a common clerk in an office. "Dearest Laura,—Please come, whenever you like. Break the journey by sleeping in London at your aunt's house. Grieved to hear of dear Marian's illness. Ever affectionately yours." I handed these lines, at arm's-length, to the Count—I sank back into my chair—I said, "Excuse me; I am entirely prostrated; I can do no more. Will you wait and hand Louis the letter? Love to all, and sympathy, and so on. Good-morning."

He made another speech—the man was absolutely unchastisable. I closed my eyes; I endeavored to hear as little as possible. In spite of my endeavors I was obliged to hear a great deal. My visitor's endless flow of words accumulated himself, and congratulated me on the result of the interview; he mentioned a great deal more about his sympathies and his regard for the injured my miserable health; he offered to write me a prescription; he commented on my forgetfulness of not forgetting what he had said about the importance of light; he accepted my obliging invitation to rest and breathe a little—because he was to expect Lady Glyde in two or three days' time; he begged my permission to look forward to our next meeting, and to my further counsel and gaining me by saying farewell; he added a great deal more, which I rejoice to think I did not attend to then, and which I can remember now. I heard his sympathetic voice travelling away from me by degrees; but, large as he was, his exit was quiet. He left the room, leaving me at it being absolutely noiseless. I don't know when he opened the door, or when he shut it. I only know that I was left alone at last again, after an interval of silence—and he was gone.

I rang for Louis, and retired to my bedroom. I would wash my hands, and use cologne-water, and I would have a fumigation. I would have a fumigation, and I would use cologne-water, and I would use chloride of lime to purify the room, and I would use vinegar for myself, and copious fumigation for my study, were the obvious precautions to take; I was grateful for the idea for the moment, and they proved successful. I enjoyed my customary siesta. I awoke moist and cool. My first thought was, Have I done right? Am I really got rid of him? Yes—he had gone away by the afternoon train. Had he lunched; and, if so, what? Never mind—I was safe, quiet, and cream. What a man! What a digestion!

Am I expected to say any thing more? I believe not. I believe I have reached the limits assigned to me. The shocking circumstances which happened at this period I did not, I am thankful to say, happen in my presence. I do beg and entreat that nobody will be so very unfeeling as to lay any part of the blame of those circumstances on me. I did every thing for the best. I am not answerable for a deplorable calamity which it was quite impossible to foresee. I am shattered by it; I have suffered bitterly from anxiety and sorrow. My servant, Louis (who is really attached to me, in his unintelligent way), thinks I shall never get over it. He sees me trembling at this moment, with my handkerchief to my eyes. I wish my memory, in justice to myself, that it was not my fault, and that I am quite exhausted and heart-broken. I can say no more.

THE NARRATIVE OF ELIZA MICHELSON, HOUSEKEEPER AT BLACKWATER PARK.

I am asked to state plainly what I know of the progress of Miss Halcombe's illness, and of the circumstances under which Lady Glyde left Blackwater Park for London.

The reason given for making this demand on me, is that my testimony is required in the interests of truth. As the widow of a clergyman of the Church of England (reduced by misfortune to the necessity of accepting a situation), I have been taught to place the claims of truth above all other considerations. I therefore comply with a request which I might otherwise, through reluctance to connect myself with distressing family affairs, have hesitated to grant.

I made no memorandum at the time, and I can not therefore be sure, to a day, of the date; but I believe I am correct in stating that Miss Halcombe's serious illness began during the first week in July. The breakfast hour was late at Blackwater Park—eleven o'clock. It is as true, never earlier than half past nine. On the morning to which I am now referring, Miss Halcombe (who was usually the first to come down) did not make her appearance at the table. After the family had waited a quarter of an hour, the upper housemaid was sent to see after her, and came running out of the room, dreadfully frightened. I met the servant on the stairs, and went at once to Miss Halcombe to see what was the matter. The poor lady was incapable of telling me. She was walking about her room with a pen in her hand, quite light-headed, in a state of burning fever.

Lady Glyde (being no longer in Sir Percival's service, I may, without impropriety, mention my former mistress by her name, instead of calling her My Lady) was the first to come in from her own bedroom. She was so dreadfully alarmed and distressed that she was quite useless. The Count Fosco and his lady, who came up stairs immediately afterward, were both most serviceable and kind. Her Ladyship assisted me to get Miss Halcombe to her bed. His lordship, the Count, remained in the sitting-room, and having sent for my medicine-chest, made a mixture for Miss Halcombe, and a cooling lotion to be applied to her head, so as to lose no time before the doctor came. We applied the lotion, but we could not get her to take the mixture. Sir Percival undertook to send for the doctor. He dispatched a groom on horseback for the nearest medical man, Mr. Dawson, of Oak Lodge.

Mr. Dawson arrived in less than an hour's time. He was a respectable elderly man, well known all round the country; and we were much pleased when we found that he considered the case to be a very serious one. His lordship, the Count, affably entered into conversation with Mr. Dawson, and gave his opinions with a judicious freedom. Mr. Dawson, not over-courteously, inquired if his lordship's advice was that of a doctor; and being informed that it was the advice of one who had studied medicine, unprofessionally, replied that he was not accustomed to consult with amateur physicians. The Count, with truly Christian meekness of temper, smiled, and left the room. Before he went out, he told me that he might be found, in case he was wanted in the course of the day, at the boat-house on the banks of the lake. Mr. Dawson have gone there I can not say. But he did go; remaining away the whole of the dull seven o'clock, which was dinner-time. Perhaps he went out to set the example of keeping the house as quiet as possible. It was entirely in his character to do so. He was a most considerate man.

Miss Halcombe passed a very bad night, the fever coming and going, and getting worse toward the morning instead of better. No nurse could be found in the neighborhood, her ladyship the Countess and myself undertook the duty, relieving each other. Lady Glyde, most unwisely, insisted on sitting up with us. She was much too nervous and too delicate in health to bear the anxiety of Miss Halcombe's illness calmly. She only did herself harm, without being of the least real assistance. A more gentle and affectionate lady never lived; but she cried and she was frightened—two weaknesses which render her entirely unfit to be present in a sick-room.

Sir Percival and the Count came in the morning to make inquiries. Sir Percival (from distress, I presume, at his lady's affliction and at Miss Halcombe's illness) appeared much confused and unlike himself in his mind. His lordship testified, on the contrary, a becoming composure and interest. He had his straw-hat in one hand and his cane in the other; and he mentioned to Sir Percival, in my hearing, that he would go out again and study at the lake. "Let us have perfect quiet," he said. "Let us not smoke in-doors, my friend, now Miss Halcombe is ill. You go your way, and I will go mine. Good-morning! I like to be alone. Good-morning, Mrs. Michelson."

Sir Percival was not civil enough—perhaps I ought in justice to say not composed enough—to take leave of me with the same polite attention. The only person in the house, indeed, who treated me, at that time or at any other, on the footing of a lady in distressed circumstances, was the Count. He had the manners of a true nobleman; he was considerate toward every one. Even the young person (Fanny by name) who attended on Lady Glyde was not beneath his notice. She was sent away by Sir Percival, his lordship (after paying his sweet little birds at the time) was most kindly anxious to know what had become of her, where she was to go the day she left Blackwater Park, and so on. It is in such little delicate attentions that the advantages of an aristocratic birth always show themselves. I make no apology for introducing these particulars; they are brought forward in justice to his lordship, whose character, I have reason to know, is viewed rather harshly in certain quarters. A nobleman who can respect a lady in distressed circumstances, and can take a fatherly interest in the fortunes of an humble servant girl, shows principles and feelings of too high an order to be lightly called in question. I advance no opinions—I offer facts only. My endeavor through life is to judge not, that I be not judged. One of my beloved husband's finest sermons was on that text. I read it constantly—in my own copy of the edition printed by subscription in the first days of my widowhood—and at every fresh perusal I derive an increase of spiritual benefit and edification.

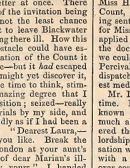
There was no improvement in Miss Halcombe, and the second night was even worse than the first. Mr. Dawson was constant in his attendance. The practical duties of nursing were still divided between the Countess and myself. Lady Glyde persisting in sitting up with us, though we both entreated her to take some rest. "My place is by Marian's bedside," was her only answer. "Whether I am ill or well, nothing will induce me to lose sight of her."

Toward mid-day I went down stairs to attend to some of my regular duties. An hour afterward, on my way back to the sick-room, I saw the Count (who had gone out again early, for the third time) entering the hall, to all appearance in the highest good spirits. Sir Percival at the same moment put his head out of the library door, and addressed his noble friend, with a coarse eagerness, in these words:

"Have you found her?"

His lordship's large face became dimpled all over with placid amusement; but he made no reply in words. At the same time Sir Percival turned his head, observed that I was approaching the stairs, and looked at me in the most rudely angry manner possible.

"Come in here and tell me about it," he said, to the Count. "Whenever there are women in a house they're always sure to be going up or down stairs."



"I hear Sir Percival," observed his lordship, kindly, "Mrs. Michelson has duties. Pray remember her admirable performances of them as sincerely as I do! How is the sufferer, Mrs. Michelson?"

"No better, my lord, I regret to say."

"Sad—most sad!" remarked the Count. "You look fatigued, Mrs. Michelson. It is certainly time you and my wife had some help in nursing. I think I may be the means of offering you that help. Circumstances have happened which will oblige Madame Fosco to travel to London either to-morrow or the day after. She will go away in the morning and return at night; and she will bring back with her, to relieve you, a nurse of excellent conduct and capacity, who is now disengaged. The woman is known to my wife as a person to be trusted. Before she comes here say nothing about her, if you please, to the doctor, because he will look with an evil eye on any nurse of my providing. When she appears in this house she will speak for herself; and Mr. Dawson will be obliged to acknowledge that there is no excuse for not employing her. Lady Glyde will say the same. Pray present my best respects and sympathies to Lady Glyde."

I expressed my grateful acknowledgments for his lordship's kind consideration. Sir Percival cut them short by calling to his noble friend (using, I regret to say, a profane expression) to come into the library, and not keep him waiting there any longer.

I proceeded up stairs. We are poor erring creatures; and however well established a woman's principles may be, she can not always keep on her guard against the temptation to excessive idle curiosity. I am ashamed to say that my little curiosity, on this occasion, got the better of my principles, and made me unduly inquisitive about the question which Sir Percival had addressed to his noble friend at the library door. Who was the Count expected to find in the course of his studious morning rambles at Blackwater Park? A woman, it was to be presumed, from the terms of Sir Percival's inquiry. I did not suspect the Count of any impropriety—I knew his moral character too well. The only question I asked myself was—Had he found her?

"I BEG YOU WILL NOT DISTURB YOURSELF—I BEG YOU WILL NOT MOVE."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

Premature Loss of the Hair,

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and it has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth.

It is unrivaled as a dressing for the hair, a single application rendering it soft and glossy for several days.

The following testimonial is conclusive of its efficacy in the case of

Loss of Hair.

BOSTON, July 19, 1857.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.:

I can not refuse to state the salutary effect, in my own aggravated case, of your excellent Hair Oil—(Cocoaine).

For many months my hair had been falling off, until I was fearful of losing it entirely. The skin upon my head became gradually more and more inflamed, so that I could not touch it without pain. This irritated condition I attributed to the use of various advertised hair washes, which I have since been told contain camphene spirit.

By the advice of my physician, to whom you had shown your process of purifying the Oil, I commenced its use the last week in June. The first application allayed the itching and irritation; in three or four days the redness and tenderness disappeared—the hair ceased to fall, and I have now a thick growth of new hair. I trust that others similarly afflicted, will be induced to try the same remedy.

Yours, very truly,

SUSAN R. POPE.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by dealers, generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

(From the St. Louis Republican.)

"No summer resort surpasses Round Hill in loveliness and in all the resources calculated to gratify the tastes and promote the comfort of visitors."—See Circulars sent gratis. Address, Round Hill Water Cure and Hotel, Northampton, Mass.

CRICKET PLAYERS ATTENTION!

Send us 10 cents, and we will send you by mail the Cricket Player's Pocket Companion, containing Rules for playing the game, plans, &c. Illustrated.

MAYHEW & BARTER, Publishers,
Boston, Mass.

Established in 1834.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,
Manufacturer of the Over-strung
GRAND & SQUARE PIANO-FORTES
Manufactory and Warerooms
75 to 85
East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five Years, and Prices are moderate.

At Walker's Warerooms,

Clinton Hall, Astor Place, near Broadway,
A Large Stock of Pianos of every description for sale and to Rent.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,

For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the normal habits of female life superinduce a variety of diseases which this Catholicon will counteract and cure. It can be relied upon in any case of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, Ulceration of the Womb, Faintness, Lassitude, &c. When every thing else has failed, this article is never taken without benefit. No suffering female should leave it untried. A pamphlet, by mail, or delivered by any Agent, gratis, on receipt of a letter, post paid, by anyone. It is sold in every somewhat similar in name, at the office of the proprietor. Address DR. J. B. MARCHISI, No. 12 Park Row, N. Y.; J. D. PARK, Cincinnati; C. Clinton; WEEKS & POTTER, Boston; SCHLLINDER & CO., Philad.

J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Ulm, N. Y.

CARD.

A. & G. A. Arnoux,

So long and reputably known as Fashionable Tailors, beg to announce to the public that they have added a department for Boy Clothing to their establishment, by which all the finest and newest styles of goods will be kept. This will enable our customers to obtain all the goods they may be in need of for themselves and the male part of their families at our house.

521 Broadway,
Under St. Nicholas Hotel, N. Y.

LE BON TON is the best LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen copy, with two patterns, will be sent for 30 cents.
S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 467 Broadway, N. Y.

FISHERMEN! HURRAH FOR WEALTH
THE ANGLYUNI—The Chinese Secret Art of Catching Fish will be sent to any address for $1. Address ALEXANDER M. GWIN, Box 151, Albany, N. Y.

CHICKERING & SONS'

MANUFACTURERS OF GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANO FORTES,
SINCE 1823.

694 Broadway, New York.

Since the period in which JONAS CHICKERING established this house 22,500 Pianos have been constructed and finished under his supervision, and that of his sons, for the superiority of which

THIRTY-EIGHT PRIZE MEDALS have been awarded them at EXHIBITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES, being the HIGHEST PREMIUMS OVER ALL COMPETITION.

They also received the PRIZE MEDAL at the World's Fair in London, in 1851.

The names of THALBERG, BENEDICT, and D. BLACK need only to be referred to, to show of what a class the judges upon this occasion were composed.

The attention of the Public is specially requested to the new Scales Plain and Overstrung GRAND AND SQUARE PIANO FORTES, which, for Quality, Strength, and Purity of Tone, Delicacy of Action, and general style of Finish, are unsurpassed by any Pianos now offered to the Public. This fact has been attested to by the leading artists of this country and of Europe.

MY DEAR SIR:

I can only repeat that which has been said as often by others as with myself—that I consider the Chickering & Sons' Pianos far beyond comparison—the best I have ever seen in America. S. THALBERG.

MESSRS. CHICKERING & SONS:

Philadelphia, January 10, 1859.

GENTLEMEN:—I wish to thank you for the use of your Piano Fortes, which you have so kindly furnished me for my concerts in this city, and to say in this connection that the opinion which I expressed three years ago has been more than confirmed to me by the continued use of them—viz., that for volume and pure quality of tone, variety of articulation, elasticity of touch, and uniform excellence, Conductor of Her Majesty's Theatre, in London, and at the Academy of Music in New York.

Baltimore, Feb. 3, 1859.

MY DEAR SIR:

Allow me to thank you for the use of the splendid Grand Piano which I have had at Illusion Concerts in this city. I think that it is needless to repeat what the whole world knows, viz.: that CHICKERING & SONS' Pianos are unequalled in any respect, and stand pre-eminent in this country. Nevertheless, if my words can have any weight in this matter, I am very happy to add my testimonial to those of my predecessors.

I remain yours truly,
GUSTAV SATTER.

It would be needless to multiply testimonials. It may, however, be satisfactory to our patrons and friends among the public at large, to state that testimonials have been received from all the leading artists who have visited, or are now residing in the United States, to the full as determinate and explicit as those above presented. A list of the principal names is here appended:—

GOTTSCHALK,	J. N. TYCHOWSKI,
LEPOLD DE MEYER,	J. BENEDICT.
ALFRED JAELL,	M. STRAKOSCH,
WM. SCHNEIDERG,	JULLIEN,
B. HOFFMAN,	ARTHUR NAPOLEON,
J. BURKE,	R. GOLDBECK,
MME. LOUISE ABEL,

And many others.

A Picture for the Times.

THE UNION NOT IN DANGER WHEN THE SHADE OF WASHINGTON IS BEFORE US.

SPIRIT OF THE UNION.

Size 13x19 inches.

This truly patriotic and elaborate Picture in Oil Colors represents a correct full length Portrait of WASHINGTON, in the attitude of addressing the Convention of the following verses from WM. ROSS WALLACE'S Poem:

"And lo! on high the glorious shade
Of Washington's lights all the gloom,
And points from these words arrayed
In lines of fire around his tomb:
"'Americans! Our fathers' grave
Their blood to rear the Union's fame;
For this your fathers' ashes spread
On many a grey plain.
"'Americans! will ye dare,
On mountain, prairie, valley, flood,
By hurling flame and ruthless gift,
To desecrate that blood?
"'The right shall live while Faction dies;
All trials there is but a fleeting wave,
But Patriots drink from God's own eyes
Truth's light, that cannot find a grave.'"

This artitle memento of the Father of his Country should ornament the fireside of every family in the land.

TERMS.

Single copies by mail 25 cts., and 12 cents in stamps; $5 will secure six copies free o.' postage.

To the Trade a liberal discount will be made.

Published by EDWARD DECHAUX,
Artist's Emporium, Baltimore, Md.

PREVENTION BETTER THAN CURE.—Now is the time to use

Sand's Sarsaparilla.

It will strengthen the system against the coming warm weather, and prevent unsightly pimples and blotches upon the skin.

"HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET PAID FOR IT."—AGENTS.—Young men—and women also—Teachers, Farmers, and others, who may wish to engage in a local or traveling agency for our Books, Journals, etc., may have full particulars by return mail, by addressing the publishers as follows: FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

"Not dangerous to the Human Family."
"Rats come out of their holes to die."

Vermin.

"Costar's" Rat, Roach, &c., Exterminator.
"Costar's"
"Costar's" Bed-bug Exterminator.
"Costar's" Electric Powder, for Insects, &c.
"Costar's"

AND DRIVE BY LADIES AND ALL OTHER HOUSEKEEPERS
IN PUTTING AWAY
FURS—CLOTHES—CARPETS.
Sold everywhere.
Principal Depot, 410 Broadway, N. Y.

"Trefelio" is the True Secret of Beauty.

"TREFELIO" Cures all Eruptions.
"TREFELIO" Softens the Skin.
"TREFELIO" Beautifies the Skin.
"TREFELIO" Eradicates Humors.
"TREFELIO" 50 cents a bottle.

1828. T. H. Chambers' 1860.

PIANOS, Established in 1828. Formerly Dubois & Stodart, and Dubois, Horne & Chambers. Rutas-Hoazon, corner of 8th St. and 4th Avenue, opposite the Peter Cooper Institute, New York.

Improved Over-strung, Iron-frame Pianos.

N. B.—Send for a Circular, with description of styles and Schedule of prices.

Female Agents Wanted.

to $3 a day.—FEMALE AGENTS are wanted, at home or to travel, for the MAMMOTH "FAMILY PICTORIAL," an elegant Periodical of Home Literature, Pure Morality, and practical Common Sense. The largest, best, handsomest and cheapest Illustrated Family Paper in the world, at only 75 Cents a year; 40 Cents for six months, or 25 Cents for three months, and ONE HALF OF THE MONEY given to Female Agents. Enclose a three cent stamp for Specimen copy, &c., to MARIE LOUISE HANKINS & CO., Publishers, 429 Broadway, New York.

A World-Wide Circulation!!!

REPUBLISHED IN ENGLAND!!

REPUBLISHED IN GERMANY!!

30,000 Copies of the English Edition already Sold!!!

SAY AND SEAL

By the Author of
"WIDE, WIDE WORLD," and the Author of
"DOLLARS AND CENTS."

2 vols. 12mo. Price $2 00.

Just Published,

By J. B. Lippincott & Co.

We are credibly informed that during the few weeks allowed to the English Publishers, in advance of the issue of the work in this country, 30,000 COPIES HAVE BEEN SOLD!

In further evidence of its great popularity, we need only say that, up to the present time, we have been unable to furnish the book as rapidly as we could wish.

We invite attention to the following notices:—

"'Say and Seal' is indeed a true, beautiful home book, that will be read with delight and profit by tens of thousands of our people."—Evening Bulletin.

"The authors have loosed their intellectual wealth to the best purposes. Such books are better than hundreds of more controversional sermons."—R. Shelton Mackenzie.

"Decidedly the best book emanating from the authoress of 'Wide, Wide World.'"—Inquirer.

"A delightful book for the young."—The Press.

"It is superior to 'Wide, Wide World.'"—North American.

For Sale by Booksellers generally, or will be sent by Mail, Postpaid, on receipt of the Price by the Publishers either in Money or Postage Stamps.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,
22 and 24 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia.

!!SOMETHING NEW!!

A HEMMER, TUCKER, FELLER, BINDER, AND GUAGE combined, just patented, simple, hemming any width and thickness of cloth without basting, and to any Sewing Machine by any one in a few minutes. Retail price $5. LIBERAL DISCOUNT TO THE TRADE. Orders by mail supplied, postage paid. Instructions accompany every hemmer. Send for a circular.
UNIVERSAL HEMMER CO.,
427 BROADWAY, N. Y.

To Wholesale Dealers in Jewelry.

The undersigned begs to say that, owing to his unsurpassed facilities, he is able to offer to the Trade Jewelry of any description of the same terms as any other house in New York.

All orders will receive the most careful and prompt attention.

W. A. HAYWARD,
198 Broadway.

LOUISVILLE ARTESIAN WATER.

THIS NATURAL MINERAL WATER, now very extensively used, is for sale by all Druggists.
S. T. THOMPSON, Agent,
No. 623 Broadway.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

For Circulars, address
GEO. F. TUTTLE,
No. 100 Nassau Street, New York.

Brown's Bronchial Troches.

We know of no article which so richly deserves the entire confidence of the community as this. We have noticed the most flattering commendations from the most celebrated Clergymen, Lawyers, and Public Speakers; and we can also speak from personal experience.—Troy Whig.

HOUSEKEEPING HARDWARE,
J. & C. Berrian, No. 601 Broadway,

Are now offering, at very low prices, a full assortment of goods in their line, comprising, among others,

Cutlery of every quality and description.
Silver-Plated Wares.
Tea Trays, to nest and singly, in great variety.
Steel-Bronzed and Iron Wires.
Looking-Glass Plates of every description.
Canes, Whitne and Wood Ware.
Refrigerators, Cream-Freezers, Tin Ware, &c.
Chinese Camphor Wood and Cedar Trunks.
N. B.—Catalogues sent gratis to any address.

Harnden's Express.

—DAILY—

Forwards Valuables and Merchandize to and from, and collects drafts, bills, &c., in all parts of the

EAST, WEST AND SOUTH.

Will receive goods, or orders to "call," at
74 Broadway.

Scrofula, or King's Evil.

One quarter of all our people are scrofulous; their persons are invaded by this lurking infection, and their health is undermined by it. To cleanse it from the system we must renovate the blood by an alterative medicine, and invigorate it by healthy food and exercise. Such a medicine we supply in the most effectual remedy which the medical skill of our times can devise for this every where prevailing and fatal malady. It is combined from the most active remedies that have been discovered for the expurgation of this foul disorder from the blood, and rescue of the system from its destructive consequences. Hence it should be employed for the cure of not only scrofula, but also those other affections which arise from it, such as ERUPTIVE and SKIN DISEASES, ST. ANTHONY'S FIRE, ROSE, or ERYSIPELAS, PUSTULES, BOILS, BLOTCHES, BLAINS and SORES, TUMORS, TETTER and SALT RHEUM, SCALD HEAD, RINGWORM, RHEUMATISM, SYPHILITIC and MERCURIAL DISEASES, DROPSY, DEBILITY, and INDIGESTION, and, indeed, ALL COMPLAINTS ARISING FROM VITIATED OR IMPURE BLOOD. The popular belief in Impurity of the blood is founded in truth, for scrofula is a degeneration of the blood. The particular purpose and virtue of this Sarsaparilla is to purify and regenerate this vital fluid, without which sound health is impossible in contaminated constitutions.

AYER'S
Compound Extract of Sarsaparilla,

PREPARED BY
DR. J. C. AYER & CO.,
LOWELL, MASS.
Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

A New Edition of
ADAM BEDE. By GEORGE ELIOT. 12mo, Muslin, $1.

Attractive NEW BOOKS.

WOMAN (La Femme). By Michelet	$1 00
LOVE (L'Amour). By Michelet	1 00
THE HABITS OF GOOD SOCIETY	1 25
THE GREAT TRIBULATION. 2 vols	2 00

* Sold by all booksellers, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by Rudd & Carleton, Publishers, 130 Grand Street, New York.

$5000 AGENTS WANTED—To sell a new Publication. Agents have made $25.00 on one,—better than all other similar agencies. Send four stamps and get 40 pages specimen, gratis.
EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

IRON IN THE BLOOD.

DYSPEPSIA, SCROFULA, GENERAL DEBILITY.
Affections of the Skin.
Impure Blood.

Why is Iron beneficial in disease?
Why is it administered in so many diseases apparently opposite in their nature?
Why is "PERUVIAN SYRUP," or Protected Solution of Protoxide of Iron combined, better than any other medicinal preparation of Iron?

Since the remarkable cures effected through the Agency of the "PERUVIAN SYRUP" have been made public, the above queries have been frequently repeated to us. They are fully answered in a pamphlet on the "Importance of Iron in the Blood," which can be had on application. The pamphlet contains also numerous certificates of remarkable cures from the highest professional physicians, clergymen and others:

Hon. John Forsyth, Rev. John W. Olmsted,
Rev. Warren Burton, Lewis Johnson, M.D.,
Rev. Arthur B. Fuller, Roswell Hunt, M.D.,
Rev. Aug. E. Pope, S. H. Kendall, M.D.,
Rev. Gordon Dexter, W. H. Chisholm, M.D.,
Rev. Sylvanus Cobb, Francis Dana, M.D.,
Rev. Thos. Whittemore, Jeremiah Jones, M.D.,
Rev. Richard Metcalf, Jose Antonio Sanchez, M.D.,
Rev. M. P. Wilcox, Marcellino Arnedo, M.D.,
Rev. Abn. Jackson, Abraham Wendell, M.D.,
Rev. J. Pierpont, H. E. Kinsley, M.D.,
Rev. Henry Upham, Jose C Espinar, M.D.

Pamphlets had on application to the agent, or to N. L. CLARK & CO., Proprietors, Boston.
Sold by Druggists generally in the United States.
Sold wholesale and Retail by
HARRIS & CO., 429 Broadway.

Cataract Washing-Machine

CLOTHING, TIME, and LABOR SAVED—by the best WASHING MACHINE ever invented, and the only one that operates by the action of the water without RUBBING, and without wearing out clothing. PRICES, $12, $15, and $18. Wholesale Depot, No. 54 Beekman Street, New York. Rights for sale.
SULLIVAN & HYATT.

The Readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY

Can have purchased and forwarded to them, with dispatch, any Article this City affords, by sending their Orders, addressed to WM. S. WYSE, Office HARPER'S WEEKLY.

N. B.—Orders from Ladies will receive the attention of MRS. W. during absence.

30,000 Copies sold since January 1st.

EVERYBODY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS,

BY FRANK CROSBY,
OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR,

Tells you how to draw up Partnership Papers, Bonds and Mortgages, Affidavits, Powers of Attorney, Notes and Bills of Exchange, and gives general forms for agreements of all kinds, Bills of Sale, Leases, Petitions, Receipts and Releases.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the Laws for the Collection of Debts, with the Statutes of Limitation and amount and kind of property exempt from execution, in every State; also how to make an Assignment properly, with forms for Composition with Creditors, and the Insolvent Laws of every State.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the legal relations existing between Guardian and Ward, Master and Apprentice, Landlord and Tenant; also, what constitutes Libel and Slander, and the law as to Marriage Power, the Rights in Property, Divorce and Alimony.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the Law for Mechanic's Liens in every State, and the Naturalization Laws of this country, and how to comply with the same; also the Law concerning Pensions, and how to obtain one, and the Pre-emption Laws to Public Lands.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the Law for Patents, with rules of procedure in obtaining same, with Interferences, Assignments and Table of Fees; also, how to make your Will, and how to Administer on an Estate, with the law and requirements thereof, in every State.

CROSBY'S LAWYER tells you the meaning of Law Terms in general use, and explains to you the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Powers of both the General and State Governments; also, how to keep out of law, by showing how to do your business legally, thus saving a vast amount of property and vexatious litigation by its timely consultation.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS contains 384 pages, printed in a clear and open type, and will be sent by mail, postpaid and post-paid postage paid, to every Farmer, every Mechanic, every Man of Business, and everybody in every State, on receipt of $1 60, or in law style at $1 25.

$1000 A YEAR can be made by engaging in the most surprising new enterprise in existence, in selling the work, as our inducements to all such are unparalleled.

For single copies of the Book, or for terms to agents, with other information, apply to or address

JOHN E. POTTER, Publisher,
No. 617 Sansom St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Rev. W. H. Milburn's New Book.

Pioneers, Preachers and People
OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

By W. H. MILBURN,
Author of "Rifle, Axe, and Saddlebags" and "Ten Years of Preacher Life."

One volume.....Price $1 25.

DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers,
New York.

THE FOLLOWING GEMS FROM THE POETS, illustrated with over 150 Engravings, Lurline, are just published by William Hall & Son, 543 Broadway, New York.

BARCAROLLE. Our barque in moonlight beaming. 50 cents.
ROMANCE. THE SPELL. Flow on, flow on silver Rhine. 50 cents.
ROMANCE. The Night Winds. 75 cents.
BALLAD. Home of my heart. 50 cents.
DO. Gentle Troubadour. 40 cents.
DO. A Father's Love. 40 cents.
BRIDAL SONG. As in the Cup the bead flies up, 50 cents.
RECIT. and ARIA. Sweet Form that on my dreamy path. 50 cents.
BRINDISI. Take this Cup of sparkling Wine. 25c.
Sent by mail on receipt of the market prices.

Rogers' Citrate of Magnesia,

To which we call the attention of Country Druggists and the Public generally. Put up carefully in the form of Powder, to keep in any climate. For sale by all Wholesale Druggists.

Manufactory 193 Spring Street, New York.

AGENTS WANTED

To sell, by subscription, PARTON'S LIFE OF ANDREW JACKSON, to be completed in three large 8vo volumes, with steel Portraits, price in plain binding, $2 50 per volume. This is one of the most salable books ever published in this country. Two volumes are now ready, and the third will be issued next August. It is, consequently, now the best time to canvass for it. NOW BUY THE BEST AGENTS ARE WANTED, and to such liberal commissions are given, with exclusive territory.

Published by

MASON BROTHERS,
Nos. 5 and 7 Mercer Street, New York.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $60.
HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $60 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

Important Invention for married people. For particulars address, inclosing stamp, DR. H. HIRSFIELD, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 489 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have now Ready:

I.
THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.
A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

II.
THE LIFE OF STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS.
By J. W. SHANAHAN. With a Portrait. 12mo, Muslin, 500 pages, $1 00.

III.
PARKE GODWIN'S HISTORY OF FRANCE.
The History of France. From the Earliest Times to the French Revolution of 1789. Vol. I. (Ancient Gaul) 8vo, Muslin, $2 00.

IV.
OLD LEAVES:
Gathered from Household Words. By W. HENRY WILLS. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

V.
THE CAXTONS. (LIBRARY EDITION.)
A Family Picture. By the Right Hon. EDWARD LYTTON, Bart. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 85. (Forming the FIFTH VOLUME of HARPER'S LIBRARY EDITION OF BULWER'S NOVELS.)

VI.
STORIES OF INVENTORS AND DISCOVERERS
In Science and the Useful Arts. A Book for Old and Young. By JACOB ABBOTT. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

VII.
LORD ELGIN'S MISSION TO CHINA AND JAPAN.
Narrative of the Earl of Elgin's Mission to China and Japan. In the Years 1857, '58, '59. By LAURENCE OLIPHANT, Private Secretary to Lord Elgin, Author of the "Russian Shores of the Black Sea," &c., &c. Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $2 75; Half Calf, $3 75.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

VERY FUNNY. Send a Red Stamp for Specimen COMIC NOTHING! 75 cents per year, to J. C. HANEY, 119 Nassau Street, New York.

NOW READY!
THE Atlantic Monthly,
FOR
MAY, 1860!

CONTENTS.

Instinct: My Own Story; The Playmate: The Maroons of Surinam; Circumstance (by the Author of "The Amber Gods" and "Sir Roban's Ghost"); Urania; Mary Somerville; Mrs. Jameson; Thoreau; General Mercado's Expedition; The Professor's Story; Nathaniel Hawthorne.

NOTICES AND LITERARY NOTICES—Le Prince Quitte Edizioni Della Divina Commedia Letterariamente Illustrate; Notes of Travel and Study in Italy; 1. An American Dictionary of the English Language, etc.; 2. A Dictionary of the English Language; Elements of Mechanics, for the use of Colleges, Academies, and High Schools; Stories from Famous Ballads; Mary Lennox, or the Pupils of Marvel Hall; Poems; Title Hunting.

Recent American Publications.

TERMS.—Single numbers, 25 cents. Three Dollars per year, postage paid to any part of the United States.

CLUBS.—Two copies, Five Dollars; Five copies, Ten Dollars; Eleven copies, Twenty Dollars. Subscribers are paying their own postage, viz.: 36 cents per year.

Clergymen, Teachers, and Postmasters will receive the Magazine at Two Dollars per year, as heretofore.

Subscriptions may commence with any number; and as all the numbers are stereotyped, back numbers can always be furnished.

All orders should be addressed to

TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers,
135 Washington Street, Boston.

AN ELEGANT ASSORTMENT OF Paris Spring Millinery and Straw Goods, Flowers and Ribbons, just received by the Steamers Europa, Teutonic, Dunstable; split straw and Paddel braid, at the lowest cash prices, at WM. SIMMONS', 627 Broadway. Wholesale and Retail.

The best Preparation for the Hair ever yet discovered is

DR. FOOTE'S CREME DE MAGNOLIA.

Because it will not dry or injure the hair. Because it will not rub off and soil your bonnet, clothing, or furniture. Because it will not become rancid after being applied to the head. Because it imparts a beautiful lustre, and keeps the hair dark, soft, smooth and glossy, and removes dandruff. Sold by the Druggists. Wholesale Depot, No. 71 Maiden Lane, New York.

The Terri-Bolt of England.—The Cricket Field. A complete manual of Cricket from the last London Edition, the best book on Cricket ever published. With numerous Illustrations. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of $1 00. MASON BROTHERS, Publishers, Boston, Mass.

Choice Music for Small Orchestras.

THE NEW GERMANIA, a Collection of Operatic Airs, Marches, Polkas, Waltzes, Dances and Melodies of the day, arranged for easy performance on five or six Instruments. By F. A. Hurlbut. Price, $1 50. STAR COLLECTION OF MUSIC, for Wind and Stringed Instruments, by J. W. Moore. Price, $1 50. Sent by mail, post paid, on receipt of the price. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES are wanted in four days, use my eugenent established 1862, which will force the beard on a smooth face within the first application, and without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1. Sent by mail, post free, or any address. R. G. GRAHAM, 10 Nassau Street, New York.

J. R. STAFFORD'S OLIVE TAR AND IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS

Should be used by all females suffering from weaknesses, irregularities, or failing of the womb. By a timely application of the Olive Tar over the parts affected, and a daily course of the Powders, the muscles of the body become strengthened, the nervous system invigorated, and power and vitality added to the system. To those near the period of a "change of life" they are invaluable. Sold at 313 Broadway and by all Druggists.

Throat and Lung Diseases.

Of all remedies for Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Influenza, Croup, Whooping Cough, Asthma, Phthisic, Quinsy, Tickling, Irritation, or Inflammation of the Throat, Chest, or Lungs, Incipient Consumption, &c., there is no one which, for safety and efficacy, or which affords such rapid and permanent relief, as the well-known and long-established

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

The only genuine is prepared by SETH W. FOWLE & CO., BOSTON, and is sold everywhere.

FOWLER AND WELLS'S
American and Foreign Patent Agency,
308 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

All kinds of business pertaining to the Patent Office done in the most prompt and satisfactory manner on reasonable terms.

Preservation & Renovation of FURS.

Ladies about putting away their furs, can secure them from moth by using the Dalmatian Fur Preservative. This preparation cleanses and renovates worn furs, making them as fresh as new. It imparts a pleasant aroma; is entirely harmless to the finest fabric, and is applied with the slightest trouble. It is utterly destructive to the moth in all its stages. Sold at the French Perfumery Depot, No. 659 Broadway, opposite Bond St. Sent by mail on the receipt of 65 cents, in stamps, addressed to JULIUS WAGNER, No. 659 Broadway.

DO YOU INTEND TO TRAVEL?—If so, send a stamp and a copy of

NORTON'S HAND-BOOK TO EUROPE,

which you will find a complete guide as to Hotels, Routes, Expenses, etc., etc., with a new Railway Map, for an outline of the Continent. Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of $1. Address

GILBERT NORTON, Publisher and Bookseller for Libraries,
Irving Building, 594 Broadway, New York.

DO YOU INTEND TO REMAIN AT HOME?—If so, secure at once a copy of

NORTON'S HAND-BOOK TO EUROPE,

Giving a complete and perfect view of all the principal cities and places of interest in Europe, including Paris, Egypt, Morocco, and the Mediterranean. Sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of $1. Address as above.

CHARLES B. NORTON, Agent for Libraries,
Irving Building, 594 Broadway, New York.

SECRET ART OF CATCHING FISH as fast as you can pull them out, and no Sunday. Sent for $1. Address Atlas Agency, Providence, R. I.

A GREAT GOSPEL PICTURE.—THE CHEAPEST ENGRAVING EVER PUBLISHED.—DAYTON & CO.'s Magnificent Engraving of THOTWALDSEN'S CELEBRATED STATUES in the Cathedral of Copenhagen, representing CHRIST AND HIS APOSTLES, 26 inches in length and 24 inches in width.

From Rev. Dr. Prime, Editor of New York Observer.

THOTWALDSEN'S GREAT WORK.—One of the pictures hangs in our study, and we regard the work as eminently suitable for the walls of every Christian household.

The religious Press of the country speak in enraptured terms of the work, and recommend its introduction into every family in the land. The proof-sheets were sold at $10 each; but the Publishing every family an opportunity to possess this "instructive picture," the proprietors offer it, with elegant Rose-wood frame, by mail, for $2 25, the 25 cents being for return postage. $1 75 will receive a letter of inquiry with one copy of the Engraving. $4 50 will ensure six pictures, postage free, to one address. Address

DAYTON & CO., 37 Park Row.

LADIES and CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.—THE OLDEST ESTABLISHMENT, the oldest and best in the United States, has always an ample supply of LADIES' and CHILDREN'S CLOTHING. Children's Wardrobes, Hats, Bonnets, and Notes de Chemise. The only establishment where Ladies and Gentlemen can at all times procure the newest and best Styles: S. CHARLES, 439 Broadway, the best talent, both native and foreign, with a supply by each steamer of the newest Fashions. Ladies' Riding Habits supplied at the lowest prices, wholesale and retail, by S. CHARLES, No. 439 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel.

Agents Wanted
To obtain Subscribers for
LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 Pages and 1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

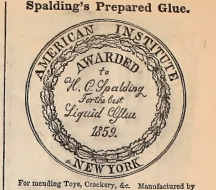
This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to whom a liberal Commercial Discount will be given. Some inducements offered. Applicants should state experience, references, and address. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

NORTON'S OINTMENT
FOR
SALT RHEUM AND SCROFULA,
Permanently cures Tetter, Scaldhead, Ringworms, and all Cutaneous Diseases of the Skin.

This Ointment penetrates to the basis of the disease, goes to its very roots, and never fails to form the flesh beneath to the skin on the surface. Sold in large glass boxes, price 50 cents.



GERRIT NORTON, Original Proprietor, New York.
Depot at PENFOLD, PARKER & SOWERS, No. 15 Beekman Street.

TWO WORKS, VALUABLE TO THE SICK, sent by mail, post paid, on pay expected within 10 days. Address, Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

1st. Six Lectures on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to 100 years. 300 pages, 36 engravings. Price fifty cents, in silver or Post-office stamps.

2d. A work on the Causes and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Fits, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what causes disease. 150 pages, 20 engravings. Price 25 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, State, county, town, and residence.

Spalding's Prepared Glue.

For mending Toys, Crockery, &c. Manufactured by HENRY C. SPALDING & CO.,
No. 45 Cedar Street, N. Y.

CHILTON ON THE CROTON, OR RIVER WATER.

The Displacing Filter, manufactured by McKENZIE & O'HARA, is the kind of pouous Filter to which I alluded in my recent report to the Croton Board. I consider the artificial sandstone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and only requires to be reversed occasionally to insure its action.

CHARLES R. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.

Manufactured and sold by McKENZIE & O'HARA, No. 594 4th Street, corner of Mercer.

The Greatest Medical Discovery of THE AGE.

Dr. Kennedy, of Roxbury, Mass., has discovered a common pasture weed that cures every kind of HUMOR from the worst SCROFULA down to a common pimple.

By strict attention to the direction in the pamphlet around each bottle, and a judicious application of the Salt Rheum Ointment, Healing Ointment, and Scrofula Ointment, CHRONIC and CORRUPT ULCERS are cured in a few weeks.

For sale by every Druggist in the United States.

WANTED.

A FEMALE AGENT IN EVERY CITY AND Town in the United States to sell a patent article required by every woman. Applicants must have at least $30, and furnish good references. Those acquainted with the nature and treatment of consumption preferred. Such persons will find this a profitable undertaking.

Apply to HALSEY & KING,
163 Clark St., Chicago, Ill.

PURE WATER.

United States Carbon Filter Company.

CARBON FILTERS of all sizes and descriptions, adapted to the Hydrant in Dwelling Houses, Factories, etc. Also, a great variety of Portable and Plain Filters for Sportsmen, Travellers, Druggists, &c., &c.

No. 27 Park Row, New York.

LADIES desiring UNDER - LINEN READY MADE will find at the Stores 397 BROADWAY, NEAR READE, the largest assortment, to suit all purses, especially for "EVERY-DAY WEAR," of entirely neat and trustworthy make.

MADAME DALINGS,

215 CANAL STREET, N. Y.,

Has opened a superior assortment of French millinery.

☞ Private Rooms. Patterns Received monthly.

FOREIGN NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS.—Subscriptions received for all foreign Newspapers and Periodicals, English, Scotch, Irish, French, &c. Punctually delivered on arrival of Steamers, or sent by mail to all parts of the U. S. Price lists of One Thousand different publications now ready.

WILLMER & ROGERS, 43 Nassau Street, N. Y.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 10 to 20 pages—and from one third to one half—more reading than any other in the country.

Close of the Tenth Year and Twentieth Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00

And an Extra Copy to the person procuring a Club of Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

The Postage (prepaid) on "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks.....$1 00
One Copy for One Year.....2 50
One Copy for Two Years.....4 00
Five Copies for One Year.....10 00
Twelve Copies for One Year.....20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year.....40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $4 00.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise by the Month or Quarter.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

LA MODE—THE ZOUAVE JACKET.

MISS STOUT. "Well now, dear, I call it charming, and shall most certainly have one Myself!"

FITZ FLINT (who hates dancing, but adores Lucy Brabazon) feels he must do the agreeable, and so says: "Do you prance this time, Miss Brabazon?"

A Card.—$100.

The undersigned will pay ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS for the best POEM descriptive of Rembrandt Peale's Painting of "THE COURT OF DEATH," the Poem to consist of not more than 100 lines—the award to be made by three distinguished American Poets (to be hereafter named) on or about the 4th of July next. The names of the authors to be covered by seal till after the decision, and only the selected one to be made public.

Address G. Q. COLTON,
No. 37 Park Row, New York.

Court of Death.

This sublime Painting, by REMBRANDT PEALE, is now on exhibition at the

Cooper Institute,

From 3 to 5½ and 7 to 9½ o'clock P. M. Description given at 4 and 8. Admission, 25 cents. FAC-SIMILE COLORED ENGRAVINGS of the Painting (size, 23 by 31 inches) may be obtained of the subscriber at the unprecedented low price of $1. Mail subscribers will add four letter stamps to pay postage. Engravings rolled and sent with perfect safety. They may also be obtained at the Exhibition, Cooper Institute.

Letters should be addressed G. Q. COLTON,
P. O. Box, No. 3,321 No. 37 Park Row, New York.

BASE BALL. BASE BALL.

Send 25 cents, and we will send you by mail The Base Ball Player's Pocket Companion, containing the latest Rules and Regulations for both the Mass, and New York Games. Illustrated.

MATHEW & BAKER, Publishers, Boston, Mass.

MORE VALUABLE THAN GOLD.

DR. WAISWORTH'S DEW DROP FOR THE CATARRH.—A newly-discovered, perfect and speedy cure for catarrh, nasal disease, in its worst form. Twenty cases of catarrh, severe or slight, the disease should be removed as soon as possible, for it gives rise to hoarseness, sometimes in the windpipe, dry cough, chronic inflammation of the lungs, dizziness, dull pain in the head, with a sensation of weight over the eyes, loss of the senses of smelling and tasting, and various painful neuralgic affections. There is not any mistake about the above remedy, and it may be had of the subscriber, General Agent for the United States and the Canadas.

H. H. BURNETON, Providence, R. I.

Price $1 00 per bottle, with full directions. Sold in N. Y. by Dudley & Stafford, Bookmen Street; F. C. Wells & Co., Franklin Street; J. Aitken, 199 Hudson Street; and by Druggists generally.

SENT BY EXPRESS EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices.

Made to Measure at $18 per doz. or Six for $10.

MADE OF NEW-YORK MILLS MUSLIN,

With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2.50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I cannot make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts

20 yards of New-York Mills muslin at 14½c. per yd.	$4 35
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard	3 50
Making and cutting	6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c.	1 50
Profit	3 65
Total	$18 00

Self Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

The Express charges on one dozen Shirts from New-York to New Orleans is about $1.

WARD, from London,

387 Broadway, up stairs,

Between White & Walker Streets, NEW-YORK.

Please copy my address as other houses in the city are selling inferior made shirts at my prices.

We have again on Hand

The Celebrated English Telescopes,

4 inches long, by which a person may be clearly seen and known at 3½ miles, and an object at 12 to 14 miles distant, and with an extra astronomical eye-piece, Jupiter's moons, Saturn's rings, and double stars are distinctly seen.

They are used in England by SPORTSMEN and GAME-KEEPERS, and are adopted by the English government for the

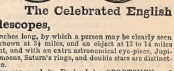
Coast Guard Service

as

Day and Night Glasses,

which we offer complete for $30.

Also,



Waistcoat Pocket Double Glasses,

Weighing only 4 ounces, containing 12 lenses, will show any person at the distance of 2½ miles with sufficient distinctness to know them.

The price of this instrument, in morocco case, is $25.

Semmons & Co.,

No. 699½ Broadway,
Under Lafarge House, New York.

Dr. Kinne's Improved Self-Adjusting Truss.

A new article, peculiarly adapted to every variety of rupture, and for cleanliness and comfort, as well as retention of rupture, unequalled. Any purchaser may wear it one week, and then return it if not perfectly satisfied, and get back his money. Pamphlets with full particulars may be had gratis from

KINNE & PHILLIPS,
New York, 193 Broadway.

Spring Fashions.

RICH BLACK SILK MANTLES.

DEEP SILK SACQUES,

STRIPED CLOTH BURNOUS FOR SPRING.

An elegant variety.

JOHN J. BENSON,
310 Canal Street, New York, opposite Mercer.

Wheeler & Wilson's SEWING MACHINE.

WHO WRITES FOR IT?

Send for a Circular and see!

Office 505 Broadway, New York.

ASTHMA. For the INSTANT RELIEF and PERMANENT CURE of this distressing complaint, use

KENDE'S BRONCHIAL CIGARETTES.

Made by C. B. SEYMOUR & CO., 197 NASSAU ST., N. Y. Price, $1 per box; sent free by port.

LONDON and PARIS WORLD of FASHION.—Monthly—Price $1 a year—Single copies 10 cents—arrives here about the twelfth of each month. The best and most reliable for Fashions extant. Every number contains four colored Fashion Plates, and one plain Millinery, and a full size paper pattern cut out ready for use.

WILMER & ROGERS, 49 Nassau Street, N. Y.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

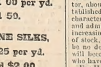
G. M. BODINE, 481 Broadway.

Great Sale of Rich Silks.

1000 PIECES,
At 75 c., 89 c., 90 c., and $1 00 per yd.
Worth $1 00 and $1 50.

800 PIECES RICH CHENE SILKS,
At $1 00, $1 12½ and $1 25 per yd.
Worth $1 50, $1 75 and $2 00.

The Greatest Inducements ever offered.



A Friend in Need. Try it.

Reed's Infallible Liniment is prepared from the recipe of Dr. Stephen Reed, of Connecticut, the great bone setter, and has been used in his practice for the last twenty years with the most astonishing success. As an external remedy it is without a rival, and will alleviate pain more speedily than any other preparation. For all Rheumatic and Nervous Disorders it is truly infallible, and as a curative for Sores, Wounds, Sprains, Bruises, &c., its soothing, healing and powerful strengthening properties, excite the just wonder and astonishment of all who have ever given it a trial. Over four hundred certificates of remarkable cures, performed by it, within the last two years attest this fact.

MILLS & ALLEN, Gen'l Agents, 46 Cliff St., N. Y.

$1500 per year. Agents Wanted. Send Stamp to Box 3871, Chicago, Ill.

Important to every man who keeps

THORLEY'S FOOD FOR CATTLE.

This artificially prepared Food for animals was invented and introduced to the British people, by the Proprietor, about three years since, and it has now become established as a legitimate article of commerce, its useful character and beneficial effects being generally recognized and admitted. The sale has been constantly and rapidly increasing, not only among Agriculturists and breeders of stock, but with the public in general; and there can be no doubt that, as its merits are better understood, it will become an article of universal consumption by all who have an interest in domestic animals.

For Horses it is Indispensable in Promoting and Sustaining all the Animal Functions in Health and Vigor. For Milch Cows it is Invaluable, increasing the Quantity and improving the Quality of Milk. For Beasts nothing can compare with it for Feeding quickly. For Sheep and Hogs, the effects produced in one month will exceed all expectation.

In feeding Domestic Animals, the addition of this food may be attended with a subtraction of other food, to the extent of one-third, thereby producing its application one of economy; while, at the same time, it materially assists the digestive powers of every animal in extracting a larger amount of nourishment from the ordinary food, which would otherwise be lost, consequent upon the impaired or defective action of these organs.

Sold in packs containing 448 feeds, price $14, and half packs, containing 224 feeds, price $7.

Orders executed promptly and carefully.

Consignees Depot 21 Broadway, New York.

A pamphlet will be sent to any address, free of all expense, on application being made for the same.

White's Trusses. PATENT LEVER TRUSS AND SUPPORTER White's Trusses.

HERNIA AND UTERINE DISEASE CURED.

An illustrated pamphlet containing all information sent free to any one by addressing BARNES & PARK, General Agents, Nos. 13 and 19 Park Row, New York.

English Carpeting.

ENGLISH MEDALLION,
ENGLISH VELVET BRUSSELS,
THREE-PLY & INGRAIN CARPETS,
Oil-Cloths, Rugs, Mats, Matting, Table and Piano Covers, Druggets, &c.,
AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

HIRAM ANDERSON,
Ten spacious Salesrooms, 99 Bowery.
(Sign of Gold Eagle.)

N. B. English Brussels, 75 cents to 85 cents per yard. Ingrain Carpets, 25 cents to 60 cents.

Orders executed promptly.

Winant's Excelsior Billiard Tables,
Manufactory 71 Cliff Street, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IV.—No. 175.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

ONLY FOR SOMETHING TO SAY.

"Not engaged? I'm so glad. Will you talk with me, then?
An oasis for me in this desert of crowd:
Blest be the blindness of dancing men,
And Laurent for playing so loud!
And as you came with the Ardeley set?
Do you like them? listen and never forget,
Do those men listen and never forget,
And never again be in fancy free?
I scarce remember'd you, fair as you are,
And you'll learn as brightly when I am gone—
Careless that thoughts of a vanished star
Make a starless night so lone.
It may take one flower before I go—
One little bud to tell of the giver?
Oh yes, it will die in a day, I know,
But the memory—never—never?"
An innocent spirit that knew not pain,
A sweet sunny brow that was stranger to sorrow,
May ponder and dwell on such words again,
Half-glad, half-sad, to-morrow.
Nay, buoyy bird, never pine. Among
The falsest and gayest be fair and gay,
Spite of homage wrung from a flattering tongue,
Only for something to say.

"That last value yours, Sir? Certainly, no.
Have I not kept the very next two?
And should I have kept and remember'd them so
For any one else but you?
Oh, I'll not praise you for dancing in time,
And talking better than all the rest;
But because it is so I think it no crime
To like you for a partner best.
Why did you look, when I danced with Sir John,
With a look as black as a storm of thunder,
And now put your drawing-room manners on,
And your brightest face, I wonder?
Well, will you take me to have some tea?
Dear, how fresh it is on the stair!
You're not too engaged to stay with me
A minute or two in the air?"
A look that had scorned the tenderest guile,
A heart that deem'd itself stern and strong,
Is bent to the light of a Psyche smile,
And chain'd by a siren-song.
He, there, Sir Knight, unconsquer'd yet—
Rover so long, are you caught to-day
In the soft snare set by a clever coquette,
Only for something to say?

"HEARTS MAY BE BROKEN BY LIGHT WORDS SPOKEN."

'Tis a glorious prowess, in sooth, with a word
To wound the trusting, and tame the proud,
Even as a leaf by a breath is stirr'd,
A spray by a dew-drop bow'd.
And so the battle goes bravely through,
And heart gets hardest as tongue flows free,
And swells the blazon, "I conquer you,
Lest you should conquer me."
Fight on, brave souls, 'tis a noble strife—
Play on, rosy lips, 'tis a merry game—
Tourney for tourney, and life for life,
Weapons and lists the same.
Since language was framed but to hide the thought (Moral as deep as the proverb is old),
Since daily the delicate miracle's wrought,
Hourly the legend told,
You will surely own it an idle creed,
Frivolous gallant and faithless maid,
That forbids the victim to suffer and bleed,
For one vain hour's parade;
You will surely deny by the evidest token
Of trophy on trophy won day by day,
That hearts may be broken by light words spoken—
Only for something to say.

RATS IN THE HOSPITALS.

We give herewith a picture of the beds in Bellevue Hospital, in this city, in one of which the newborn child of Mary Connor was eaten by rats on Monday morning, 23d ult. The artist has peopled the scene, so as to bring its horrors vividly before the public mind. That it is no exaggeration the published evidence proves. All the hospital authorities state that the building is swarming with rats, as many as forty having been killed in a bathtub in one evening; and Mary Connor herself mentions that, in her agony, she felt them running over her body. The following is Alexander Hadden's account of what he pleased to call the "unpleasant occurrence."

THE DOCTOR'S ACCOUNT.

"Mary Connor, an unmarried woman, aged thirty-one years, was admitted to Bellevue Hospital Sunday afternoon. She stated that she expected to be confined soon, but could not specify how soon. Up to the period of admission to the hospital she had been engaged in housecleaning, working very hard every day. She had no pains, and made no complaint. She talked somewhat to the ward appointed to women who come here to wait their confinement. The ward was occupied on the floor by twenty other women patients, and by the nurse, who had charge of the ward. At six o'clock Monday morning I was called by the nurse to see a woman. I went immediately to the ward, found the woman, who was expected by the nurse to be soon confined, as follows: Lying on a bed between two other beds, not five feet from either; both beds were occupied by waiting women. I asked of her condition; she stated she thought her child was born. I immediately examined and found the child beneath the hips of the mother, in a fainting condition, and mutilated, apparently, by rats. In the position in which the child was life could not have existed for a few moments. The mutilation, without doubt, occurred after the death of the child. She stated that she considered herself a healthy ill to a patient on her left, but thought she would be worse before she was better, and did not like to remain here for fear. She felt sleepy, and was conscious at one time that something was running over her. Which she supposed to be a rat. She left which: the doctor came to me in the morning as soon as the nurse sent for him; I was born in County Dublin, Ireland.

THE SICK WOMEN IN BELLEVUE HOSPITAL, NEW YORK, OVERRUN BY RATS.

The new Commissioners have taken up the matter. They have work before them of the intend to do their duty. Not only the rats but the officials need some sweeping out.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1860.

THE BRUTAL PRIZE-FIGHT.

WE publish this week, as part of the news to the readers of which this paper is devoted, an engraving of the brutal and bloody prize-fight which lately took place in England between Tom Sayers and John C. Heenan. We need not say that we regret its appearance in our columns. Unfortunately, the subjects which we illustrate are not of our choosing: we are bound to supply the public with what they want, and we have no power to control their choice. We therefore give the prize-fight just as we should give any other matter of news which happened to impress the public attention.

But this is a column in which the opinion of Harper's Weekly may be freely expressed; and we will express it in such a manner that it shall not be misunderstood. A notion has latterly gone abroad, under very promising auspices, that prize-fighting is a manly and reputable institution; that it is calculated to improve the physical capacity of our people; and that the existing prejudice against it is the offspring of ecant and cant. Against that notion we desire to enter an emphatic protest. We believe prize-fighting to be a degrading, brutal, and shameful practice; we consider the prize-ring a natural result of pugilistic training; and we do not believe that pugilism is in the least degree calculated to do good, which alone can hardly fail to do evil.

The tree must be judged by its fruits. In this country prize-fighters are generally notorious bullies, blackguards, and rowdies. When Morrissey, the hero of a knock-down, drag-out scrape, Heenan was one of the bullies who drove the last Democratic Convention out of the hall at Syracuse, and nearly killed old Mr. Bryant, who also killed Poole; Cunningham, Mullaghan, Price, Kelly, and their fellows are perpetually appearing before our police courts charged with some offense or other. These are the kings of the prize-ring in the United States. Their life is one continual scene of riot, debauchery, brutality, and crime. They live by trading on the vile sale of adulterated liquors in rum holes or upon the wages paid them by politicians for bullying honest voters at the polls. In their own words, they "travel on their muscle"—modern Robin Hoods and Dick Turpins; but without a particle of the chivalry which redeemed the one, or a trace of the generosity which created sympathy for the other. Generally speaking, they seldom venture abroad—with all their strength and all their skill—without a pistol or a knife concealed in their clothing. Their habits are brutal; their associations licentious; their conduct disgraceful; their whole career blackguardly.

Perhaps some one will say that the vices of American prize-fighters are peculiar to this country, and that in England the ring is purer. Look again at the facts. The highest aim in London prize-fighter is to keep a tavern where bullies congregate and blackguards get drunk. This is the climax of a successful champion's career. Broken-down pugilists like Barkley waste rhodomontading letters about the nobility of the prize-ring, and its restoration to its ancient splendor. The fact is that Berkeley was long since thrust out of the society of decent people, and would be well pleased to drag the world down into the mire in which he wallows. For a generation at least civilization has made real progress in England, and pugilism has ceased to be reputable. No man of character has any thing to do with it. The Tipton Slasher and the Durham Ox live with men like themselves—coarse and brutal in their tastes, vagabond in habit, and far beyond the pale of decent society. Some Americans who have visited them and formed sympathizes with prize-fighters, therefore prize-fighting is approved by Englishmen of station. This is just as ridiculous as it would be to assume that cheating and swindling are established institutions here because members of Congress sometimes cheat and bully. The lords and baronets who patronize the ring in England are nobodies—outcasts from society —as thorough blackguards as the lowest shoulder-hitter in New York. They can not help being silent.

The idea that the prize-ring is a manly institution, and that prize-fighting has a tendency to improve the physical power of the race, will not bear examination. It is true that the men whose inevitable fruits are ruffianism, cheating, drunkenness, debauchery, idleness, and crime, are often very strong men; but a prize-fight which did not bring forth these fruits? The boldest blackguards in New York trembled at the ruffianly display at the fight between Morrissey and Heenan. The fear of the police disputed bets, and the drunken carouses, and shameful lasciviousness which followed that event are positively sickening to respectable "sporting circles." If this be manliness—if a man can not be manly without coming into contact with such enormities—then, in God's name, let us try to be Unmanly. But it is an outrage to call such infamies manly. Manliness implies the very opposite of these things. It means courage, not pistolling and knifing. It means honesty, not cheating, sobriety and good conduct, not drunkenness and ruffianism, industry and good citizenship, not sloth and riot and profligacy. Peter Hackett, who broke one of the ribs of Australian Kelly, by the council of his quick-eyed second he aimed every subsequent blow at the point where the ribs were broken and the lungs unprotected to tear the antagonist's lungs and heart, till the wretched creature almost screamed with the agony—with this mere manliness, what is it to be unmanly?

There can be no question but the course of exercise pursued by boxers in training for a prize-fight is one which develops their muscle to the best advantage. They live soberly, regularly, and regularly; they take a great quantity of wholesome exercise, and avoid all excesses. Nothing can be better. But what does this prove? Simply that there are occasions when ruffians find themselves obliged to forswear their evil habits for a time, and become manly and sober. The fact that prize-fighting is right because one of its incidents is wholesome is very illogical. Nothing can be more admirable than the physical training which Professor Wells, the famous pedestrian, the Marquis of Waterfillers, possessed a marvelous power of endurance; but Professor Webster, the murderer of Dr. Parkman; the stories of the physical power of Spanish Main fill us with admiration for their skill and courage, but not for their morality; but, for all this, does any one want to become a Thug, or a poisoner, or an assassin, or a pirate? The rules observed by boxers in training are simply those which every prudent man will follow in his everyday life. To take plenty of open-air exercise; to develop each and every muscle in the body; to avoid the whole some, digestible food; to drink moderately, and to avoid spirituous liquors; to go to bed early and rise early—is not this what our doctors tell every one of us? Why, then, is prize-ring fun what is dinned into our ears by our medical men from the time we leave the nursery till we die here?

This journal has always insisted on the importance of physical exercise. We attach immense importance to it. We hold that the development of the body is of equal importance as the development of the mind; and we should be glad to see some of the Greek and some of the prowdy classes in our colleges discarded, and foot-ball and cricket or rowing substituted in their place. We think every business-man should go to a gymnasium or take some violent exercise daily. But boxing is by no means the exercise to be recommended. It is very inferior—as a means of developing the strength—to foot-ball, or rowing, or cricket, or fencing. It calls into play fewer muscles than any of these, and does not try the muscles it does exercise fairly and regularly. Boxing strains as much as it develops. Every blow are apt to do serious mischief; a sudden violent shock may do more harm in a second than a month's careful training can do good. Moreover, pugilists must expect to have battered noses and discolored eyes; happy if their ribs are all right, and no disease of the kidneys be engendered by continual damage. Who ever knew an old prize-fighter? As to strength, where is the pugilist who can lift as heavy a weight as Dr. Winship, who never fought in his life?

If, then, pugilism is neither beneficial as a physical exercise, nor tolerable in view of its inevitable immoral tendencies; what shall be said of the general and engrossing interest that has been felt in the combat between Sayers and Heenan? The other evenings refined and enlightened audiences was assembled in the Academy of Music to hear a charming opera by Flotow; the music was exquisite, the singers were doing their best, the interest was at its climax, when, suddenly, at the doors, a cry arose that an extra of a sporting paper was offered for sale containing the particulars of the prize-fight, and in ten minutes the house was empty. The men and who entered the ovation cleared three or four thousand dollars, and sold 30,000 copies of his paper in a few hours. Nor is this interest confined to this country: the most snobbish and aristocratic of the London weeklies—the Saturday Review—had an article the other day commending the spirit of the poor wretches who fought for the prize—as though every one did not know they were mere hired gladiators. What are we to infer from these facts? What can be inferred but that the moral perceptions of the age are less acute than optimists fancy, and that the old leaven of brutality still constitutes a large part of our character? This is a matter which philosophers and ministers should ponder deeply and honestly. Moralists must be writing and clergymen must be preaching with more vigor and power than the bulk of the people of England and America are heart and soul engrossed in a fight compared to which a Spanish bull-bait is a mild and diverting pastime. If we are to believe so many pulpits and so many sermons if the brutal prize-fighter is the hero of the day? With what feelings can the clergy, with what feelings can the press contemplate the enormous interest in the battle of five

THE LOUNGER.

"OUR CIVILIZATION."

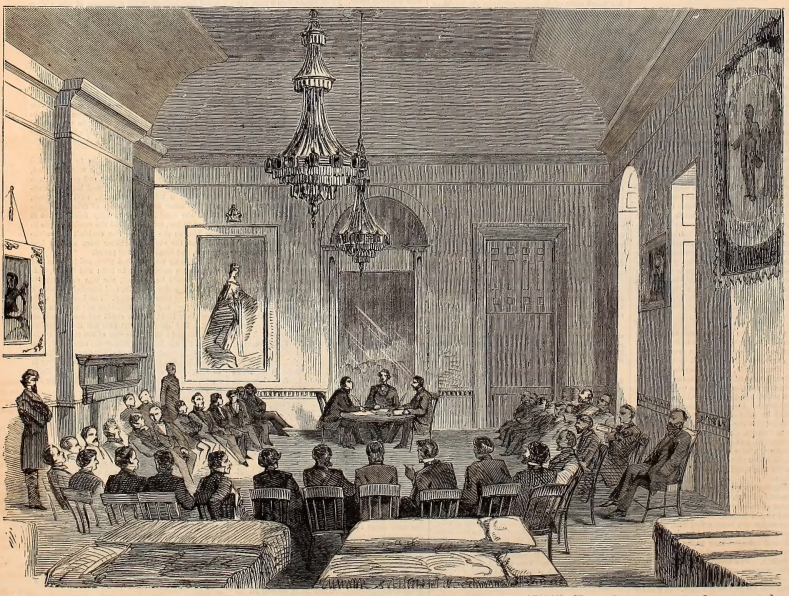
The Japanese Ambassadors are coming. They are to be entertained by "the city." "The city" is to take them in carriages to see the Institutions By all means let it be done; and we may be very sure that the most truly worthy guests give of the exhibition will not be less interesting in Japan than the first accounts of the splendid city of Jeddo were to us when they were published two years ago. The illustrious guests will arrive at the time of the anniversaries. Our morality and philanthropy will be in full feather. If the Japanese diplomatists are of a poetic turn they may fancy that our self-congratulatory charity expands itself upon their arrival, as the well-fed peacock spreads his gorgeous tail as the visitor drives up the avenue by the lawn.

"The city" must not forget one institution. The visitors must surely go and see the Bellevue Hospital. They are barbarians—they don't wear black hats—the sacred creatures wear satin clothes; let us bear with them good-humoredly although they are not civilized; and therefore, by all means, let them be taken in the city hacks (probably the poor savages never ride in hacks) to the Bellevue Hospital—our grand charity—our pride—our "institution"—that they may see what civilization can do. And please to show them particularly the "waiting-room" in which Mary Connor, on the verge of confinement, was placed on Sunday evening a week ago; and please to point out the bed on which, during the night, all alone in her agony, the poor woman suffered the horrible pangs of child-birth; and please to mention to the sallow barbarians from Japan that, when Mary Connor threw herself upon the rate cause and devoured the nose, the upper lip, the toes, and half the left foot of the new-born infant, so that when the doctor came early in the morning the child was dead—well out of the scrape of our noble public charitable institutions.

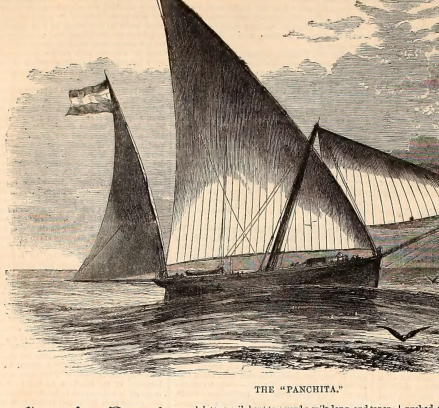
Then, please, drive the barbarians on to see the Academy of Music, and let the envoys of Japan perceive the complacent manner in which we subscribe thousands of dollars to ameliorate the barbarisms of China and Siam and the islands of the Indian Ocean. Imagine your tears, Conscript Fathers! with what a flow of illustrious strangers, as you hear recited the sufferings of Crim Tartary, the woes of Thibet. Then return to hum-and-vichoes and compliments over your banquet—sip, sup with maudlin pride a toast to the prosperity and increasing renown of our noble charities. Before the ladies withdraw let some portly and fatherly eloquent Conscript Father point out to the Japanese philosophers the ingratitude of man, remarking how many of dollars in that poor people hate public charity, and even recoil from the Bellevue Hospital.

ANOTHER WORD WITH THE JAPANESE EMBASSADORS.

BEFORE you proceed to convict us of utter public heartlessness and barbarity, please to observe that we have partially awakened to the enormity of the abominations practiced in our name and in that of public charity, and that we are making a strenuous effort to be tolerably decent in the world's eye and estimation. We have just inaugurated a new system, and hope to see some new results. It was the President's misfortune, not his fault, that he died on the beautiful day which was allotted, we true, the day after the shocking affair of Mary Connor, that he'll highly esteemed their professional services to the unfortunate sufferers of those unfortunates intrusted to their medical and surgical supervision." The President is a great joker, but this, its good deal, was even a great joke. It was the ordinary compliment, and unquestionably he spoke of what was implied by the character and ability of the individuals to whom he was addressing, and of what the new commission means to effect.



The whole business evidently needs the most tremendous purgation. The scandalous exposures that were made some time since in regard to the iniquity of the old commission were clearly faithful. There is good ground for believing that the was affecting



SLEEPING-ROOM OF THE NORTHWESTERN DELEGATION, HIBERNIAN HALL, CHARLESTON.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN ARTIST.]

THE CONVENTION.

WE present herewith two pictures from Charleston—one of Mayor Wood's committee-room; the other of the head-quarters of the Douglas delegations from the Northwestern States. It will be seen that both parties were in close quarters—the Wood men have their beds beside them, and Mr. Douglas's friends are packed pretty close. It seems, however, that the Democrats have not flocked to Charleston in as large crowds as was expected. One correspondent says that preparations were made for 15,000 visitors, and that there will not be half as many. Others doubt whether the whole number present will exceed 3000. So much for $5 a day board.

MEETING OF THE REJECTED WOOD DELEGATION IN THEIR COMMITTEE-ROOM, ST. ANDREW'S HALL, CHARLESTON.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE "PANCHITA."

Captain Brand,

OF THE

SCHOONER "CENTIPEDE,"

A PIRATE OF EMINENCE IN THE WEST INDIES:

His Loves and Exploits,

TOGETHER WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF THE SINGULAR MANNER BY WHICH HE DEPARTED THIS LIFE.

BY LIEUT. H. A. WISE, U.S.N.
(HARRY GRINGO),
AUTHOR OF "LOS GRINGOS" AND "TALES FOR THE MARINES."

ILLUSTRATED BY
C. PARSONS AND A. LUMLEY.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

CHAPTER X.

AN ANCIENT MARINER WITH ONE EYE.

"THE Panchita has passed Mangrove Point," came in the hoarse whisper from the signalman. "You can see her now from below, Sir." Captain Brand put on a fine Panama hat, and stepped out on the veranda, where, with a cigar in his mouth, he leaned over the balustrade and kept sharp watch on every thing that was going on below him. In a few minutes a long pointed brown bowsprit protruded itself beyond the wall of rocks, followed by a great triangular lateen sail, bent to a yard a mile long, and tapering away like a fly-fishing rod, where, at the end, was a short bit of yellow and red pennant. As her bows came into view they showed above a curved prow falling inboard, with a huge bunch of sheepskin for a chafing mat on the knob, and a thin red streak along the wales, on a lead-colored ground, above her copper, which was painted green. As more of her proportions came into the picture you saw a stout stump of a mast, raking forward, with short black ropes of purchases for hoisting the single yard, and heavy square blocks close down to the foot of the mast. When this great sail had come out from the screen of rocks another light stick of a mast stood up over the taffrail, with another lateen sail and whip stem of a yard, to which was bent the Spanish Colonial Guarda Costa flag. In fact, she was a Spanish felucca all over, from stem to stern, and truck to water-line. A few dingy hammocks were stowed about half-way along her rail, and there were a good many men moving about her decks in getting the cable clear; and a lot more clinging like so many lizards along the bending yard, and all in some attempt at uniform dress, in readiness to roll up the sail when the anchor was down. There was a long brass gun, too, burnished like gold, on a pivot slide, with all its equipment, trained muzzle forward in front of the mainmast. No sooner had she sagged into the open basin, with her immense sail hanging flat and heavy in the light air, than a boat from the schooner boarded her, and presently she let go an anchor. There were a few coarse compliments and greetings exchanged between the crews of the two vessels, and some rough jokes made, as the last-comer veered out the chain, rolled up his sails, and set taut his running gear in quite a tidy and man-of-way style.

"God, be with you, Don Ignacio, and say I shall be happy to see him," cried Captain Brand from the pinzza to a man at the cove; "and tell him," continued he, "that I should have called in person, but I can't bear the hot sun since I caught the fever. Take my pig."

This was said in Spanish, and when he had finished speaking he shaded his face behind the curtain and scowled.

"You're a bird of ill omen, my one-eyed friend; but one of these days I'll wipe out old scores, and now once too, perhaps," Captain Brand muttered to himself; and from his murderous expression of face he seemed just the man to carry out his threat. Meanwhile a light whale-boat of a pig, manned by four men and a coxswain, pushed off from the shore, and in three strokes of the oars she was alongside the felucca. The coxswain stepped over the low rail, and walking aft, turned down a cuddy of a cabin, took off his hat, and delivered his message. A minute later he again got into the boat, and pulled to the cove, where he said to the Captain,

"Don Ignacio says he'll come in his own boat when he's ready."

"Buena!" was responded aloud; and then to himself: "Don't ask or receive favors—eh? What an old file the brute is!"

He said no more, but watched. Presently a small man came up out of the cabin of the Panchita, but so very slow, and with such a quiet motion, did he emerge, that one might suppose it was a wary animal rather than a human being. He was scrupulously neat in attire—a brown pair of linen trowsers, a Marseilles vest with gold filigree buttons, an embroidered shirt bosom, with diamond studs, and a dark navy-blue broadcloth coat, with standing collar and anchor gilt buttons. His headgear was simply a white chip hat, with a very narrow brim and a fluttering red ribbon; but beneath it his coal-black hair behind was chopped as close as could be, leaving a single long and well-oiled ringlet on each side, which curled like snakes around a pair of large gold rings pendent from his ears. His complexion was dark, lillous, and swarthy, with a thin, sharp nose, and a million of minute wrinkles, all meeting above, at the corners, and under a small line of a mouth; quite like rays, in fact, and only relaxed when the lips parted to show a few ragged, rotten pegs of sharp teeth. But perhaps the most noticeable feature in his face was his eye—for he had but one—and the spot where the other is seen in the species was merely a red, closed patch of tightly drawn skin, with a few hairs sticking out like iron tacks. His single eye, however, was a jet black, round, piercing organ, which seemed to do duty for half a dozen ordinary glims, and danced with a sharp, malevolent scrutiny, as if the owner was always in search of something, and never found it; and every body and every thing appeared to slink out of its light wherever it glanced around. His age might have been any where from forty to sixty. As he stepped on deck, clear of the cuddy cabin hatch, his sinister optic played about in its socket—now scanning the long brass gun, the half-furled sails, the crew, the ropes, or taking a steady, unwinking glance at the mid-day sun, and then shifting off to the shore and sweeping in the Centipede, the little pool of blue water, and the mouth of the inlet. Feeling apparently satisfied with the present aspect of affairs, he slowly pulled out a machero from his waistcoat-pocket, plucked a cigaretto from the case, and then proceeded deliberately to strike a light. Even while performing this simple operation his uneasy orb, like unto a black bull's-eye, traversed about in its habitual way; and when he raised the spark of fire with his brown, thin hand, and the claws of fingers lended with rings, he seemed to be looking into his own mouth. Nodding to a fellow who stood near, with a crimson sash around his waist, he inclined his eye toward the shore, blew out a thin wreath of smoke from his lungs—all the while his vigilant organ shining like a burning spark of lambent jet through the smoke—and merely said,

"The boat?"

In a moment a small cockle-shell of a punt was lowered from the stern of the felucca, when, stepping carefully in, he seized a scull, and with a few vigorous twists pushed her to the landing at the cove.

During all these movements of the commander of the felucca Captain Brand was by no means an inattentive observer; and indeed he was so extremely critical that he stuck the tube of a powerful telescope through an aperture of the curtains around him, and not only looked at his cautious visitor, but he actually watched the expression of his uneasy eye, and almost counted every wrinkle—finely engraved as they were—on his swarthy visage; but if Captain Brand's own visage reflected an index of his mind, he did not seem over and above pleased with what he saw.

"Has a bandile of papers under his arm! I can see the hilt of that delicate blade, too, sticking out from his wristband. Ah! I've seen him throw that short blade from his coat-sleeve and strike a dollar at twenty yards! Wonderful skill with knives you have, Don Ignacio; but you never yet tried your knack with me! Oh no, my Tuerto—bird of ill omen that you are! We can't do without one another, though, just yet; so let us wait and see what's in the wind!"

Soliloquizing these remarks, Captain Brand withdrew his telescope as the commander of the felucca approached, and, with a cheerful smile, waited to receive him. A few moments later the one-eyed individual mounted the rope-ladder stair-way, carefully feeling the strands, however, and looking suspiciously around him as he stepped lightly on the piazza.

"Ah! compadre mio!" exclaimed Captain Brand, in Spanish, as he seized his visitor by the flipper, and squeezed his fingers till the pressure of his valuable rings made him wince, as he was led into the large and spacious saloon, while at the same time the Captain gave him a hearty slap between his narrow shoulders.

"HE TOUCHED THE BELL OVERHEAD AS HE SPOKE, AND, PUTTING HIS MOUTH TO THE TUBE, ASKED, 'ANY THING IN SIGHT?'"

"THE DOCTOR DREW NIGH, AND, GENTLY PUSHING ASIDE THE CURTAIN, STOOD LOOKING AT THE CHILD," ETC.

"Ah! compadre! How goes the friend of my soul?"

The small man gave no symptoms of joy at this warm greeting; but screwing his wiry frame out of the Captain's caresses, his eye finished like a spark of fire quickly up and down and all around the apartment, as if making a mental inventory of the furniture, and not omitting his tall companion from the crown of his head to the toes of his straw slippers, when he quietly remarked through his closed teeth,

"Como estamos V——" "How are we?"

"Ah, Don Ignacio, poco bueno, poco malo! Half and half. Just getting well over that maldito attack of Yellow Jack."

"Hum! more bad than good. No. I've brought you some letters from the agent at Havana."

"Thanks—thanks, my friend. How! Babette! Babette! Some aniscite for Don Ignacio. Presto! my good Baba. There; that will do!" he said, merrily, as the liqueur and glasses were placed on the table. "And don't omit the turtle soup for dinner, and tell Lascar Joe to make it. Ah! I forgot—the best cook I had—the devil's making soup of him now. However, do the best you can, my Baba, and let us have dinner about sunset."

Then turning to his visitor, with a graceful bow and a laugh, he added: "And well have the Doctor to dine, too, and tell how he cut off our poor friend Gibbs's leg with a hand-saw. Dios! amigo! Capital joke, 'pon my honor!" Captain Brand's honor! Lord have mercy upon us! And he had very few jokes and never told one himself.

"How?" replied the Tuerto, in the pause of the conversation. "There's better jokes than that to hear. Look!"

With this brief rejoinder he threw a bundle of newspapers on the table, and pulling out a packet of letters from a breast-pocket, pitched it toward his host. Then helping himself to a thimbleful of anisette, he took off his narrow-brimmed ship hat for the first time, polished up his eye a bit with the knuckle of his fore-finger, and looked at his companion fixedly.

"Letters, I see, from our old friend Moreno, at Havana," said Captain Brand, as he sat down on the settee, and with a pretty tortoise-shell knife cut round the seals. "Ah! what says he? 'Happy to inform you,' is he? 'Packages of French silks seized by custom-house on account of informal invoice and clearance.' Why didn't the fool forge others, then? Well, what next? 'Schooner Reel, from Barbadoes, with cargo of rum, jerked beef, etc., wrecked going into Principe, and crew thrown into prison on suspicion of being engaged in—' Oh! oh! he served them right, when I ordered them to St. Jago—delighted they must be! 'Bills for advances and stores now due, please remit per bands of Don Ignacio Sanchez—' Hey! Cop tain Brand caught a ray from the one eye of his companion, which he returned with interest; and then laying the letters down on the table with the softest motion in life, he exclaimed, with a sigh,

"Not the best men in the world, as you say, compadre; all those rich goods and those bags of coffee and pipes of rum gone to the devil. But these are little accidents in our profession."

"Como?" said Señor Ignacio, "our profession?" shaking his forefinger before his paper cigar in a deprecating manner. "Speak for yourself, amigo."

"Ah! true," the other went on—"my profession. The freedom of the seas, the toll of the tropics, the right of search, and all that sort of thing—privateering, in fact. You know, to the usual risks." Here he inclined his head to one side and gave a slight cluck to his lips, as much as to say, "Remember we're man choking to death with a knotted rope under his ear. However, we must be more cautious in the future." And retiren to his glasses, for there are still on the sea as good barks as ever floated."

Captain Brand said this as if he were a mere chant of large means and strict integrity, and was about to enter into some shrewd commercial speculation.

"Hum!" murmured Señor Ignacio while pouring out another little glass of anisette. "Always true, you had better read the paper from Havana before you talk of another cruise."

"Oh! delighted to read the news, quite refreshing to get a peep at the world after being cooped up here for months! Another French revolution! Bonaparte alive yet! A Patriot war! Nelson and Villeneuve! All interesting."

Thus glancing rapidly over the prints, pausing at times at a paragraph that excited his attention, then tossing a paper away and taking up another, till suddenly Captain Brand's hand shook where he was he read aloud:

"His Britannic Majesty's squadron has been augmented on the West India station. Ships of Fire Fly, sloops Condor and Jeter, touched at Nassau, New Providence, on the second instant, bound to leeward. We also learn that the United States have fitted out a squadron of small vessels, called the Mosquito Fleet, to search for the suite of Lopez, who has so impudently mitted atrocities among the islands. He was last chased by the American corvette Scourge, off Morant Cays, on the east coast of Jamaica, but escaped during the night. The officer having day a shattered boat was picked up which had been cut away from the piratical schooner, containing several dead and dying bodies of the pirates. One of the latter gave such information to the Captain of the Scourge as leads to the hope that Brand's retreat may soon be discovered and his nest of pirates be destroyed. Received advices from Cape Haytien that a vessel loaded with valuable merchandize struck on the Cavallo Reef and went down. The crew, however, five in number, were rescued, but on landing were identified by the mate of the English bark Trident as a portion of the men who robbed that vessel and murdered the master and several of the passengers. Our readers may remember that among the latter were two sisters, who leaped overboard and were drowned, so as to save themselves the horror of a more cruel fate. The men identified as those were arrested by the civil Office, were sent in chains to Havana, and were yesterday publicly garroted in the Plaza of Moro Castle.

CHAPTER XI.

CONVERSATION IN SLEEVES AND POCKETS.

CAPTAIN BRAND laid down the paper without a sign of outward emotion, and nodded his head several times at the one-eyed man facing him. He then extracted his perfumed handkerchief, examined the cipher in the corner, and waved it before his face. Don Ignacio pulled out a red silk bandana and polished his eye as if it were the lens to a spy-glass. At length the corner spoke: "Amigo mio! The nets are spreading! But the fish are not in them yet!"

"No, amigo!"

"Ah, compadre! viento y ventura pocos duran! The fair breezes have chopped round in our teeth! Success, my friend, crentes jealousy, envy, hatred, and malice! Now here were we arranging along and quietly, when what we ter, only coming up for a bite occasionally, when on come those villainous sword-fishes and wish to drive us away?" Captain Brand gave expression to this pious homily in a tone of virtuous reproach against the world at large, and as if he were a very much injured and ill-used individual man. He touched the bell overhead as he spoke, and, putting his mouth to the tube, asked,

"Any thing in sight?"

"Nothing, Señor."

"Telegraph the man at the Tiger Trap station to keep a bright look-out, and direct the gunner to keep the battery manned day and night! Tell the boatswain to set two more chain on the other side at the Alligator's Mouth!"

Don Ignacio gave a rather suspicious glimmer at his vessel as this last order went forth, and inhaled; then he nodded-sweetly twice to the wrinkles about the line of his mouth could be tortured into a smile. He composed his features to divine nothing passing in the Don's mind, for he added, politely,

"The cable won't interfere with the Pawchita?"

"No, amigo! the felucca is anchored just outside of it. The Tuerto was about to mention any thing to chance, and he had taken the precaution to be on the safe side of the pirates, whether friends or enemies. He had indeed been as near an approach to a pirate himself as could be, and had only abandoned the business for a profession which, if less exciting, was more less risk and more profit. In other words, he was now a colonial officer in command of a Revenue Cutter, which, however, was shutting his eye—at piracy whenever he was well paid for it; and he invariably was well paid for it or else he made it so. Which, by the way, is as crafty and determined an old villain as ever smiled the West Indies. He had amassed a large fortune, and was a most inharcteristic-pirate, pretty much all his wealth acquired by the easy trouble of holding his tongue. Yet his greed was insatiable, and he would have sold and sold the fingers from his hands, and his legs and arms with them, all save his single black hair of an ogre—which he would have kept for doubloons. In fact, this feverish thirst after gold, which always raged in his hot veins, had induced him to join Brand's band at first, and he shall see with what result. The truth is, however, that Captain Brand was the only man of his nationality he could trust, and the one for whom he felt the least dread. He knew him to be bold, skillful, and wary, and a man of a high and chivalrous organization that should he play him false, his own neck might get a wrench in the gargoule while he was throwing the noose for his confrère.

To return, however, to the pair of worthies sitting in conclave in the parlor of the Cachita. Assuming the conversation, observed in a careless tone, quite as if the subject under discussion was a matter of indifference:

"When will this swarm of hornets be down upon us?"

The Spaniard blew a thick puff of smoke from his cigarrito, and still holding it between his teeth, while his eye glittered through the murky cloud, he replied,

"Perhaps a fortnight, a little more or less. I left St. Jago five days ago, with orders from the Administrator to beat up for the rest of the island and procure information for the English consul."

"Any cruisers down that way?"

"Ay! the corvette Scourge and the Snapper schooner; they arrived the night before I sailed."

"Did you speak with the officers, amigo?"

"O, si! I had a long talk with the Captain of the corvette at the custom-house!"

"Hola! you did, eh?"

"Yes! I showed him a chart of the Isle of Pines, and pointed out how to get into the old hole!"

Here the pair laughed short laughs, when Brand continued his questions with,

"And how did he get out?"

"Hooked him, for I heard him order his first lieutenant to be ready for weighing at daylight, and say that he would proceed direct with that of the dying man they picked up in the Cantipede's boat!" replied the Tuerto, with a chuckle.

"Good!" exclaimed Brand, as the fat face assumed an unwonted sternness, while he rested his cheek on his left hand with the elbow on the table, and slipped the right into the pocket of his trowsers.

"Bueno! amigo mio! But how do I know but you may have made a little mistake, and described another haunt besides the Island of Pines, off its north-eastern end?"

There was the faintest click of a noise in the Captain's pocket as he spoke, but not so faint but that it struck upon the ear of the Spaniard, and, pushing back his chair a foot or two from the table, he raised his right hand, the forefingers and thumb slightly bent inward, but grasping a jewel-hilted knife, whose dim, blue blade glimmered up the loose sleeve. There was nothing threatening, apparently, in the movement, though the two villains looked at each other with a cold, murderous, unflinching glare.

The Don was the first to break the silence; and he said, in a low, hissing tone,

"Maldito! Because I had a little account of plata to settle with you before the men-o'-war should roast you out! But beware! Capitano mio! I left a little will at St. Jago with directions where to find me in case I did not return in a certain time!"

"Ho, compadre! how very cautious with your friends! Why, what has put such thoughts into your head? Diavolo! we have stood by one another too long to mistrust now! There! my hand upon it!"

Saying this Captain Brand's whole manner changed, and drawing his hand from his pocket he reached over toward his companion. The Don, however, remained in his sairowly, and his head out a wary sparkle as he withdrew his hand, when cautiously putting forth his own left, he touched the cold, thin, brown fingers to those of the man before him. This operation ended, he quietly sipped a few drops of anisette and pulled and lighted another paper cigar.

"Well, amigo! let us now proceed to business," said Brand, gayly, "for dinner will soon be ready, and we have no time to lose. How stands the account?"

"The papers are on board the felucca, and it will be more convenient when the settlement is made to come on board with the money. How would to-morrow morning do? There's no hurry?"

"Just as you choose, friend of my soul! The doubloons, or the silk, or broadcloth is ready for you at any moment. Say you in any thing except the delicious wines of France. Bueno!" he added, pulling out a splendid gold repeater, with a ruinous display of the clustred knob. "And now, amigo! accept this little token into the bargain."

Don Ignacio's fiery eye twinkled with greed; but it was only for a moment, when, giving a quick glance at the coronet and coat of arms, he waved his forefinger from side to side and shook his head.

"What's No? Why you know it once belonged to the Captain-General of Cuba, old Tacon de rol de ridda tol—what was his name? He gave it me, you know, together with some other trinkets, for—for—you know—you remember? Very generous old gentleman—noble man indeed—that was. May he live a thousand years, or more, if he can!"

Ay, Don Ignacio did remember the circumstance attending that generous transaction, and he remembered to have heard also that the Captain-General made a present of all his money and jewels when the pirate of the Spanish Main delivered at his throat. He said nothing, however, in allusion to this interesting episode, but he smiled meaningly, and went on with his cigar.

"Not take it, eh? Well, amigo, I must look on up somewhere else for dinner. Basta! the keys of the wine-cellar. The best, my beauty, and plenty of it! Ah! Doctor mio! is he compañion: "Suppose we take a stroll to the Tiger's Trap; the sun is sinking, and a walk will give us an appetite for the turtle-soup—vamos!"

CHAPTER XII.

DOCTOR AND PRIEST.

WHILE Captain Brand and Don Ignacio Sanchez walked pleasantly along the pebbly shore of the clear blue inlet to the Tiger's Trap, let us, too, examine the curious habitations which sheltered the Pirate's haunt. Apart from the mat-sheds of the shelly cove of the basin, where the Congo and Spanish negroes dwelled, there was a nest of red-tiled buildings which served the crew of the former vessel for a dwelling place in any of the temporary situations of a little sandy plateau, within a stone's-throw of the water, and shaded by a cluster of palm-trees; while in the rear of the whole jungle of cocoa and bushes, through which led numerous paths to a small lagoon beyond. The buildings were four in number, and of those houses, the basis was plastered with yellow clay, with broad, projecting eaves extending over roughly-built piazza. Seated at the door of each one of these buildings we have described were two men. One, the shorter of the two, was dressed in a long, loose, Dombaston garment, about his waist by a white rope, which fell in knotted ends over his knees. A red handkerchief was bound in a turban of black ebony beads, hooked on to a heavy gold cross which rested on his cagacious breast, and which the wearer was continually fondling and occasionally pressing to his lips. His face was dark and sensual—thick, unctuous lips, a flat nose, and a low, receding forehead, over the fringe of raven hair went like a thick curtain all around his head, only leaving a bluish-white round patch on the crown exposed. This individual was the Padre Ricardo, who, for some good reasons best known to himself, had left his clerical charge in the city of Vera Cruz, and taken service with Captain Brand. One of the reasons for leaving—and rather abruptly, too—was that the Padre was confided into the heart of his own father, who had reported him to his superior for his licentiousness. The Padre, however, was not aware that he was accurately entirely by filial duty in killing his old parent, to save him the pain and disgrace which would have followed the exposure of his son! He still clung to the priestly calling, and prided himself upon his feats and vigils, and never omitted the smallest forms or penances; and said mass from Ave Maria in the early morning to Angelus at vesper time in the evening. For Captain Brand he was always ready to shrive a dying pirate—and pretty busy he was, too, at times—or look after the spiritual affairs of a troubled conscience in sound health; which, if important to the safety or well-being of the fraternity, he took every opportunity of imparting to his superior in command. In these pursuits he not only made himself useful to Captain Brand, but he became more or less his confidant and adviser; and seemed to maintain his influence by ghostly advice over the superstitious feelings of the men. The Padre, however, utterly detested the sea, and never touched his soft feet in the water if he could by any possibility avoid it; but since he had plenty to eat and drink on the island, and no end of prayers for his amusement when in charge of the haunt was his own to look out for the people who were left when the Centipede sailed on service, he thus passed the time in a delightfully agreeable manner.

The companion who sat opposite to the Padre was a tall, gaunt, cadaverous person, evidently of French extraction, with sandy hair and sun-burnt about his face; but yet the physiognomy expressed the utmost determination of character—such a heart and eye as could perform a delicate surgical operation without a flutter of nerve or eyelid, and who would stand before a leveled pistol looking calmly down the barrel as the hammer fell. His face was intellectual, and he never smiled. His whole appearance portrayed a thorough sternness. Where he came from no one knew; nor did he ever open his lips, even to the Captain, with a reason for taking service among his band. All known was that he landed from a slaver at St. Jago, and was engaged by Don Ignacio to serve professionally with Brand in the same capacity as the Spanish Main. When, however, he reached the rendezvous of the pirates, and discovered that they were altogether a different sort of gentleman he had bargained for, he nevertheless made no objections to remain, and took the oath of allegiance to the articles, stating that he did not be called upon to take an active part in their proceedings. Since then, he had been absent for three years, attending to the sick or wounded, taking no interest in the accounts of the exploits of the Centipede when returned from cruising, and holding speech with any one save his room-mate, the Padre, or occasionally a dinner or a walk with Captain Brand. On the last occasion, however, of the Centipede he had been induced to go on board, so that he might become a check on the greed of the brutal ruffians who had been placed temporarily in command; but, as we have already seen, his influence had been of little avail.

There was yet another occupant of the room inhabited by the Doctor and Padre Ricardo; and a low moan would very easily cause the first to rise quietly from his chair and approach the low iron bedstead on his side of the lodging. There, beneath a light cotton mosquito-net, lay one poor little Henri—his once round, rosy, innocent face now pale and thin, with a red spot on each cheek, and a dark soft line beneath each sunken eye. Uneasily he moved in his fitful slumber; and putting his little hands together as if in prayer, he murmured, "Oh! mamma! mamma!" Beside the bed stood an unglazed jar of lemonade, together with a phial and a spoon. The Doctor drew nigh, and, gently pushing aside the curtain, stood looking at the child for some minutes. Presently the little sick boy feebly stretched out his delicate, thin hands, and unclosed his eyes. Oh! how dim, and sad, and touching was that look, as he gave a timid, half-wild stare, and then, while the lids light tremulously, the hot drops bubbled out and coursed slowly down his tender cheeks.

The Doctor, with the gentleness of a woman, bent over him, and taking up his poor, limp little hand, he remained for a few moments counting pulse and catching the hot breath on his dark cheeks. As if communing with himself—as a glow of compassion lighted his care-worn visage, he muttered, "By the great and good God who bears me, if I save this child I will restore him to his mother's embrace!" He sank back on his knees by the bedside as he made his vow, and letting the little hand rest on the bed, he looked into the face in his devotions. What thoughts passed through that man's mind none but the Almighty knows; but when he rose from his knees there was a calm and resolved expression, and pouring a little lemonade in a glass he held it to the sleeper's lips. Then he moved noiselessly back to the table, he said, in a low tone,

"Padre, the boy will live. His fever is leaving him, and he will get well."

"Ave Maria Santissima!" ejaculated the Padre, crossing himself and kissing his cross, "I knew that you had the new drug in the Doctor. I will make him a little priest, and he shall swing the censer and chant the Misericordias when I get the new church at Vera."

"Time enough to think of that, mi Padre, when he gets strong again. But you have all when he gets strong again. But you have all your prayers to say, or he will do him no good, and so I hope you won't put yourself to the trouble."

"Doctor, amigo, Doctor; but don't sneer at the prayers of the Church. They do good; they ease the soul and soothe the pangs of Purgatory!"

"Ah! and how long do you expect to stop in Purgatory?"

"A—purissima! What a question to ask your pious and devout Padre Ricardo!"

"I question you, my holy priest fire," retorted the Doctor, as he opened a book lying on the table before him, and put an end to the conversation. His companion then helped himself to a measure of pure gin and unclasped the covers of his richly-bound missal.

Scarcely, however, had their conversation ceased when a hoarse hum of many voices was heard in the direction of the sheds without, mingled with shouts in all tongues and uproarious laughter.

"Diavolo!" said the Doctor, looking out of an open window "the people have knocked off work and are coming home to their supper,

They seem to have brought some of the crew of the felucca with them too. We shall have a loud night of it, for the Captain has sent them a pipe of wine and a barrel of rum to carouse with."

"Pobre cito! all They have had a hard time of it during the summer; short of rum, and water, too, I hear, and they need refreshment and repose. So many of my poor flock killed too by that accursed American cowards. I must hear to administer the last consolations and holy rites," sighed the Padre, as he kissed the crucifix and bowed his head. "There's Lascar Joe too among the missing! He refused the Sacrament, infidel as he was, the day before he sailed; but what turtle-soup he made! The Padre hereupon sighed deeply again, but whether for the loss of the Lascar or the soup no one knows.

The noise without increased; the rattle of crockery, the clinking of glasses, the moving of feet, and all the sounds of hungry, boisterous sailors at table. Soon, too, a shout or cheer would be heard, then a verse of a song, roars of laughter, and now and then the tickle of a guitar struck by vigorous fingers in waltz or fandango.

"Marci!" muttered the Doctor, as he looked compassionately at the sick child on the bed, "those noisy devils will, I fear, disturb the little boy, and it is a hot time too, Padre, as the place we all are going to."

"It is warm, my son!" he replied, as his thick, unctuous lips parted with a smile at his companion's allusion to another and a hotter place; "but I think if our good Capitano would have a cool drop for my little patient, it will be soon of the big building there. It is always cool on the crop, you know!"

"Ah! perhaps he will!" said the Doctor, reflectively; "I'll see about it."

Stepping again to the bedside of the little sufferer, he laid a hand gently on his forehead, where the soft curls lay in confusion about his temples, and then quickly touching his pulse he regarded him attentively for a few moments, while at the same time a light glow of perspiration came hastily over the innocent face and spread itself down the neck.

"His fever is breaking! Grace à Dieu!" whispered the Doctor to the Padre; "his pulse is regular and cool, and he is sleeping sweetly. Now, if you like, we will go to see the Captain; and if he consents, I will carry the child with he wakes to the dwelling." The Doctor carefully closed the door of the room as he and his companion stepped out into the open air, and spread itself down the neck.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, April 23, in the Senate, President Bigler chose unanimous copies of the resolutions passed on Saturday. Mr. M'Lean, when Minister to China. The Postmaster-General was requested to report the copies of the contracts entered with Messrs. Johnson and Vanderbilt, respectively, for carrying the mails.——In the House, Mr. Bocock then suggested that time might be saved if gentlemen were willing to waive the tariff, and instead refer it to the Committee of the Whole. But a motion of Mr. Pidgin, that when the House adjourn, it be to-day, was negatived, and the House went into Committee of the Whole. Mr. Avery defended Southern rights from Republican aggression, and Mr. Morrill argued that the increase of the tariff was a necessity, that the part of the public debt which falls due in 1868 may be paid.

On Tuesday, April 24, the Senate was not in session. Mr. Grimes introduced an amendment to the Constitution, being occupied with debates on the slavery and tariff questions.

On Wednesday, April 25, the Senate not being in session, in the House, a bill was introduced granting to each newspaper and periodical readers may receive packages by mail at pay rates of freight. In Committee of the Whole, several Republican members, including Mr. Garvin, of Ohio, delivered their views on the constitutionality of the Fugitive Slave Law.

On Thursday, April 26, in the Senate, several executive communications were received, among them the report of Mr. Crosby relative to the difficulties between the United States and Great Britain respecting the occupation of the island of Ruatan. Some unimportant business was transacted, and the Senate adjourned till Monday. In the House, a discussion took place on the slavery question.

On Friday, April 27, in the House, the Senate not being in session, a resolution was offered directing the Secretary of War to communicate to the House the Commission as a full plan of the floating steady battery for the defence of the harbor of New York; which has been in progress of construction at Hoboken for some years past, under the superintendence of the Board of Engineers. A motion was made to the reception of the resolution, and no action was taken on it. In Committee of the Whole, half a dozen political speeches were made.

THE CHARLESTON CONVENTION.

At the City of Charleston, on April 23, the Democratic National Convention assembled at noon. There was a full attendance from every State in the Union. The Convention was called to order by Judge Stanley, Chairman of the National Committee. During the morning, of Arkansas, was chosen temporary Chairman, and returned thanks for the honor. Prayer was offered by Rev. Dr. Hanckel, of Charleston. William F. Ritchie, of Virginia, was appointed temporary Secretary. After a warm dispute occasioned by the attempt to read a letter from the Ohio delegation from New York, Mr. Avery, of Ohio, offered a resolution to appoint a committee on permanent organization. Mr. Rickards, of Illinois, offered an amendment that the committee shall consist only of members from States from which there was no contest. Mr. Richardson, of Illinois, spoke in favor of harmony, and urged gentlemen to keep cool and preserve order. Mr. Cochrane did not desire any thing but a fair hearing. Mr. Cook, of Ohio, offered a resolution confining only New York and Illinois from participating in the organization, the seating of delegates being contested. Mr. Clarke, of Missouri, protested that the resolution was out of order; for a State should be excluded whose delegations have been admitted by the Rules. (Cheers and groans.) Mr. Cook contended that those who were admitted to the floor had a right to participate in all the acts of organization except the Committee on Credentials. A long debate followed, participated in by Messrs. Richardson, Judge Mack, of Alabama, and Barksdale, of Mississippi. Mr. Cessna offered an amendment that the committee, now on organization, and one on credentials, be appointed, following New York to be excluded from the latter. The previous question was called, and the resolution adopted by ayes 165, nays 98.

The vote on striking the New York and Illinois delegations from the Committee on Credentials was adopted with the following negative votes: Maryland, 3 • Virginia, 15; Georgia, 10; Alabama, 9; Louisiana, 6; Mississippi, 7; Texas, 4; California, 3. Balance all in the affirmative. Ayes, 344; nays, 54. A resolution was introduced requesting the delegates from New York and Illinois not to participate in the organization until the right to the seats of the delegates is settled. A motion to lay the resolution on the table was carried—ayes, 202; nays, 84. On the motion the vote was nearly the same as the previous one, except that Wisconsin has the affirmative and Arkansas in the negative.

The States were called for the report of the Committee on Organization and Credentials, and were appointed by the delegations.

A resolution was offered requesting the credentials to be handed to Secretary Ritchie for safe-keeping and directing that Fernando Wood be heard to-day. Mr. Richardson moved to refer the resolution to the Committee without debate. Mr. Cochrane moved to amend by striking out the word "debate," and by inserting the word "discussion." Mr. Richardson accepted the amendment. Mr. Wright, of Pennsylvania, made a strong appeal for harmony. If the Convention should adjourn to-day, nominations to be made would not be worth the paper on which they were recorded when known to the country. The will was in favor of the rule. Every delegate should be permitted to cast the vote of his State, despite the convictions and those of his constituents. Pennsylvania had never voted as a unit except when the Convention was unanimous. He closed by demanding the previous question, and the vote was then taken on the rule of the report relating to presiding officers, and it was adopted unanimously.

Mr. Flournoy, the temporary Chairman, then returned thanks, counseling moderation and harmony. The ayes still marching under one flag. The Democratic party has but one flag—the flag of the Constitution. The Democratic sentiment, and hoped no more allusions would be made to such divisions.

CALEB CUSHING'S ADDRESS.

Hon. Caleb Cushing was then introduced to the Convention, amidst tumultuous applause.

When the cheering subsided General Cushing addressed the Convention as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONVENTION.—I respectfully refer to you my name associated with the nomination for the honor which you have this day done me in appointing me by general acclamation your President. I am aware, a responsible duty imposed, much more than a high honor conferred. But I am encouraged to accept it in the direction of business and of debate, and in the preservation of order, by the confidence reasonably and faithfully and impartially to effectate here as your minister, and not invalidly to preside over you. It is a great deliberative assembly like this it is not the presiding officer in whom the strength resides. It is not his strength, that power—[Loud applause]—which is the result of the instinct of self-respect. I rely, gentlemen, confidently upon you, not upon myself. This is a great parliamentary dispatch of the business of this Convention. Gentlemen, you have come here from the united hands of the Eastern States, from the rich States of the imperial centre, from the new-lighted States of the North-West, and the fertile States of the mighty basin of the Mississippi, from the golden coast of the Pacific, and from the Gulf. [Loud cheers.] You have come hither in the exercise of the highest political duty which belongs to participate, to aid in the election of the future rulers of the republic. You are the representatives of the true democratic party—of that great party of the Union whose grand mission it is to combine and to reconcile the reconcilable popular freedom for constitutional order, to maintain the supremacy of the laws of the United States. [Loud and long-continued applause.] To stand, in a word, on the broad platform of fiction and fundamental Constitution. Cries of "That's the talk!" and loud and enthusiastic cheering.] Gentlemen, I repeat, it is a motto inscribed on that scroll in the hands of the monumental statue of our great statesman and sage, Washington—"Truth, Justice, and the Constitution." [Loud cheers.] Opposed to us are those who desire to overthrow the Constitution, under the false and insidious pretense of supporting it. [Laughter.] Opposed to us are those who in this country a permanent sectional conspiracy—a traitorous sectional conspiracy—against the Union and the rest of the Union against the other half; those who, impelled by this stupid and fanatical spirit of faction and fanaticism, would hurry our land on to revolution and to civil war. Those, the representatives of that sectional party, is the part, the high and noble part, of the Democracy of the Union to meet and to defeat. [Loud and long cheers.] Ay, that is our part, and we will do it in the name of our God and our country. [Loud cheers.] Ay, we will do it; [great and enthusiastic cheers.] Ay, we will do it; for, gentlemen, we have the power, we have the right, we have the spair of the genius of our country; we will continue to prosper with unexampled [sic] prosperity, under the Almighty God. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Cushing then again loudly cheered upon the conclusion of his address.

UNIT VOTING.

A warm debate sprung up on the rule reported by the Committee on Organization, in which Messrs. Richardson, M'Cook, Cochrane, Bocock, Avery, and Judge Mack, of Indiana, spoke; Messrs. Randall, of Pennsylvania, and many others took part. Mr. Richardson moved the previous question on the rule. Mr. Randall also opposed it, declaring that certain delegations from Pennsylvania and Illinois had been proposed to violate and misrepresent their constituents in voting for Douglas, whose nomination by the Convention would lead to certain defeat. He then went into a review of the action of the Committee on Credentials relative to this subject. Mr. Richardson rose to reply, and asked Mr. Randall whether he had not violated the Democratic principles and freedom? How long had the gentleman been in the Democratic party? [Laughter.] Cries of "Order" and great excitement. Several persons rose to points of order. Mr. Chairman decided that Mr. Richardson was entitled to the floor, and that with his decision denying his right. Mr. Richardson, standing on the platform, declared that he had been misrepresented, and if entrusted to be heard, was kindly allowed to go on, and he would show that he had not. He would only come down to the fold, alluding to his political associates entitling him to the right of representation in the Convention. [Laughter.] He did not desire, after a life of service in the cause, to be denied the right of representation. [Laughter.] The question was called on the motion to strike out the word relative to the right of representation of delegates to the Convention, and the rules instructed by the convention that appointed them. During the discussion which ensued the greatest excitement prevailed. The Secretary, Virginia, Rodes, and other delegations protested against the announcement of the Chairman, saying the rules of the United States as a unit against the adoption of the rule. Ten of the twelve Tennessee delegates were opposed to the manner in which the vote of that State had been recorded. The vote was finally announced as follows: ayes, 101; nays, 248. So the rule was adopted, and the majority of a delegation was declared to be entitled to cast the vote of that State, under instructed by the convention that appointed them.

THE COMMITTEE ON PLATFORM.

The resolution of the appointment of a committee on resolutions and a platform was then called up, and an amendment or two was offered, when Mr. Bocock, President or Vice-President until the committee have made their report. A vote was first taken on the resolution for the appointment of the committee, which was adopted. The committee was then appointed by the vote, on the rule against unit voting is regarded as a test vote. The vote to lay it on the table was as follows:

Massachusetts	8	Alabama	9
Pennsylvania	14	Louisiana	6
Ohio	21	Mississippi	7
Maryland	5	Texas	4
Virginia	15	Arkansas	4
North Carolina	7	Missouri	9
South Carolina	8	California	3
Georgia	10	Oregon	3
Illinois	11

Total ayes, 161; nays, all the balance of the States, 258.

OTHER MATTERS OF ORGANIZATION.

After the Committee on Platform was announced, the motion was renewed on the proposition that no balloting shall be had until the report of the Committee on Platform be adopted. A motion to lay the resolution on the table was rejected.——Mr. Avery, of Ohio, said he was then taken on the resolution, and it was adopted by acclamation. A new point was raised on the propagation to limit members from speaking more than once on the same question, and finally laid over to the morrow. The President was directed to invite ministers of the Convention with prayer. Judge Mack, of Indiana, moved the Alabama platform, and it was referred to the Committee on Platform. The Committee on Credentials anon stated that they would not be able to report before the following morning. The Convention adjourned.

SPEECHES NOT TO BE LIMITED.

On Wednesday, April 25, the Convention met at ten o'clock.

The resolution restricting speakers to fifteen minutes, and not once on the same subject, was taken up, debated, and rejected—ayes, 148; nays, 154.

A Southern delegate demanded that there should be no gag law on any subject.

The motion was adopted limiting speaking to fifteen minutes on all subjects except the platform, and on that the time was extended to one hour—ayes, 237; nays, 71.

CREDENTIALS AND DELEGATIONS.

The Committee on Credentials reported that the sitting delegates from New York, Maryland, Illinois, Massachusetts, and Maryland (the latter T. M. Lonsdale and Wm. H. Norris) were entitled to their seats.

The report of the minority of the committee was presented. It is in favor of admitting the rival delegations from Alabama, California, Arkansas, Texas, Georgia, and Mississippi, and recommends that one-half of the votes of each State be given to the Douglas and the other half to each to cast 71 votes.

The announcement of the result was received with cheers and great excitement.

A motion was made that Fernando Wood delegates to honorable seats on the floor added to the excitement, but the rose was laid on the table—ayes, 152; nays, 151.

A vote was for taken on the Illinois question, and the minority report was adopted.

The vote was next taken on the Maryland question, and the majority report was adopted by a vote of 152 to 151.

A vote was taken by States on the minority report of the Committee on Credentials between the two New York delegations.

The States voted aye were: North Carolina, 5; Georgia, 10; Virginia, 15; Missouri, 1; Alabama, 9; Louisiana, 6; Texas, 4; Mississippi, 7; California, 3; Arkansas, 3. Ayes, 58; nays, 210. So the Dean Richmond delegation was seated and Mr. Wood delegation excluded.

After some other business the Convention, at seven o'clock, adjourned.

NO PLATFORM YET.

On Thursday, April 26, nothing was done in the Convention as the Committee on Platform had not reported. The Committee on Credentials also reported nothing.

On Friday, 27th, three reports were made from the Committee on Platform, one by a majority of the committee, affirming that it is the duty of Congress to protect slavery in the Territories; one by a minority report of the Committee saying nothing about slavery in the Territories, but affirming the Cincinnati platform, submitted by Hon. F. Butler, of Massachusetts, simply indorsing the Cincinnati platform, and the Dred Scott decision. The three reports were discussed by Messrs. Avery (O.), Cushing (Mass.), Guthrie (Ky.), Richardson (Ill.), and others. Mr. Cochrane (N. Y.) offered a new Platform—affirming the rights of Congressional protection of slavery in the Territories; and Mr. Bayard another to the same purport. Discussion was had upon them till the adjournment.

REPUBLICAN CONVENTION AT BALTIMORE.

A fair portrayal of the Convention on Thursday and Friday and a Maryland Republican State Convention, for the purpose of electing Delegates to the Chicago Convention, and making preparations for the Presidential Ticket (N. Y. Times), was held in Baltimore. Governor Hicks attended the meeting, and at an early stage of the proceedings explained that he had called the Convention to prevent of the disgraces, and destroyed their papers. This was done in the midst of the tumultuous shouts of the Convention. The proprietor of the hall where the meeting was held refused to allow the Democratic meeting to hold premises in the afternoon. They, however, met at a private hall, and appointed delegates to the Chicago Convention, and a State Committee who were empowered to nominate an electoral ticket, which they resolved to support at the Presidential election.

PERSONAL.

The New York correspondent of the Charleston Courier says that there "was a grand wedding up the North River, on Tuesday, the 24th, between a daughter and a son of the great author. A son of Governor Morgan was married to a daughter of General James Watson Webb, of the Courier and Enquirer."

N. W. Lyon, a Revolutionary soldier, died at his residence in Easton, Connecticut, on the morning of the 18th inst., in his one hundred and first year. He was engaged in the Continental service during the Army for some time.

The Prince of Wales, on his visit to this country, will be attended by nine gentlemen of honor and one of the Queen's Favorites of State, who will probably be the Duke of Newcastle.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE GARIBALDI EXCITEMENT.

The great prize-fight between Heenan and Sayers came off, near Aldershot, on the morning of 17th April. Sayers was the favorite, and the betting was 5 to 4 on him, finally handed by Heenan. Sayers drew first blood, but Heenan soon got the mastery in the first knock-down. In the thirty-third round, Sayers's friends finding him exhausted, threw up the sponge, and Heenan was declared upon the ring. This continued till the thirty-eighth round, when Sayers was declared victor, and Heenan was carried off the field. The battle lasted two hours and twenty minutes, and was fought with great determination on both sides. Heenan's head was severely bruised, and his face much disfigured, while Sayers was but little marked. Sayers was much exhausted, and was finally laid over the ropes. The Prince of Wales was present, and the Queen's favorite sent to inquire after the health of the champion.

In the 40th and 41st rounds this dishonorable treatment was resorted to. In the 40th Heenan being brought up until Heenan presented himself before him, and declared he would not fight any more. Sayers, finding that he was up the last time he was in his corner, and his seconds refused to support him in the round, he managed to him, by throwing up the sponge, he advanced upon him in the midst of the uproar, and declared that where he only being struck in return by some one else in that corner he advanced upon him, and with a single but indignation at the outrageous manner in which the object of the ambition had been treated, he received from him, he opened a free fight against them all. His friends, however interfered, and order was restored in the corner. Ever whose, after declaring himself to be the winner of the fight, and the winner of the belt and title of the Champion of England, he left the ring. Fair-minded men will honorably applaud and will decide whether these facts, so clearly and bravely won, shall not be given to him because he as a stranger to their soil.

THE RESULT.

The Herald correspondent says: "The general topic of conversation to-day in London was the great combat of yesterday. The feeling in the minds of the public is almost entirely in favor of Heenan. The breaking in of the ring was a concerted plan of the pickpockets, who were disappointed in the battle not lasting Saturday; nearly every American losing his watch or pocket-book.

